

Encyclopedia of
AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES

Volume 1

A – F

Index

Paul Finkelman

Editor

Encyclopedia of
AMERICAN
CIVIL LIBERTIES

Encyclopedia of AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES

Volume 1
A – F
Index

Paul Finkelman
Editor

 Routledge
Taylor & Francis Group
New York London

Routledge is an imprint of the Taylor & Francis Group, an informa business

Routledge
Taylor & Francis Group
270 Madison Avenue
New York, NY 10016

Routledge
Taylor & Francis Group
2 Park Square
Milton Park, Abingdon
Oxon OX14 4RN

© 2006 by Taylor & Francis Group, LLC
Routledge is an imprint of Taylor & Francis Group, an Informa business

Printed in the United States of America on acid-free paper
10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

International Standard Book Number-10: 0-415-94342-6 (Hardcover)
International Standard Book Number-13: 978-0-415-94342-0 (Hardcover)

No part of this book may be reprinted, reproduced, transmitted, or utilized in any form by any electronic, mechanical, or other means, now known or hereafter invented, including photocopying, microfilming, and recording, or in any information storage or retrieval system, without written permission from the publishers.

Trademark Notice: Product or corporate names may be trademarks or registered trademarks, and are used only for identification and explanation without intent to infringe.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Encyclopedia of American civil liberties / Paul Finkelman, editor.

p. cm.

ISBN 0-415-94342-6 (set : alk. paper)

1. Civil rights--United States--Encyclopedias. 2. Civil rights--United States--Cases. I. Finkelman, Paul, 1949-

KF4747.5.E53 2006

342.7308'503--dc22

2006045284

Visit the Taylor & Francis Web site at <http://www.taylorandfrancis.com> and the Routledge Web site at <http://www.routledge-ny.com>

For Judge Avern Cohn, a friend of legal history and civil liberties.

CONTENTS

Editorial Board	ix
Contributors	xi
Alphabetical List of Entries	xxv
Thematic List of Entries	xli
Introduction	lvii
Entries A to Z	1
Index	II

EDITOR

Paul Finkelman

President William McKinley Distinguished Professor of Law and Public Policy and Senior Fellow in the Government Law Center at Albany Law School

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

Gabriel J. Chin

Chester H. Smith Professor of Law, Professor of Public Administration, University of Arizona

Davison M. Douglas

Hanson Professor of Law, Director, Institute of Bill of Rights Law, William and Mary School of Law

Rodney A. Smolla

Dean and Allen Professor of Law, T.C. Williams School of Law, University of Richmond

Melvin I. Urofsky

Professor of Public Policy, Emeritus, Virginia Commonwealth University

Mary L. Volcansek

Dean and Professor of Political Science, Addran College of Humanities and Social Sciences, Texas Christian University

CONTRIBUTORS

Douglas E. Abrams
University of Missouri

Erin Ackerman
Johns Hopkins University

Jeffrey F. Addicott
St. Mary's University School of Law

J. Mark Alcorn
Independent Scholar

Mark C. Alexander
Seton Hall University

Azizah Y. Al-Hibri
University of Richmond

Craig H. Allen
University of Washington

Diane Marie Amann
University of California, Davis

Vikram D. Amar
University of California, Hastings College of the Law

David A. Anderson
University of Texas at Austin

Christopher J. Anderson
Drew University

Jean-Claude André
Ivey, Smith & Ramirez

Keith Aoki
University of Oregon

Annette R. Appell
University of Nevada, Las Vegas

Michael S. Ariens
St. Mary's University

Jennifer J. Ashley
Boise State University

Miriam J. Aukerman
Legal Aid of Western Michigan

Irene Segal Ayers
New York University

Paul R. Baier
Louisiana State University

Enoch W. Baker
Wayne State University

Julie A. Baker
Suffolk University

David T. Ball
Methodist Theological School

William C. Banks
Syracuse University

Judith M. Barger
Appalachian School of Law

Gordon S. Barker
College of William and Mary

Robin D. Barnes
University of Connecticut

Randy E. Barnett
Boston University

Rebecca Barnhart
City University of New York

Kathleen L. Barrett
Georgia State University

Robert F. Bauer
Perkins Coie LLP

CONTRIBUTORS

Francis J. Beckwith

Baylor University

Valena Elizabeth Beety

University of Chicago

Angela Behrens

University of Minnesota

Valerie R. Bell

Boise State University

Diane Benjamin

University of Montana

Thomas C. Berg

University of St. Thomas

Kathleen Hawkins Berkowe

Law Offices of Kathleen Hawkins Berkowe

David E. Bernstein

George Mason University

Ashutosh Bhagwat

University of California, Hastings College of the Law

Jean Binkovitz

Independent Scholar

J. Michael Bitzer

Catawba College

David Blackett

University of Arizona

G. Robert Blakey

Notre Dame University

Robert Blecker

New York Law School

Eric D. Blumenson

Suffolk University

Eli C. Bortman

Babson College

Michael W. Bowers

University of Nevada, Las Vegas

Cynthia Grant Bowman

Northwestern University

William C. Bradford

Indiana University-Purdue University

Craig M. Bradley

Indiana University

Elizabeth B. Brandt

University of Idaho

Daniel L. Brenner

National Cable TV Association

Susan W. Brenner

University of Dayton

J. Richard Broughton

Texas Wesleyan University

Todd Brower

Western State University College of Law

Geneva Brown

University of Nevada, Las Vegas

William H. Brown

North Carolina Office of Archives and History

Michael J. Broyde

Emory University

James J. Brudney

Ohio State University

Karen Bruner

Syracuse University

Michael H. Burchett

Limestone College

Alafair S. Burke

Hofstra University

John M. Burkoff

University of Pittsburgh

David D. Burnett

University of Virginia

Charles R. Calleros

Arizona State University

Clay Calvert

Pennsylvania State University

Dale Carpenter

University of Minnesota

Elizabeth S. Carpenter

Averett University

David M. Carr

Honeywell International Inc.

Nicole B. Cásarez

University of St. Thomas

John S. Celichowski

St. Benedict the Moor Ministries

Michael C. Cernovich

Law Offices of Norm Pattis

Michael Chang

Santa Clara University School of Law

Anthony Chase

Nova Southeastern University

Jim Chen

University of Minnesota

Sanjay K. Chhablani

Syracuse University

Ann B. Ching

United States Military Academy

Kathryn H. Christopher

University of Tulsa

Russell L. Christopher

University of Tulsa

Thomas K. Clancy

University of Mississippi

Jason A. Cole

University of Arizona

Ruth Colker

Ohio State University

Peter A. Collins

Boise State University

Ronald K. L. Collins

The First Amendment Center

Todd A. Collins

University of Georgia

Daniel O. Conkle

Indiana University

Beverly Blair Cook

University of Wisconsin, Milwaukee, Emeritus

Mark W. Cordes

Northern Illinois University

Ezekiel E. Cortez

Independent Scholar

Vance L. Cowden

University of South Carolina

Randall T. Coyne

University of Oklahoma

B. Keith Crew

University of Northern Iowa

David B. Cruz

University of Southern California

Larry Cunningham

Texas Tech University

Perry Dane

Rutgers University

M. K. B. Darmer

Chapman University

Brian Daugherty

College of William and Mary

James Corbett David

College of William and Mary

Martha F. Davis

Northeastern University

Louis A. Day

Louisiana State University

Dominic DeBrincat

University of Connecticut

Nora V. Demleitner

Hofstra University

George M. Dery, III

California State University

Neal Devins

College of William and Mary

Suzanne L. Diaz

University of Arizona

CONTRIBUTORS

J. Amy Dillard

American University

Michael Dimino

Widener University

Robert Dingwall

University of Nottingham

Michael Dodson

Texas Christian University

James M. Donovan

University of Georgia

Davison M. Douglas

College of William and Mary

David Dow

University of Houston

Steven B. Dow

Michigan State University

Robert E. Drechsel

University of Wisconsin, Madison

Daniel L. Dreisbach

American University

Joshua Dressler

Ohio State University

Father Robert F. Drinan, S. J.

Georgetown University

William V. Dunlap

Quinnipiac University

Philip Dynia

Loyola University

Rebecca Goodgame Ebinger

Yale University

Jane Eggers

University of Arizona

Jeannine M. Eiband

Boise State University

James W. Ely, Jr.

Vanderbilt University

Francene M. Engel

University of Maryland

Garrett Epps

Oregon University

Carl H. Esbeck

University of Missouri

Sarah Eskreis-Winkler

University of Pennsylvania

Christopher E. Everett

Nova Southeastern University

Sara Faherty

State University of New York at Buffalo

Marie A. Failing

Hamline University

Roger A. Fairfax, Jr.

George Washington University

Daniel A. Farber

University of Minnesota

Anthony L. Fargo

University of Nevada

Anthony Paul Farley

Boston College

Stephen M. Feldman

University of Wyoming

Zanita E. Fenton

University of Miami

John M. Ferren

Senior Judge

Daniel M. Filler

University of Alabama

Michael S. Finch

Stetson University

Andrew Finkelman

University of Iowa

Paul Finkelman

Albany Law School

Edwin B. Firmage

University of Utah

Susanna Fischer

Catholic University of America

Clifford S. Fishman
Catholic University of America

Joel Fishman
Duquesne University

Roy B. Flemming
Texas A&M University

Matthew L. M. Fletcher
University of North Dakota

Patrick Flynn
University of South Carolina

James C. Foley
University of Mississippi

James C. Foster
Oregon State University - Cascades

James W. Fox, Jr.
Stetson University

Nichole H. Franklin
Boise State University

Amanda Freeman
Boise State University

Steven I. Friedland
Nova Southeastern University

Lawrence Friedman
New England School of Law

Emily R. Froimson
Arizona State University

Maryellen Fullerton
Brooklyn School of Law

Lynne Garcia
University of Maryland

James A. Gardner
University at Buffalo

Alan E. Garfield
Widener University

Scott D. Gerber
Ohio Northern University

Steven G. Gey
Florida State University

Daniel G. Gibbens
University of Oklahoma

Robert Don Gifford
Assistant United States Attorney, District of Nevada

Gary S. Gildin
University of Pennsylvania

Jean Giles-Sims
Texas Christian University

Michele Gilman
University of Baltimore

Adam Gitlin
University of Michigan

Joel K. Goldstein
Saint Louis University

Joel M. Gora
Brooklyn Law School

Mark A. Graber
University of Maryland

Lino Graglia
University of Texas at Austin

Stuart P. Green
Louisiana State University

Marcel Green
Independent Scholar

Steven K. Green
Willamette University

I. Michael Greenberger
University of Maryland

Daniel J. H. Greenwood
University of Utah

Natalie R. Gregg
Boise State University

David L. Gregory
St. John's University

Leslie C. Griffin
University of Houston

Lissa Griffin
Pace University

CONTRIBUTORS

David E. Guinn

DePaul University

Heidi Scott Giusto

Duke University

Kevin R. C. Gutzman

Western Connecticut State University

Jonathan L. Hafetz

New York University

Patrick H. Haggerty

Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom LLP

James Halabuk, Jr.

George Mason University

Kermit L. Hall

President, State University of New York at Albany

Timothy L. Hall

University of Mississippi

Marci A. Hamilton

Cardozo School of Law

Roberta M. Harding

University of Kentucky

Linda F. Harrison

Nova Southeastern University

Marc M. Harrold

University of Mississippi

Stephanie Roberts Hartung

Suffolk University

James G. Harwood

United States Army

Melissa Haussman

Carleton University

Cynthia G. Hawkins-León

Stetson University

Arthur S. Hayes

Fordham University

Kevin Jon Heller

University of Georgia

Craig Hemmens

Boise State University

Peter J. Henning

Wayne State University

Kay Henriksen

MacMurray College

Michael E. Herz

Cardozo School of Law

Milton Heumann

Rutgers University

Christopher Hill

Legal Services of New Jersey

B. Jessie Hill

Case Western Reserve University

Michele L. Hill

University of Richmond

Ann C. Hodges

University of Richmond

Michael H. Hoffheimer

University of Mississippi

Daniel N. Hoffman

Johnson C. Smith University

Kenneth M. Holland

Kansas State University

Bobby R. Holt

University of Tennessee

Janet Hong

University of Arizona

Chris Jay Hoofnagle

Electronic Privacy Information Center

Kevin James Houk

Drew University

Scott W. Howe

Chapman University

Stephanie Hszieh

Independent Scholar

Audrey I-Wei Huang

Suffolk University

L. Sue Hulett

Knox College

Brian M. Iannacchione

Boise State University

Randa Carolyn Issa

University of Southern California

Donald W. Jackson

Texas Christian University

Tonja Jacobi

Northwestern University

Elizabeth E. Joh

University of California, Davis

Steve R. Johnson

University of Nevada, Las Vegas

John Paul Jones

University of Richmond

Stephen Jones

Stephen Jones & Associates

Deanna Juhl

Stephen Jones & Associates

Jonathan Kahn

University of Minnesota

Thomas M. Keck

Syracuse University

Mark Kemper

Bridgewater State College

Ken I. Kersch

Princeton University

Todd Kerstetter

Texas Christian University

Kirk L. Kimber

Boise State University

Christopher D. King

Law Office of Christopher King

Jeffrey L. Kirchmeier

City University of New York

Jane E. Kirtley

University of Minnesota

Susan R. Klein

University of Texas

Helen J. Knowles

State University of New York at Oswego

Daniel T. Kobil

Capital Law School

Michael Koby

Washington University in St. Louis

Margery M. Koosed

University of Akron

Andrew Koppelman

Northwestern University

Candace Saari Kovacic-Fleischer

American University

Raymond James Krohn

Purdue University

Renée M. Landers

Suffolk University

Jefferson L. Lankford

Judge, Arizona Court of Appeals

Carlton F. W. Larson

University of California, Davis

Kenneth Lasson

University of Baltimore

Frederick M. Lawrence

Boston University

Margaret M. Lawton

Charleston School of Law

Hans Leaman

Yale University

Arthur Leavens

Western New England College of Law

Francis Graham Lee

St. Joseph's University

Donna H. Lee

City University of New York

Emery G. Lee, III

Case Western Reserve University

William E. Lee

University of Georgia

CONTRIBUTORS

Scott Lemieux

City University of New York

Arthur S. Leonard

New York Law School

Daniel Levin

University of Utah

Kay L. Levine

Emory University

Samuel J. Levine

Pepperdine Law School

David W. Levy

University of Oklahoma

Lisa Levy

Case Western Reserve University

Martin L. Levy

Texas Southern University

Bin Liang

Arizona State University

Steven Lichtman

University of Vermont

Sara E. Lindenbaum

University of Arizona

Susan E. Looper-Friedman

Capital University

María Pabón López

Indiana University-Purdue University

Aaron R. S. Lorenz

University of Massachusetts, Amherst

Jimmy Luke

Emory University

Erik Luna

University of Utah

Christopher C. Lund

University of Houston Law Center

Pam M. Madarieta

Boise State University

Michael Madow

Brooklyn Law School

Richard Collin Mangrum

Creighton Law School

Mary K. Mankus

Syracuse University

Samuel A. Marcossan

University of Louisville

Paul Marcus

College of William and Mary

Nancy S. Marder

Chicago-Kent College of Law

Julie H. Margetta

Boston College

Karen M. Markin

University of Rhode Island

Earl F. Martin

Texas Wesleyan University

Robert W. T. Martin

Hamilton College

Gilbert D. Martinez

Texas State University, San Marcos

Calvin Massey

University of California, Hastings College of the Law

Ralph D. Mawdsley

Cleveland State University

Marilyn McAuley

Boise State University

Charles McClain

University of California, Berkeley

Celestine Richards McConville

Chapman University

David McCord

Drake University

Marthé L. McCoy

Boise State University

Janis L. McDonald

Syracuse University

Judithanne Scourfield McLauchlan

University of Florida, St. Petersburg

M. Isabel Medina
Loyola University

Daniel S. Medwed
University of Utah

Philip L. Merkel
Western State University

Bernadette Meyler
Cornell University

Alan C. Michaels
Ohio State University

Kent R. Middleton
University of Georgia

F. Thornton Miller
Missouri State University

David A. Moran
Wayne State University

Denise C. Morgan
New York Law School

Robert P. Mosteller
Duke University

Mitchell A. Mosvick
University of Virginia

Kenneth F. Mott
Gettysburg College

Kerry L. Muehlenbeck
Arizona State University

Eric L. Muller
University of North Carolina

Johann N. Neem
Western Washington University

Ronald L. Nelson
University of South Alabama

Caryn E. Neumann
Ohio State University

Joel A. Nichols
Pepperdine University

David A. Nichols
Indiana State University

John T. Nockleby
Loyola Marymount University

Lawrence D. Norden
New York University

Jerome D. O'Callaghan
State University of New York College at Cortland

J. C. Oleson
Old Dominion University

Samuel R. Olken
John Marshall Law School

Carol A. Olson
University of Akron

Kathleen K. Olson
Lehigh University

Robert M. O'Neil
University of Virginia

Melissa Ooten
University of Richmond

John V. Orth
University of North Carolina

Antony Page
Indiana University School of Law

John Gregory Palmer
Lehigh University

David Ray Papke
Marquette University

Michael S. Pardo
University of Alabama

Nicholas Parrillo
Yale University

Michael E. Parrish
University of California, San Diego

Lisa K. Parshall
Daemen College

Richard J. Peltz
University of Arkansas at Little Rock

Mary M. Penrose
University of Oklahoma

CONTRIBUTORS

Antonio F. Perez
Catholic University of America

Shawn Francis Peters
University of Wisconsin–Madison

Todd E. Pettys
University of Iowa

Tamara R. Piety
University of Tulsa

Nina Pillard
Georgetown University

Brian K. Pinaire
Lehigh University

Sherrow O. Pinder
Hobart and William Smith Colleges

Marc R. Poirier
Seton Hall University

Michael J. Polelle
John Marshall Law School

Malla Pollack
University of Idaho

Scot Powe
University of Texas at Austin

Linda Przybyszewski
University of Notre Dame

Marc Georges Pufong
Valdosta State University

Vincent L. Rabago
Office of the Arizona Attorney General

R. S. Radford
Pacific Legal Foundation

Kiran Raj
Emory University

Frank S. Ravitch
Michigan State University

Gavin J. Reddick
University of Virginia

Lee R. Remington
University of Kentucky

Jeffrey T. Renz
University of Montana

Charles W. “Rocky” Rhodes
South Texas College of Law

Thomas E. Richard
Southern University Law Center

Jef I. Richards
University of Texas at Austin

Robert D. Richards
Pennsylvania State University

James Riddlesperger
Texas Christian University

Alison P. Rivchun
University of Arizona

James E. Robertson
Minnesota State University, Mankato

Jon Roland
Constitution Society

Victor C. Romero
Pennsylvania State University

Kermit Roosevelt, III
University of Pennsylvania

William Rose
Albion College

Susan Dente Ross
Washington State University

William G. Ross
Samford University

Constance L. Rudnick
Massachusetts School of Law

David S. Rudstein
Chicago-Kent College of Law

Irma S. Russell
University of Tulsa

John Paul Ryan
Independent Consultant

Arthur J. Sabin
John Marshall Law School

Rebecca Mae Salokar
Florida International University

Lawrence G. Salzman
Pacific Legal Foundation

Vincent J. Samar
Loyola University of Chicago

Steve Sanders
University of Michigan

Stephen L. Sarazin
William Mitchell College of Law

Kevin W. Saunders
Michigan State University

Shelley Saxon
Pepperdine University

Laura J. Scalia
Independent Scholar

Michael A. Scaperlanda
University of Oklahoma

Edward J. Schoen
Rowan University

David Schultz
Hamline University

Louis N. Schulze, Jr.
Suffolk University

Aaron Schwabach
Thomas Jefferson School of Law

Herman Schwartz
American University

Martin A. Schwartz
Touro Law Center

Melissa Schwartzberg
George Washington University

Maimon Schwarzschild
University of San Diego

Judith A. M. Scully
West Virginia University

Keith E. Sealing
Syracuse University

Amy Shapiro
Syracuse University

Rebecca S. Shoemaker
Indiana State University

Salmon A. Shomade
University of Arizona

Michael R. Siebecker
Hofstra University

Mary Sigler
Arizona State University

Louis J. Sirico, Jr.
Villanova University

Christopher Slobogin
University of Florida

Steven D. Smith
University of San Diego

Rodney A. Smolla
University of Richmond

Jason M. Sokiera
University of Southern Mississippi

Daniel J. Solove
George Washington University

A. Benjamin Spencer
University of Richmond

Shaun B. Spencer
Harvard University

Clyde Spillenger
University of California, Los Angeles

Peter J. Spiro
Hofstra University

Robert Spitzer
State University of New York College at Cortland

Rick M. Steinmann
Clarion University

Jerry E. Stephens
United States Court of Appeals

Kristopher B. Stevens
Emory University

CONTRIBUTORS

Janet W. Steverson
Lewis and Clark College

Maria Stilson
Ohio State University

Cody Stoddard
Boise State University

Robert N. Strassfeld
Case Western Reserve University

Marcy Strauss
Loyola Law School

J. Thomas Sullivan
University of Arkansas at Little Rock

Kathleen S. Sullivan
Ohio University

Douglas J. Sylvester
Arizona State University

Andrew E. Taslitz
Howard University

John B. Taylor
Washington College

Gabriel H. Teninbaum
Attorney

Fernando R. Tesón
Florida State University

Joseph T. Thai
University of Oklahoma

Gerald J. Thain
University of Wisconsin

Tracy A. Thomas
University of Akron

Jay Tidmarsh
University of Notre Dame

Lee Tien
Electronic Frontier Foundation

Christopher R. Tingle
University of Southern Mississippi

Enid Trucios-Haynes
University of Kentucky

G. L. Tyler
Independent Scholar

Christopher Uggen
University of Minnesota

Laura S. Underkuffler
Duke University

Melvin I. Urofsky
Virginia Commonwealth University

Mariangela Valle-Peters
Independent Scholar

James F. Van Orden
University of North Carolina

Geiza Vargas-Vargas
Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom LLP

Richard L. Vining
Emory University

Robert K. Vischer
St. Thomas Law School

Mary L. Volcansek
Texas Christian University

Eugene Volokh
University of California, Los Angeles

Candice R. Voticky
Emory University

Sarah E. Waldeck
Seton Hall University

Samuel Walker
University of Nebraska at Omaha

Carol Walker
Georgia State University

E. Gregory Wallace
Campbell University

Lu-in Wang
University of Pittsburgh

Stephen Watkins
United States Army Legal Services Agency

Russell L. Weaver
University of Louisville

Mark S. Weiner
Rutgers School of Law, Newark

Alan C. Weinstein
Cleveland State University

John W. Welch
Brigham Young University

Ba-Shen Welch
Virginia Commonwealth University

Sarah N. Welling
University of Kentucky

W. Bradley Wendel
Cornell University

Stephen J. Wermiel
American University

John Wertheimer
Davidson College

Ellis M. West
University of Richmond

Keith E. Whittington
Princeton University

Garry D. Wickerd
University of Florida

William M. Wiecek
Syracuse University

Daniel R. Williams
Northeastern University

Eric J. Williams
Rutgers University

Kenneth A. Williams
Southwestern University

R. Owen Williams
Yale University

Louis E. Wolcher
University of Washington

Adam B. Wolf
American Civil Liberties Union Drug Reform Project

Kevin J. Worthen
Brigham Young University

Ronald F. Wright
Wake Forest University

Ingrid Brunk Wuerth
University of Cincinnati

Katy H. H. Yang-Page
Concord University

Tung Yin
University of Iowa

Diana H. Yoon
New York University

Gordon G. Young
University of Maryland

Susan Zaeske
University of Wisconsin

Deborah Zalesne
City University of New York

ALPHABETICAL LIST OF ENTRIES

A

- A Book Named “John Cleland’s Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure” v. Massachusetts, 383 U.S. 413 (1966)
- Abington Township School District v. Schempp, 374 U.S. 203 (1963)
- Abolitionist Movement
- Abolitionists
- Aboud v. Detroit Board of Education, 431 U.S. 209 (1977)
- Abortion
- Abortion Laws and the Establishment Clause
- Abortion Protest Cases
- Abrams v. United States, 250 U.S. 616 (1919)
- Absolutism and Free Speech
- Abu Ghraib
- Academic Freedom
- Access to Government Operations Information
- Access to Judicial Records
- Access to Prisons
- Accommodation of Religion
- Accomplice Confessions
- Act Up
- Acton, Lord John
- Actual Malice Standard
- Administrative Searches and Seizures
- Adolescent Family Life Act
- Affirmative Action
- Agostini v. Felton, 521 U.S. 203 (1997)
- Aguilar v. Felton, 473 U.S. 402 (1985)
- Airport Searches
- Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, 462 U.S. 416 (1983)
- Alcorta v. Texas, 355 U.S. 28 (1957)
- Alien and Sedition Acts (1798)
- Aliens, Civil Liberties of
- County of Allegheny v. ACLU, 492 U.S. 573 (1989)
- Allen v. Illinois, 478 U.S. 364 (1986)
- Amalgamated Food Employees Union Local 590 v. Logan Valley Plaza, 391 U.S. 308 (1968)
- Ambach v. Norwick, 441 U.S. 68 (1979)
- America Online
- American Anti-Slavery Society
- American Booksellers Association, Inc., et al. v. Hudnut, 771 F. 2nd 323 (1985)
- American Civil Liberties Union
- American Communications Association v. Douds, 339 U.S. 382 (1950)
- American Indian Religious Freedom Act of 1978
- American Revolution
- Americans United for Separation of Church and State
- Amish and Religious Liberty
- Amnesty International
- Amsterdam, Anthony G.
- Anders v. California, 386 U.S. 738 (1967)
- Anne Hutchinson Trial
- Anonymity and Free Speech
- Anonymity in On-line Communication
- Anslinger, Harry Jacob
- Anthony, Susan B.
- Anti-Abolitionist Gag Rules
- Anti-Abortion Protest and Freedom of Speech
- Anti-Anarchy and Anti-Syndicalism Statutes
- Anti-Defamation League of B’nai B’rith
- Antidiscrimination Laws
- Antipolygamy Laws
- Apodaca v. Oregon, 406 U.S. 404 (1972)
- Application of First Amendment to States
- Apprendi v. New Jersey, 530 U.S. 466 (2000)
- Appropriation of Name or Likeness
- Aptheker v. Secretary of State, 378 U.S. 500 (1964)
- Arizona v. Fulminante, 499 U.S. 279 (1991)
- Arizona v. Hicks, 480 U.S. 321 (1987)
- Arizona v. Youngblood, 488 U.S. 51 (1988)
- Arraignment and Probable Cause Hearing
- Arrest
- Arrest Warrants
- Arrest without a Warrant
- Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, 535 U.S. 234 (2002)
- Ashcroft, John

ALPHABETICAL LIST OF ENTRIES

Assisted Suicide
Asylum, Refugees and the Convention against Torture
Atheism
Automobile Searches
Autopsies and Free Exercise Beliefs

B

Bache, Benjamin Franklin
Bad Tendency Test
Bail
Balancing Approach to Free Speech
Balancing Test
Baldus Study (Capital Punishment)
Baldwin, Roger
Ballew v. Georgia, 435 U.S. 223 (1978)
Ballot Initiatives
Baltimore City Department of Social Services v. Bouknight, 493 U.S. 549 (1990)
Baptists in Early America
Barclay v. Florida, 463 U.S. 939 (1983)
Barefoote v. Estelle, 463 U.S. 880 (1983)
Barenblatt v. United States, 360 U.S. 109 (1959)
Barnes v. Glen Theatre, Inc., 501 U.S. 560 (1991)
Barron v. Baltimore, 32 U.S. 243 (1833)
Bartkus v. Illinois, 359 U.S. 121 (1959)
Bartnicki v. Vopper, 532 U.S. 514 (2001)
Bates v. State Bar of Arizona, 433 U.S. 350 (1969)
Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79 (1986)
Beal v. Doe, 432 U.S. 438 (1977)
Beauharnais v. Illinois, 343 U.S. 250 (1952)
Becker Amendment
Belief–Action Distinction in Free Exercise Clause History
Belle Terre v. Boraas, 416 U.S. 1 (1974)
Bellis v. United States, 417 U.S. 85 (1974)
Bellotti v. Baird, 443 U.S. 622 (1979)
Benton v. Maryland, 395 U.S. 784 (1969)
Berger v. New York, 388 U.S. 41 (1967)
Berkemer v. McCarty, 468 U.S. 420 (1984)
Bethel School District v. Fraser, 478 U.S. 675 (1986)
Betts v. Brady, 316 U.S. 455 (1942)
Bible in American Law
Bible Reading in Public Schools, History of before and after Abington School District v. Schempp
Biddle, Francis Beverly
Bill of Attainder
Bills of Rights in Early State Constitutions
Bill of Rights: Adoption of
Bill of Rights: Structure
Bingham, John Armor
Birth Control
Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of Federal Bureau of Narcotics, 403 U.S. 388 (1971)
Blackledge v. Perry, 417 U.S. 21 (1974)
Blacklisting
Blackstone and Common-Law Prohibition on Prior Restraints
Blaine Amendment
Bloody Tenet of Persecution for Cause of Conscience, Discussed in a Conference between Truth and Peace, The Blue Wall of Silence
Board of Education of the Westside Community Schools v. Mergens, 496 U.S. 226 (1990)
Board of Education v. Allen, 392 U.S. 236 (1968)
Board of Education v. Earls, 536 U.S. 822 (2002) (Students)
Board of Education v. Pico, 457 U.S. 853 (1982)
Board of Education, Kiryas Joel School District v. Grumet, 512 U.S. 687 (1994)
Bob Jones University v. United States, 461 U.S. 574 (1983)
City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507 (1997)
Bolger v. Youngs Drug Products Corp., 463 U.S. 60 (1983)
Bond v. Floyd, 385 U.S. 116 (1966)
Book Banning and Book Removals
Bordenkircher v. Hayes, 434 U.S. 357 (1978)
Bork, Robert Heron
Boston Massacre Trial (1770)
Bowen v. American Hospital Association, 476 U.S. 610 (1986)
Bowen v. Kendrick, 487 U.S. 589 (1988)
Bowen v. Roy, 476 U.S. 693 (1986)
Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186 (1986)
Boy Scouts of America v. Dale, 530 U.S. 640 (2000)
Boyd v. United States, 116 U.S. 616 (1886)
Boykin v. Alabama, 395 U.S. 238, 242 (1969)
Bradfield v. Roberts, 175 U.S. 291 (1899)
Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963)
Brandeis, Louis Dembitz
Brandenburg Incitement Test
Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969)
Branti v. Finkel, 445 U.S. 507 (1980)
Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665 (1972)
Braswell v. United States, 487 U.S. 99 (1988)
Bray v. Alexandria Women's Health Clinic, 506 U.S. 263 (1993)
Breithaupt v. Abram, 352 U.S. 432 (1957)
Brewer v. Williams, 430 U.S. 387 (1977)
Breyer, Stephen Gerald
Broadcast Regulation
Brooks v. Tennessee, 406 U.S. 605 (1972)
Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen v. Virginia ex rel. Virginia State Bar, 377 U.S. 1 (1964)

Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954)
 Brown v. Mississippi, 279 U.S. 278 (1936)
 Bruce, Lenny
 Bryan, William Jennings
 Bryant, Anita
 Buchanan v. Kentucky, 483 U.S. 402 (1987)
 Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U.S. 60 (1917)
 Buck v. Bell, 274 U.S. 200 (1927)
 Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1 (1976)
 Bullington v. Missouri, 451 U.S. 430 (1981)
 Burdeau v. McDowell, 256 U.S. 465 (1921)
 Burden of Proof: Overview
 Burger Court
 Burger, Warren E.
 Burke, Edmund
 Burks v. United States, 437 U.S. 1 (1978)
 Burton, Justice Harold
 Butler v. McKellar, 494 U.S. 407 (1990)
 Butler, Pierce
 Byers v. Edmondson, 712 So.2d 681 (1999) (“Natural Born Killers” Case)

C

Cable Television Regulation
 Cain v. Kentucky, 387 U.S. 319 (1970)
 Calder v. Bull, 3 U.S. 386 (1798)
 Calero-Toledo v. Pearson Yacht Leasing Co., 416 U.S. 663 (1974)
 Calhoun, John Caldwell
 California v. Acevedo, 500 U.S. 565 (1991)
 California v. Greenwood, 486 U.S. 35 (1988)
 California v. LaRue, 409 U.S. 109 (1972)
 California v. Ramos, 459 U.S. 1301 (1982)
 California v. Trombetta, 467 U.S. 479 (1984)
 Camara v. Municipal Court of the City and County of San Francisco, 387 U.S. 523 (1967)
 Cameras in the Courtroom
 Campaign Finance Reform, No. 1021
 Campus Hate Speech Codes
 Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296 (1940)
 Capital Punishment
 Capital Punishment and Race Discrimination
 Capital Punishment and Resentencing
 Capital Punishment and Sentencing
 Capital Punishment and the Equal Protection Clause Cases
 Capital Punishment and the Right of Appeal
 Capital Punishment for Felony Murder
 Capital Punishment Held Not Cruel and Unusual Punishment under Certain Guidelines
 Capital Punishment Reversed

Capital Punishment: Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996
 Capital Punishment: Due Process Limits
 Capital Punishment: Eighth Amendment Limits
 Capital Punishment: Execution of Innocents
 Capital Punishment: History and Politics
 Capital Punishment: Lynching
 Capital Punishment: Methods of Execution
 Capital Punishment: Proportionality
 Capitol Square Review and Advisory Board v. Pinette, 515 U.S. 753 (1995)
 Captive Audiences and Free Speech
 Cardozo, Benjamin
 Carey v. Population Services International, 431 U.S. 678 (1977)
 Carolene Products v. U.S., 304 U.S. 144 (1938)
 Carroll v. United States, 267 U.S. 132 (1925)
 Categorical Approach to Free Speech
 Catholics and Religious Liberty
 Catt, Carrie Chapman
 Central Hudson Gas and Electric Corp. v. Public Service Commission of New York, 447 U.S. 557 (1980)
 Central Intelligence Agency
 Ceremonial Deism
 Chae Chan Ping v. U.S., 130 U.S. 581 (1889) and Chinese Exclusion Act
 Chafee, Zechariah, Jr.
 Chain Gangs
 Chambers v. Florida, 309 U.S. 227 (1940)
 Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284 (1973)
 Chambers, Whittaker
 Chandler v. Florida, 449 U.S. 560 (1981)
 Chandler v. Miller 520 U.S. 305 (1997) (candidates)
 Chaplains: Legislative
 Chaplains: Military
 Charitable Choice
 Chase Court
 Chase, Samuel
 Chavez, Cesar
 Checkpoints (Roadblocks)
 Chemerinsky, Erwin
 Chessman, Caryl
 Chicago Seven Trial
 Chicago v. Morales, 527 U.S. 41 (1999)
 Child Custody and Adoption
 Child Custody and Foster Care
 Child Pornography
 Children and the First Amendment
 Chimel v. California, 395 U.S. 752 (1969)
 Christian Coalition
 Church of Scientology and Religious Liberty
 Church of the Holy Trinity v. United States, 143 U.S. 457 (1892)

ALPHABETICAL LIST OF ENTRIES

- Church of the Lukumi Babalu Aye v. City of Hialeah, 508 U.S. 520 (1993)
Church of the New Song and Religious Liberty
Church Property after the American Revolution
Cicenia v. LaGay, 357 U.S. 504 (1958)
Cincinnati v. Discovery Network, Inc., 507 U.S. 14 (1993)
Citizenship
Civil Asset Forfeiture
Civil Death
Civil Religion
Civil Rights Act of 1866
Civil Rights Act of 1875
Civil Rights Act of 1964
Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. 3 (1883)
Civil Rights Laws and Freedom of Speech
Civilian Complaint Review Boards
Clark, Ramsey
Clark, Tom Campbell
Classified Information
Clear and Present Danger Test
Cloning
Coerced Confessions/Police Interrogations
Cohen v. California, 403 U.S. 15 (1971)
Cohen v. Cowles Media Company, 501 U.S. 663 (1991)
Cohn, Roy
Coker v. Georgia, 433 U.S. 584 (1977)
Colautti v. Franklin, 439 U.S. 379 (1979)
Coleman v. Thompson, 501 U.S. 722 (1991)
Collateral Consequences
Colonial Charters and Codes
Colorado Republican Federal Campaign Committee v. Federal Election Commission, 518 U.S. 604 (1996)
Colorado v. Connelly, 479 U.S. 157 (1986)
Commercial Speech
Committee for Public Education and Religious Liberty v. Nyquist, 413 U.S. 756 (1973)
Committee for Public Education and Religious Liberty v. Regan, 444 U.S. 646 (1980)
Common Law or Statute
Communications Decency Act (1996)
Communism and the Cold War
Communist Party
Company Towns and Freedom of Speech
Compelling State Interest
Compulsory Vaccination
Comstock, Anthony
Concept of “Christian Nation” in American Jurisprudence
Confrontation and Compulsory Process
Confrontation Clause
Congressional Protection of Privacy
Connally v. Georgia, 429 U.S. 245 (1977)
Connor, Eugene “Bull”
Conscientious Objection, the Free Exercise Clause
Conspiracy
Constitution of 1787
Constitution Overseas
Constitutional Amendment Permitting School Prayer
Constitutional Convention of 1787
Content-Based Regulation of Speech
Content-Neutral Regulation of Speech
Coolidge v. New Hampshire, 403 U.S. 443 (1971)
Copyright Law and Free Exercise
Corporation of Presiding Bishop of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints v. Amos, 483 U.S. 327 (1987)
Corrigan v. Buckley, 271 U.S. 323 (1926)
Corruption of Blood
Counselman v. Hitchcock, 142 U.S. 547 (1892)
County and City Seals with Religious Content
Covington, Hayden
Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 536 (1965)
Cox v. New Hampshire, 312 U.S. 569 (1941)
Coy v. Iowa, 487 U.S. 1012 (1988)
Crane v. Johnson, 242 U.S. 339 (1917)
Crane v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 683 (1986)
Creationism and Intelligent Design
Criminal Conspiracy
Criminal Law/Civil Liberties and Noncitizens in the United States
Criminalization of Civil Wrongs
Cromwell, Oliver
Cross Burning
Cruel and Unusual Punishment (VIII)
Cruel and Unusual Punishment Generally
Cruzan v. Missouri, 497 U.S. 261 (1990)
Cuban Interdiction
Cultural Defense
- ## D
- Dandridge v. Williams, 397 U.S. 471 (1971)
Darrow, Clarence
Davis v. Alaska, 415 U.S. 308 (1974)
Davis v. Beason, 133 U.S. 333 (1890)
Dawson, Joseph Martin
Days of Religious Observance as National or State Holidays
Debs, Eugene V.
Debs v. United States, 249 U.S. 211 (1919)
Debtor’s Prisons
Declaration of Independence
Defamation and Free Speech
Defense of Marriage Act
Defense, Right to Present
Defiance of the Court’s Ban on School Prayer

Defining Religion
 DeJonge v. Oregon, 299 U.S. 353 (1937)
 Delaware v. Prouse, 440 U.S. 648 (1979)
 Demonstrations and Sit-Ins
 Denaturalization
 Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494 (1951)
 Department of Homeland Security
 Dershowitz, Alan
 Designated Public Forums
 DeWitt, General John
 Dial-a-Porn
 Dickerson v. United States, 530 U.S. 428 (2000)
 Dies, Martin
 Disciplining Lawyers for Speaking about
 Pending Cases
 Disciplining Public Employees for Expressive Activity
 Discovery Materials in Court Proceedings
 Discrimination by Religious Entities That Receive Government Funds
 Discriminatory Prosecution
 Disestablishment of State Churches in the Late Eighteenth Century and Early Nineteenth Century
 Diversity Immigration Program
 DNA and Innocence
 DNA Testing
 Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. 179 (1973)
 Domestic Violence
 Don't Ask, Don't Tell
 Double Jeopardy (V): Early History,
 Background, Framing
 Double Jeopardy: Modern History
 Douglas v. California, 372 U.S. 353 (1963)
 Douglas, William Orville
 Douglass, Frederick
 Draft Card Burning
 Dred Scott v. Sandford, 60 U.S. 393 (1857)
 Drug Testing
 Drugs, Religion, and Law
 Dual Citizenship
 Due Process
 Due Process in Immigration
 Due Process of Law (V and XIV)
 Duncan v. Louisiana, 391 U.S. 145 (1968)
 Dusky v. U.S., 362 U.S. 402 (1960)
 Duty to Obey Court Orders
 DWI
 Dworkin, Andrea

E

Economic Regulation
 Economic Rights in the Constitution

Edwards v. Aguillard, 482 U.S. 578 (1987)
 Edwards v. Arizona, 451 U.S. 477 (1981)
 Edwards v. California, 314 U.S. 160 (1941)
 Edwards v. South Carolina, 372 U.S. 229 (1963)
 Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438 (1972)
 Eldred v. Ashcroft, 537 U.S. 186 (2001)
 Electric Chair as Cruel and Unusual Punishment
 Electronic Surveillance, Technology Monitoring, and Dog Sniffs
 Elk Grove Unified School District v. Newdow, 542
 U.S. 1 (2004)
 Ellsworth Court
 Elrod v. Burns, 427 U.S. 347 (1976)
 Emancipation Proclamation (1863)
 Emergency, Civil Liberties in Emerson, Thomas Irwin
 Employment Division, Department of Human Resources v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872 (1990)
 Engel v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421 (1962)
 English Bill of Rights, 1689
 English Toleration Act
 English Tradition of Civil Liberties
 Entrapment and "Stings"
 Entrapment by Estoppel
 Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97 (1968)
 Equal Access Act
 Equal Protection Clause and Religious Freedom
 Equal Protection of Law (XIV)
 Equal Rights Amendment
 City of Erie v. Pap's A.M., 529 U.S. 277 (2000)
 Erznoznik v. City of Jacksonville, 422 U.S. 205 (1975)
 Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478 (1964)
 Establishment Clause (I): History, Background, Framing
 Establishment Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court
 Jurisprudence
 Establishment Clause: Theories of Interpretation
 Establishment of Religion and Free Exercise Clauses
 Estate of Thornton v. Caldor, 472 U.S. 703 (1985)
 Estelle v. Smith, 451 U.S. 454 (1980)
 Estelle v. Williams, 425 U.S. 501 (1975)
 Estes, Billie Sol
 Eugenic Sterilization
 Euthanasia
 Evers, Medgar Wiley
 Everson v. Board of Education, 330 U.S. 1 (1947)
 Ex Parte Milligan, 71 U.S. 2 (1866)
 Ex Parte Vallandigham, 28 F.CAS. 874 (1863)
 Ex Post Facto Clause
 Exclusionary Rule
 Exemplars
 Exemptions for Religion Contained in Regulatory Statutes
 Expatriation
 Extradition

ALPHABETICAL LIST OF ENTRIES

Extremist Groups and Civil Liberties
Eyewitness Identification

F

Fair Credit Reporting Act, 84 Stat. 1127 (1970)
Fair Labor Standards Act and Religion
Fair Use Doctrine and First Amendment
Fairness Doctrine
False Confessions
False Light Invasion of Privacy
Falwell, Jerry
Family Unity for Noncitizens
Family Values Movement
FCC v. League of Women Voters, 468 U.S. 364 (1984)
FCC v. Pacifica Foundation, 438 U.S. 726 (1978)
Federal Communications Commission
Federalization of Criminal Law
Feiner v. New York, 340 U.S. 315 (1951)
Felon Disenfranchisement
Fiallo v. Bell, 430 U.S. 787 (1977)
Field, Stephen J.
Fighting Words and Free Speech
First Amendment and PACs
Fisher v. United States, 425 U.S. 391 (1976)
Flag Salute Cases
Flag Burning
Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83 (1968)
Florida Star v. B.J.F., 491 U.S. 524 (1989)
Florida v. Jimeno, 500 U.S. 248 (1991)
Florida v. Riley, 488 U.S. 445 (1989)
Florida v. Royer, 460 U.S. 491 (1983)
Florida v. White, 526 U.S. 559 (1999)
Flynt, Larry
Follett v. Town of McCormick, S.C., 321 U.S. 573 (1944)
Fong Yue Ting v. United States, 149 U.S. 698 (1893)
Forced Speech
Fortas, Abe
Fourteenth Amendment
44 Liquormart v. Rhode Island, 517 U.S. 484 (1996)
France v. United States, 164 U.S. 676 (1897)
Francis v. Franklin, 471 U.S. 307 (1985)
Frank, John P.
Frankfurter, Felix
Franklin, Benjamin
Free Exercise Clause (I): History, Background, Framing
Free Exercise Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence
Free Press/Fair Trial
Free Speech in Private Corporations

Freedom of Access to Clinic Entrances (FACE) Act, 108 Stat. 694 (1994)
Freedom of Association
Freedom of Contract
Freedom of Expression in the International Context
Freedom of Information Act (1966)
Freedom of Information and Sunshine Laws
Freedom of Speech and Press under the Constitution: Early History, 1791–1917
Freedom of Speech and Press: Nineteenth Century
Freedom of Speech Extended to Corporations
Freedom of Speech in Broadcasting
Freedom of Speech: Modern Period (1917 – Present)
Freedom of the Press: Modern Period (1917 – Present)
Freund, Paul A.
Frisbie v. Collins, 342 U.S. 519 (1952)
Frisby v. Schultz, 487 U.S. 474 (1988)
Fruit of the Poisonous Tree
Fuller Court
Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972)
FW/PBS, Inc. v. City of Dallas, 493 U.S. 215 (1990)

G

Gag Orders in Judicial Proceedings
Gag Rule
Gang Ordinances
Gardner v. Florida, 430 U.S. 349 (1977)
Garrison, William Lloyd
Gay and Lesbian Rights
General Warrants
Gentile v. State Bar of Nevada, 501 U.S. 1030 (1991)
Gerstein v. Pugh, 420 U.S. 103 (1975)
Gertz v. Robert Welch Inc., 418 U.S. 323 (1974)
Gibson v. Florida Legislative Investigation Committee, 372 U.S. 539 (1961)
Giddings, Joshua Reed
Gideon, Clarence Earl
Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963)
Giglio v. United States, 405 U.S. 150 (1972)
Gilmore, Gary
Ginsberg v. New York, 390 U.S. 629 (1968)
Ginsburg, Ruth Bader
Ginzberg v. United States, 343 U.S. 463 (1966)
Gitlow v. New York 268 U.S. 652 (1925)
Glorious Revolution
Godfrey v. Georgia, 446 U.S. 420 (1980)
Godinez v. Moran, 509 U.S. 389 (1993)
Goldberg v. Kelly, 397 U.S. 254 (1970)
Goldberg, Arthur J.
Goldman v. Weinberger, 475 U.S. 503 (1986)

Good News Club v. Milford Central School, 533 U.S. 98 (2001)
 Government Funding of Speech
 Government Speech
 Graham v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, 490 U.S. 680 (1989)
 Grand Jury
 Grand Jury in Colonial America
 Grand Jury Indictment (V)
 Grand Jury Investigation and Indictment
 Grant's General Orders #11 (1862) (expelling Jews)
 Green v. Georgia, 442 U.S. 95 (1979)
 Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153 (1976)
 Griffin v. California, 380 U.S. 609 (1965)
 Griffin v. Illinois, 351 U.S. 12 (1956)
 Griffin v. Wisconsin, 483 U.S. 868 (1987)
 Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965)
 Grosjean v. American Press Co., 297 U.S. 233 (1936)
 Group Libel
 Guantanamo Bay, Enemy Combatants, Post 9/11
 Guided Discretion Statutes
 Guilty but Mentally Ill
 Guilty Plea
 Gun Control/Anti-Gun Control

H

H.L. v. Matheson, 450 U.S. 398 (1981)
 Habeas Corpus Act of 1679
 Habeas Corpus in Colonial America
 Habeas Corpus: Modern History
 Hague v. C.I.O., 307 U.S. 496 (1939)
 Hague, Frank
 Haig v. Agee, 453 U.S. 280 (1981)
 Hale v. Henkel, 201 U.S. 370 (1906)
 Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, 542 U.S. 507 (2004)
 Hamilton, Alexander
 Hamilton, Andrew
 Hand, (Billings) Learned
 Harisiades v. Shaughnessy, 342 U.S. 580 (1952)
 Harlan, John Marshall, the Elder
 Harlan, John Marshall, II
 Harmelin v. Michigan, 501 U.S. 957 (1991)
 Harmless Error
 Harper v. Virginia State Board of Elections, 383 U.S. 663 (1966)
 Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980)
 Harris v. New York, 401 U.S. 222 (1971)
 Hatch Act
 Hate Crime Laws
 Hate Crimes
 Hate Speech
 Hays, Will H.

Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier, 484 U.S. 260 (1988)
 Hearsay Evidence
 Heckler's Veto Problem in Free Speech
 Helms Amendment (1989)
 Helper, Hinton
 Hentoff, Nat
 Herbert v. Lando, 441 U.S. 153 (1979)
 Hernandez v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, 490 U.S. 680 (1989)
 Herrera v. Collins, 506 U.S. 390 (1993)
 Hess v. Indiana, 414 U.S. 105 (1973)
 Hester v. United States, 265 U.S. 445 (1924)
 Hip-Hop and Rap Music
 Hiss, Alger
 History and Its Role in Supreme Court Decision Making on Religion
 Hoffa v. United States, 385 U.S. 293 (1966)
 Holland v. Illinois, 493 U.S. 474 (1990)
 Holmes, Oliver Wendell, Jr.
 Homosexuality and Immigration
 Hoover, J. Edgar
 Hopt v. Utah, 110 U.S. 574 (1884)
 Hostile Environment and Employment
 Discrimination Issues and Free Speech
 Houchins v. KQED, Inc., 438 U.S. 1 (1978)
 House Un-American Activities Committee
 Hudson v. Louisiana, 450 U.S. 40 (1981)
 Hudson v. Palmer, 468 U.S. 517 (1984)
 Hughes Court
 Hughes, Charles Evans
 Hunt v. McNair, 413 U.S. 734 (1973)
 Hurley v. Irish-American Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Group of Boston, 515 U.S. 557 (1995)
 Hurtado v. California, 110 U.S. 516 (1884)
 Hustler Magazine v. Falwell, 485 U.S. 46 (1988)
 Hutchinson v. Proxmire, 443 U.S. 111 (1979)

I

Ideological and Security-Based Exclusion and Deportation
 Illegitimacy and Immigration
 Illinois v. Gates, 462 U.S. 213 (1983)
 Illinois v. Krull, 480 U.S. 340 (1987)
 Illinois v. Perkins, 496 U.S. 292 (1990)
 Illinois v. Wardlow, 528 U.S. 119 (2000)
 Immigration and Marriage Fraud Amendments of 1986
 Immigration and Nationality Act Amendments
 of 1965
 Immigration and Naturalization Service v. Chadha,
 462 U.S. 919 (1983)

ALPHABETICAL LIST OF ENTRIES

Immigration and Naturalization Service v.
Lopez-Mendoza, 468 U.S. 1032 (1984)
Impartial Decisionmaker
Implied Rights
Incorporation Doctrine
Incorporation Doctrine and Free Speech
Indefinite Detention
City of Indianapolis v. Edmond, 531 U.S. 32 (2000)
Indian Bill of Rights
Ineffective Assistance of Counsel
Infliction of Emotional Distress and
First Amendment
In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1 (1967)
In re Griffiths, 413 U.S. 717 (1973)
In re Winship, 397 U.S. 358 (1970)
Insanity Defense
Intellectual Influences on Free Speech Law
Intellectual Property and the First Amendment
Intelligence Identities Protection Act (1982)
Intermediate Scrutiny Test in Free Speech Cases
Internet and Civil Liberties
Internet and Intellectual Property
Internet Filtering at Libraries and Free Speech Interstate Commerce
Intrusion
Invasion of Privacy and Free Speech
Invidious Discrimination

J

Jackson v. Denno, 378 U.S. 368 (1964)
Jackson v. Indiana, 406 U.S. 715 (1972)
Jackson v. Virginia, 443 U.S. 307 (1979)
Jackson, Andrew
Jackson, Robert H.
Jacobellis v. Ohio, 378 U.S. 184 (1964)
Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 197 U.S. 11 (1905)
Jacobson v. United States, 503 U.S. 540 (1992)
Jailhouse Informants
Jamison v. Texas, 318 U.S. 413 (1943)
Japanese Internment Cases
Jay Court
Jefferson, Thomas
Jehovah's Witnesses and Religious Liberty
Jenkins v. Georgia, 418 U.S. 152 (1974)
Jews and Religious Liberty
Jimmy Swaggart Ministries v. Board of Equalization of California, 493 U.S. 378 (1990)
John Birch Society
Johnson, Frank Minis, Jr.
Johnson, Lyndon Baines
Jones v. Wolf, 443 U.S. 595 (1979)
Joseph Burstyn, Inc. v. Wilson, 343 U.S. 495 (1952)

Journalism and Sources
Judicial Bias
Judicial Proceedings and References to the Deity Judicial Resolution of Church Property Disputes
Judicial Review
Jurek v. Texas, 428 U.S. 262 (1976)
Jurisdiction of the Federal Courts
Jury Nullification
Jury Nullification in Capital Punishment
Jury Selection and Voir Dire
Jury Trial
Jury Trial Right
Jury Trials and Race
Justice, William Wayne

K

Kamisar, Yale
Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347 (1967)
Kaufman, Irving Robert
Kendall, Amos
Kennedy, Anthony McLeod
Kent v. Dulles, 357 U.S. 116 (1957)
Kentucky and Virginia Resolves
Kevorkian, Jack
King, Martin Luther, Jr.
Kingsley International Pictures Corporation v.
Regents of the University of New York, 360 U.S.
684 (1959)
Kirby v. Illinois, 406 U.S. 682 (1972)
Kleindienst v. Mandel, 408 U.S. 753 (1972)
Klopfer v. North Carolina, 386 U.S. 213 (1967)
Kois v. Wisconsin, 408 U.S. 229 (1972)
Kolender v. Lawson, 461 U.S. 352 (1983)
Konigsberg v. State Bar of California, 336 U.S.
36 (1961)
Ku Klux Klan
Kunstler, William M.
Kyles v. Whitley, 514 U.S. 419 (1995)
Kyllo v. United States, 533 U.S. 27 (2001)

L

La Follette, Robert Marion, Sr.
Lambda Legal Defense and Education Fund
Lambert v. California, 355 U.S. 255 (1957)
Lambert v. Wicklund, 520 U.S. 292 (1997)
Lamb's Chapel v. Center Moriches Union Free
School District, 508 U.S. 384 (1993)
Lanzetta v. New Jersey, 306 U.S. 451 (1939)
Late Corporation of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints v. United States, 136 U.S. 1 (1890)

Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003)
 Lawyer Advertising
 Lee v. Weisman, 505 U.S. 577 (1992)
 Legal Aid Society of New York
 Legal Realists
 Legal Services Corporation v. Valesquez, 531 U.S. 533 (2001)
 Legion of Decency
 Legislative Prayer
 Legislators' Freedom of Speech
 Leland v. Oregon, 343 U.S. 790 (1952)
 Lemon Test
 Leyra v. Denno, 347 U.S. 556 (1954)
 Lilborne, John (Freeborn John)
 Lilly v. Virginia, 527 U.S. 116 (1999)
 Limitations on Clergy Holding Office
 Limited Public Forums
 Lincoln, Abraham
 Line-Ups
 City of Littleton v. Z.J. Gifts D-4, L.L.C. (2004)
 Lloyd Corporation v. Tanner, 407 U.S. 551 (1972)
 Loan Association v. Topeka, 87 U.S. 655 (1875)
 Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45 (1905)
 Locke v. Davey, 540 U.S. 712 (2004)
 Locke, John
 Lockett v. Ohio, 438 U.S. 586 (1978)
 Lockhart v. McCree, 476 U.S. 162 (1986)
 Log Cabin Republicans
 Lo-Ji Sales, Inc. v. New York, 442 U.S. 319 (1979)
 Long, Huey Pierce
 Los Angeles v. Lyons, 461 U.S. 95 (1983)
 Lovejoy, Elijah
 Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1 (1967)
 Low Value Speech
 Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668 (1984)
 Lyng v. Northwest Indian Cemetery Protective Association, 485 U.S. 439 (1988)
 Lynumn v. Illinois, 372 U.S. 528 (1963)

M

Mabry v. Johnson, 467 U.S. 352 (1984)
 MacKinnon, Catharine
 Madison, James
 Madison's Remonstrance (1785)
 Madsen v. Women's Health Center, 512 U.S. 753 (1994)
 Magna Carta
 Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464 (1977)
 Mallory v. United States, 354 U.S. 499 (1957)
 Mandatory Death Sentences Unconstitutional
 Mandatory Minimum Sentences
 Mann Act
 Manson v. Brathwaite, 432 U.S. 98 (1977)

Manual Enterprises, Inc. v. Day, 370 U.S. 478 (1962)
 Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961)
 Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. 137 (1803)
 Marches and Demonstrations
 Marchetti v. United States, 390 U.S. 39 (1968)
 Marital Rape
 Marketplace of Ideas Theory
 Marriage, History of
 Marsh v. Chambers, 463 U.S. 783 (1983)
 Marshall Court
 Marshall, John
 Marshall, Thurgood
 Martin v. Ohio, 480 U.S. 228 (1987)
 Maryland Toleration Act (1649)
 Maryland v. Buie, 494 U.S. 325 (1990)
 Maryland v. Craig, 497 U.S. 836 (1990)
 Mason, George
 Massachusetts Body of Liberties of 1641
 Masses Publishing Company v. Patten, 244 U.S. 535 (1917)
 Massiah v. United States, 377 U.S. 201 (1964)
 Material Witnesses
 Mathis v. United States, 391 U.S. 1 (1968)
 Matters of Public Concern Standard in Free Speech Cases
 McCarran-Walter Act of 1952
 McCarthy, Joseph
 McCleskey v. Kemp, 481 U.S. 277 (1987)
 McCollum v. Board of Education, 333 U.S. 203 (1948)
 McCorvey, Norma (Jane Roe)
 McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. 316 (1819)
 McDaniel v. Paty, 435 U.S. 618 (1978)
 McGautha v. California, 402 U.S. 183 (1971)
 McGowen v. Maryland, 366 U.S. 420 (1961)
 McKeiver v. Pennsylvania, 403 U.S. 528 (1971)
 McLaughlin v. Florida, 379 U.S. 184 (1964)
 McNabb v. United States, 318 U.S. 332 (1943)
 McReynolds, James C.
 Media Access to Information
 Media Access to Judicial Proceedings
 Media Access to Military Operations
 Media Liability for Causing Physical Harm
 Meese, Edwin, III
 Megan's Law (Felon Registration)
 Meiklejohn, Alexander
 Menna v. New York, 423 U.S. 61 (1975)
 Mentally Ill
 Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios (MGM) v. Grokster, 545 U.S. (2005)
 Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390 (1923)
 Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo, 418 U.S. 241 (1974)
 Michigan Department of State Police v. Sitz, 496 U.S. 444 (1990)

ALPHABETICAL LIST OF ENTRIES

Michigan v. DeFillippo, 443 U.S. 31 (1979)
 Michigan v. Lucas, 500 U.S. 145 (1991)
 Michigan v. Mosley, 423 U.S. 96 (1975)
 Michigan v. Summers, 452 U.S. 692 (1981)
 Military Law
 Military Tribunals
 Milkovich v. Lorain Journal Co., 497 U.S. 1 (1990)
 Mill, John Stuart
 Miller Test
 Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15 (1973)
 Mills v. Alabama, 384 U.S. 214 (1966)
 Mincey v. Arizona, 437 U.S. 385 (1978)
 Minnesota v. Dickerson, 508 U.S. 366 (1993)
 Minnesota v. Olson, 495 U.S. 91 (1990)
 Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)
 Miranda Warning
 Miranda, Ernesto Arturo
 Miscegenation Laws
 Mishkin v. New York, 383 U.S. 502 (1966)
 Mistretta v. United States, 488 U.S. 361 (1989)
 Mitchell v. Helms, 463 U.S. 793 (2000)
 Mitchell, John
 Modern Political and Legal Philosophy, Civil Liberties in Moment of Silence Statutes
 Monroe v. Pape, 365 U.S. 167 (1961)
 Montesquieu
 Mooney v. Holohan, 294 U.S. 103 (1935)
 Moore v. East Cleveland, 431 U.S. 494 (1977)
 Moran v. Burbine, 475 U.S. 412 (1986)
 Mormons and Religious Liberty
 Motes v. United States, 178 U.S. 458 (1900)
 Movie Ratings and Censorship
 Mozert v. Hawkins County Board of Education, 827 F. 2d 1058 (1987)
 Mt. Healthy City School District Board of Education v. Doyle, 429 U.S. 274 (1977)
 Mueller v. Allen, 463 U.S. 388 (1983)
 Mullaney v. Wilbur, 421 U.S. 684 (1975)
 Murphy, Frank
 Murray, John Courtney
 Museums and Expression
 Muslims and Religious Liberties
 Mutual Film Corporation v. Industrial Commission of Ohio, 236 U.S. 230 (1915)

N

NAACP v. Alabama Ex Rel. Patterson, 357 U.S. 449 (1958)
 NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. 415 (1963)
 Naim v. Naim, 875 E. 2nd 749 (Va. 1955); 350 U.S.

891 (1955); 350 U.S. 985 (1956)
 Napue v. Illinois, 360 U.S. 264 (1959)
 Nardone v. United States, 308 U.S. 338 (1939)
 National Abortion Rights Action League (NARAL)
 National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP)
 National Endowment for the Arts v. Finley, 118 S. Ct 2168 (1998)
 National Labor Relations Board
 National Motto “In God We Trust”
 National Organization for Women
 National Origins Quota System
 National Rifle Association (NRA)
 National Security
 National Security and Freedom of Speech
 National Security Prior Restraints
 National Treasury Employee Union v. Von Raab, 489 U.S. 656 (1989)
 Native Americans and Religious Liberty
 Natural Law, Eighteenth-Century Understanding
 Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697 (1931)
 Nebbia v. New York, 291 U.S. 502 (1934)
 Nebraska Press Association v. Stuart, 427 U.S. 539 (1976)
 Neutral Reportage Doctrine
 New Deal and Civil Liberties
 New Hampshire Constitution of 1784
 New Jersey v. T.L.O., 469 U.S. 325 (1985)
 New Right
 New York Ex. Rel. Bryant v. Zimmerman, 278 U.S. 63 (1928)
 New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964)
 New York Times Co. v. United States, 403 U.S. 713 (1971)
 New York v. Belton, 453 U.S. 454 (1981)
 New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747 (1982)
 New York v. Quarles, 467 U.S. 649 (1984)
 Newsroom Searches
 9/11 and the War on Terrorism
 Ninth Amendment
 Nix v. Williams, 467 U.S. 431, 104 (1984)
 Nixon, Richard Milhous
 NLRB v. Catholic Bishop of Chicago, 440 U.S. 490 (1979)
 No Coercion Test
 No Endorsement Test
 Noncitizens and Civil Liberties
 Noncitizens and the Franchise
 Noncitizens and Land Ownership
 Non-Preferentialism
 North Carolina Constitution of 1776
 North Carolina v. Alford, 400 U.S. 25 (1970)
 North Carolina v. Pearce, 395 U.S. 711 (1969)

O

O'Brien Content-Neutral Free Speech Test
 O'Brien Formula
 Obscenity
 Obscenity in History
 O'Connor, Sandra Day
 O'Connor v. Ortega, 480 U.S. 709 (1987)
 Ohio v. Robinette, 519 U.S. 33 (1996)
 Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438 (1928)
 O'Lone v. Estate of Shabazz, 482 U.S. 342 (1987)
 Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968
 (92 Stat. 3795)
 On Lee v. United States, 343 U.S. 747 (1952)
 Open Fields
 Operation Rescue
 Oregon's Death with Dignity Act (1994)
 Orozco v. Texas, 394 U.S. 324 (1969)
 Osborne v. Ohio, 495 U.S. 103 (1990)
 Otis, James
 Overbreadth Doctrine

P

Pacifists and Naturalization
 Paine, Thomas
 Palmer, A. Mitchell
 Papachristou v. City of Jacksonville, 405 U.S.
 156 (1972)
 Pardon and Commutation
 Paris Adult Theatre v. Slaton, 413 U.S. 49 (1973)
 Patriot Act
 Patterson v. New York, 432 U.S. 197 (1977)
 Paul v. Davis, 424 U.S. 693 (1976)
 Payton v. New York, 445 U.S. 573 (1980)
 Pell v. Procunier, 417 U.S. 817 (1974)
 Penn, William
 Pennsylvania v. Scott, 524 U.S. 357 (1998)
 Penumbras
 Personal Liberty Laws
 Petition Campaign
 Petition of Right (1628)
 Philadelphia Newspapers, Inc. v. Hepps, 475 U.S.
 767 (1986)
 Phillips, Wendell
 Philosophy and Theory of Freedom of Expression
 Physician-Assisted Suicide
 Pickering v. Board of Education, 391 U.S. 563 (1968)
 Picketing
 Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925)
 Plain View
 Planned Parenthood ("Nuremburg Files") Litigation

Planned Parenthood of Missouri v. Danforth, 428
 U.S. 52 (1976)
 Planned Parenthood v. Ashcroft, 462 U.S. 476 (1983)
 Planned Parenthood v. Casey, 112 S.Ct. 2791 (1992)
 Plea Bargaining
 Pledge of Allegiance ("Under God")
 Pledge of Allegiance and the First Amendment
 Plenary Power Doctrine
 Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537 (1896)
 Plyler v. Doe, 457 U.S. 202 (1982)
 Poe v. Ullman, 367 U.S. 497 (1961)
 Poelker v. Doe, 432 U.S. 59 (1977)
 Police Investigation Commissions
 Police Power of the State
 Political Correctness and Free Speech
 Political Patronage and the First Amendment
 Politics and Money
 Pope v. Illinois, 481 U.S. 497 (1987)
 Posadas de Puerto Rico Association v. Tourism
 Company of Puerto Rico, 478 U.S. 328 (1986)
 Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45 (1932)
 Powell v. Texas, 392 U.S. 514 (1968)
 Powell, Lewis Franklin, Jr.
 Prayer in Public Schools
 Preferred Position
 Prejean, Sister Helen
 Press Clause (I): Framing and History from Colonial
 Period up to Early National Period
 Preventative Detention
 Prince v. Massachusetts, 321 U.S. 158 (1944)
 Prior Restraints
 Prison Population Growth
 Prisoners and Free Exercise Clause Rights
 Prisoners and Freedom of Speech
 Privacy
 Privacy Protection Act, 94 Stat. 1879 (1980)
 Privacy, Theories of Private Discriminatory Association
 Private Police
 Private Possession of Obscenity in the Home
 Private Religious Speech on Public Property
 Privileges and Immunities (XIV)
 Probable Cause
 Professional Advertising
 Profiling (including DWB)
 Profit v. Florida, 428 U.S. 242 (1976)
 Prohibition
 Proof beyond a Reasonable Doubt
 Proportional Punishment
 Proportionality Reviews
 Public Figures
 Public Forum Doctrines
 Public/Nonpublic Forums Distinction
 Public Officials
 Public School Curricula and Free Exercise Claims

ALPHABETICAL LIST OF ENTRIES

Public Trial
Public Vulgarity and Free Speech
Pulley v. Harris, 465 U.S. 37 (1984)
Puritans

Q

Quakers and Religious Liberty
Quartering of Troops (III)
Quick Bear v. Leupp, 210 U.S. 50 (1908)
Quinlan, Karen Ann

R

Rabe v. Washington, 405 U.S. 313 (1972)
Race and Criminal Justice
Race and Immigration
Raley v. Ohio, 360 U.S. 423 (1959)
Rankin v. McPherson, 483 U.S. 378 (1987)
Rape: Naming Victim
Rastafarians and the Free Exercise of Religion
Ratification Debate, Civil Liberties in Rauh, Joseph L., Jr.
R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul, 505 U.S. 377 (1992)
Rawlings v. Kentucky, 448 U.S. 98 (1980)
Rawls, John Bordley
Reapportionment
Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367 (1969)
Red Scare of the Early 1920s
Redrup v. New York, 386 U.S. 767 (1967)
Refusal of Medical Treatment and Religious Beliefs
Regents of University of California v. Bakke, 438 U.S. 265 (1978)
Regina v. Hicklin, L.R. 2 Q.B. 360 (1868)
Rehnquist Court
Rehnquist, William H.
Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1 (1957)
Reid v. Georgia, 448 U.S. 438 (1980)
Release Time from Public Schools (For Religious Purposes)
Religion in Nineteenth-Century Public Education (Includes “Bible Wars”)
Religion in “Public Square” Debate
Religion in Public Universities
Religion in the Workplace
Religious Freedom in the Military
Religious Freedom Restoration Act
Religious Garb in Courtrooms and Classrooms
Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000

Religious Liberty under Eighteenth-Century State Constitutions
Religious Symbols on Public Property
Religious Tests for Officeholding (Article 6, Cl. 3)
Removal to Federal Court
Reno v. ACLU, 521 U.S. 844 (1997)
Reno, Janet
Renton v. Playtime Theatres, Inc., 475 U.S. 41 (1986)
Reporter’s Privilege
Reproductive Freedom
Restricting Actions of Legal Services Lawyers
Restrictive Covenants
Retained Rights (Ninth Amendment)
Retribution
Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145 (1878)
Rhode Island v. Innis, 446 U.S. 291 (1980)
Rice v. Paladin Press (“Hit Man” Case), 940 F.Supp. 836 (D.Md. 1996)
Richards v. Wisconsin, 520 U.S. 385 (1997)
Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia, 448 U.S. 555 (1980)
Ricketts v. Adamson, 483 U.S. 1 (1987)
RICO
Riggins v. Nevada, 504 U.S. 127 (1992)
Right of Access to Criminal Trials
Right of Privacy
Right to Bear Arms (II)
Right to Counsel
Right to Counsel (VI)
Right to Know
Right to Petition
Right to Reply and Right of the Press
Right to Travel
Right to Vote for Individuals with Disabilities
Right v. Privilege Distinction
Rights of the Accused
Ripeness in Free Speech Cases
County of Riverside v. McLaughlin, 500 U.S. 44 (1991)
Rizzo v. Goode, 423 U.S. 362 (1976)
Roberts v. United States Jaycees, 468 U.S. 609 (1984)
Roberts, Owen Josephus
Robinson v. California, 370 U.S. 660 (1962)
Rochin v. California, 342 U.S. 165 (1952)
Rock v. Arkansas, 483 U.S. 44 (1987)
Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)
Roemer v. Maryland Board of Public Works, 426 U.S. 736 (1976)
Romer v. Evans, 517 U.S. 620 (1996)
Roosevelt, Franklin Delano
Rorty, Richard
Rosales-Lopez v. United States, 451 U.S. 182 (1981)
Rose v. Locke, 423 U.S. 48 (1975)
Rosenberg, Julius and Ethel

Rosenberger v. Rector and Visitors of the University of Virginia, 515 U.S. 819 (1995)
 Ross v. Moffitt, 417 U.S. 600 (1974)
 Rotary International v. Rotary Club of Duarte, 481 U.S. 537 (1987)
 Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476 (1957)
 Roviato v. United States, 353 U.S. 53 (1957)
 Rowan v. United States Post Office Department, No. 399, 397 U.S. 728 (1970)
 Ruby Ridge Incident
 Rule of Law
 Rush, Benjamin
 Rust v. Sullivan, 500 U.S. 173 (1991)
 Rutan v. Republican Party of Illinois, 497 U.S. 62 (1990)
 Rutledge, Wiley Blount, Jr.
 Ryan, George

S

Sacco and Vanzetti
 Saenz v. Roe, 526 U.S. 489 (1999)
 Salvation Army and Religious Liberty
 Same-Sex Adoption
 Same-Sex Marriage Legalization
 Same-Sex Unions
 Sandstrom v. Montana, 442 U.S. 510 (1979)
 Sanger, Margaret Higgins
 Santa Clara Pueblo v. Martinez, 436 U.S. 49 (1978)
 Santa Fe Independent School District v. Doe, 530 U.S. 290 (2000)
 Santobello v. New York, 404 U.S. 257 (1971)
 Satire and Parody and the First Amendment
 Saxbe v. Washington Post, 417 U.S. 817 (1974)
 Scales v. United States, 367 U.S. 203 (1961)
 Scalia, Antonin
 Schad v. Borough of Mount Ephraim, 452 U.S. 61 (1981)
 Schall v. Martin, 467 U.S. 253 (1984)
 Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919)
 Schlafly, Phyllis Stewart
 Schmerber v. California, 384 U.S. 757 (1966)
 Schneckloth v. Bustamonte, 412 U.S. 218 (1973)
 School District of the City of Grand Rapids v. Ball, 473 U.S. 373 (1985)
 School Vouchers
 Scopes Trial
 Scottsboro Trials
 Sealed Documents in Court Proceedings
 Search (General Definition)
 Search Warrants
 Secondary Effects Doctrine
 Secular Humanism and the Public Schools
 Secular Purpose

Seditious Libel
 Segregation
 Seizures
 Selective Draft Law Cases (1918), Selective Service Act of 1917
 Self-Defense
 Self-Fulfillment Theory of Free Speech
 Self-Governance and Free Speech
 Self-Incrimination (V): Historical Background
 Self-Incrimination: Miranda and Evolution
 Self-Representation at Trial
 Sentencing Guidelines
 Sentencing Reform Act
 Servicemembers Legal Defense Network
 Seventh Day Adventists and Religious Liberty
 Sex and Criminal Justice
 Sex and Immigration
 Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618 (1969)
 Shaughnessey v. United States ex rel. Mezei, 345 U.S. 206 (1953)
 Shaw, Lemuel
 Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U.S. 1 (1948)
 Shepard, Matthew
 Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398 (1963)
 Sherman Act
 Sherman, Roger Shield Laws
 Shopping Centers and Freedom of Speech
 Sicurella v. United States, 348 U.S. 385 (1955)
 Simopoulos v. Virginia, 462 U.S. 506 (1983)
 Sincerity of Religious Belief
 Singer v. United States, 380 U.S. 24 (1965)
 Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535 (1942)
 Skinner v. Railway Labor Executives' Association, 489 U.S. 602 (1989)
 SLAPP Suits (Strategic Lawsuits against Public Participation)
 Slaughterhouse Cases, 83 U.S. (16 Wall.) 36 (1873)
 Slavery
 Slavery and Civil Liberties
 Smith Act
 Smith v. California, 361 U.S. 147 (1959)
 Smith v. Organization of Foster Families, 431 U.S. 816 (1977)
 Snake-Handling Sects and Religious Liberty
 Snapp v. United States, 444 U.S. 507 (1980)
 Sodomy Laws
 Solem v. Helm, 463 U.S. 277 (1983)
 Son of Sam Laws
 Sorrells v. U.S., 287 U.S. 435 (1932)
 Souter, David Hackett
 South Dakota v. Opperman, 428 U.S. 364 (1976)
 Southeastern Promotions, Ltd. v. Conrad, 420 U.S. 546 (1975)
 Southern Center for Human Rights

ALPHABETICAL LIST OF ENTRIES

Southern Poverty Law Center
 Spano v. New York, 360 U.S. 315 (1959)
 Spaziano v. Florida, 468 U.S. 447 (1984)
 Speech and Education
 Speech and Its Relation to Violence
 Speech of Government Employees
 Speech versus Conduct Distinction
 Speedy Trial
 Spying on Citizens
 Standing in Free Speech Cases
 Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 557 (1969)
 Stanton, Elizabeth Cady
 Staples v. United States, 511 U.S. 600 (1994)
 Stare Decisis
 State Action Doctrine
 State Aid to Religious Schools
 State and Federal Regulation of Immigration
 State Constitution, Privacy Provisions
 State Constitutional Distinctions
 State Constitutions and Civil Liberties
 State Constitutions, Modern History, Civil Liberties under
 State Courts
 State Regulation of Religious Schools
 State Religious Freedom Statutes
 Status Offenses
 Statutory Rape
 Stay of Execution
 Stem Cell Research/Research using Fetal Tissue
 Stenberg v. Carhart, 530 U.S. 914 (2000)
 Stevens, John Paul
 Stewart, Potter
 Stone Court
 Stone v. Graham, 449 U.S. 39 (1980)
 Stone, Harlan Fiske
 Stonewall Riot
 Stop and Frisk
 Storey, Moorfield
 Story, Joseph
 Strict Liability
 Strossen, Nadine
 Student Activity Fees and Free Speech
 Student Speech in Public Schools
 Subpoenas to Reporters
 Substantive Due Process
 Sumner, Charles
 Sunday Closing Cases and Laws
 Sunday Mail
 Supremacy Clause in Article VI of the Constitution
 Suspended Right of Habeas Corpus
 Swain v. Alabama, 380 U.S. 202 (1965)
 S. Warren and L. Brandeis, "The Right to Privacy,"
 4 Harvard L. Rev. 193 (1890)
 Swearinger v. United States, 161 U.S. 446 (1896)
 Symbolic Speech

T

Taft Court
 Taft–Hartley Act of 1947
 Taft, William Howard
 Takings Clause (V)
 Taney Court
 Tax Exemptions for Religious Groups and Clergy
 Taxpayer Standing to Challenge Establishment Clause Violations
 Taylor v. Illinois, 484 U.S. 400 (1988)
 Taylor v. Louisiana, 419 U.S. 522 (1975)
 Teacher Speech in Public Schools
 Teaching "Creation Science" in the Public Schools
 Teaching Evolution in the Public Schools
 Ten Commandments on Display in Public Buildings
 Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U.S. 1 (1985)
 Terrorism and Civil Liberties
 Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968)
 Test Oath Cases
 Texas Monthly, Inc. v. Bullock, 489 U.S. 1 (1989)
 Theories of Civil Liberties
 Theories of Civil Liberties, International Theories of Free Speech Protection
 Theories of Punishment
 Thirteenth Amendment
 Thomas, Clarence
 Thornburgh v. Abbott, 490 U.S. 401 (1989)
 Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747 (1986)
 Threats and Free Speech
 Three Strikes/Proportionality
 Tibbs v. Florida, 457 U.S. 31 (1982)
 Tileston v. Ullman, 318 U.S. 44 (1943)
 Tilton v. Richardson, 403 U.S. 672 (1971)
 Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U.S. 374 (1967)
 Time, Place, and Manner Rule
 Tinker v. Des Moines School District, 393 U.S.
 503 (1969)
 Title VII and Religious Exemptions
 Tony and Susan Alamo Foundation v. Secretary of Labor, 471 U.S. 290 (1985)
 Torcaso v. Watkins, 367 U.S. 488 (1961)
 Trademarks and the Establishment Clause
 Traditional Public Forums
 Treason
 Treason Clause
 Trial in Civil Cases (VII)
 Trial of the Seven Bishops, 12 Howell's State Trials
 183 (1688)
 Tribe, Laurence H.
 Trop v. Dulles, 356 U.S. 86 (1958)
 Turner Broadcasting Sys., Inc. v. FCC (Turner I), 512
 U.S. 622 (1994); 520 U.S. 180 (1997) (Turner II)

Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78 (1987)
Two-Tiered Theory of Freedom of Speech

U

Ulster County Court v. Allen, 442 U.S. 140 (1979)
Unconstitutional Conditions
Undocumented Migrants
United Nations Subcommittee on Freedom of Information and of the Press
United States v. 12 200-Foot Reels of Super 8mm.
Film, 413 U.S. 123 (1973)
United States v. 37 Photographs, 402 U.S. 363 (1971)
United States v. 92 Buena Vista Avenue, 507 U.S.
111 (1993)
United States v. Agurs, 427 U.S. 97 (1976)
United States v. Ash, 413 U.S. 300 (1973)
United States v. Balsys, 524 U.S. 666 (1998)
United States v. Brignoni-Ponce, 422 U.S. 873 (1975)
United States v. Calandra, 414 U.S. 338 (1974)
United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U.S. 542 (1876)
United States v. Dionisio, 410 U.S. 1 (1973)
United States v. Grimaud, 220 U.S. 506 (1911)
United States v. Havens, 446 U.S. 620 (1980)
United States v. Kahriger, 345 U.S. 22 (1953)
United States v. Lee, 455 U.S. 252 (1982)
United States v. Leon, 468 U.S. 897 (1984)
United States v. Lovasco, 431 U.S. 783 (1977)
United States v. Lovett, 328 U.S. 303 (1946)
United States v. Miller 307 U.S. 174 (1939)
United States v. Miller, 425 U.S. 435 (1976)
United States v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367 (1968)
United States v. One Book Entitled "Ulysses," 72 E.
2d 705 (1934)
United States v. Playboy Entertainment Group, 529
U.S. 803 (2000)
United States v. Ramirez, 523 U.S. 65 (1998)
United States v. Reidel, 402 U.S. 351 (1971)
United States v. Robinson, 414 U.S. 218 (1973)
United States v. Schoon, 971 F.2d 193 (9th Cir. 1991)
United States v. Schwimmer, 279 U.S. 644 (1929)
United States v. Seeger, 380 U.S. 163 (1965)
United States v. Tateo, 377 U.S. 463 (1964)
United States v. The Progressive, Inc., 467 F. Supp.
990 (W.D. Wis. 1979)
United States v. United States District Court, 407
U.S. 297 (1972)
United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 494 U.S.
259 (1990)
United States v. Wade, 388 U.S. 218 (1967)
United States v. Washington, 431 U.S. 181 (1977)
United States v. Watson, 423 U.S. 411 (1976)
Universities and Public Forums

University of Wisconsin v. Southworth, 529 U.S.
217 (2000)
Urofsky v. Gilmore, 216 F.3d 401 (4th Cir. 2000)

V

Vagrancy Laws
Vagueness and Overbreadth in Criminal Statutes
Vagueness Doctrine
Valentine v. Chrestensen, 316 U.S. 52 (1942)
Vance v. Universal Amusement Co., Inc., 445 U.S.
208 (1980)
Vernonia School District v. Acton, 515 U.S.
646 (1995)
Vice Products and Commercial Speech
Victim Impact Statements
Victimless Crimes
Victims' Rights
Vidal v. Girard's Executor, 43 U.S. 127 (1844)
Video Privacy Protection Act (1980)
Viewpoint Discrimination in Free Speech Cases
Vinson Court
Vinson, Fred Moore
Virginia Charter of 1606
Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776)
Virginia State Board of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens
Consumer Council, Inc., 425 U.S. 748 (1976)
Virginia v. Black, 123 S.Ct. 1536 (2003)
Void for Vagueness
Voting Rights (Compound)
Voting Rights Act of 1965

W

Waco/Branch Davidians
Waite Court
Walker, David
Wall of Separation
Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38 (1985)
Walz v. Tax Commission of the City of New York,
397 U.S. 664 (1970)
War on Drugs
Warden v. Hayden, 387 U.S. 294 (1967)
Warrant Clause (IV)
Warrantless Searches
Warren Court
Warren, Earl
Wartime Legislation
Washington v. Glucksberg, 521 U.S. 702 (1997)
Washington v. Texas, 388 U.S. 14 (1967)
Watson v. Jones, 80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 679 (1872)

ALPHABETICAL LIST OF ENTRIES

Watts v. United States, 394 U.S. 705 (1969)
Webb v. Texas, 409 U.S. 95 (1972)
Webster v. Reproductive Health Services, 492 U.S. 490 (1989)
Weddington, Sarah Ragle
Weeks v. United States, 232 U.S. 383 (1914)
Weems v. United States, 217 U.S. 349 (1910)
Welch, Joseph N.
Wells-Barnett, Ida Bell
West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943)
Whistleblowers
White Court
White, Byron Raymond
Whitney v. California, 274 U.S. 357 (1927)
William Penn's Case (1670)
Williams, Roger
Wilson v. Layne, 526 U.S. 603 (1999)
Wilson, Woodrow
Wiretapping Laws
Wisconsin v. Mitchell, 508 U.S. 476 (1993)
Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205 (1972)
Witters v. Washington Department of Services for the Blind, 474 U.S. 481 (1986)
Wolf v. Colorado, 338 U.S. 25 (1949)
Wolman v. Walter, 433 U.S. 229 (1977)
Wong Sun v. United States, 371 U.S. 471 (1963)
World War I, Civil Liberties in World War II, Civil Liberties in
Writs of Assistance Act

Wyman v. James, 400 U.S. 309 (1971)
Wyoming v. Houghton, 526 U.S. 295 (1999)

Y

Yates v. United States, 354 U.S. 298 (1957)
Young v. American Mini Theatres, Inc. 427 U.S. 50 (1976)
Younger v. Harris, 401 U.S. 37 (1971)

Z

Zablocki v. Redhail, 434 U.S. 374 (1978)
Zacchini v. Scripps Howard Broadcasting Company, 433 U.S. 562 (1977)
Zelman v. Simmons-Harris, 536 U.S. 639 (2002)
Zenger Trial (1735)
Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills School District, 509 U.S. 1 (1993)
Zoning and Religious Entities
Zoning Laws and "Adult" Businesses Dealing with Sex
Zoning Laws and Freedom of Speech
Zorach v. Clauson, 343 U.S. 306 (1952)
Zurcher v. Stanford Daily, 436 U.S. 547 (1978)

THEMATIC LIST OF ENTRIES

Organizations and Government Bodies

Act Up
America Online
American Anti-Slavery Society
American Civil Liberties Union
Americans United for Separation of Church and State
Amish and Religious Liberty
Amnesty International
Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith
Burger Court
Catholics and Religious Liberty
Central Intelligence Agency
Christian Coalition
Church of Scientology and Religious Liberty
Church of the New Song and Religious Liberty
Communist Party
Department of Homeland Security
Equal Rights Amendment
Fair Labor Standards Act and Religion
Federal Communications Commission
House Un-American Activities Committee
John Birch Society
Ku Klux Klan
Lambda Legal Defense and Education Fund
Legal Aid Society of New York
Legion of Decency
Log Cabin Republicans
Mormons and Religious Liberty
National Abortion Rights Action League (NARAL)
National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP)
National Labor Relations Board
National Organization for Women
National Rifle Association (NRA)
Operation Rescue
Private Discriminatory Association
Puritans
Quakers and Religious Liberty
Servicemembers Legal Defense Network

Seventh Day Adventists and Religious Liberty
Southern Center for Human Rights
Southern Poverty Law Center
Warren Court

Legislation and Legislative Action, Statutes, and Acts

Abortion Laws and the Establishment Clause
Adolescent Family Life Act
Alien and Sedition Acts (1798)
American Indian Religious Freedom Act of 1978
Anti-Anarchy and Anti-Syndicalism Statutes
Antipolygamy Laws
Becker Amendment
Bills of Rights in Early State Constitutions
Bill of Rights: Structure
Blaine Amendment
Broadcast Regulation
Cable Television Regulation
Campaign Finance Reform, No. 1021
Civil Rights Act of 1866
Civil Rights Act of 1875
Civil Rights Act of 1964
Communications Decency Act (1996)
Constitutional Amendment Permitting School Prayer
Defense of Marriage Act
Don't Ask, Don't Tell
English Toleration Act
Equal Access Act
Equal Protection Clause and Religious Freedom
Fair Credit Reporting Act, 84 Stat. 1127 (1970)
Fair Labor Standards Act and Religion
Freedom of Access to Clinic Entrances (FACE) Act,
108 Stat. 694 (1994)
Freedom of Information Act (1966)
Freedom of Information and Sunshine Laws
Gag Rule
Guided Discretion Statutes

THEMATIC LIST OF ENTRIES

Hatch Act
Hate Crime Laws
Helms Amendment (1989)
Immigration and Marriage Fraud Amendments of 1986
Immigration and Nationality Act Amendments of 1965
Indian Bill of Rights
Intelligence Identities Protection Act (1982)
Mann Act
Maryland Toleration Act (1649)
McCarran–Walter Act of 1952
Megan’s Law (Felon Registration)
Military Law
Moment of Silence Statutes
Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968 (92 Stat. 3795)
Oregon’s Death with Dignity Act (1994)
Patriot Act
Petition of Right (1628)
Privacy Protection Act, 94 Stat. 1879 (1980)
Religious Freedom Restoration Act
Selective Draft Law Cases (1918), Selective Service Act of 1917
Sentencing Reform Act
Sherman Act
Smith Act
Son of Sam Laws
State Religious Freedom Statutes
Taft–Hartley Act of 1947
Vagrancy Laws
Video Privacy Protection Act (1980)
Void for Vagueness
Voting Rights Act of 1965
Wiretapping Laws
Writs of Assistance Act

Historical Overview

Aliens, Civil Liberties of Arrest
Atheism
Belief–Action Distinction in Free Exercise Clause History
Bible Reading in Public Schools, History of before and after Abington School District v. Schempp
Bill of Rights: Adoption of
Blackstone and Common-Law Prohibition on Prior Restraints
Book Banning and Book Removals
Capital Punishment
Capital Punishment: History and Politics

Chase Court
Children and the First Amendment
Church Property after the American Revolution
Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. 3 (1883)
Civil Rights Laws and Freedom of Speech
Communism and the Cold War
Company Towns and Freedom of Speech
Cruel and Unusual Punishment (VIII)
Declaration of Independence
Defamation and Free Speech
Demonstrations and Sit-Ins
Disestablishment of State Churches in the Late Eighteenth Century and Early Nineteenth Century
Diversity Immigration Program
Domestic Violence
Double Jeopardy (V): Early History, Background, Framing
Double Jeopardy: Modern History
Due Process of Law (V and XIV)
Economic Regulation
Economic Rights in the Constitution
Ellsworth Court
English Bill of Rights, 1689
English Tradition of Civil Liberties
Equal Protection of Law (XIV)
Establishment Clause (I): History, Background, Framing
Establishment of Religion and Free Exercise Clauses
Exemptions
Extremist Groups and Civil Liberties
Fair Use Doctrine and First Amendment
Federalization of Criminal Law
Flag Salute Cases
Fourteenth Amendment
Free Exercise Clause (I): History, Background, Framing
Free Press/Fair Trial
Freedom of Speech and Press under the Constitution: Early History, 1791–1917
Freedom of Speech and Press: Nineteenth Century
Freedom of Speech Extended to Corporations
Freedom of Speech in Broadcasting
Freedom of Speech: Modern Period (1917–Present)
Freedom of the Press: Modern Period (1917–Present)
Fuller Court
Gay and Lesbian Rights
Grand Jury
Grand Jury Indictment (V)
Grand Jury Investigation and Indictment
Habeas Corpus: Modern History
Hughes Court
Insanity Defense
Intellectual Influences on Free Speech Law

Internet and Civil Liberties
 Japanese Internment Cases
 Jay Court
 Judicial Review
 Jury Nullification in Capital Punishment
 Jury Trial
 Jury Trials and Race
 Madison's Remonstrance (1785)
 Magna Carta
 Marriage, History of
 Marshall Court
 Miscegenation Laws
 Modern Political and Legal Philosophy, Civil Liberties in
 New Deal and Civil Liberties
 New Hampshire Constitution of 1784
 Noncitizens and Civil Liberties
 Non-Preferentialism
 North Carolina Constitution of 1776
 Obscenity in History
 Personal Liberty Laws
 Press Clause (I): Framing and History from Colonial Period up to Early National Period
 Privacy
 Privileges and Immunities (XIV)
 Proof beyond a Reasonable Doubt
 Quartering of Troops (III)
 Race and Criminal Justice
 Race and Immigration
 Ratification Debate, Civil Liberties in
 Rehnquist Court
 Religious Liberty under Eighteenth Century
 State Constitutions
 Religious Tests for Officeholding (Article 6, Cl. 3)
 Retained Rights (IX)
 Right to Bear Arms (II)
 Right to Counsel (VI)
 Same-Sex Marriage Legalization
 Segregation
 Self-Incrimination (V): Historical Background
 Self-Representation at Trial
 Sentencing Guidelines
 Sex and Criminal Justice
 Sex and Immigration
 Slavery and Civil Liberties
 Sodomy Laws
 Speech and Education
 Stare Decisis
 State Constitution, Privacy Provisions
 State Constitutions and Civil Liberties
 State Constitutions, Modern History, Civil Liberties under
 State Courts
 State Regulation of Religious Schools
 Stone Court

Substantive Due Process
 Sunday Closing Cases and Laws
 Supremacy Clause in Article VI of the Constitution
 Taft Court
 Takings Clause (V)
 Taney Court
 Tax Exemptions for Religious Groups and Clergy
 Teaching Evolution in the Public Schools
 Thirteenth Amendment
 Treason
 Trial in Civil Cases (VII)
 Vinson Court
 Voting Rights (Compound)
 Waite Court
 Warrant Clause (IV)
 Wartime Legislation
 White Court
 World War I, Civil Liberties in World War II, Civil Liberties in

Biography

Acton, Lord John
 Amsterdam, Anthony G.
 Anslinger, Harry Jacob
 Anthony, Susan B.
 Ashcroft, John
 Bache, Benjamin Franklin
 Baldwin, Roger
 Biddle, Francis Beverly
 Bingham, John Armor
 Bork, Robert Heron
 Brandeis, Louis Dembitz
 Breyer, Stephen Gerald
 Bruce, Lenny
 Bryan, William Jennings
 Bryant, Anita
 Burger, Warren E.
 Burke, Edmund
 Burton, Justice Harold
 Butler, Pierce
 Calhoun, John Caldwell
 Cardozo, Benjamin
 Catt, Carrie Chapman
 Chafee, Zechariah, Jr.
 Chambers, Whittaker
 Chase, Samuel
 Chavez, Cesar
 Chemerinsky, Erwin
 Chessman, Caryl
 Clark, Ramsey
 Clark, Tom Campbell

THEMATIC LIST OF ENTRIES

Cohn, Roy	Kevorkian, Jack
Comstock, Anthony	King, Martin Luther, Jr.
Connor, Eugene "Bull"	Kunstler, William M.
Covington, Hayden	La Follette, Robert Marion, Sr.
Cromwell, Oliver	Lilborne, John (Freeborn John)
Darrow, Clarence	Lincoln, Abraham
Dawson, Joseph Martin	Locke, John
Debs, Eugene V.	Long, Huey Pierce
Dees, Morris	Lovejoy, Elijah
Dershowitz, Alan	MacKinnon, Catharine
DeWitt, General John	Madison, James
Dies, Martin	Marshall, John
Douglas, William Orville	Marshall, Thurgood
Douglass, Frederick	Mason, George
Dworkin, Andrea	McCarthy, Joseph
Emerson, Thomas Irwin	McCorvey, Norma (Jane Roe)
Estes, Billie Sol	McReynolds, James C.
Evers, Medgar Wiley	Meese, Edwin, III
Falwell, Jerry	Meiklejohn, Alexander
Field, Stephen J.	Mill, John Stuart
Flynt, Larry	Miranda, Ernesto Arturo
Fortas, Abe	Mitchell, John
Frank, John P.	Montesquieu
Frankfurter, Felix	Murphy, Frank
Franklin, Benjamin	Murray, John Courtney
Freund, Paul A.	Nixon, Richard Milhaus
Garrison, William Lloyd	O'Connor, Sandra Day
Giddings, Joshua Reed	Otis, James
Gideon, Clarence Earl	Paine, Thomas
Gilmore, Gary	Palmer, A. Mitchell
Ginsburg, Ruth Bader	Penn, William
Goldberg, Arthur J.	Phillips, Wendell
Hague, Frank	Powell, Lewis Franklin, Jr.
Hamilton, Alexander	Prejean, Sister Helen
Hamilton, Andrew	Quinlan, Karen Ann
Hand, (Billings) Learned	Rauh, Joseph L., Jr.
Harlan, John Marshall, the Elder	Rawls, John Bordley
Harlan, John Marshall, II	Rehnquist, William H.
Hays, Will H.	Reno, Janet
Helper, Hinton	Roberts, Owen Josephus
Hentoff, Nat	Roosevelt, Franklin Delano
Hiss, Alger	Rorty, Richard
Holmes, Oliver Wendell, Jr.	Rosenberg, Julius and Ethel
Hoover, J. Edgar	Rush, Benjamin
Hughes, Charles Evans	Rutledge, Wiley Blount, Jr.
Jackson, Andrew	Ryan, George
Jackson, Robert H.	Sanger, Margaret Higgins
Jefferson, Thomas	Scalia, Antonin
Johnson, Frank, Minis, Jr.	Schlafly, Phyllis Stewart
Johnson, Lyndon Baines	Shaw, Lemuel
Justice, William Wayne	Shepard, Matthew
Kamisar, Yale	Sherman, Roger
Kaufman, Irving Robert	Souter, David Hackett
Kendall, Amos	Stanton, Elizabeth Cady
Kennedy, Anthony McLeod	Stevens, John Paul

Stewart, Potter
 Stone, Harlan Fiske
 Storey, Moorfield
 Story, Joseph
 Strossen, Nadine
 Sumner, Charles
 Taft, William Howard
 Thomas, Clarence
 Tribe, Laurence H.
 Vinson, Fred Moore
 Walker, David
 Warren, Earl
 Weddington, Sarah Ragle
 Welch, Joseph N.
 Wells-Barnett, Ida Bell
 White, Byron Raymond
 Williams, Roger
 Wilson, Woodrow

Cases

- A Book Named “John Cleland’s Memoirs of a Women of Pleasure” v. Massachusetts, 383 U.S. 413 (1966)
 Abington Township School District v. Schempp, 374 U.S. 203 (1963)
 Aboud v. Detroit Board of Education, 431 U.S. 209 (1977)
 Abortion Protest Cases
 Abrams v. United States, 250 U.S. 616 (1919)
 Agostini v. Felton, 521 U.S. 203 (1997)
 Aguilar v. Felton, 473 U.S. 402 (1985)
 Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, 462 U.S. 416 (1983)
 Alcorta v. Texas, 355 U.S. 28 (1957)
 County of Allegheny v. ACLU, 492 U.S. 573 (1989)
 Allen v. Illinois, 478 U.S. 364 (1986)
 Amalgamated Food Employees Union Local 590 v. Logan Valley Plaza, 391 U.S. 308 (1968)
 Ambach v. Norwick, 441 U.S. 68 (1979)
 American Booksellers Association, Inc., et al. v. Hudnut, 771 F. 2nd 323 (1985)
 American Communications Association v. Douds, 339 U.S. 382 (1950)
 Anders v. California, 386 U.S. 738 (1967)
 Apodaca v. Oregon, 406 U.S. 404 (1972)
 Apprendi v. New Jersey, 530 U.S. 466 (2000)
 Aptheker v. Secretary of State, 378 U.S. 500 (1964)
 Arizona v. Fulminante, 499 U.S. 279 (1991)
 Arizona v. Hicks, 480 U.S. 321 (1987)
 Arizona v. Youngblood, 488 U.S. 51 (1988)
 Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, 535 U.S. 234 (2002)
 Ballew v. Georgia, 435 U.S. 223 (1978)
 Baltimore City Department of Social Services v. Bouknight, 493 U.S. 549 (1990)
 Barclay v. Florida, 463 U.S. 939 (1983)
 Barefoote v. Estelle, 463 U.S. 880 (1983)
 Barenblatt v. United States, 360 U.S. 109 (1959)
 Barnes v. Glen Theatre, Inc., 501 U.S. 560 (1991)
 Barron v. Baltimore, 32 U.S. 243 (1833)
 Bartkus v. Illinois, 359 U.S. 121 (1959)
 Bartnicki v. Vopper, 532 U.S. 514 (2001)
 Bates v. State Bar of Arizona, 433 U.S. 350 (1969)
 Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79 (1986)
 Beal v. Doe, 432 U.S. 438 (1977)
 Beauharnais v. Illinois, 343 U.S. 250 (1952)
 Belle Terre v. Boraas, 416 U.S. 1 (1974)
 Bellis v. United States, 417 U.S. 85 (1974)
 Bellotti v. Baird, 443 U.S. 622 (1979)
 Benton v. Maryland, 395 U.S. 784 (1969)
 Berger v. New York, 388 U.S. 41 (1967)
 Berkemer v. McCarty, 468 U.S. 420 (1984)
 Bethel School District v. Fraser, 478 U.S. 675 (1986)
 Betts v. Brady, 316 U.S. 455 (1942)
 Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of Federal Bureau of Narcotics, 403 U.S. 388 (1971)
 Blackledge v. Perry, 417 U.S. 21 (1974)
 Board of Education of the Westside Community Schools v. Mergens, 496 U.S. 226 (1990)
 Board of Education v. Allen, 392 U.S. 236 (1968)
 Board of Education v. Earls, 536 U.S. 822 (2002) (Students)
 Board of Education v. Pico, 457 U.S. 853 (1982)
 Board of Education, Kiryas Joel School District v. Grumet, 512 U.S. 687 (1994)
 Bob Jones University v. United States, 461 U.S. 574 (1983)
 City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507 (1997)
 Bolger v. Youngs Drug Products Corp., 463 U.S. 60 (1983)
 Bond v. Floyd, 385 U.S. 116 (1966)
 Bordenkircher v. Hayes, 434 U.S. 357 (1978)
 Bowen v. American Hospital Association, 476 U.S. 610 (1986)
 Bowen v. Kendrick, 487 U.S. 589 (1988)
 Bowen v. Roy, 476 U.S. 693 (1986) (Social Security Number)
 Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186 (1986)
 Boy Scouts of America v. Dale, 530 U.S. 640 (2000)
 Boyd v. United States, 116 U.S. 616 (1886)
 Boykin v. Alabama, 395 U.S. 238 (1969)
 Bradfield v. Roberts, 175 U.S. 291 (1899)
 Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963)
 Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969)
 Branti v. Finkel, 445 U.S. 507 (1980)
 Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665 (1972)
 Braswell v. United States, 487 U.S. 99 (1988)

THEMATIC LIST OF ENTRIES

- Bray v. Alexandria Women's Health Clinic, 506 U.S. 263 (1993)
- Breithaupt v. Abram, 352 U.S. 432 (1957)
- Brewer v. Williams, 430 U.S. 387 (1977)
- Brooks v. Tennessee, 406 U.S. 605 (1972)
- Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen v. Virginia ex rel. Virginia, 377 U.S. 1 (1964)
- Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954)
- Brown v. Mississippi, 279 U.S. 278 (1936)
- Buchanan v. Kentucky, 483 U.S. 402 (1987)
- Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U.S. 60 (1917)
- Buck v. Bell, 274 U.S. 200 (1927)
- Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1 (1976)
- Bullington v. Missouri, 451 U.S. 430 (1981)
- Burdeau v. McDowell, 256 U.S. 465 (1921)
- Burks v. United States, 437 U.S. 1 (1978)
- Butler v. McKellar, 494 U.S. 407 (1990)
- Byers v. Edmondson, 712 So.2d 681 (1999) ("Natural Born Killers" Case)
- Cain v. Kentucky, 387 U.S. 319 (1970)
- Calder v. Bull, 3 U.S. 386 (1798)
- Calero-Toledo v. Pearson Yacht Leasing Co., 416 U.S. 663 (1974)
- California v. Acevedo, 500 U.S. 565 (1991)
- California v. Greenwood, 486 U.S. 35 (1988)
- California v. LaRue, 409 U.S. 109 (1972)
- California v. Ramos, 459 U.S. 1301 (1982)
- California v. Trombetta, 467 U.S. 479 (1984)
- Camara v. Municipal Court of the City and County of San Francisco, 387 U.S. 523 (1967)
- Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296 (1940)
- Capitol Square Review and Advisory Board v. Pinette, 515 U.S. 753 (1995)
- Carey v. Population Services International, 431 U.S. 678 (1977)
- Carolene Products v. U.S., 304 U.S. 144 (1938)
- Carroll v. United States, 267 U.S. 132 (1925)
- Central Hudson Gas and Electric Corp. v. Public Service Commission of New York, 447 U.S. 557 (1980)
- Chae Chan Ping v. U.S., 130 U.S. 581 (1889) and Chinese Exclusion Act
- Chambers v. Florida, 309 U.S. 227 (1940)
- Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284 (1973)
- Chandler v. Florida, 449 U.S. 560 (1981)
- Chandler v. Miller 520 U.S. 305 (1997) (Candidates)
- Chicago v. Morales, 527 U.S. 41 (1999)
- Chimel v. California, 395 U.S. 752 (1969)
- Church of the Holy Trinity v. United States, 143 U.S. 457 (1892)
- Church of the Lukumi Babalu Aye v. City of Hialeah, 508 U.S. 520 (1993)
- Cicenia v. LaGay, 357 U.S. 504 (1958)
- Cincinnati v. Discovery Network, Inc., 507 U.S. 14 (1993)
- Cohen v. California, 403 U.S. 15 (1971)
- Cohen v. Cowles Media Company, 501 U.S. 663 (1991)
- Coker v. Georgia, 433 U.S. 584 (1977)
- Colautti v. Franklin, 439 U.S. 379 (1979)
- Coleman v. Thompson, 501 U.S. 722 (1991)
- Colorado Republican Federal Campaign Committee v. Federal Election Commission, 518 U.S. 604 (1996)
- Colorado v. Connelly, 479 U.S. 157 (1986)
- Committee for Public Education and Religious Liberty v. Nyquist, 413 U.S. 756 (1973)
- Committee for Public Education and Religious Liberty v. Regan, 444 U.S. 646 (1980)
- Connally v. Georgia, 429 U.S. 245 (1977)
- Coolidge v. New Hampshire, 403 U.S. 443 (1971)
- Corporation of Presiding Bishop of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints v. Amos, 483 U.S. 327 (1987)
- Corrigan v. Buckley, 271 U.S. 323 (1926)
- Counselman v. Hitchcock, 142 U.S. 547 (1892)
- Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 536 (1965)
- Cox v. New Hampshire, 312 U.S. 569 (1941)
- Coy v. Iowa, 487 U.S. 1012 (1988)
- Crane v. Johnson, 242 U.S. 339 (1917)
- Crane v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 683 (1986)
- Cruzan v. Missouri, 497 U.S. 261 (1990)
- Dandridge v. Williams, 397 U.S. 471 (1971)
- Davis v. Alaska, 415 U.S. 308 (1974)
- Davis v. Beason, 133 U.S. 333 (1890)
- Debs v. United States, 249 U.S. 211 (1919)
- DeJonge v. Oregon, 299 U.S. 353 (1937)
- Delaware v. Prouse, 440 U.S. 648 (1979)
- Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494 (1951)
- Dickerson v. United States, 530 U.S. 428 (2000)
- Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. 179 (1973)
- Douglas v. California, 372 U.S. 353 (1963)
- Dred Scott v. Sandford, 60 U.S. 393 (1857)
- Duncan v. Louisiana, 391 U.S. 145 (1968)
- Dusky v. U.S., 362 U.S. 402 (1960)
- Edwards v. Aguillard, 482 U.S. 578 (1987)
- Edwards v. Arizona, 451 U.S. 477 (1981)
- Edwards v. California, 314 U.S. 160 (1941)
- Edwards v. South Carolina, 372 U.S. 229 (1963)
- Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438 (1972)
- Eldred v. Ashcroft, 537 U.S. 186 (2001)
- Elk Grove Unified School District v. Newdow, 542 U.S. 1 (2004)
- Elrod v. Burns, 427 U.S. 347 (1976)
- Employment Division, Department of Human Resources v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872 (1990)
- Engel v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421 (1962)
- Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97 (1968)
- City of Erie v. Pap's A.M., 529 U.S. 277 (2000)
- Erznoznik v. City of Jacksonville, 422 U.S. 205 (1975)

- Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478 (1964)
 Estate of Thornton v. Caldor, 472 U.S. 703 (1985)
 Estelle v. Smith, 451 U.S. 454 (1980)
 Estelle v. Williams, 425 U.S. 501 (1975)
 Everson v. Board of Education, 330 U.S. 1 (1947)
 Ex Parte Milligan, 71 U.S. 2 (1866)
 Ex Parte Vallandigham, 28 F.CAS 874
 FCC v. League of Women Voters, 468 U.S. 364 (1984)
 FCC v. Pacifica Foundation, 438 U.S. 726 (1978)
 Feiner v. New York, 340 U.S. 315 (1951)
 Fiallo v. Bell, 430 U.S. 787 (1977)
 Fisher v. United States, 425 U.S. 391 (1976)
 Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83 (1968)
 Florida v. Jimeno, 500 U.S. 248 (1991)
 Florida v. Riley, 488 U.S. 445 (1989)
 Florida v. Royer, 460 U.S. 491 (1983)
 Florida v. White, 526 U.S. 559 (1999)
 Florida Star v. B.J.F., 491 U.S. 524 (1989)
 Follett v. Town of McCormick, S.C., 321 U.S. 573 (1944)
 Fong Yue Ting v. United States, 149 U.S. 698 (1893)
 44 Liquormart v. Rhode Island, 517 U.S. 484 (1996)
 France v. United States, 164 U.S. 676 (1897)
 Francis v. Franklin, 471 U.S. 307 (1985)
 Frisbie v. Collins, 342 U.S. 519 (1952)
 Frisby v. Schultz, 487 U.S. 474 (1988)
 Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972)
 FW/PBS, Inc. v. City of Dallas, 493 U.S. 215 (1990)
 Gardner v. Florida, 430 U.S. 349 (1977)
 Gentile v. State Bar of Nevada, 501 U.S. 1030 (1991)
 Gerstein v. Pugh, 420 U.S. 103 (1975)
 Gertz v. Robert Welch Inc., 418 U.S. 323 (1974)
 Gibson v. Florida Legislative Investigation Committee, 372 U.S. 539 (1961)
 Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963)
 Giglio v. United States, 405 U.S. 150 (1972)
 Ginsberg v. New York, 390 U.S. 629 (1968)
 Ginzberg v. United States, 343 U.S. 463 (1966)
 Gitlow v. New York 268 U.S. 652 (1925)
 Godfrey v. Georgia, 446 U.S. 420 (1980)
 Godinez v. Moran, 509 U.S. 389 (1993)
 Goldberg v. Kelly, 397 U.S. 254 (1970)
 Goldman v. Weinberger, 475 U.S. 503 (1986)
 Good News Club v. Milford Central School, 533 U.S. 98 (2001)
 Graham v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, 490 U.S. 680 (1989)
 Green v. Georgia, 442 U.S. 95 (1979)
 Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153 (1976)
 Griffin v. California, 380 U.S. 609 (1965)
 Griffin v. Illinois, 351 U.S. 12 (1956)
 Griffin v. Wisconsin, 483 U.S. 868 (1987)
 Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965)
 Grosjean v. American Press Co., 297 U.S. 233 (1936)
 H.L. v. Matheson, 450 U.S. 398 (1981)
 Hague v. C.I.O., 307 U.S. 496 (1939)
 Haig v. Agee, 453 U.S. 280 (1981)
 Hale v. Henkel, 201 U.S. 370 (1906)
 Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, 542 U.S. 507 (2004)
 Harisiades v. Shaughnessy, 342 U.S. 580 (1952)
 Harmelin v. Michigan, 501 U.S. 957 (1991)
 Harper v. Virginia State Board of Elections, 383 U.S. 663 (1966)
 Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980)
 Harris v. New York, 401 U.S. 222 (1971)
 Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier, 484 U.S. 620 (1988)
 Herbert v. Lando, 441 U.S. 153 (1979)
 Hernandez v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, 490 U.S. 680 (1989)
 Herrera v. Collins, 506 U.S. 390 (1993)
 Hess v. Indiana, 414 U.S. 105 (1973)
 Hester v. United States, 265 U.S. 445 (1924)
 Hoffa v. United States, 385 U.S. 293 (1966)
 Holland v. Illinois, 493 U.S. 474 (1990)
 Hopt v. Utah, 110 U.S. 574 (1884)
 Houchins v. KQED, Inc., 438 U.S. 1 (1978)
 Hudson v. Louisiana, 450 U.S. 40 (1981)
 Hudson v. Palmer, 468 U.S. 517 (1984)
 Hunt v. McNair, 413 U.S. 734 (1973)
 Hurley v. Irish-American Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Group of Boston, 515 U.S. 557 (1995)
 Hurtado v. California, 110 U.S. 516 (1884)
 Hustler Magazine v. Falwell, 485 U.S. 46 (1988)
 Hutchinson v. Proxmire, 443 U.S. 111 (1979)
 Illinois v. Gates, 462 U.S. 213 (1983)
 Illinois v. Krull, 480 U.S. 340 (1987)
 Illinois v. Perkins, 496 U.S. 292 (1990)
 Illinois v. Wardlow, 528 U.S. 119 (2000)
 Immigration and Naturalization Service v. Chadha, 462 U.S. 919 (1983)
 Immigration and Naturalization Service v. Lopez-Mendoza, 468 U.S. 1032 (1984)
 City of Indianapolis v. Edmond, 531 U.S. 32 (2000)
 In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1 (1967)
 In re Griffiths, 413 U.S. 717 (1973)
 In re Winship, 397 U.S. 358 (1970)
 Jackson v. Denno, 378 U.S. 368 (1964)
 Jackson v. Indiana, 406 U.S. 715 (1972)
 Jackson v. Virginia, 443 U.S. 307 (1979)
 Jacobellis v. Ohio, 378 U.S. 184 (1964)
 Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 197 U.S. 11 (1905)
 Jacobson v. United States, 503 U.S. 540 (1992)
 Jamison v. Texas, 318 U.S. 413 (1943)
 Jenkins v. Georgia, 418 U.S. 152 (1974)
 Jimmy Swaggart Ministries v. Board of Equalization of California, 493 U.S. 378 (1990)
 Jones v. Wolf, 443 U.S. 595 (1979)
 Joseph Burstyn, Inc. v. Wilson, 343 U.S. 495 (1952)
 Jurek v. Texas, 428 U.S. 262 (1976)

THEMATIC LIST OF ENTRIES

- Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347 (1967)
 Kent v. Dulles, 357 U.S. 116 (1957)
 Kingsley International Pictures Corporation v. Regents of the University of New York, 360 U.S. 684 (1959)
 Kirby v. Illinois, 406 U.S. 682 (1972)
 Kleindienst v. Mandel, 408 U.S. 753 (1972)
 Klopfer v. North Carolina, 386 U.S. 213 (1967)
 Kois v. Wisconsin, 408 U.S. 229 (1972)
 Kolender v. Lawson, 461 U.S. 352 (1983)
 Konigsberg v. State Bar of California, 336 U.S. 36 (1961)
 Kyles v. Whitley, 514 U.S. 419 (1995)
 Kyllo v. United States, 533 U.S. 27 (2001)
 Lambert v. California, 355 U.S. 255 (1957)
 Lambert v. Wicklund, 520 U.S. 292 (1997)
 Lamb's Chapel v. Center Moriches Union Free School District, 508 U.S. 384 (1993)
 Lanzetta v. New Jersey, 306 U.S. 451 (1939)
 Late Corporation of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints v. United States, 136 U.S. 1 (1890)
 Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003)
 Lee v. Weisman, 505 U.S. 577 (1992)
 Legal Services Corporation v. Valesquez, 531 U.S. 533 (2001)
 Leland v. Oregon, 343 U.S. 790 (1952)
 Leyra v. Denno, 347 U.S. 556 (1954)
 Lilly v. Virginia, 527 U.S. 116 (1999)
 City of Littleton v. Z.J. Gifts D-4, L.L.C. (2004)
 Lloyd Corporation v. Tanner, 407 U.S. 551 (1972)
 Loan Association v. Topeka, 87 U.S. 655 (1875)
 Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45 (1905)
 Locke v. Davey, 540 U.S. 712 (2004)
 Lockett v. Ohio, 438 U.S. 586 (1978)
 Lockhart v. McCree, 476 U.S. 162 (1986)
 Lo-Ji Sales, Inc. v. New York, 442 U.S. 319 (1979)
 Los Angeles v. Lyons, 461 U.S. 95 (1983)
 Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1 (1967)
 Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668 (1984)
 Lyng v. Northwest Indian Cemetery Protective Association, 485 U.S. 439 (1988)
 Lynumn v. Illinois, 372 U.S. 528 (1963)
 Mabry v. Johnson, 467 U.S. 532 (1984)
 Madsen v. Women's Health Center, 512 U.S. 753 (1994)
 Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464 (1977)
 Mallory v. United States, 354 U.S. 449 (1957)
 Manson v. Brathwaite, 432 U.S. 98 (1977)
 Manual Enterprises Inc. v. Day, 370 U.S. 478 (1962)
 Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961)
 Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. 137 (1803)
 Marchetti v. United States, 390 U.S. 39 (1968)
 Marsh v. Chambers, 463 U.S. 783 (1983)
 Martin v. Ohio, 480 U.S. 228 (1987)
 Maryland v. Buie, 494 U.S. 325 (1990)
 Maryland v. Craig, 497 U.S. 836 (1990)
 Masses Publishing Company v. Patten, 244 U.S. 535 (1917)
 Massiah v. United States, 377 U.S. 201 (1964)
 Mathis v. United States, 391 U.S. 1 (1968)
 McCleskey v. Kemp, 481 U.S. 277 (1987)
 McCollum v. Board of Education, 333 U.S. 203 (1948)
 McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. 316 (1819)
 McDaniel v. Paty, 435 U.S. 618 (1978)
 McGautha v. California, 402 U.S. 183 (1971)
 McGowen v. Maryland, 366 U.S. 420 (1961)
 McKeiver v. Pennsylvania, 403 U.S. 528 (1971)
 McLaughlin v. Florida, 379 U.S. 184 (1964)
 McNabb v. United States, 318 U.S. 332 (1943)
 Menna v. New York, 423 U.S. 61 (1975)
 Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios (MGM) v. Grokster, 545 U.S. (2005)
 Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390 (1923)
 Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo, 418 U.S. 241 (1974)
 Michigan Department of State Police v. Sitz, 496 U.S. 444 (1990)
 Michigan v. DeFillippo, 443 U.S. 31 (1979)
 Michigan v. Lucas, 500 U.S. 145 (1991)
 Michigan v. Mosley, 423 U.S. 96 (1975)
 Michigan v. Summers, 452 U.S. 692 (1981)
 Milkovich v. Lorain Journal Co., 497 U.S. 1 (1990)
 Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15 (1973)
 Mills v. Alabama, 384 U.S. 214 (1966)
 Mincey v. Arizona, 437 U.S. 385 (1978)
 Minnesota v. Dickerson, 508 U.S. 366 (1993)
 Minnesota v. Olson, 495 U.S. 91 (1990)
 Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)
 Mishkin v. New York, 383 U.S. 502 (1966)
 Mistretta v. United States, 488 U.S. 361 (1989)
 Mitchell v. Helms, 463 U.S. 793 (2000)
 Monroe v. Pape, 365 U.S. 167 (1961)
 Mooney v. Holohan, 294 U.S. 103 (1935)
 Moore v. East Cleveland, 431 U.S. 494 (1977)
 Moran v. Burbine, 475 U.S. 412 (1986)
 Motes v. United States, 178 U.S. 458 (1900)
 Mozert v. Hawkins County Board of Education, 827 F. 2d 1058 (1987)
 Mt. Healthy City School District Board of Education v. Doyle, 429 U.S. 274 (1977)
 Mueller v. Allen, 463 U.S. 388 (1983)
 Mullaney v. Wilbur, 421 U.S. 684 (1975)
 Mutual Film Corporation v. Industrial Commission of Ohio, 236 U.S. 230 (1915)
 NAACP v. Alabama ex rel. Patterson, 357 U.S. 449 (1958)
 NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. 415 (1963)
 Naim v. Naim, 875 E. 2nd 749 (Va. 1955); 350 U.S. 891 (1955); 350 U.S. 985 (1956)
 Napue v. Illinois, 360 U.S. 264 (1959)

- Nardone v. United States, 308 U.S. 338 (1939)
 National Endowment for the Arts v. Finley, 118 S. Ct 2168 (1998)
 National Treasury Employee Union v. Von Raab, 489 U.S. 656 (1989)
 Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697 (1931)
 Nebbia v. New York, 291 U.S. 502 (1934)
 Nebraska Press Association v. Stuart, 427 U.S. 539 (1976)
 New Jersey v. T.L.O., 469 U.S. 325 (1985)
 New York Ex. Rel. Bryant v. Zimmerman, 278 U.S. 63 (1928)
 New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964)
 New York Times Co. v. United States, 403 U.S. 713 (1971)
 New York v. Belton, 453 U.S. 454 (1981)
 New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747 (1982)
 New York v. Quarles, 467 U.S. 649 (1984)
 Nix v. Williams, 467 U.S. 431, 104 (1984)
 NLRB v. Catholic Bishop of Chicago, 440 U.S. 490 (1979)
 North Carolina v. Alford, 400 U.S. 25 (1970)
 North Carolina v. Pearce, 395 U.S. 711 (1969)
 O'Connor v. Ortega, 480 U.S. 709 (1987)
 Ohio v. Robinette, 519 U.S. 33 (1996)
 Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438 (1928)
 O'Lone v. Estate of Shabazz, 482 U.S. 342 (1987)
 On Lee v. United States, 343 U.S. 747 (1952)
 Orozco v. Texas, 394 U.S. 324 (1969)
 Osborne v. Ohio, 495 U.S. 103 (1990)
 Papachristou v. City of Jacksonville, 405 U.S. 156 (1972)
 Paris Adult Theatre v. Slaton, 413 U.S. 49 (1973)
 Patterson v. New York, 432 U.S. 197 (1977)
 Paul v. Davis, 424 U.S. 693 (1976)
 Payton v. New York, 445 U.S. 573 (1980)
 Pell v. Procunier, 417 U.S. 817 (1974)
 Pennsylvania v. Scott, 524 U.S. 357 (1998)
 Philadelphia Newspapers, Inc. v. Hepps, 475 U.S. 767 (1986)
 Pickering v. Board of Education, 391 U.S. 563 (1968)
 Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925)
 Planned Parenthood of Missouri v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52 (1976)
 Planned Parenthood v. Ashcroft, 462 U.S. 476 (1983)
 Planned Parenthood v. Casey, 112 S.Ct. 2791 (1992)
 Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537 (1896)
 Plyler v. Doe, 457 U.S. 202 (1982)
 Poe v. Ullman, 367 U.S. 497 (1961)
 Poelker v. Doe, 432 U.S. 59 (1977)
 Pope v. Illinois, 481 U.S. 497 (1987)
 Posadas de Puerto Rico Association v. Tourism Company of Puerto Rico, 478 U.S. 328 (1986)
 Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45 (1932)
 Powell v. Texas, 392 U.S. 514 (1968)
 Prince v. Massachusetts, 321 U.S. 158 (1944)
 Profitt v. Florida, 428 U.S. 242 (1976)
 Pulley v. Harris, 465 U.S. 37 (1984)
 Quick Bear v. Leupp, 210 U.S. 50 (1908)
 Rabe v. Washington, 405 U.S. 313 (1972)
 Raley v. Ohio, 360 U.S. 423 (1959)
 Rankin v. McPherson, 483 U.S. 378 (1987)
 R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul, 505 U.S. 377 (1992)
 Rawlings v. Kentucky, 448 U.S. 98 (1980)
 Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367 (1969)
 Redrup v. New York, 386 U.S. 767 (1967)
 Regents of University of California v. Bakke, 438 U.S. 265 (1978)
 Regina v. Hicklin, L.R. 2 Q.B. 360 (1868)
 Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1 (1957)
 Reid v. Georgia, 448 U.S. 438 (1980)
 Reno v. ACLU, 521 U.S. 844 (1997)
 Renton v. Playtime Theatres, Inc., 475 U.S. 41 (1986)
 Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145 (1878)
 Rhode Island v. Innis, 446 U.S. 291 (1980)
 Rice v. Paladin Press ("Hit Man" Case), 940 F. Supp. 836 (D. Md. 1996)
 Richards v. Wisconsin, 520 U.S. 385 (1997)
 Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia, 448 U.S. 555 (1980)
 Ricketts v. Adamson, 483 U.S. 1 (1987)
 Riggins v. Nevada, 504 U.S. 127 (1992)
 County of Riverside v. McLaughlin, 500 U.S. 44 (1991)
 Rizzo v. Goode, 423 U.S. 362 (1976)
 Roberts v. United States Jaycees, 468 U.S. 609 (1984)
 Robinson v. California, 370 U.S. 660 (1962)
 Rochin v. California, 342 U.S. 165 (1952)
 Rock v. Arkansas, 483 U.S. 44 (1987)
 Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)
 Roemer v. Maryland Board of Public Works, 426 U.S. 736 (1976)
 Romer v. Evans, 517 U.S. 620 (1996)
 Rosales-Lopez v. United States, 451 U.S. 182 (1981)
 Rose v. Locke, 423 U.S. 48 (1975)
 Rosenberger v. Rector and Visitors of the University of Virginia, 515 U.S. 819 (1995)
 Ross v. Moffitt, 417 U.S. 600 (1974)
 Rotary International v. Rotary Club of Duarte, 481 U.S. 537 (1987)
 Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476 (1957)
 Roviario v. United States, 353 U.S. 53 (1957)
 Rowan v. United States Post Office Department, No. 399, 397 U.S. 728 (1970)
 Rust v. Sullivan, 500 U.S. 173 (1991)
 Rutan v. Republican Party of Illinois, 497 U.S. 62 (1990)
 Saenz v. Roe, 526 U.S. 489 (1999)
 Sandstrom v. Montana, 442 U.S. 510 (1979)

THEMATIC LIST OF ENTRIES

- Santa Clara Pueblo v. Martinez, 436 U.S. 49 (1978)
 Santa Fe Independent School District v. Doe, 530 U.S. 290 (2000)
 Santobello v. New York, 404 U.S. 257 (1971)
 Saxbe v. Washington Post, 417 U.S. 817 (1974)
 Scales v. United States, 367 U.S. 203 (1961)
 Schad v. Borough of Mount Ephraim, 452 U.S. 61 (1981)
 Schall v. Martin, 467 U.S. 253 (1984)
 Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919)
 Schmerber v. California, 384 U.S. 757 (1966)
 Schneekloth v. Bustamonte, 412 U.S. 218 (1973)
 School District of the City of Grand Rapids v. Ball, 473 U.S. 373 (1985)
 Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618 (1969)
 Shaughnessey v. United States Ex Rel. Mezei, 345 U.S. 206 (1953)
 Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U.S. 1 (1948)
 Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398 (1963)
 Sicurella v. United States, 348 U.S. 385 (1955)
 Simopoulos v. Virginia, 462 U.S. 506 (1983)
 Singer v. United States, 380 U.S. 24 (1965)
 Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535 (1942)
 Skinner v. Railway Labor Executives' Association, 489 U.S. 602 (1989)
 Slaughterhouse Cases, 83 U.S. (16 Wall.) 36 (1873)
 Smith v. California, 361 U.S. 147 (1959)
 Smith v. Organization of Foster Families, 431 U.S. 816 (1977)
 Snapp v. United States, 444 U.S. 507 (1980)
 Solem v. Helm, 463 U.S. 277 (1983)
 Sorrells v. U.S., 287 U.S. 435 (1932)
 South Dakota v. Opperman, 428 U.S. 364 (1976)
 Southeastern Promotions, Ltd. v. Conrad, 420 U.S. 546 (1975)
 Spano v. New York, 360 U.S. 315 (1959)
 Spaziano v. Florida, 468 U.S. 447 (1984)
 Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 557 (1969)
 Staples v. United States, 511 U.S. 600 (1994)
 Stenberg v. Carhart, 530 U.S. 914 (2000)
 Stone v. Graham, 449 U.S. 39 (1980)
 Swain v. Alabama, 380 U.S. 202 (1965)
 Swearingin v. United States, 161 U.S. 446 (1896)
 Taylor v. Illinois, 484 U.S. 400 (1988)
 Taylor v. Louisiana, 419 U.S. 522 (1975)
 Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U.S. 1 (1985)
 Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968)
 Test Oath Cases
 Texas Monthly, Inc. v. Bullock, 489 U.S. 1 (1989)
 Thornburgh v. Abbott, 490 U.S. 401 (1989)
 Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747 (1986)
 Tibbs v. Florida, 457 U.S. 31 (1982)
 Tileston v. Ullman, 318 U.S. 44 (1943)
 Tilton v. Richardson, 403 U.S. 672 (1971)
 Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 U.S. 374 (1967)
 Tinker v. Des Moines School District, 393 U.S. 503 (1969)
 Tony and Susan Alamo Foundation v. Secretary of Labor, 471 U.S. 290 (1985)
 Torcaso v. Watkins, 367 U.S. 488 (1961)
 Trop v. Dulles, 356 U.S. 86 (1958)
 Turner Broadcasting Sys., Inc. v. FCC (Turner I), 512 U.S. 622 (1994), 520 U.S. 180 (1997) (Turner II)
 Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78 (1987)
 Ulster County Court v. Allen, 442 U.S. 140 (1979)
 United States v. 12 200-Foot Reels of Super 8mm. Film, 413 U.S. 123 (1973)
 United States v. 37 Photographs, 402 U.S. 363 (1971)
 United States v. 92 Buena Vista Avenue, 507 U.S. 111 (1993)
 United States v. Agurs, 427 U.S. 97 (1976)
 United States v. Ash, 413 U.S. 300 (1973)
 United States v. Balsys, 524 U.S. 666 (1998)
 United States v. Brignoni-Ponce, 422 U.S. 873 (1975)
 United States v. Calandra, 414 U.S. 338 (1974)
 United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U.S. 542 (1876)
 United States v. Dionisio, 410 U.S. 1 (1973)
 United States v. Grimaud, 220 U.S. 506 (1911)
 United States v. Havens, 446 U.S. 620 (1980)
 United States v. Kahriger, 345 U.S. 22 (1953)
 United States v. Lee, 455 U.S. 252 (1982)
 United States v. Leon, 468 U.S. 897 (1984)
 United States v. Lovasco, 431 U.S. 783 (1977)
 United States v. Lovett, 328 U.S. 303 (1946)
 United States v. Miller 307 U.S. 174 (1939)
 United States v. Miller, 425 U.S. 435 (1976)
 United States v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367 (1968)
 United States v. One Book Entitled "Ulysses," 72 E. 2nd 705 (1934)
 United States v. Playboy Entertainment Group, 529 U.S. 803 (2000)
 United States v. Ramirez, 523 U.S. 65 (1998)
 United States v. Reidel, 402 U.S. 351 (1971)
 United States v. Robinson, 414 U.S. 218 (1973)
 United States v. Schoon, 971 F.2d 193 (9th Cir. 1991)
 United States v. Schwimmer, 279 U.S. 644 (1929)
 United States v. Seeger, 380 U.S. 163 (1965)
 United States v. Tateo, 377 U.S. 463 (1964)
 United States v. The Progressive, Inc., 467 F. Supp. 990 (W.D. Wis. 1979)
 United States v. United States District Court, 407 U.S. 297 (1972)
 United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 494 U.S. 259 (1990)
 United States v. Wade, 388 U.S. 218 (1967)
 United States v. Washington, 431 U.S. 181 (1977)
 United States v. Watson, 423 U.S. 411 (1976)
 University of Wisconsin v. Southworth, 529 U.S. 217 (2000)
 Urofsky v. Gilmore, 216 F.3d 401 (4th Cir. 2000)

Valentine v. Chrestensen, 316 U.S. 52 (1942)
 Vance v. Universal Amusement Co., Inc. 445 U.S.
 208 (1980)
 Vernonia School District v. Acton, 515 U.S. 646 (1995)
 Vidal v. Girard's Executor, 43 U.S. 127 (1844)
 Virginia State Board of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens
 Consumer Council, Inc., 425 U.S. 748 (1976)
 Virginia v. Black, 123 S.Ct. 1536 (2003)
 Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38 (1985)
 Walz v. Tax Commission of the City of New York,
 397 U.S. 664 (1970)
 Warden v. Hayden, 387 U.S. 294 (1967)
 Washington v. Glucksberg, 521 U.S. 702 (1997)
 Washington v. Texas, 388 U.S. 14 (1967)
 Watson v. Jones, 80 U.S. 679 (1872)
 Watts v. United States, 394 U.S. 705 (1969)
 Webb v. Texas, 409 U.S. 95 (1972)
 Webster v. Reproductive Health Services, 492 U.S.
 490 (1989)
 Weeks v. United States, 232 U.S. 383 (1914)
 Weems v. United States, 217 U.S. 349 (1910)
 West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette, 319
 U.S. 624 (1943)
 Whitney v. California, 274 U.S. 357 (1927)
 William Penn's Case
 Wilson v. Layne, 526 U.S. 603 (1999)
 Wisconsin v. Mitchell, 508 U.S. 476 (1993)
 Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205 (1972)
 Witters v. Washington Department of Services for the Blind, 474 U.S. 481 (1986)
 Wolf v. Colorado, 338 U.S. 25 (1949)
 Wolman v. Walter, 433 U.S. 229 (1977)
 Wong Sun v. United States, 371 U.S. 471 (1963)
 Wyman v. James, 400 U.S. 309 (1971)
 Wyoming v. Houghton, 526 U.S. 295 (1999)
 Yates v. United States, 354 U.S. 298 (1957)
 Young v. American Mini Theatres, Inc., 427 U.S.
 50 (1976)
 Younger v. Harris, 401 U.S. 37 (1971)
 Zablocki v. Redhail, 434 U.S. 374 (1978)
 Zacchini v. Scripps Howard Broadcasting Company,
 433 U.S. 562 (1977)
 Zelman v. Simmons-Harris, 536 U.S. 639 (2002)
 Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills School District, 509
 U.S. 1 (1993)
 Zorach v. Clauson, 343 U.S. 306 (1952)
 Zurcher v. Stanford Daily, 436 U.S. 547 (1978)

Themes, Issues, Concepts, and Events

Abolitionist Movement
 Abolitionists
 Abortion

Absolutism and Free Speech
 Abu Ghraib
 Academic Freedom
 Access to Government Operations Information
 Access to Judicial Records
 Access to Prisons
 Accommodation of Religion
 Accomplice Confessions
 Actual Malice Standard
 Administrative Searches and Seizures
 Affirmative Action
 Airport Searches
 American Revolution
 Anne Hutchinson Trial
 Anonymity and Free Speech
 Anonymity in Online Communication
 Anti-Abolitionist Gag Rules
 Anti-Abortion Protest and Freedom of Speech
 Antidiscrimination Laws
 Application of First Amendment to States
 Appropriation of Name or Likeness
 Arraignment and Probable Cause Hearing
 Arrest Warrants
 Arrest without a Warrant
 Assisted Suicide
 Asylum, Refugees and the Convention
 Against Torture
 Automobile Searches
 Autopsies and Free Exercise Beliefs
 Bad Tendency Test
 Bail
 Balancing Approach to Free Speech
 Balancing Test
 Baldus Study (Capital Punishment)
 Ballot Initiatives
 Baptists in Early America
 Bible in American Law
 Bill of Attainder
 Birth Control
 Blacklisting
 Bloody Tenent of Persecution for Cause of Conscience, Discussed in a Conference between Truth and Peace, The
 Blue Wall of Silence
 Boston Massacre Trial
 Brandenburg Incitement Test
 Burden of Proof: Overview
 Cameras in the Courtroom
 Campus Hate Speech Codes
 Capital Punishment and Race Discrimination
 Capital Punishment and Resentencing
 Capital Punishment and the Equal Protection Clause Cases
 Capital Punishment and Sentencing
 Capital Punishment and the Right of Appeal

THEMATIC LIST OF ENTRIES

Capital Punishment for Felony Murder	Criminal Conspiracy
Capital Punishment Held Not Cruel and Unusual Punishment under Certain Guidelines	Criminal Law/Civil Liberties and Noncitizens in the United States
Capital Punishment Reversed	Criminalization of Civil Wrongs
Capital Punishment: Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996	Cross-Burning
Capital Punishment: Due Process Limits	Cruel and Unusual Punishment Generally
Capital Punishment: Eighth Amendment Limits	Cuban Interdiction
Capital Punishment: Execution of Innocents	Cultural Defense
Capital Punishment: Lynching	Days of Religious Observance as National or State Holidays
Capital Punishment: Methods of Execution	Debtor's Prisons
Capital Punishment: Proportionality	Defense, Right to Present
Captive Audiences and Free Speech	Defiance of the Court's Ban on School Prayer
Categorical Approach to Free Speech	Defining Religion
Ceremonial Deism	Denaturalization
Chain Gangs	Designated Public Forums
Chaplains—Legislative	Dial-a-Porn
Chaplains—Military	Disciplining Lawyers for Speaking about Pending Cases
Charitable Choice	Disciplining Public Employees for Expressive Activity
Checkpoints (Roadblocks)	Discovery Materials in Court Proceedings
Chicago Seven Trial	Discrimination by Religious Entities That Receive Government Funds
Child Custody and Adoption	Discriminatory Prosecution
Child Custody and Foster Care	DNA and Innocence
Child Pornography	DNA Testing
Citizenship	Draft Card Burning
Civil Asset Forfeiture	Drug Testing
Civil Death	Drugs, Religion, and Law
Civil Religion	Dual Citizenship
Civilian Complaint Review Boards	Due Process
Classified Information	Due Process in Immigration
Clear and Present Danger Test	Duty to Obey Court Orders
Cloning	DWI
Coerced Confessions/Police Interrogation	Electric Chair as Cruel and Unusual Punishment
Collateral Consequences	Electronic Surveillance, Technology Monitoring, and Dog Sniffs
Colonial Charters and Codes	Emancipation Proclamation (1863)
Commercial Speech	Emergency, Civil Liberties in
Common Law or Statute	Entrapment and "Stings"
Compelling State Interest	Entrapment by Estoppel
Compulsory Vaccination	Establishment Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence
Concept of "Christian Nation" in American Jurisprudence	Establishment Clause: Theories of Interpretation
Confrontation and Compulsory Process	Eugenic Sterilization
Confrontation Clause	Euthanasia
Congressional Protection of Privacy	Ex Post Facto Clause
Conscientious Objection, the Free Exercise Clause	Exclusionary Rule
Conspiracy	Exemptions for Religion Contained in Regulatory Statutes
Constitution of 1787	Expatriation
Constitution Overseas	Extradition
Constitutional Convention of 1787	Eyewitness Identification
Content-Based Regulation of Speech	Fairness Doctrine
Content-Neutral Regulation of Speech	False Confessions
Copyright Law and Free Exercise
Corruption of Blood
County and City Seals with Religious Content
Creationism and Intelligent Design

THEMATIC LIST OF ENTRIES

False Light Invasion of Privacy Family Unity for Noncitizens Family Values Movement Felon Disenfranchisement Fighting Words and Free Speech First Amendment and PACs Flag Burning Forced Speech Free Exercise Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence Free Speech in Private Corporations Freedom of Association Freedom of Contract Freedom of Expression in the International Context Fruit of the Poisonous Tree Gag Orders in Judicial Proceedings Gang Ordinances General Warrants Glorious Revolution Government Funding of Speech Government Speech Grand Jury in Colonial America Grant's General Orders #11 (1862) (Expelling Jews) Group Libel Guantanamo Bay, Enemy Combatants, Post 9/11 Guilty But Mentally Ill Guilty Plea Gun Control/Anti-Gun Control Habeas Corpus Act of 1679 Habeas Corpus in Colonial America Harmless Error Hate Crimes Hate Speech Hearsay Evidence Heckler's Veto Problem in Free Speech Hip-Hop and Rap Music History and Its Role in Supreme Court Decision Making on Religion Homosexuality and Immigration Hostile Environment and Employment Discrimination Issues and Free Speech Ideological and Security-Based Exclusion and Deportation Illegitimacy and Immigration Impartial Decisionmaker Implied Rights Incorporation Doctrine Incorporation Doctrine and Free Speech Indefinite Detention Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Infliction of Emotional Distress and First Amendment Intellectual Property and the First Amendment Intermediate Scrutiny Test in Free Speech Cases Internet and Intellectual Property	Internet Filtering at Libraries and Free Speech Interstate Commerce Intrusion Invasion of Privacy and Free Speech Invidious Discrimination Jailhouse Informants Jehovah's Witnesses and Religious Liberty Jews and Religious Liberty Journalism and Sources Judicial Bias Judicial Proceedings and References to the Deity Judicial Resolution of Church Property Disputes Jurisdiction of the Federal Courts Jury Nullification Jury Selection and Voir Dire Jury Trial Right Kentucky and Virginia Resolves Lawyer Advertising Legal Realists Legislative Prayer Legislators' Freedom of Speech Lemon Test Limitations on Clergy Holding Office Limited Public Forums Line-Ups Low Value Speech Mandatory Death Sentences Unconstitutional Mandatory Minimum Sentences Marches and Demonstrations Marital Rape Marketplace of Ideas Theory Massachusetts Body of Liberties of 1641 Material Witnesses Matters of Public Concern Standard in Free Speech Cases Media Access to Information Media Access to Judicial Proceedings Media Access to Military Operations Media Liability for Causing Physical Harm Mentally Ill Military Tribunals Miller Test Miranda Warning Movie Ratings and Censorship Museums and Expression Muslims and Religious Liberties National Motto "In God We Trust" National Origins Quota System National Security National Security and Freedom of Speech National Security Prior Restraints Native Americans and Religious Liberty Natural Law, Eighteenth-Century Understanding Neutral Reportage Doctrine New Right
---	--

THEMATIC LIST OF ENTRIES

Newsroom Searches
9/11 and the War on Terrorism
Ninth Amendment
No Coercion Test
No Endorsement Test
Noncitizens and the Franchise
Noncitizens and Land Ownership
Non-Preferentialism
O'Brien Content-Neutral Free Speech Test
O'Brien Formula
Obscenity
Open Fields
Overbreadth Doctrine
Pacifists and Naturalization
Pardon and Commutation
Penumbras
Petition Campaign
Philosophy and Theory of Freedom of Expression
Physician-Assisted Suicide
Picketing
Plain View
Planned Parenthood ("Nuremburg Files") Litigation
Plea Bargaining
Pledge of Allegiance ("Under God")
Pledge of Allegiance and the First Amendment
Plenary Power Doctrine
Police Investigation Commissions
Police Power of the State
Political Correctness and Free Speech
Political Patronage and the First Amendment
Politics and Money
Prayer in Public Schools
Preferred Position
Preventative Detention
Prior Restraints
Prison Population Growth
Prisoners and Free Exercise Clause Rights
Prisoners and Freedom of Speech
Privacy, Theories of
Private Police
Private Possession of Obscenity in the Home
Private Religious Speech on Public Property
Probable Cause
Professional Advertising
Profiling (Including DWB)
Prohibition
Proportional Punishment
Proportionality Reviews
Public Figures
Public Forum Doctrines
Public/Nonpublic Forums Distinction
Public Officials
Public School Curricula and Free Exercise Claims
Public Trial
Public Vulgarly and Free Speech
Rape: Naming Victim
Rastafarians and the Free Exercise of Religion
Reapportionment
Red Scare of the Early 1920s
Refusal of Medical Treatment and Religious Beliefs
Release Time from Public Schools (For Religious Purposes)
Religion in Nineteenth-Century Public Education (Includes "Bible Wars")
Religion in "Public Square" Debate
Religion in Public Universities
Religion in the Workplace
Religious Freedom in the Military
Religious Garb in Courtrooms and Classrooms
Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000
Religious Symbols on Public Property
Removal to Federal Court
Reporter's Privilege
Reproductive Freedom
Restricting Actions of Legal Services Lawyers
Restrictive Covenants
Retribution
RICO
Right of Access to Criminal Trials
Right of Privacy
Right to Counsel
Right to Know
Right to Petition
Right to Reply and Right of the Press
Right to Travel
Right to Vote for Individuals with Disabilities
Right v. Privilege Distinction
Rights of the Accused
Ripeness in Free Speech Cases
Ruby Ridge Incident
Rule of Law
S. Warren and L. Brandeis, "The Right to Privacy," 4 Harvard L. Rev. 193 (1890)
Sacco and Vanzetti
Salvation Army and Religious Liberty
Same-Sex Adoption
Same-Sex Unions
Satire and Parody and the First Amendment
School Vouchers
Scopes Trial
Scottsboro Trials
Sealed Documents in Court Proceedings
Search (General Definition)
Search Warrants
Secondary Effects Doctrine
Secular Purpose
Seditious Libel
Seizures
Self-Defense

THEMATIC LIST OF ENTRIES

Self-Fulfillment Theory of Free Speech Self-Governance and Free Speech Self-Incrimination: Miranda and Evolution Shield Laws Shopping Centers and Freedom of Speech Sincerity of Religious Belief SLAPP Suits (Strategic Lawsuits against Public Participation) Slavery Snake-Handling Sects and Religious Liberty Speech and Its Relation to Violence Speech of Government Employees Speech versus Conduct Distinction Speedy Trial Spying on Citizens Standing in Free Speech Cases State Action Doctrine State Aid to Religious Schools State and Federal Regulation of Immigration State Constitutional Distinctions Status Offenses Statutory Rape Stay of Execution Stem Cell Research/Research Using Fetal Tissue Stonewall Riot Stop and Frisk Strict Liability Student Activity Fees and Free Speech Student Speech in Public Schools Subpoenas to Reporters Sunday Mail Suspended Right of Habeas Corpus Symbolic Speech Taxpayer Standing to Challenge Establishment Clause Violations Teacher Speech in Public Schools Teaching “Creation Science” in the Public Schools Ten Commandments on Display in Public Buildings Terrorism and Civil Liberties	Theories of Civil Liberties Theories of Civil Liberties, International Theories of Free Speech Protection Theories of Punishment Threats and Free Speech Three Strikes/Proportionality Time, Place, and Manner Rule Title VII and Religious Exemptions Trademarks and the Establishment Clause Traditional Public Forums Treason Clause Trial of the Seven Bishops, 12 Havell’s State Trials 183 (1688) Two-Tiered Theory of Freedom of Speech Unconstitutional Conditions Undocumented Migrants United Nations Subcommittee on Freedom of Information and of the Press Universities and Public Forums Vagueness and Overbreadth in Criminal Statutes Vagueness Doctrine Vice Products and Commercial Speech Victim Impact Statements Victimless Crimes Victims’ Rights Viewpoint Discrimination in Free Speech Cases Virginia Charter of 1606 Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776) Waco/Branch Davidians Wall of Separation War on Drugs Warrantless Searches Whistleblowers Zenger Trial (1735) Zoning and Religious Entities Zoning Laws and “Adult” Businesses Dealing with Sex Zoning Laws and Freedom of Speech
---	--

INTRODUCTION

The story of America is, in part, the story of civil liberties. The early settlers of Massachusetts, the Plymouth separatists—remembered as the Pilgrims—and the Massachusetts Bay Puritans came to America seeking freedom of religious worship. This was a civil liberty they sought for themselves, although not for others in their community. But by the end of the 1640s, Rhode Island offered substantial religious toleration for people of all faiths while Maryland offered toleration for most Christians. New Amsterdam would later develop a regime of toleration while Pennsylvania and South Carolina would begin as colonies open to people of all faiths. While Europeans continued to slaughter each other over matters of faith, Americans, even in the most rigid colonies, developed a sense of toleration. This was the first step towards a culture of liberties and civil liberties. Instances of religious persecution—hanging of Quakers in Boston or witches in Salem—proved to be lessons to other Americans on why civil liberties mattered.

Political struggles in the colonies helped Americans develop a growing sense of liberty. The trial of the printer John Peter Zenger in 1736 for his attacks on the governor of New York did not alter the law of libel in England or America. But the case did highlight the importance of due process, the grand jury indictment, and an impartial jury to the cause of liberty. Zenger had clearly embarrassed the governor and his administration, and under the law of the time that amounted to seditious libel. However, the grand jury refused to indict the printer, in part because what he said was substantially true. The prosecutor charged Zenger by information, bypassing the grand jury and, in the process, teaching Americans the importance of the grand jury as a buffer between the state and the individual. The prosecutor then tried to stack the jury while the judge disbarred Zenger's lawyers. Good lawyering by an appointed counsel, a clever strategy by Zenger's supporters, and an impartial jury ultimately led to an acquittal. The lesson for the colonists was that due process protections were central to a free people and civil liberties were necessary to protect the governed from the government.

The Revolutionary Era brought new civil liberties concerns. In 1776, Americans complained that the King denied them due process and fair trials. During the Revolution, Americans worried about freedom the press, bills of attainder, and the problems of creating a free society without spinning into anarchy; and about creating a stable society that avoided becoming a tyranny. Constitutional government, a bill of rights, and an expanded suffrage were designed to prevent both evils by creating stability and liberty.

Since the adoption of the Bill of Rights in 1791, Americans have often debated the meaning of civil liberties. In the 1790s, Congress passed the Fugitive Slave Law of 1793 and the Sedition Act of 1798, both of which seemed to violate provisions of the Bill of Rights. The Supreme Court did not consider the constitutionality of the first law until 1842 and never considered the constitutionality of the Sedition Act. By 1812, however, the political process and accepted political and social norms eliminated seditious libel from the American landscape, until Congress revived it during World War I. The antebellum crisis led to debates over abolitionist speech and petitions to Congress. Slavery itself was, of course, the worst violation of civil liberties in American history. But slave owners argued that their civil liberties prevented the national government from taking their property—freeing their slaves—without just compensation. The Civil War raised new questions about free speech, the suspension of habeas corpus, and the right to free slaves. The aftermath of the war led to loyalty oaths, the suspension of habeas corpus in parts of the South, and three new amendments that began to change the nature of federalism by applying the Bill of Rights and other federal protection to the states. Immigration, labor unions, anarchism, new political ideologies, the suppression of black equality, fears of pornography, feminism, and the dissemination of information about birth control all raised new civil liberties issues in the last part of the nineteenth century. World War I led to a new Sedition Act and, for the first time, the Supreme Court was forced to define the meaning of speech.

Throughout the twentieth century, the Supreme Court was at the center of the meaning of rights. The courts have protected civil liberties at times, and at others have been less protective. Most importantly, the courts have continuously expanded and reinterpreted the meaning of civil liberties. So too has popular culture. In the early nineteenth century it seemed reasonable, even within the context of freedom of speech and religion, to punish blasphemy. Today such an idea would be dismissed by almost all Americans. Early movies were often quite sexually suggestive. By the 1940s they were almost prudish. Today society tolerates almost anything in a movie, but we properly focus on who can see a movie—protecting children from sexually explicit content—rather than on the content itself.

INTRODUCTION

The rights of the accused also changed over time. Since 1791, the Eighth Amendment has banned cruel and unusual punishment, and most states have had similar prohibitions in their constitutions. But until the 1960s, many police department routinely interrogated prisoners with threats, violence, sleep deprivation, and other tactics commonly called “the third degree.” When the U.S. Supreme Court stopped such practices in the mid-1960s many Americans objected. They feared that the police would be unable to do their job. Two generations later, even police departments find that protecting the rights of the accused makes policing easier and is less likely to lead to false confessions. Most Americans can recite their “Miranda” rights by heart, having heard them in movies and on television over and over again. Americans know their rights and understand the value of these rights.

At the beginning of the twenty-first century, civil liberties are at the center of political discourse. The wars in Afghanistan, in Iraq and the war on terrorism have raised new questions about civil liberties in an age of what may be perpetual war or at least perpetual alerts for terrorism. Americans have to ponder how eighteenth century ideas fit into a new technological age. The Bill of Rights requires that the government may not conduct a search without a warrant, issued by a judge on the basis of probable cause. The Sixth Amendment requires a speedy trial. Can such requirements work in an age of high-tech terror? Can our democracy survive if such requirements are ignored?

With these issues in mind, Routledge publishes the Encyclopedia of American Civil Liberties. We have designed this work to provide a comprehensive access to the key historical and contemporary issues surrounding civil liberties in the United States. We believe that no reference work could be more timely or more vital to the nation than one on civil liberties. We hope the encyclopedia will help students, scholars, the general public, lawmakers, and government officials better understand the complexity of civil liberties and their historic role in the development of the United States.

Coverage

In addition to freedom of speech, press, religion, assembly, and petition, the encyclopedia covers topics such as privacy, property rights, the rights of the accused, and national security. Its multidisciplinary approach and breadth of scope will make it an essential library reference for lawyers, scholars, students, and general readers. The entries discuss a wide range of topics, including:

- The Constitution, the Bill of Rights, and the history of civil liberties
- Cases, trials, and important court decisions
- Associations, societies, organizations, and government bodies
- Literature, entertainment, media, and art
- Slavery, crime, and war
- Religion, censorship, and privacy
- People, places, and events

The articles are grouped into thematic entries, as follows:

Biography

Biographies cover such pioneers from Thomas Jefferson, the master stylist of American history, to Margaret Sanger, the founder of Planned Parenthood. The biography entries in this encyclopedia are focused on the social, political, and other circumstances relevant to the individual's work.

Cases

Case entries provide a clear and engaging narrative that includes the background on the case, the identification of key players, and an explanation of how the case arose. The main text of the entry should discuss the analysis, doctrine, and majority opinion vote. Case entries conclude by explaining the long-term impact of the decision, as well as the importance of the case in relation to civil liberties.

Historical Overview

Entries focus on the origin of the subject in American history and its relationship to civil liberties. The discussion includes influences (religious, philosophical, cultural, and so forth), major players and events, and long-term impact on civil liberties.

Legislation, Legislative Action, Statutes, and Acts

Entries on legislation detail the history, enactment, and current status of the law, statute, or act. This also includes precedents, actions, and events that led to its formation, cases involved in its history, and consequences or lasting impact on civil liberties.

Organizations and Government Bodies

Organizations are included that have had an impact on civil liberties in the United States. Each entry includes the organization or government body's history, key members (including founders) throughout its history, and legal implications of its impact on civil liberties.

Themes, Issues, Concepts, and Events

The focus of these entries is on the relationship between the subject and civil liberties. In addition to the basic discussion of the subject, each entry may include the following issues: history, origins, and development; legal, academic, or theoretical debates; perspectives from different fields or schools of thought; or any unresolved issues concerning the subject.

How to Use This Book

The Encyclopedia of American Civil Liberties contains 1423 entries of 250 to 6000 words in length. They range from biographies to thematic interpretations and analytical discussions of timely topics. As far as possible, the encyclopedia covers the history and politics of civil liberties from the time of the Founding Fathers to the present, providing the reader with a reliable, up-to-date view of the current state of scholarship on civil liberties and the meaning of freedom in American life.

Perhaps the most significant feature of the encyclopedia is the easily accessible A to Z format. Cross-referencing in the form of See Alsos at the end of most entries refer the reader to other related entries. Each article contains a list of References and Further Reading, including sources used by the writer and editor as well as additional items that may be of interest to the reader. Most books or articles cited are easily available through interlibrary loan services in libraries. Entries may also include a segment entitled Cases and Statutes Cited, which lists the citations of cases and statutes referred to in the article. Blind Entries direct readers to essays listed under another title. For example, the blind entry "Death Penalty" refers the reader to the article titled "Capital Punishment." A thorough, analytical index complements the accessibility of the entries, easing the reader's entry into the wealth of information provided. A Thematic List of Entries is also included to assist readers with research in particular areas.

Four hundred and seventy authors have contributed the entries to this encyclopedia. Contributors represent a variety of fields, among them criminal law, Constitutional law, law and religion, legal history, law and race, and reproductive rights. The expertise of a wide-ranging and diverse group of contributors will provide the reader with a broad-based overview of issues, events, and theories of the developing world.

INTRODUCTION

Acknowledgments

This encyclopedia would not have been possible without the cooperation of hundreds of scholars who have written for it. My coeditors—Jack Chin, Dave Douglas, Rod Smolla, Mel Urofsky, and Mary Volcansek—have worked enormously hard in making this project happen. They have made my job as editor-in-chief a pleasure because they were such a pleasure to work with. The project began under the editorship of Sylvia Miller. I am especially grateful to Jamie Ehrlich, who has managed the project for the last year, Mark Georgiev, Mark O'Malley, Kate Aker, and Marie-Claire Antoine, and Tracy Grace for their efforts in the editorial production aspects of this encyclopedia. The creation of a reference work is a team effort, and I have been blessed with a wonderful team of scholars and publishers. I thank all of them not only for the pleasure of working together, but also for their dedication to helping all Americans learn more about our constitutional rights and our civil liberties.

Paul Finkelman

A BOOK NAMED “JOHN CLELAND’S MEMOIRS OF A WOMAN OF PLEASURE” v. MASSACHUSETTS, 383
U.S. 413 (1966)

A civil proceeding initiated by the Massachusetts attorney general declared Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure (more commonly known as Fanny Hill) to be obscene. The publisher, G. P. Putman, appealed and lost. The Supreme Court, with Justice Brennan writing for a three-judge plurality (Justices Warren and Fortas joining him), reversed the lower court in a short opinion—one of three dealing with obscenity questions handed down on the same day. Justices Douglas and Black wrote opinions concurring with the judgment. Justices Clark, Harlan, and White wrote separate dissents.

The sole issue in Memoirs was the appellate court’s application of the Roth (Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476, 1957) standard. Justice Brennan concluded the court erred by not applying each element separately before declaring a publication obscene. The Massachusetts appellate court in affirming the lower court decision that Memoirs was obscene on two of Roth’s criteria applied the third standard according to its view that it did “not interpret the ‘social importance’ test as requiring that a book which appeals to prurient interest and is patently offensive must be unqualifiedly worthless before it can be deemed obscene.”

Justice Brennan disagreed and asserted that all three elements must be met. Moreover, he explained the third criterion, in accordance with his opinion in Jacobellis v. Ohio, 378 U.S. 184 (1964), meant that the book must be “utterly without redeeming social value” (italics in original). The justice’s restatement of this criterion had the effect of shrinking the zone of sexually explicit material that would not be protected under the First Amendment. It constituted a liberalization of this criterion in Roth because prosecutions for obscenity would be made more difficult.

Moreover, the social value of allegedly obscene material cannot be weighed against the other two elements; material failing any one standard, therefore, is sufficient to consider the material not obscene. Even if Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure possessed “only a modicum of social value,” the Massachusetts judgment would have to be reversed. Then, referring to the majority’s contemporaneous decision in Ginzburg v. United States, 383 U.S. 463 (1966), Justice Brennan added that the circumstances of production, sale, and publicity might be pertinent when determining the obscenity of material. Commercial exploitation of the book’s prurient appeal, “to the exclusion of all other values,” might indicate the book lacks redeeming social importance. In this instance, however, the courts were not asked to judge Memoirs against this background.

In an angry dissent, Justice Clark, reporting that he supplied the deciding vote in Roth, complained that the “utterly without redeeming social value” standard added a new element to Roth. In his view, Roth required only that a book be judged “as a whole” and in terms of “its appeal to the prurient interest of the average person, applying contemporary community standards.” Prior to Jacobellis, Justice Clark pointed out, no previous decisions referred to the “utterly without redeeming social value” test, and Justice Brennan’s position in Jacobellis won only Justice Goldberg’s vote, which did not give it precedential weight. Justice White, agreeing with Justice Clark, claimed that this element “is not an independent test of obscenity but is relevant only to determining the predominant prurient interest of the material.” In other words, evidence of prurience implies something that is “utterly without redeeming social value.”

Justice Harlan lamented that Roth produced “no stable approach” to the obscenity problem. Moreover, the concept of pandering, suggested first by Justice Warren in his Roth concurrence and subsequently adopted in Ginzburg, provided no more than “an uncertain . . . interpretative aid” in sorting out “this tangled state of affairs.” Furthermore, Brennan’s suggestion that pandering may create a context that offsets social value “wipes out any certainty the latter term might be given . . . and admits into the case highly prejudicial evidences without appropriate restrictions.”

The companion cases to Memoirs are Ginzburg vs. United States and Mishkin v. New York, 383 U.S. 502 (1966).

ROY B. FLEMMING

Reference and Further Reading

Rembar, Charles. The End of Obscenity: The Trials of Lady Chatterley, Tropic of Cancer, and Fanny Hill. New York: Random House, 1968.

Cases and Statutes Cited

A Book Named “John Cleland’s Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure” v. Attorney General of Massachusetts, 383 U.S. 413 (1966)

Ginzburg v. United States, 383 U.S. 463 (1966)

Jacobellis v. Ohio, 378 U.S. 184 (1964)

Mishkin v. New York, 383 U.S. 502 (1966)

Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476 (1957)

ABINGTON TOWNSHIP SCHOOL DISTRICT v. SCHEMP, 374 U.S. 203 (1963)

One of the two decisions known as the school prayer cases, Abington followed immediately in the wake of Engel v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421 (1962), in which the Supreme Court declared unconstitutional the recitation in public schools of a prayer composed by the New York Board of Regents. There the Court concluded that it was “no part of the business of government to compose official prayers for any group of the American people to recite as a part of a religious program carried on by government.” Unlike Engel, which involved the state’s participation in the composition of a religious exercise, in Abington government acted as the sponsor rather than composer of religious exercises. The case thus posed clearly the issue of whether state-sponsored and supervised religious activities violated the First Amendment’s establishment clause. A majority of the Court held that they did.

The Decision in Abington

At issue in Abington was the state-sponsored practice of beginning school days with Bible readings, selected and read by students or a teacher, and the recitation of the Lord’s Prayer by students. Writing for the Court’s majority, Justice Tom Clark easily concluded that the Bible readings and prayers were religious exercises. The primary defect of state-sponsored religious exercises in public schools, according to the Court’s opinion, was that they offended the establishment clause’s demand for neutrality on the part of government with respect to religion. The requisite constitutional neutrality was more than a mere lack of preference for one religion over another, though there was significant evidence before the Court that the religious exercises at issue preferred Christianity to Judaism. Instead, the Court characterized the necessary neutrality as one which avoided aiding or hindering religion. Justice Clark’s opinion did not characterize the establishment clause in terms of a necessary separation between church and state, but it quoted favorably from previous decisions emphasizing the requirement of separation.

The decision in Abington did not turn on a finding that students were compelled to participate in religious exercises that offended their beliefs, since students were allowed to absent themselves from the exercises. But the Court concluded that this fact did not salvage the practices at issue, since the establishment clause required neutrality toward religion, not simply the avoidance of religious compulsion. In language that would assume even greater importance once incorporated into the three-part test of Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602 (1971), for determining whether a government action violated the establishment clause, the Court’s opinion emphasized that the requisite neutrality called for a “secular legislative purpose and a primary effect that neither advances nor inhibits religion.”

Against the claim that the removal of officially sponsored prayer and Bible reading would establish a “religion of secularism,” the Court denied that its decision excluded religion from schools. “Nothing we have said here,” Justice Clark insisted for the majority, “indicates that . . . study of the Bible or of religion, when presented objectively as part of a secular program of education, may not be effected consistently with the First Amendment.” Nor could the Court accept that its decision frustrated the free exercise of religion, an argument present by Justice Potter Stewart in a dissenting opinion. Stewart suggested that parents who wished their children to begin the school day with Bible readings and prayer had a substantial free exercise claim. If religion were excluded from public schools, then the religion would be placed at an “artificial and state-created” disadvantage. A majority of the Court, however, rejected this argument. The establishment clause meant that a local or state religious majority could not “use the machinery of the State to practice its beliefs.”

Aftermath

Abington established firmly the principle that public school authorities would not be permitted to sponsor devotional religious exercises. In subsequent cases, the Court demonstrated itself to be the implacable antagonist of every attempt to make state or local governments partners in the conduct of religious exercises or in the dissemination of religious teachings. Attempts to circumvent the holdings of Engel and Abington flourished in the decades that followed. Some states attempted to create “moments of silence” in which students might pray or meditate or do nothing, according to their individual desires. A majority of the members of the Court seemed receptive to this kind of legislative scheme, at least in some circumstances. But when evidence suggested that an Alabama statute of this nature had been passed with the purpose of restoring prayer to public schools, the Court struck the law down in Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38 (1985), as lacking a secular purpose. Since Wallace v. Jaffree, all lower courts have sustained these statutes as unconstitutional.

Later, when state-sponsored prayers banished from public school classrooms migrated to various paraschool functions, such as graduation ceremonies and football games, the Court responded with similar constitutional vigilance. In Lee v. Weisman, 505 U.S. 577 (1992), a majority of the Court held unconstitutional prayers at a middle school graduation ceremony offered by a rabbi at a school official’s request. Moreover, in Sante Fe I.S.D. v. Doe, 530 U.S. 290 (2000), the Court struck down an arrangement established by a school district in which students were allowed to vote on whether to have prayers at football games and to select students to offer the prayers.

The Court has also applied the essential principle of Abington to contexts in which religious symbols or teaching was at issue. Thus, in Stone v. Graham, 449 U.S. 39 (1980), the Court invalidated a school district practice of displaying the Ten Commandments in classrooms, concluding that such displays lacked a secular purpose. In Edwards v. Aguillard, 482 U.S. 578 (1987), the Court found a similar lack of secular purpose in a Louisiana statute providing for the teaching of “creation science” when evolution was taught.

In spite of complaints that the Court had banished religion from public schools, however, not all forms of religious devotion or even teaching about religion are excluded by the principle of Abington. Both the opinion for the Court and Justice William Brennan’s important concurring opinion in the case emphasized the propriety of teaching about religion from an academic, rather than a devotional, standpoint. It would distort history and literature and other subjects to teach these subjects without reference to the religious experiences of humankind, and the Court hurried to acknowledge this fact. What the School Prayer cases prohibited was teaching designed to proselytize or to inculcate religious devotion. Moreover, private prayer offends no constitutional principle. Thus, in Board of Education v. Mergens, 496 U.S. 226 (1990), the Court refused to extend the ruling of Engel and Abington to prevent Congress from mandating equal access for religious student groups. The federal Equal Access Act provided that religious student groups were entitled to equal access to school facilities as enjoyed by other noncurricular groups. In Mergens, the Court held that this accommodation did not offend the establishment clause.

Abington acknowledged various forms of civic religiosity common in American society, including the divine invocation made a part of oaths in legal proceedings (“So help me God”), the invocation preceding the Court’s sessions (“God save this honorable Court”), and civic prayers such as those offered at the beginning of congressional sessions. But Justice Clark’s opinion for the majority did not seriously attempt to distinguish these aspects of public religion from the Bible readings and prayer before the Court. It would remain for future majorities to harmonize the principles articulated in Abington with civil religion more broadly conceived.

The School Prayer cases had a further legacy that reached outside the realm of courts into the realm of politics. After the controversy between theological liberals and fundamentalists during the early part of the twentieth century, many theological conservatives withdrew from active participation in public affairs. They focused instead on the creation of their own educational and charitable institutions rather than on political action. But the School Prayers cases of the 1960s, coupled with the Court's decision affirming a right to abortion in Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113, in 1973, almost certainly had the effect of igniting a new wave of conservative participation in the political process. Some of this political participation took the form of advocacy of a constitutional amendment to reverse the holdings in the School Prayer cases. Although such amendments have been proposed, none has secured the measure of support necessary to win passage.

The new advocacy also turned to a variety of other political issues. In the late 1970s, for example, Baptist minister Jerry Falwell founded the Moral Majority as a political group devoted to the advocacy of conservative political policies. Although the group remained active only for a decade, it is sometimes credited with helping to elect Ronald Reagan as president of the United States. Though Falwell disbanded the organization toward the end of the following decade, Pat Robertson, a popular religious television personality and would-be candidate for the Republican nomination for president, organized the Christian Coalition to serve purposes similar to those sought by the Moral Majority. The exact political influence of these and other manifestations of what came to be known as the "Christian right" remain highly contested. But the significant presence of such groups, a presence at least partially owing its genesis to hostility to the School Prayer cases, cannot be doubted.

TIMOTHY L. HALL

References and Further Reading

- Choper, Jesse H. Securing Religious Liberty: Principles for Judicial Interpretation of the Religion Clauses. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1995, 44–53.
- Curry, Thomas J. Farewell to Christendom: The Future of Church and State in America. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2001, 76–80.
- Feldman, Stephen M. Please Don't Wish Me a Merry Christmas: A Critical History of the Separation of Church and State. New York: New York University Press, 1997, 233–235.
- Hall, Timothy L., Sacred Solemnity: Civic Prayer, Civil Communion, and the Establishment Clause, Iowa Law Review 79 (1993): 44–46.
- Nowak, John E., and Ronald D. Rotunda, Constitutional Law, 1460–1465, 7th ed. St. Paul, MN: Thompson–West, 2004.

Stone, Geoffrey R., In Opposition to the School Prayer Amendment, University of Chicago Law Review 50 (1983): 823–848.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Board of Education v. Mergens*, 496 U.S. 226 (1990)
- Engel v. Vitale*, 370 U.S. 421 (1962)
- Edwards v. Aguillard*, 482 U.S. 578 (1987)
- Everson v. Board of Education*, 330 U.S. 1 (1947)
- Lee v. Weisman*, 505 U.S. 577 (1992)
- Lemon v. Kurtzman*, 403 U.S. 602 (1971)
- Roe v. Wade*, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)
- Santa Fe Independent School Dist. v. Doe*, 530 U.S. 290 (2000)
- Stone v. Graham*, 449 U.S. 39 (1980)
- Wallace v. Jaffree*, 472 U.S. 38 (1985)
- Equal Access Act*, 20 U.S.C. §§ 4071–74

See also Bible Reading in Public Schools, History of before and after Abington School District v. Schempp; Engel v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421 (1962); Legislative Prayer; Marsh v. Chambers, 463 U.S. 783 (1983); Prayer in Public Schools; Santa Fe Independent School District v. Doe, 530 U.S. 290 (2000)

ABOLITIONIST MOVEMENT

A new and aggressive phase of American abolitionism emerged in the 1830s. Called "immediatism," the movement for the immediate, uncompensated emancipation of slaves without expatriation (which received institutional expression first from the regional New England Anti-Slavery Society, founded in 1832, then the national American Anti-Slavery Society, founded in 1833) comprised individuals regardless of race, class, or gender, a stark departure from previous efforts that were primarily gradual in scope and genteel (read elite white male) in composition. The changes signified by immediatism's seemingly sudden appearance were anything but welcomed, as evidenced by the scores of mobs that assaulted exponents of that creed; by the federal postal service's (especially its state auxiliaries in the South) effective ban of abolitionist literature from reaching a southern audience; and by the U.S. Congress's virtual stranglehold, for nearly a decade, on the voices of antislavery petitioners, preventing them from receiving an appropriate hearing in the nation's highest council.

Although those reactions constituted a curtailment of, if not utter disregard for, traditional rights as guaranteed in the state and federal constitutions—freedom of speech and of the press, the right of the people to peaceably assemble and to petition the government for a redress of grievances, according to the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution—abolitionists, though seriously challenged, were neither thwarted nor suppressed. On the contrary, since the enjoyment of basic civil liberties was jeopardized, abolitionism actually thrived, despite and because of the animosity that immediatists directly and indirectly provoked.

Hostility and violence early greeted the abolitionist movement, as outbreaks of mob activity readily indicate. Although anti-abolitionist attacks occurred in the North throughout the three decades preceding the Civil War, the high tide of such riots took place in the years between 1834 and 1838. Too numerous to list in detail, a few incidents shall sufficiently illustrate immediatism's initial impact on northern society and reveal the difficulties that abolitionists encountered in order to broadcast their message.

In their attempts to assemble peaceably, abolitionists frequently confronted local antagonism, potentially volatile situations that sometimes threatened the safety of their very persons. For example, on October 21, 1835, an angry mob stormed a gathering of the Boston Female Anti-Slavery Society. Although concerned citizens directly targeted the meeting's invited speaker, William Lloyd Garrison, the outspoken and controversial editor of the Boston antislavery weekly, The Liberator, the society's members also confronted a raucous crowd. Yet, to protect one another from harm, white and black women marched in double-file, arm-in-arm, past protestors, a dangerous display of social equality that could have elicited unintended reactions from already belligerent demonstrators. Indeed, once the female abolitionists exited the building, the mob seized Garrison and then dragged him through the city's streets—only a night's refuge in prison protected him from additional assault.

Anti-abolitionist rioters also played havoc with the exercise of freedom of speech and of the press. Twice in July 1836 Cincinnatians sought to dissuade the southern-born former slaveholder and future Liberty Party presidential candidate James G. Birney from continuance of his abolitionist newspaper, The Philanthropist, by partial or complete destruction of his printing press. The relocated Maine native Elijah Lovejoy suffered similar opposition in the southern Illinois town of Alton. Over about a three-month period in 1837, city residents, alarmed by Lovejoy's increasing abolitionist editorial policy and his attempts to organize a state antislavery society, wrecked the press of his Presbyterian reformist paper, the Observer, three times. It was on that final and what proved to be fatal occasion, on November 7, that Lovejoy succumbed to five gunshot wounds when he, himself armed, rushed the mob that set ablaze the roof of the building that housed his press. Although some abolitionists expressed regret over Lovejoy's use of physical force in his defense, the lack of unity over faithful adherence to the movement's founding pacifistic principles gave way to near unanimity over Lovejoy's symbolic importance for abolitionism. Thus, Lovejoy was thereafter known as "the first MARTYR to American LIBERTY[,] MURDERED for asserting the FREEDOM of the PRESS."

Although riotous events concerning abolitionists were occurrences largely in free states, anti-abolitionism reared its ugly head against immediatists throughout the country. The concurrent pamphlet and petition campaigns, amplified in 1835–1836, clearly revealed that nationwide antipathy to the cause. Each initiative underscored abolitionists' faith in the redemptive power of "moral suasion," one of the movement's fundamental tenets that emphasized the demise of slaveowning and racial prejudice once their sinfulness was exposed to the American public. To achieve that much-desired end, abolitionists appealed especially to those most capable of instituting the process of emancipation: slaveholders and congressmen.

Whatever abolitionists' expectations, the reactions from those groups to their proselytizing schemes were not unlike those of the northern mobs—vitriolic and censorious. For example, when postal sacks filled with antislavery newspapers and journals (addressed to prominent citizens and not free blacks or illiterate slaves) arrived in Charleston, South Carolina, on the morning of July 29, 1835 (only a small fraction of the more than one million pieces of printed matter circulated by the American Anti-Slavery Society to points and persons across the country during the fiscal year ending in May 1836), enraged residents quickly alleviated the uncertainties that beset the city's postmaster over what to do with the troublesome material. That evening, members of the Lynch Men vigilance committee spirited away the satchels containing immediatist propaganda during a raid on the post office. The following night the abolitionist mails—as appropriately befitted what the local press called "incendiary" tracts—were ceremoniously burned, along with effigies of three leading abolitionists, before a crowd of between two and three thousand people.

Despite the swift resistance by Carolinians to outside abolitionist incursions, antislavery periodicals continued unabated. Charlestonians once more mobilized in retaliation, forming another vigilance society to search for and confiscate what were judged to be seditious publications; the committee even called upon northern state governments to legislate abolitionist organizations out of existence. Although the Charleston postmaster provided for a guarded escort for the conveyance of that dreadful material from such seemingly malignant individuals, his protection of the mails was limited to the delivery of abolitionist pamphlets to the post office only. Once there, they remained safely quarantined until orders from the postmaster general directed otherwise. The latter, Kentuckian and stalwart Jacksonian Democrat Amos Kendall, did not order a contrary course—which would have necessitated the uninhibited distribution of antislavery literature—but intimated approval, noting in correspondence that obedience to the community where one lived surpassed obligations to federal statutes.

The anti-abolitionist sentiments that the postal campaign unleashed finally reached a crescendo in December 1835, when President Andrew Jackson, in his annual message, urged Congress to enact appropriate measures against “the misguided persons [abolitionists] who have engaged in these unconstitutional and wicked attempts.” The national assembly, he suggested, should pass “such a law as will prohibit, under severe penalties, the circulation in the Southern States, through the mail, of incendiary publications intended to instigate the slaves to insurrection.”

Just as Carolinians prevented (extralegally if not illegally) the discussion of slavery (specifically, its abolition) at home, they sought similar action in the nation’s capital. In the same month that Andrew Jackson addressed Congress, South Carolina Representative James Henry Hammond remonstrated against any further introduction of abolitionist petitions in the lower house. In so doing, he not only captured the ire and recalcitrance of his constituents in matters involving the security of the “peculiar institution,” but also, by his demand that such memorials be peremptorily repudiated, initiated a debate that shifted congressional practices regarding the historic right of petition and spurred abolitionists to greater activity.

What resulted after weeks of heated deliberation was the “gag rule,” which prohibited congressmen from discussing or printing the contents of any petitions that dealt with slavery. Those antislavery memorials that reached, and would soon bombard, Congress were automatically “laid on the table,” with “no further action [taken] whatever.” That order, adopted in May 1836 and remaining in force until 1844, did not repulse abolitionists, but rather increased their resolve. Indeed, in 1837 and 1838 alone, 412,000 antislavery petitions deluged the House, and nearly two-thirds that amount flooded the Senate. Women especially contributed to the success of such operations. They were not only active in gaining signatures—women comprised over half of the signatories—but also became more involved in public affairs and more assertive on behalf of their own, deprived, rights.

The response to abolitionism was gravely important to activists at that time, for at stake was nothing less than the Bill of Rights. The ensuing civil liberties controversy almost instantly redounded to the benefit of an otherwise unpopular and dissenting minority portion of the citizenry. In the short run, immediatist organizations increased by more than twofold, from about two hundred in May 1835 to over five hundred the following year. To be sure, abolitionists would remain a small segment of the population throughout the antebellum period, but the struggle over the maintenance of traditional American rights, which antislavery agitation instigated, catapulted the immediatist movement and the question of slavery onto a national stage. They remained there, despite attempts to the contrary, until President Abraham Lincoln officially announced the Emancipation Proclamation on New Year’s Day, 1863.

RAYMOND JAMES KROHN

References and Further Reading

- Grimsted, David. American Mobbing, 1828–1861: Toward Civil War. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Nye, Russel B. Fettered Freedom: Civil Liberties and the Slavery Controversy, 1830–1860. East Lansing: Michigan State College Press, 1949.
- Richards, Leonard L. Gentlemen of Property and Standing: Anti-Abolition Mobs in Jacksonian America. New York: Oxford University Press, 1970.
- Wyatt-Brown, Bertram. “The Abolitionists’ Postal Campaign of 1835.” The Journal of Negro History 50(4) (1965):227–238.
- Wyly-Jones, Susan. “The 1835 Anti-Abolition Meetings in the South: A New Look at the Controversy over the Abolition Postal Campaign.” Civil War History 47(4) (2001):289–309.
- Yellin, Jean Fagan, and John C. Van Horne, eds. The Abolitionist Sisterhood: Women’s Political Culture in Antebellum America. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1994.
- Zaeske, Susan. Signatures of Citizenship: Petitioning, Antislavery, and Women’s Political Identity. Chapel Hill: The University of North Carolina Press, 2003.

ABOLITIONISTS

Abolitionists were individuals committed to eradicating chattel slavery in the United States. The first organized abolitionist group was the Pennsylvania Abolition Society (PAS). Dominated by socialites, politicians, businessmen, lawyers, and community leaders, its members included such prominent figures as Thomas Paine, George Washington, and Benjamin Franklin. PAS believed in the gradual abolition of slavery through legal (representing blacks in court) and political (petitioning Congress) means. PAS shunned grassroots involvement (even among African Americans) and instead focused on a strategy whereby elite white males would pursue their moral calling by working within existing institutional structures to abolish slavery.

With the surge of democratic sentiment that swept the nation in the early nineteenth century, it became obvious that PAS's conservative approach to abolitionism was outdated and ineffective. In the 1830s, the abolitionist cause moved to Massachusetts, where the emphasis was on the immediate emancipation of slaves. The movement solicited the support of the masses (including African Americans and women) through the creation of organizations and societies and the dissemination of written material (pamphlets and newspapers) in a grassroots effort to abolish slavery. Abolitionists appealed to people's emotions by emphasizing the immorality of such an "evil institution." Such was the intent of Harriet Beecher Stowe's antislavery novel, Uncle Tom's Cabin (1852), which was written in response to the strengthening of the Fugitive Slave Act of 1850.

William Lloyd Garrison's (1805–1879) newspaper, The Liberator, was the rallying cry for the abolitionist cause. Garrison believed not only in the immediate emancipation of slaves, but also in a commitment to treating African Americans as persons with "inherent and unalienable rights." He supported the Declaration of Independence but shunned the Constitution as a "proslavery compact," a "covenant with death," an "agreement with hell," and a "flagrant robbery of the inalienable rights of men." The Constitution, which was created at the expense of human dignity, violated the laws of God and, therefore, was null and void. Garrison detested political action and believed that abolitionism was a moral and religious crusade to open the eyes of the people to the evils of slavery.

One of the most prominent African-American abolitionists was Frederick Douglass (1818–1895), a former slave, whose autobiographies (The Narrative of the Life of Frederick Douglass, An American Slave, and My Bondage, My Freedom) revealed the details of his life as a slave and were also arguments against the institution that denied slaves their self-worth. At first Douglass supported Garrison's reading of the Constitution as a proslavery compact, but soon parted ways with Garrison when he realized that the Constitution could be interpreted to be against slavery. Douglass encouraged abolitionists to work within the system to abolish slavery by becoming active in politics and exercising their constitutional rights of speech and press, as well as voting.

The abolitionist movement began in the Revolutionary era, reached its pinnacle in the 1830s, maintained its strength in the 1850s, and continued after the Civil War until the end of Reconstruction. By 1900, slavery was completely abolished in the Western Hemisphere.

RANDA CAROLYN ISSA

References and Further Reading

- Blassingame, John W., ed. The Frederick Douglass Papers: Series One: Speeches, Debates, and Interviews. 3 vols. New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 1979.
- Cain, William E., ed. William Lloyd Garrison and the Fight Against Slavery: Selections From The Liberator. Boston: St. Martin's Press, 1995.
- Newman, Richard S. The Transformation of American Abolitionism: Fighting Slavery in the Early Republic. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2002.
- Stowe, Harriet Beecher. Uncle Tom's Cabin, 150th ed. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2002.

ABOOD v. DETROIT BOARD OF EDUCATION, 431 U.S. 209 (1977)

In Abood v. Detroit Board of Education, the U.S. Supreme Court unanimously ruled that assessment of mandatory service charges on nonunion members in an agency shop to finance union expenditures for collective bargaining did not violate their First Amendment rights. However, the Court prohibited unions from requiring employees to contribute to the support of ideological causes to which they might be opposed as a condition of holding their jobs as public school teachers. Noting that the First Amendment safeguards the freedom to associate with others and contribute money to advance ideas and promote beliefs and that those protections are not surrendered by virtue of public employment, the Court decided compulsory contributions by union members for political purposes violate the First Amendment.

The First Amendment precludes the state from compelling association with a political point of view to retain public employment. The Court stressed, however, that the ruling did not stop the union from spending money to advance a political viewpoint or help a candidate to gain office. Rather, the First Amendment demands such political expenditures be funded by union members who neither oppose nor are forced to support those political ideas by the threat of loss of employment with the government.

By safeguarding individuals from being forced to contribute to causes they oppose as a condition of employment, Abood provides significant First Amendment protection against compelled financing of political or ideological speech.

EDWARD SCHOEN

References and Further Reading

- Ogeka, Charles J., Respecting Nonunion Member Employees' Rights While Avoiding a Free Ride. Lehnert v. Ferris Faculty Ass'n, Hofstra Labor Law Journal 10 (1992): 349–373.
- Schoen, Edward J. et al., United Foods and Wileman Bros: Protection Against Compelled Commercial Speech—Now You See It, Now You Don't, American Business Law Journal 39 (2002): 467–520.
- Skaare, Jessica J., Constitutional Law—First Amendment: University Fees Can Speak for Students: The Constitutionality of a University's Right to Fund Student Speech Via a Mandated Activities Fee, North Dakota Law Review (2001): 549–586.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- International Association of Machinists v. Street*, 367 U.S. 740 (1961) (Union shops must not use compulsory assessments to support political activities against the expressed wishes of dissenting employees.)
- Keller v. State Bar of California*, 496 U.S. 1 (1990) (Compulsory bar association dues may not be expended to advance political causes, but may be spent for disciplining bar members or proposing ethical codes for the legal profession.)
- Lehnert v. Ferris Faculty Association*, 500 U.S. 507 (1991) (The state cannot compel its unionized employees to subsidize legislative lobbying or other political union activities outside the context of labor contract ratification or implementation.)

ABORTION

Prior to the middle of the nineteenth century, abortion was an issue to which men, and therefore lawmakers, judges, and politicians, paid little or no attention. With the Supreme Court's 1973 decision of Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 114 (1973), abortion became perhaps the most prominent legal and political issue of the late twentieth century and continues to be so in the twenty-first century.

In Roe v. Wade, the Supreme Court struck down a Texas law that prohibited all abortions except those strictly necessary to save the life of the mother. The statute in question (and similar laws in effect in a majority of states at that time) was not in fact part of the Anglo-American common law, but was of relatively recent origin. At the time at which the U.S. Constitution was ratified, there were no statutes against abortion in the United States or in England, and the English common law received by the new states recognized a crime of abortion only after “quickening”—that is, only after the movements of a fetus can be felt (generally between the fourteenth and sixteenth weeks of pregnancy). Since colonial times, early abortion was not only legal but also was widely practiced in this country, increasingly so in the early nineteenth century. Abortion services were commonly advertised in newspapers, and women's folk medicine recognized a number of traditional herbal abortifacients that were widely known. It was not until after the Civil War that criminal statutes proscribing abortion were widely adopted by the states.

Two developments in the mid-1800s may have influenced state legislatures to enact criminal sanctions against abortion. The first was the founding in 1847 of the American Medical Association (AMA), which lobbied lawmakers to enact regulations limiting the practice of medicine to professionally licensed physicians and prohibiting “irregulars,” such as midwives, from providing healthcare services. In 1857, the AMA created a Committee on Ethics that launched a campaign to make all abortions illegal.

The second issue influencing the early development of abortion policy was the “first wave” feminist movement, which led many women to question their traditional roles in the family and to seek many of the social, economic, and legal privileges enjoyed by men. Abortion was seen as inimical to the proper role of women as wives and mothers. Concern for “protecting” women's traditional roles was expressed by the Supreme Court in its 1873 decision of Bradwell v. Illinois, 83 U.S., 16 Wall., 130 (1873), in which the Court denied women the right to practice law. The earliest state statutes generally prohibited only those abortions performed after “quickening.” Not until the 1920s, during a second wave of anti-abortion legislation, did most states adopt laws proscribing abortion at all stages of pregnancy.

Abortion laws remained largely unchanged until the 1960s, when a number of events led to a reexamination of abortion policy and practice. One such event was an outbreak of German measles, which, along with the widespread use of thalidomide, resulted in an epidemic of children born with serious birth defects. Many physicians feared the criminal sanctions they risked if they performed abortions on women at risk of delivering babies with severe birth defects. Another turning point in the evolution of abortion policy was the introduction in 1960 of the first birth control pill, which launched the “sexual revolution” and the “second-wave” feminist movement. More young women began pursuing higher education, entering into traditionally male professions, and postponing motherhood or eschewing it altogether. While this new form of contraception gave women additional and more reliable control over their fertility, the option of abortion was viewed as necessary to provide complete protection from unwanted pregnancies.

As a result of these developments, many groups began to push for the liberalization of abortion laws. In 1962, the American Law Institute (ALI) introduced a Model Penal Code that recommended legalizing abortion under certain circumstances, such as when pregnancy resulted from rape or incest or when the fetus was likely to suffer from serious defects. By the time of the Roe decision, fourteen states had adopted some or all of the ALI's recommendations, and four states, Alaska, Hawaii, New York, and Washington, had repealed their abortion laws altogether. While some groups sought legislative reform to liberalize or repeal the old criminal laws, other groups pursued judicial recognition of a constitutionally protected civil right to reproductive autonomy that would include access to birth control and to abortion.

The Supreme Court's first foray into the issue of reproductive rights was in the case of Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965), in which the Court recognized a right of privacy within the "penumbra" of the Constitution's enumerated rights that protected the freedom of married persons to obtain contraceptives. This right of privacy was extended to unmarried persons with the Court's decision in Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438 (1972). Justice Brennan, writing for the majority, said: "If the right of privacy means anything, it is the right of the individual, married or single, to be free from unwarranted governmental intrusion into matters so fundamentally affecting a person as the decision of whether to bear or beget a child."

These two cases set the stage for the Supreme Court's landmark decision of Roe v. Wade. Justice Harry Blackmun wrote the opinion for the seven-justice majority of the Court. In it he said that "the right of privacy, whether it be founded in the Fourteenth Amendment's concept of personal liberty and restrictions upon state action, as we feel it is, or . . . in the Ninth Amendment's reservation of rights to the people, is broad enough to encompass a woman's decision whether or not to terminate her pregnancy." Without resolving the question of the legal status of an unborn fetus, the Court held that the states had compelling interests in the health of the mother and the "potential human life" of the unborn. Each of these interests justifies state regulation at different stages of pregnancy. During the first trimester of pregnancy, when the Court found that abortion was medically safer than childbirth, a state has no legitimate interest in interfering with the abortion decision. After the third month of pregnancy, when the risks of abortion to the mother's health increase, the state "may, if it chooses, regulate the abortion procedure in ways that are reasonably related to maternal health." In the third trimester, when the fetus may be viable outside the womb, the state may "regulate, or even proscribe, abortion except where it is necessary . . . for the preservation of the life or health of the mother."

While the Roe decision was enthusiastically embraced by most abortion rights advocates, it also provoked the formation of a "right-to-life" movement that has fought relentlessly since the day the decision was handed down to limit its application or to overturn it outright. Even those who support abortion rights have criticized the Roe decision on grounds ranging from its lack of textual authority to the unworkability of its trimester framework. The "pro-life" movement initially focused its efforts on the election of lawmakers who, it was hoped, would appoint judges who would limit the application of Roe, support laws limiting access to abortions, and even amend the Constitution to define a right to life for the unborn.

Throughout the 1970s and early 1980s, the Court continued to refine the contours of the right to abortion, but held to the position that a woman's right to terminate a pregnancy prior to fetal viability was a fundamental one and that, therefore, any state's attempt to regulate abortion was subject to "strict scrutiny." Between 1973 and 1986, the Court, using this heightened standard of judicial review, struck down state laws that required spousal consent to an abortion (Planned Parenthood of Central Missouri v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52, 1976), that required a twenty-four-hour waiting period before an abortion (Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, 462 U.S. 416, 1983), that mandated specific information about fetal development be provided before consent would be considered "informed" (Akron; Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, Pennsylvania Section, 476 U.S. 747, 1986), that limited the methods that could be used to perform abortions (Danforth and Thornburgh), and that required a minor to notify a parent or to obtain parental consent to an abortion without providing adequate judicial bypass protections (Bellotti v. Baird, 443 U.S. 622, 1979; Akron; Thornburgh).

While the Court struck down most legislative attempts to impede or discourage abortions, it did uphold laws that reflected the government's refusal to support a woman's choice to abort. The "Hyde Amendment" enacted by Congress in 1976 to prohibit the use of Medicaid funds for abortions, along with similar state statutes, has been upheld by the Court. Many argued that these laws violated the equal protection clause by making safe abortions unavailable to poor women. But, in Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980), that argument was rejected by the Court, which held that "although government may not place obstacles in the path of a woman's exercise of her freedom of choice, it need not remove those not of its own creation. Indigency falls in the latter category." Since the Harris decision, forty-seven states now prohibit the use of public funds for abortion except when the life of the mother is at risk.

The anti-abortion movement gained momentum in 1980 with the election of President Ronald Reagan, who made anti-abortion policies a top priority and vowed that he would appoint justices to the Supreme Court who would vote to overrule Roe. It was during this period that the abortion issue became highly politicized as the religious Right became more closely identified with the Republican administration. The Reagan years saw the passage of a number of federal laws that sought to limit access to abortion. Congress passed laws restricting access to abortions for government workers, Medicaid patients, and patients in public hospitals. "Gag rules" were imposed that prevented any facility receiving federal funds from giving women information about abortion. Reagan's administration also withheld foreign aid to countries that provided government access to abortion. But the principle focus of the Reagan and Bush administrations' anti-abortion efforts was on the Supreme Court, where views on abortion became a litmus test for judicial appointments.

When Chief Justice Warren Burger retired from the Court in 1986, Reagan appointed William Rehnquist, who had dissented in Roe, to fill the position. Other members of the Roe majority were replaced by the more conservative Justices O'Connor, Scalia, and Kennedy, each of whom had shown some degree of opposition to the right to abortion. When the case of Webster v. Reproductive Health Services, 492 U.S. 490 (1989), came before the Court in 1989, many believed that the Court was then poised to overturn Roe v. Wade.

The Court in Webster was asked to review a Missouri statute that declared that "the life of each human being begins at conception" and that "unborn children have protectable interest in life, health, and well being." The statute also prohibited the use of public employees or facilities for nontherapeutic abortions and required fetal viability testing for any pregnancy believed to be at twenty or more weeks. A five-justice majority upheld the statute, sustaining many restrictions on abortion that it had previously invalidated in Thornburgh and Akron. Without directly overruling the Roe decision, the Court effectively ceded control over abortion rights to states' regulation.

In the years following the Webster decision, states enacted a wide variety of laws limiting the right to abortion. One of these laws, the Pennsylvania Abortion Control Act, was brought before the Court in 1992, giving it the opportunity to clarify its Webster holding. In Planned Parenthood v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833 (1992), a plurality of the Court reaffirmed the core principles of Roe but abandoned the notion that abortion was a "fundamental right" that required strict scrutiny. Instead, it found that abortion was simply a "liberty claim" subject to a more deferential "undue burden" test. The Pennsylvania law, which imposed a mandatory twenty-four-hour waiting period, informed consent, and parental consent requirements, was found not to impose an undue burden on women's choice of abortion.

The Casey decision was disappointing to the anti-abortion movement, which had hoped that the more conservative Rehnquist Court would overturn Roe. Anti-abortion strategies shifted from efforts to make abortion illegal to efforts to make access to abortion inconvenient or impossible. Abortion providers suffered a plague of violent and intimidating acts, ranging from protesters attempting to block entrances to abortion clinics to the bombing, arson, and vandalism of clinics, and the murder of two physicians who performed abortions. Some states issued injunctions against anti-abortion protesters, prohibiting them from demonstrating within "buffer zones" around clinic entrances. Many of these laws were challenged as violating the First Amendment rights of the protesters. In 1997, in the case of Schenck v. Pro-Choice Network of Western New York, 519 U.S. 357 (1997), the Court found that the creation of "fixed" buffer zones was constitutionally valid as necessary to protect women's freedom to seek pregnancy-related services and to protect the public's safety. While the extent of the violence has been reduced by these laws, the anti-abortion movement's intimidating tactics have, nevertheless, succeeded in eliminating abortion services entirely from as many as 87 percent of all counties in the United States.

Anti-abortion legislation since Casey has focused primarily on outlawing certain methods of abortion, particularly dilation and evacuation (D&E) and dilation and extraction (D&X), also referred to as "partial birth" abortion. Most of these laws have been struck down because they were not limited to postviability abortions or because they failed to provide exceptions for situations when the procedure is necessary to protect the woman's life or health (Stenberg v. Carhart, 530 U.S. 914, 2000). Congress continues its efforts to craft legislation outlawing "partial-birth" abortions that will pass constitutional review.

The 2000 election of President George W. Bush, who is firmly dedicated to outlawing abortion entirely, puts the current status of abortion law in this country at serious risk. The resignation of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who was often the critical swing vote on decisions affirming the abortion right, gives President Bush the opportunity to appoint a new justice who will likely provide the fifth vote needed to overrule Roe v. Wade. The confirmation of O'Connor's successor was complicated by the death of Chief Justice William Rehnquist. This gave President Bush two slots to fill on the court. Abortion rights advocates opposed the confirmation of Samuel Alito, but were unsuccessful. Supporters of abortion rights were leery of John Roberts, but did not fight his confirmation as Chief Justice. At this point it is unclear whether these two justices will provide the necessary votes to overturn Roe, or simply vote to uphold state legislation that limits rights of choice.

SUSAN E. LOOPER-FRIEDMAN

References and Further Reading

- Ely, John Hart. Democracy and Distrust. 1980.
 Gold, Rebecca Benson. Abortion and Women's Health: A Turning Point for America? 1990.
 Mohr, James. Abortion in America. 1978.
 Rubin, Eva. Abortion, Politics, and the Courts. 1987.
 Tribe, Laurence H. Abortion: The Clash of Absolutes. 1990.
 Wishner, Jane B., ed. Abortion and the States: Political Change and Future Regulation. 1993.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health*, 462 U.S. 416 (1983)
Bellotti v. Baird, 443 U.S. 622 (1979)
Bradwell v. Illinois, 83 U.S. (16 Wall.) 130 (1873)
Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438 (1972)
Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965)
Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980).
National Organization for Women v. Scheidler, 510 U.S. 249 (1994)
National Organization for Women v. Scheidler, 537 U.S. 393 (2003)
Planned Parenthood of Central Missouri v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52 (1976)
Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833 (1992)
Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 114 (1973)
Rust v. Sullivan, 500 U.S. 173 (1991)
Schenck v. Pro-Choice Network of Western New York, 519 U.S. 357 (1997)
Stenberg v. Carhart, 530 U.S. 914 (2000)
Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, Pennsylvania Section, 476 U.S. 747 (1986) (portions overruled by Casey)
Webster v. Reproductive Health Services, 492 U.S. 490 (1989)

ABORTION LAWS AND THE ESTABLISHMENT CLAUSE

A defining principle of the United States is the separation between church and state. This principle is embodied in the establishment clause of the First Amendment, which provides that Congress shall make no law respecting the establishment of religion. Since 1947, the prohibition has also applied to the states, and it has been interpreted to prevent the states from enacting laws that are motivated by religious purposes. When states enact laws, they must have secular purposes for doing so.

In Roe v. Wade, the Supreme Court ruled that the right of privacy enjoyed by all Americans protects a woman's right to decide whether to terminate a pregnancy. During the first trimester, the state may not interfere with this right at all (though in subsequent trimesters the state may impose certain restrictions). A critical premise of the Court's holding was that, at the early stages of pregnancy, the fetus is not a "person" for constitutional purposes.

This critical premise of Roe is obviously at odds with certain religious views, which consider a fetus a person from the moment of conception, or shortly thereafter. Indeed, in Roe, the Court recognized that the question of when life begins is fundamentally a religious question. In cases subsequent to Roe, the Court expressly held that a state is not permitted to adopt one theory of when life begins to justify its regulation of abortions (Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, Inc., 462 U.S. 416, 444, 1983).

Saying that the states may not regulate abortion on the basis of religious doctrine is one thing; enforcing that prohibition is quite another. There are three reasons for the difficulty of enforcing the establishment clause norm in the abortion context. First, determining why people believe what they believe presents difficult epistemological questions; a legislator may oppose abortion because Catholic doctrine holds that a fetus is a human being, or the legislator might be a physician who has purely secular reasons for believing that a fetus possesses human qualities. Second, distinguishing religious beliefs from nonreligious beliefs presents similarly daunting difficulties. Finally, the answer to the question of when life begins may indeed have religious and nonreligious influences.

The complexity of invalidating abortion laws on the basis of the establishment clause is illustrated by Webster v. Reproductive Health Services, 492 U.S. 490 (1989), a case involving a challenge to a Missouri statute that placed various restrictions on the right to obtain an abortion. The preamble to the state statute asserted that life begins at conception—a statement clearly at odds with Roe and its progeny. Nevertheless, despite a powerful dissent from Justice Stevens that insisted that the statute reflected an "unequivocal enforcement" of religion—and was therefore in violation of the establishment clause—the Court upheld many of the law's restrictions, reasoning that they could be justified by secular criteria unrelated to the statute's preamble.

Consequently, although Roe, Akron, and other decisions indicate that a state may not base anti-abortion legislation on religious ideology or premises, these premises are often so diffused into the secular legal culture that it is impossible to neutralize their influence. For example, in Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980), the Supreme Court upheld the Hyde amendment, which prohibits the use of federal Medicaid funds for most abortions. Justice Stewart's opinion for the Court concluded that the attitude toward abortion reflected in the amendment could very well reflect what the Court called "traditionalist" values; these value overlap, but are not identical to, religious values.

As a matter of legal doctrine, therefore, the state may not predicate laws that interfere with a woman's right to choose on religious doctrine. At the same time, as a political matter, laws that place restrictions on abortions during the second and third trimesters will almost certainly have a strong religious influence.

DAVID R. DOW

References and Further Reading

Everson v. Board of Education, 330 U.S. 1 (1947).
 Feldman, Noah, From Liberty to Equality: The Transformation of the Establishment Clause, Cal. Law Review 673 (2002): 90:680–700.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, Inc., 462 U.S. 416, 444 (1983)
Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980)
Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)
Webster v. Reproductive Health Services, 492 U.S. 490 (1989)

ABORTION PROTEST CASES

In three cases, the Supreme Court has considered the rights of anti-abortion protestors outside abortion clinics. The cases have pitted free-speech values against the fundamental right to abortion declared by the Supreme Court in Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973).

In the first of the cases, Madsen v. Women's Health Center, Inc., 512 U.S. 753 (1994), anti-abortion protestors had repeatedly violated a federal court injunction against blocking access to a Florida abortion clinic and had harassed patients and doctors at the clinic and at their homes. After this defiance, the federal district court entered a broader injunction against the protestors. The new injunction prohibited demonstrators from: (1) protesting within 36 feet of the clinic; (2) making excessive noise near the clinic by shouting and using sound devices; (3) exhibiting images observable by patients within the clinic; (4) approaching patients within 300 feet of the clinic unless the patient voluntarily indicated a desire to be approached; and (5) demonstrating within 300 feet of the home of any clinic employee.

The government defended the restrictions as necessary to protect a woman's freedom to seek medical services; to safeguard public safety and order; to keep open the free flow of traffic on streets and sidewalks; to protect private property rights; and to preserve residential privacy. The protestors complained that the restrictions were content based (and thus especially suspect under the First Amendment) and unduly restricted their free-speech rights.

The Supreme Court first held that the injunction was not content based merely because it aimed at the protestors. The nature of an injunction is to restrict only those subject to it, the Court held, and the purpose of the injunction was only to address past violations of the court's orders.

Next, the Court held that the government's interests were significant and that parts of the injunction were narrowly tailored to serve those interests. First, the Court upheld the 36-foot buffer zone as applied to the public property around the clinic but not the private property along the side and back of the clinic where there had been no showing of interference. Second, the Court upheld the ban on excessive noise near the clinic on the ground that medical recovery requires some tranquility. But the Court struck down the rest of the injunction as too broad.

The Supreme Court's next encounter with the free-speech rights of abortion-clinic protestors came three years later in Schenck v. Pro-Choice Network, 519 U.S. 357 (1997). In that case, several abortion clinics in upstate New York had been subjected to large-scale blockades in which protestors marched, stood, knelt, or lay in clinic parking lots and doorways. Smaller groups of protestors, called "sidewalk counselors," crowded, pushed, jostled, yelled, and spat at women entering the clinics. Police officers on the scene attempting to control the protests were also harassed verbally and by mail.

A federal district court issued an injunction against fifty individuals and three organizations (including Operation Rescue). One part of the injunction banned demonstrating within 15 feet of clinic entrances, including doorways and parking lots. The Supreme Court upheld this "fixed buffer zone" on the ground that it was necessary to prevent anti-abortion protestors from blocking entrance to and exit from the clinic.

The second part of the injunction allowed anti-abortion protestors to approach a patient to make “nonthreatening” conversation with her, but required such sidewalk counselors to withdraw a distance of 15 feet from a patient if she requested them to cease counseling her. The Court struck down this “floating buffer zone” as burdening more speech than necessary to serve the government’s interests.

The third clash of abortion and free-speech rights came in Hill v. Colorado, 530 U.S. 703 (2000). Unlike the first two cases, Hill involved a statute—not a court injunction—restricting protests around abortion clinics. The Colorado law in Hill made it unlawful within the vicinity of a health care clinic for anyone to “knowingly approach” within 8 feet of another person, without that person’s consent, “for the purpose of passing a leaflet to, displaying a sign to, or engaging in oral protest, education, or counseling” with that person. Unlike the floating buffer zone in Schenck, however, the statute did not require counselors to move away if a patient walked into the 8-foot zone.

The Court upheld the statute against a First Amendment free-speech challenge by anti-abortion protestors. The main issue was whether the statute was content based and thus subject to strict scrutiny, or content neutral and thus subject to lesser scrutiny. The majority held that the statute was a content-neutral regulation of the place where speech may occur. The Court observed that the statute applied equally to all demonstrators, regardless of viewpoint, and was not adopted because of the state’s disagreement with the message of the anti-abortion protestors. Furthermore, the Court said, the state’s interests in unimpeded access to health care and patient privacy were unrelated to the content of speech.

Justices Scalia, Thomas, and Kennedy dissented vigorously, as they had in the previous two abortion protest cases. Scalia’s dissent argued that the statute was content based because it prohibited only “protest, counseling, or education,” but not other speech like social or random conversation. Thus, whether a person could be prosecuted for violating the 8-foot buffer zone “depends entirely on what he intends to say once he gets there.” The majority replied that the statute applied equally to all who engage in “protest, counseling, or education” speech without further regard to content.

While the dissenters agreed that the state could prohibit protestors from physically blocking access to a clinic, they chided the majority for approving a restriction on “peaceful, nonthreatening, but uninvited speech” within a distance of 8 feet from a patient entering or exiting an abortion clinic. Scalia accused the majority of distorting free-speech jurisprudence so that it could “sustain this restriction on the free speech of abortion opponents.” “Does the deck seem stacked?” he asked. “You bet.”

DALE CARPENTER

Cases and Statutes Cited

Hill v. Colorado, 530 U.S. 703 (2000)

Madsen v. Women’s Health Center, Inc., 512 U.S. 753 (1994)

Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. (1973)

Schenck v. Pro-Choice Network of Western New York, 519 U.S. 357 (1997)

ABRAMS v. UNITED STATES, 250 U.S. 616 (1919)

Condemning “the hypocrisy of the United States and her allies” and denouncing President Woodrow Wilson as a hypocrite and a coward, Jacob Abrams and four associates—all five Russian-born Jews and avowed anarchists—distributed fliers on the Lower East Side of Manhattan in the summer of 1918 directing attention to U.S. efforts to halt the Bolshevik Revolution. Among other things, the fliers called for a general strike by workers to stymie the war effort against the imperial German government. Abrams and his colleagues were charged with violating the Espionage Act of 1917 (as amended in 1918), which allowed convictions for conspiring to “utter, print, write, and publish disloyal, scurrilous, and abusive language about the form of government of the United States, or language intended to bring the form of government of the United States into contempt, scorn, contumely and disrepute, or intended to incite, provoke, and encourage resistance to the United States [. . .]” Thus, the stage was set for one of the most important freedom of speech cases of the twentieth century.

One of the defendants (Joseph Schwartz) died the night before the trial started; a federal district court found the other four guilty of violating the act. At the U.S. Supreme Court, Justice John H. Clarke affirmed the convictions, emphasizing the special circumstances of wartime and the potential consequences of the dissident speech. Rooting the Court’s conclusions in the recent precedent dealing with similarly “dangerous” speech—especially Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919), Frohwerk v. United States, 249 U.S. 204 (1919), and Debs v. United States, 249 U.S. 211 (1919)—Clarke found that the plain purpose of their propaganda was to excite, at the supreme crisis of the war, disaffection, sedition, riots, and, as they hoped, revolution, in this country for the purpose of embarrassing and, if possible, defeating the military plans of the government in Europe.

Thus, the Court deemed that the expression in question constituted a “clear and present danger” (“whether the words are used in such circumstances and are of such a nature as to create a clear and present danger that they will bring about the substantive evils that Congress has a right to prevent”)—the legal test recently implemented in the Schenck case—in that such advocacy may have had the tendency to inhibit the war effort, among other things. Congress was, therefore, within its authority to restrict speech in such a fashion.

Yet, Abrams is actually more famous for the powerful and poetic dissent authored by Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr. Though Holmes was, ironically, the one who had recently devised the “clear and present danger” test, he pulled back in Abrams, finding (with Justice Louis D. Brandeis) that the statutory requirement of “intent” had not been demonstrated in this case. More importantly, the speech at hand was not worthy of the alarm alleged by the state and accepted by the Court majority. Indeed, indicating the influences of early twentieth century philosophical pragmatism on his thinking, Holmes averred that, while one may be disturbed by or disagree with the substantive nature of such dissent, one should still be willing to subject it to the processes of inquiry, scrutiny, and significantly, “competition.” The following passage portrays Holmes’ famous assertion of how and why this might be done:

But when men have realized that time has upset many fighting faiths, they may come to believe even more than they believe the very foundations of their own conduct that the ultimate good desired is better reached by free trade in ideas—that the best test for truth is the power of the thought to get itself accepted in the competition of the market; and that truth is the only ground upon which their wishes safely can be carried out. That at any rate is the theory of our Constitution. It is an experiment, as all life is an experiment.

Thus, the theory of the “marketplace of ideas” was formally articulated in American law.

While the introduction of this metaphor was significant in that it has become the predominant trope for the contemplation of free-speech issues in the United States, the Abrams decision was significant as well because it demonstrated the first serious challenge to the “clear and present danger” test. In essence, Holmes wondered, in this case, exactly how “clear and present” must the “danger” be in order for congressional authority to reach the situation? Estimating proximity and degree in such a way led the Court several decades later to abandon the test in favor of an evaluation of the potential for “imminent lawlessness” in Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969).

BRIAN K. PINAIRE

References and Further Reading

Chafee, Zechariah. Free Speech in the United States. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1940/1967.
Menand, Louis. The Metaphysical Club. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2001.
Polenberg, Richard. Fighting Faiths. New York: Viking, 1987.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969)
Debs v. United States, 249 U.S. 211 (1919)
Frohwerk v. United States, 249 U.S. 204 (1919)
Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919)

See also Freedom of Speech: Modern Period (1917–Present); Holmes, Oliver Wendell, Jr.; Marketplace of Ideas Theory; Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919)

ABSOLUTISM AND FREE SPEECH

Absolutism is an approach to interpretation of the First Amendment guarantee of freedom of speech that takes literally the text of the amendment when it declares that “Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech.” Under a theory of absolutism, Congress may not constitutionally interfere with free speech in any way; the theory would also limit the power of state and local governments, through incorporation of the First Amendment into the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Although the U.S. Supreme Court never adopted an absolutist approach, the theory found credence in the decisions of Justice Hugo L. Black and, to a lesser degree, Justice William O. Douglas. Examining state restrictions on speech in dissent in Beauharnais v. Illinois, 343 U.S. 988 (1952), Black put it in simple fashion when he said, “I think the First Amendment, with the Fourteenth, ‘absolutely’ forbids such laws without any ‘ifs’ or ‘buts’ or ‘whereases.’” Throughout the 1950s and 1960s, as the Supreme Court created new tests to balance the state’s interest against free speech, Black objected. The “First Amendment’s unequivocal command that there shall be no abridgment of the rights of free speech and assembly shows that the men who drafted our Bill of Rights did all the ‘balancing’ that was to be done in the field,” Black wrote in a dissenting opinion in Konigsberg v. State Bar of California, 366 U.S. 36 (1961). Black’s concern was that balancing tests made the importance of particular speech dependent on the value judgments of individual judges.

The views of Justice Douglas were less clear. In Dennis v. U.S., 341 U.S. 494 (1951), Douglas said, “The freedom to speak is not absolute.” But in New York Times v. U.S., 403 U.S. 713 (1971), the Pentagon Papers case, Douglas said the guarantees of freedom of speech and of freedom of the press leave “in my view, no room for governmental restraint on the press.”

Even Black’s absolutism had significant definitional limits. When civil rights protesters in the 1960s argued that their demonstrations and lunch-counter sit-ins that led to their arrest were expressive conduct entitled to the protection of the First Amendment, Black drew a distinction between speech and conduct, finding the latter unprotected. Free speech, he wrote in Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 536 (1965), did not include the “right to engage in the conduct of picketing or patrolling, whether on publicly owned streets or on privately owned property.” In Adderly v. Florida, 385 U.S. 39 (1966), he wrote the Court’s opinion upholding the trespass convictions of students who protested outside a Florida county jail, rejecting the premise “that people who want to propagandize protests or views have a constitutional right to do so whenever and however and wherever they please.” Even when the conduct was symbolic expression, Black viewed it as action that was not protected. He dissented in Tinker v. Des Moines Indep. Community Sch. Dist., 393 U.S. 503 (1969), in which the Court ruled that students could wear black armbands to school as long as there was no evidence that their protest caused disruption.

STEPHEN J. WERMIEL

References and Further Reading

- Meiklejohn, Alexander, The First Amendment Is an Absolute, 1961 Supreme Court Review (1961).
 Smolla, Rodney A. Smolla and Nimmer on Freedom of Speech. 2005, § 2.49.
 Stemberge, Patricia R., Adjusting Absolutism: Extending First Amendment Protection for the Fringe, B.U. Law Review 907 (2000): 80.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Adderley v. Florida*, 385 U.S. 39 (1966)
Beauharnais v. Illinois, 343 U.S. 988 (1952)
Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 536 (1965)
Dennis v. U.S., 341 U.S. 494 (1951)
Konigsberg v. State Bar of California, 366 U.S. 36 (1961)
New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964)
New York Times v. U.S., 403 U.S. 713 (1971)
Tinker v. Des Moines Indep. Community Sch. Dist., 393 U.S. 503 (1969)

See also Douglas, William Orville; Due Process; First Amendment and PACs; Fourteenth Amendment; Freedom of the Press: Modern Period (1917–Present); Freedom of Speech: Modern Period (1917–Present)

ABU GHRAIB

Abu Ghraib prison was originally built in the 1960s by Western contractors but achieved notoriety during Saddam Hussein’s rule as a repository for up to fifteen thousand of his political enemies. More recently, it has become infamous as the site of torture of Iraqi detainees at the hands of American soldiers.

Abu Ghraib came into American possession following the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in March 2003. Selected by Ambassador Paul Bremer, head of the Coalition Provisional Authority that governed the country, the prison was originally to be used as a temporary facility for criminal detainees until the new Iraqi government could establish a permanent prison at another site. Rather than limiting the number of prisoners, Abu Ghraib was also designated as a detention facility for high-value security detainees. These were individuals suspected of playing a role in the growing insurgency in Iraq, who were prime targets for interrogation. Of the seventeen detention facilities in Iraq in October 2003 Abu Ghraib was the largest, holding seven thousand prisoners with a guard force of approximately ninety Americans.

The release of the infamous photographs of prisoner abuse of Iraqi detainees by U.S. soldiers in April 2004 revealed for the first time to the world that something had gone badly wrong at Abu Ghraib. From the commencement of hostilities in Afghanistan and Iraq through 2004, the United States had apprehended fifty thousand people. Three hundred allegations of abuse resulted, leading to the determination that, in sixty-six cases, prisoners under U.S. control were abused. Fifty-five of those were later found to have occurred in Iraq. The seriousness of the allegations and the horrifying scenes depicted in the pictures prompted numerous investigations. The U.S. Army dispatched Maj Gen. Antonio Taguba to report on abuse at Abu Ghraib; the Pentagon later appointed an “independent panel” to review Department of Defense detention operations and provide recommendations. These, along with reports by organizations such as the International Committee of the Red Cross (“the Red Cross”) confirmed that multiple violations of international humanitarian law and the Uniform Code of Military Justice had occurred. The Taguba report cited instances of beating, terrorizing, and sodomizing detainees committed by military intelligence units and the 372nd Military Police Company.

Revelations of torture at Abu Ghraib did lasting damage to American credibility and cast doubt on the United States’ respect for international law and human rights. The U.S. military responded by calling court martials for soldiers directly implicated in the abuse. However, as the Independent Panel Report makes clear, the sadistic tendencies of half-a-dozen enlisted soldiers are not alone to be blamed. Although the vast majority of detentions and prisoner interviews took place within the bounds of the law, the report points to larger systemic problems at the prison that also contributed to creating the conditions wherein such abuse was allowed to take place.

As the size and ferocity of the Iraqi insurgency grew, the inadequacies of American postwar planning became increasingly evident. Command and control structures broke down, and training of military police and interrogators proved insufficient in the face of a mounting prisoner population. A lack of understanding as to which interrogation procedures were acceptable was the result. Techniques deemed acceptable for Taliban and al Qaeda prisoners, who were found not to be entitled to protections guaranteed under the Geneva Convention of 1949, were in some cases used when questioning Iraqi detainees, who were entitled to those protections. Moreover, the presence of military intelligence operatives and the CIA, which ostensibly operated independently and had reportedly hidden “ghost detainees” during Red Cross inspections, created further confusion.

Along with an analysis of which specific decisions gave rise to conditions of lawlessness at Abu Ghraib prison, the legal community also debated the extent to which Bush administration policies with respect to domestic laws and international treaties forbidding torture played a role. Recognizing that the United States was now in a struggle against nonstate actors—terrorists who refused to abide by the laws of war—Bush administration lawyers set about providing a basis for expansive executive power in prosecuting what the President termed the Global War on Terror, or “GWOT.” The lack of human intelligence on terrorist organizations gave rise to a need to extract information through interrogation. Indeed, this need proved all the more pressing at Abu Ghraib, considering that existing interrogation techniques had yielded little actionable intelligence regarding the insurgency.

A legal memorandum from Assistant Attorney General Jay S. Bybee on August 1, 2002, for example, advised Counsel to the President Alberto Gonzales that physical pain amounting to torture must be “equivalent in intensity to the pain accompanying serious physical injury such as organ failure, impairment of bodily function or even death.” These and other memoranda sought to expand the range of acceptable interrogation techniques and to immunize those implementing interrogation procedures from the Convention on Torture and from U.S. law.

ANDREW FINKELMAN

References and Further Reading

- Greenberg, Karen, and Joshua Dratel, eds. The Torture Papers: The Road to Abu Ghraib. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2005.
- Independent Panel to Review DoD Detention Operations (James Schlesinger, Chairman). Final Report of the Independent Panel to Review DoD Detention Operations. Buffalo, NY: William Hein, 2005.

ACADEMIC FREEDOM

Origins of Academic Freedom

Academic freedom is a concept that encompasses notions of philosophy and contracts as well as civil liberties. In the United States the concept of academic freedom has developed primarily (although not exclusively) in the context of higher education. General U.S. understanding of academic freedom can be traced to two important documents published by the American Association of University Professors (AAUP). The first of these documents is the 1915 General Report of the Committee on Academic Freedom and Academic Tenure. The 1915 declaration was a manifesto on academic freedom in which the AAUP argued that academic freedom consisted of three components: the freedom of faculty to teach, to do research, and to talk and write on matters outside their disciplines. The AAUP argued that academic freedom could only be fostered in an environment of institutional neutrality.

In the second important document—the 1940 Statement of Principles on Academic Freedom and Tenure—the AAUP attempted to reduce the concept of academic freedom to a series of rule-like propositions that could guide university governance and serve as a basis for enforcing norms of academic freedom. Like the 1915 declaration, the statement of principles contains three core provisions that generally correspond with this three-part vision of research, teaching, and service responsibilities of most university professors:

Teachers are entitled to full freedom in research and in the publication of the results, subject to the adequate performance of their other academic duties; but research for pecuniary return should be based upon an understanding with the authorities of the institution.

Teachers are entitled to freedom in the classroom in discussing their subject, but they should be careful not to introduce into their teaching controversial matter which has no relation to their subject. Limitations of academic freedom because of religious or other aims of the institution should be clearly stated in writing at the time of the appointment.

College and university teachers are citizens, members of a learned profession, and officers of an educational institution. When they speak or write as citizens, they should be free from institutional censorship or discipline, but their special position in the community imposes special obligations. As scholars and educational officers, they should remember that the public may judge their profession and their institution by their utterances. Hence they should at all times be accurate, should exercise appropriate restraint, should show respect for the opinions of others, and should make every effort to indicate that they are not speaking for the institution.

These provisions of the statement of principles are based on the explicit assumptions of the drafters that “institutions of higher education exist not for themselves but for the ‘common good’; that academic freedom is ‘essential’ to that purpose; that academic tenure is ‘essential’ to academic freedom no less than to academic job security; and that ‘academic freedom carries with it duties correlative with rights.’”

These core values of academic freedom have been secured primarily through individual and institutional commitment to them. Statements regarding academic freedom are incorporated in the handbooks and/or procedures of most American universities. Commitments regarding academic freedom are also often incorporated in contracts between university faculty and administrations. Most American schools and colleges have adopted tenure for teachers as one of the mechanisms for ensuring academic freedom.

Academic Freedom and the First Amendment

American courts have found a nexus between academic freedom and rights of free speech protected in the First Amendment. The U.S. Supreme Court, in Keyishian v. Board of Regents, 385 U.S. 589 (1967), has referred to academic freedom as “a special concern of the First Amendment.” Yet, the scope of First Amendment protection afforded academic speech is ambiguous at best.

The first two U.S. Supreme Court cases explicitly to link academic freedom and the First Amendment were Adler v. Board of Education, 342 U.S. 485 (1952), and Wieman v. Updegraff, 344 U.S. 183 (1952). Decided during the Court’s 1952 term, both cases dealt with state regulations arising from the opposition to Communism and the cold war. Adler involved a New York statute that required that any person espousing the use of violence or altering the form of U.S. government or belonging to a “subversive organization” that espoused such views be removed from public employment. Although the majority of the Court upheld the state law, Justice William O. Douglas dissented, reasoning that the law unreasonably infringed on the academic freedom of public school teachers by intimidating any teacher who had ever been associated with a “subversive organization” from going into teaching or voicing his or her thoughts on the topics of the day.

Wieman involved the constitutionality of a state statute requiring that state employees take a loyalty oath disclaiming affiliation with any subversive organization as a condition of state employment. In contrast to Adler, the majority of the Court struck down the statute. In a separate concurring opinion, Justice Felix Frankfurter reasoned that in addition to the infringement on freedom of association of state employees, the disclaimer oath would have a pernicious effect on the academic freedom of teachers.

These early cases set the stage for a series of Supreme Court decisions during the 1950s and 1960s that define the scope of First Amendment protection for teachers based on notions of academic freedom. In Sweezy v. New Hampshire, 354 U.S. 234 (1957), the Court addressed the question of academic freedom and the First Amendment in yet another case challenging the constitutionality of government action undertaken as part of the cold war.

In Sweezy a University of New Hampshire professor was charged with contempt when he refused to provide details of his lectures and political associations in answer to questions by the state attorney general as part of a state antisubversive investigation. In his concurring opinion, Justice Frankfurter said that requiring Sweezy to produce his notes violated his academic freedom rights ensured by the First Amendment. Frankfurter wrote, “[w]hen weighed against the grave harm [to academic freedom] resulting from governmental intrusion into the intellectual life of a university, [ordinary justifications] for compelling a witness to discuss the contents of his lecture [appear] grossly inadequate.” Frankfurter’s reasoning was based, in part, on his view that the examination of Sweezy’s notes would have a chilling effect on the continued free exchange of ideas within the university.

Despite the fact that the academic freedom argument in Sweezy was made by an individual professor,

Justice Frankfurter's analysis was rooted significantly in the government's intrusion into the university as an institution; he characterized the government's action as an intrusion into the "intellectual life of a university," not as an intrusion into the free speech and association rights of an individual professor. Frankfurter's grand but unspecific conclusion was that a free society depends on free universities and that "this means the exclusion of governmental intervention in the intellectual life of a university."

In Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U.S. 479 (1960), the Court struck down an Arkansas statute requiring teachers, as a condition of employment, to submit an annual affidavit listing every organization to which they had belonged or regularly contributed for the past five years. The Court held that this requirement violated the free association rights of teachers. Although it did not base its reasoning expressly on "academic freedom" grounds, the Court quoted Weiman and Sweezy, reasoning that "[t]eachers and students must always remain free to inquire, to study and to evaluate, to gain new maturity and understanding; otherwise our civilization will stagnate and die."

The Supreme Court's majority relied on the link between free speech and academic freedom for the first time in 1967 in Keyishian v. Board of Regents. There the Court struck down the provisions of New York's Feinberg law that had been previously upheld in Adler. Writing for the majority, Justice William Brennan reasoned:

[A]cademic freedom . . . is of transcendent value to all of us and not merely to the teachers concerned. That freedom is therefore a special concern of the First Amendment, which does not tolerate laws that cast a pall of orthodoxy over the classroom The classroom is particularly the marketplace of ideas. The Nation's future depends upon leaders trained through wide exposure to that robust exchange of ideas which discovers truth out of a multitude of tongues, [rather] than through any kind of authoritative selection.

The Keyishian Court relied on the reasoning of Sweezy in its analysis and, as in Frankfurter's opinion in Sweezy, employed sweeping generalizations and avoided specific analysis. While Justice Douglas characterized academic freedom as a "transcendent value," his opinion does not shed additional light on the relationship between academic freedom and the First Amendment.

The year after Keyishian, Justice Douglas, writing for the majority in Whitehill v. Elkins, 389 U.S. 54 (1967), struck down an oath similar to that in Wieman on express academic freedom grounds. Continuing the sweeping, general invocation of academic freedom without specific analysis, the Court concluded "[t]he continuing surveillance which this type of law places on teachers is hostile to academic freedom The restraints on conscientious teachers are obvious."

Individual Academic Freedom and the Public Employee Doctrine

The potentially broad reach of the First Amendment/academic freedom cases may be limited by the cases dealing with free speech of public employees. These cases define the scope of free speech rights of public employees including, arguably, teachers and faculty members at public institutions. In Pickering v. Board of Education, 391 U.S. 563 (1968), the Supreme Court recognized that the free speech rights of public employees may be limited when the speech interferes with the efficient operation of the government employer.

Pickering involved a teacher who was fired because he wrote a letter to a newspaper criticizing the conduct of the local board of education regarding tax increases for education. The Court held that in the absence of proof that the teacher knowingly or recklessly made false statements, he could not be fired for exercising his First Amendment rights. The Pickering Court did not rely on notions of academic freedom for its conclusion that the teacher's free speech rights were infringed by the school district. In fact, the Court cited Keyishian and Whitehill only for the narrower proposition that public employees do not shed the free speech rights enjoyed by all citizens simply because they are in the public's employ.

While the Pickering Court concluded that the teacher's free speech rights had been impermissibly invaded, the decision established a framework in which public employees' speech is subject to scrutiny when it is related to their employment or negatively affects their employer. The test adopted by the Court balances the government's interest in the efficient operation of public services and in not having those services disrupted against the speech of public employees. If the potential disruptiveness of a public employee's speech outweighs the value of that speech, the public employer may take appropriate disciplinary action against the employee.

The public employee cases—Pickering in particular—raise questions about the extent of First Amendment protection for individual academic freedom. While the cases certainly recognize that the speech of public employees is protected by the First Amendment, they nonetheless appear to treat the speech of teachers no differently from the speech of other public employees. It may be that Pickering does not reach to the speech of college and university teachers or that it only applies to the speech of teachers outside the areas of the classroom and scholarly pursuits. While the latter limitation would be inconsistent with the AAUP's conception of academic freedom, it would leave intact the reasoning of Sweezy, Shelton, Keyishian, and Whitehill.

Institutional Academic Freedom

Within this basic context, the Supreme Court has slowly articulated a limited theory of institutional academic freedom. The core principle of this theory is that public institutions involved in academic endeavors should be accorded deference in core academic decision-making, even when the decision may arguably infringe the rights of institutional participants such as students, faculty, library patrons, and researchers. Thus, for example, in Regents of the University of Michigan v. Ewing, 474 U.S. 214 (1985), the Court recognized that a medical student had a constitutionally protected property right in continued enrollment free from arbitrary actions of the university. Nonetheless, the Court declined to second guess the decision of a university to disqualify a medical student after he did not pass required medical boards even though most other students were given the opportunity to retake the exam. The Ewing Court reasoned that “[w]hen judges are asked to review the substance of a genuinely academic decision, such as this one, they should show great respect for the faculty’s professional judgment.”

Deference to the decision-making of educational institutions on academic questions has played a role in other decisions. For example, in Grutter v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 306 (2003), in upholding the University of Michigan’s admissions policy regarding affirmative action in law school admissions, Justice Sandra Day O’Connor cited Keyishian and Ewing, noting that “[o]ur holding today is in keeping with our tradition of giving a degree of deference to a university’s academic decisions, within constitutionally prescribed limits.” Justice O’Connor’s consideration of academic freedom in university admissions paralleled Justice Lewis F. Powell’s similar deference twenty-five years earlier in Regents of the University of California v. Bakke, 438 U.S. 265 (1978).

Likewise, in Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier, 484 U.S. 260 (1988), the Court held that educators could exercise “editorial control over the style and content of student speech in school-sponsored expressive activities so long as their actions are reasonably related to legitimate pedagogical concerns.” Although the Court did not rely on a specific academic freedom rationale, its reasoning is consistent with the developing theory of institutional academic freedom on matters of core academic concern.

Academic Freedom in the Lower Federal Courts

The lower courts struggled to make sense of the Supreme Court’s approach in cases involving claims to individual academic freedom by faculty and students. While the cases rely on a number of different rationales, they consistently recognize the principle of deference to the academic decisions of educational institutions. Recently, for example, in Brown v. Li, 308 F. 3d 939 (9th Cir. 2002), the Ninth Circuit refused to question the University of California’s decision to require excisions from a master’s thesis, stating “under the Supreme Court’s precedents, the curriculum of a public education institution is one means by which the institution itself expresses its policy, a policy with which others do not have a constitutional right to interfere.” In Axson-Flynn v. Johnson, 356 F.3d 1277 (10th Cir. 2003), the Tenth Circuit similarly held that deference was due to university decision-making on curricular speech that was “reasonably related to legitimate pedagogical goals.”

While a limited theory of institutional academic freedom has developed, most courts have declined to recognize an independent, constitutionally based theory of academic freedom extending to faculty or to students, particularly when the protection of faculty and/or student academic freedom interests would conflict with the policies of the academic institution. Brown and Axson-Flynn, for example, each involved claims that the First Amendment protected academic speech by students that were overridden by the Court’s deference to institutional decision-making on matters of core academic concern.

In Urofsky v. Gillmore, 216 F. 3d 401 (4th Cir. 2001), the en banc panel of the Fourth Circuit expressly rejected the idea that individual faculty possess a constitutionally protected right of academic freedom separate and apart from institutional academic freedom. Urofsky involved a Virginia statute that prohibited state employees from accessing sexually explicit materials on state-provided computers. A number of university professors argued that the statute infringed on the free speech rights of all state employees and that, alternatively, the statute infringed on the academic freedom rights of state-employed teachers.

Applying Pickering, the Fourth Circuit found that the state did not infringe on the rights of state employees generally because states can regulate the speech of their employees undertaken in the course of the performance of their employment duties. The court also rejected the academic freedom argument stating: “[t]aking all of the cases together, the best that can be said for Appellees’ claim that the Constitution protects the academic freedom of an individual professor is that teachers were the first public employees to be afforded the now-universal protection against dismissal for the exercise of First Amendment rights. Nothing in Supreme Court jurisprudence suggests that the ‘right’ claimed by Appellees extends any further.”

Other decisions, such as Bonnell v. Lorenzo, 241 F. 3d 800 (6th Cir. 2001), have followed the approach of Urofsky, applying Pickering and not broader principles of academic freedom to claims advanced by individual faculty.

Academic freedom has played a role in a number of civil liberties debates arising in academic settings. In the debate about hate speech on college campuses, for example, opponents of civility and campus hate speech codes have argued that such codes violate academic freedom because they attempt to deter and sanitize protected academic speech that may be offensive. Academic freedom has also been part of the analysis of First Amendment defenses to sexual harassment claims based on a hostile educational environment. Nonetheless, cases in the hate speech and sexual harassment areas have not directly turned on the courts’ analysis of academic freedom.

Despite the broad language in early Supreme Court opinions regarding academic freedom and the First Amendment, constitutional protection of academic freedom is very narrow. Courts have deferred to academic institutions on matters involving core academic decision-making. At the same time, the lower federal courts have declined to recognize an independent, constitutionally protected right of academic freedom for faculty and students, especially when the recognition of such a right would require the court to intervene in institutional academic decision-making.

ELIZABETH B. BRANDT

References and Further Reading

- Byrne, J. Peter, Academic Freedom: A “Special Concern of the First Amendment,” Yale Law Review 99 (1989): 251–340.
- Menand, Louis, ed. The Future of Academic Tenure. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1996.
- Metzger, Walter P., Profession and Constitution: Two Definitions of Academic Freedom in America, Texas Law Review 66 (1988): 1265–1322.

Rabban, David M., Functional Analysis of ‘Individual’ and ‘Institutional’ Academic Freedom Under the First Amendment. Law and Contemporary Problems 53 (1990):227–301.

Van Alstyne, William W., Academic Freedom and the First Amendment in the Supreme Court of the United States: An Unhurried Historical Review. Law and Contemporary Problems 53 (1990):79–154.

———, ed. Freedom and Tenure in the Academy. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1993.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Adler v. Board of Education*, 342 U.S. 485 (1952)
- Axson–Flynn v. Johnson*, 356 F.3d 1277 (10th Cir. 2003)
- Bonnell v. Lorenzo*, 241 F. 3d 800 (6th Cir. 2001)
- Brown v. Li*, 308 F. 3d 939 (9th Cir. 2002)
- Grutter v. Bollinger*, 539 U.S. 306 (2003)
- Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier*, 484 U.S. 260 (1988)
- Keyishian v. Board of Regents*, 385 U.S. 589 (1967)
- Pickering v. Board of Education*, 391 U.S. 563 (1968)
- Regents of the University of California v. Bakke*, 438 U.S. 265 (1978)
- Regents of the University of Michigan v. Ewing*, 474 U.S. 214 (1985)
- Shelton v. Tucker*, 364 U.S. 479 (1960)
- Sweezy v. New Hampshire*, 354 U.S. 234 (1957)
- Urofsky v. Gillmore*, 216 F. 3d 401 (4th Cir. 2001)
- Whitehill v. Elkins*, 389 U.S. 54 (1967)
- Wieman v. Updegraff*, 344 U.S. 183 (1952)

See also Campus Hate Speech Codes; Freedom of Speech and Press: Nineteenth Century; Freedom of Speech: Modern Period (1917–Present); Student Speech in Public Schools; Teacher Speech in Public Schools; Universities and Public Forums

ACCESS TO GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS INFORMATION

In a democratic society, the informed citizen must have an affirmative right to gain access to information concerning the operations of government. Often referred to as “transparency,” the public’s right of access makes oversight possible and helps ensure that the government will be accountable to the people.

Access to the three branches of government varies in scope. Executive branch agencies are subject to the federal Freedom of Information and Sunshine laws, which create a presumptive right of access, subject to specific and limited exemptions. The legislative branch is generally open to public observation and review as a matter of practice and sometimes of statute. The Supreme Court declared that public and press access to criminal trials is guaranteed by the First Amendment in Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia, 448 U.S. 555 (1980), and common law and court rules are designed to keep most other court proceedings open.

The rights of access to other instrumentalities of government are less clear. Although the Supreme Court has recognized that news gathering is protected by the First Amendment, the precise parameters are vague. For example, the scope of a First Amendment-based right of media access to military operations remains ill defined and a source of constant tension; competing interests of the government in maintaining operational security and the right of the public to know are imperfectly balanced. In the aftermath of 9/11 and the War on Terrorism, the government closed down access to many sources of government operations information in the name of protecting national security.

JANE E. KIRTLEY

Cases and Statutes Cited

Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia, 448 U.S. 555 (1980)

See also Access to Judicial Records; Freedom of Information Act (1966); Freedom of Information and Sunshine Laws; Media Access to Information; Media Access to Judicial Proceedings; Media Access to Military Operations; 9/11 and the War on Terrorism; Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia, 448 U.S. 555 (1980)

ACCESS TO JUDICIAL RECORDS

Courts generally recognize two independent rights of public access to judicial records, one stemming from the common law and one from the First Amendment. Both are predicated on furthering government accountability.

The common law right originated before the First Amendment and is broader in scope; however, as with any common law right, it can be overridden by rule or statute. The Supreme Court recognized in Nixon v. Warner Communications, Inc., 453 U.S. 589 (1978), that the common law creates a presumption of access to judicial records. But the Court denied access to White House audiotapes on grounds of supervening statute and declined to “delineate precisely the contours of the common-law right.”

Common-law access is decided case by case, entrusted to the discretion of the trial court, and privileged by high deference on appeal. Access is determined by balancing public interests in disclosure, such as understanding of the judiciary or of historical events, against potential ills of disclosure, such as invasion of privacy, promotion of scandal, dissemination of defamation, or revelation of trade secrets.

The Supreme Court has not explicitly recognized a First Amendment right of access to judicial records, but lower courts have found the right implicit in the Court’s release of transcripts after access to proceedings was unconstitutionally denied in the Press-Enterprise cases. To analyze First Amendment access, courts employ the experience and logic test propounded in Richmond Newspapers v. Virginia, Inc., 453 U.S. 589 (1978), for access to proceedings. As such, fewer records are covered. But access denial cannot be ordained by statute and merits no deference on appeal.

RICHARD J. PELTZ

Cases and Statutes Cited

Nixon v. Warner Communications, Inc., 453 U.S. 589 (1978)
Press-Enterprise Co. v. Superior Court (I), 464 U.S. 501 (1984)

Press-Enterprise Co. v. Superior Court (II), 478 U.S. 1 (1984)

Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia, 448 U.S. 555 (1980)

See also Cameras in the Courtroom; Discovery Materials in Court Proceedings; Duty to Obey Court Orders; Gag Orders in Judicial Proceedings; Media Access to Information; Media Access to Judicial Proceedings; Nixon, Richard Milhous; Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia, 448 U.S. 555 (1980); Right of Access to Criminal Trials; Sealed Documents in Court Proceedings; State Courts

ACCESS TO PRISONS

In two cases decided on the same day in 1974, the U.S. Supreme Court said that state and federal prison regulations barring journalists from interviewing individual inmates did not violate the First Amendment. In Pell v. Procunier, 417 U.S. 817 (1974), and Saxbe v. Washington Post, 417 U.S. 817 (1974), the Court deferred to the judgment of prison officials who believed press interviews compromised security and discipline. The Court also said that journalists had the same right of access to prisons as the general public. Similarly, the Court in Houchins v. KQED, Inc., 438 U.S. 1 (1978), rejected a television station’s argument that barring cameras and sound equipment from public tours of a county jail infringed on the station’s First Amendment rights as long as all members of the public faced the same restrictions.

State and federal courts consistently have found that it does not violate the First Amendment to bar the media from filming prisoner executions. In Garrett v. Estelle, 556 F.2d 1274 (5th Cir. 1977), a federal appellate court upheld a Texas regulation barring the filming of executions for broadcast. In 2001, a federal court in Entertainment Network Inc. v. Lappin, 134 F.Supp.2d 1002 (S.D. Ind. 2001), upheld a federal prison's decision to bar the Internet broadcast of an execution. However, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit said in 2002, in California First Amendment Coalition v. Woodford, 299 F.3d 868 (9th Cir. 2002), that California prison officials violated the First Amendment when they kept reporters and other witnesses invited to view an execution from seeing part of the lethal injection process.

ANTHONY L. FARGO

References and Further Reading

- Frost, Kristen, Case Notes and Comments: The Constitutionality of an Internet Execution: Lappin v. Entertainment Network, Inc., DePaul-LCA Journal of Art and Entertainment Law 12 (Spring 2002): 173–216.
- Levi, Nicholas, Note: Veil of Secrecy: Public Executions, Limitations on Reporting Capital Punishment, and the Content Based Nature of Private Execution Laws, Federal Communications Law Journal 55 (December 2002): 131–152.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- California First Amendment Coalition v. Woodford*, 299 F.3d 868 (9th Cir. 2002)
- Entertainment Network, Inc. v. Lappin*, 134 F.Supp.2d 1002 (S.D. Ind. 2001)
- Garrett v. Estelle*, 556 F.2d 1274 (5th Cir. 1977)
- Houchins v. KQED, Inc.*, 438 U.S. 1 (1978)
- Pell v. Procunier*, 417 U.S. 817 (1974)
- Saxbe v. Washington Post*, 417 U.S. 843 (1974)

See also Capital Punishment: History and Politics; Freedom of Speech and Press: Nineteenth Century; Press Clause (I): Framing and History from Colonial Period up to Early National Period; Prisoners and Freedom of Speech

ACCOMMODATION OF RELIGION

The free exercise clause of the First Amendment is often interpreted as requiring the government to accommodate religion by refraining from applying to religious practitioners general laws that interfere with the edicts of particular religious faiths. This accommodation mandate has two aspects: the accommodation of religious belief and the accommodation of behavior motivated by religious belief. In Reynolds v. United States (1878), the Supreme Court's first comprehensive consideration of religious accommodation, the Court recognized that "while [laws] cannot interfere with mere religious belief and opinion, they may with practices." Even though the Court has always recognized that the law can interfere with religiously motivated conduct, it has grappled repeatedly with the degree to which the First Amendment will permit legal interference with that conduct.

The mandatory accommodation required under the free exercise clause in some contexts is augmented by several federal and state statutes requiring accommodation of religious practitioners in other contexts. These statutes raise the issue of whether the Constitution permits government to accommodate religion in situations in which the free exercise clause does not mandate accommodation. Statutory accommodations potentially run afoul of two constitutional limits. First, to the extent that federal and state accommodation statutes provide favorable treatment to individuals based solely on religious belief, the provisions may violate the establishment clause. Second, federal statutes that require states to accommodate religion more comprehensively than the free exercise clause requires are vulnerable to the claim that Congress has exceeded its authority to remedy violations of the Fourteenth Amendment.

The History of Accommodation

For many years, courts were reluctant to require governments to accommodate religious practitioners by granting them exemptions from generally applicable laws. In Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145 (1878), for example, the Supreme Court refused to grant traditional Mormon practitioners an exemption from a federal statute criminalizing the practice of polygamy. Permitting individuals to avoid criminal punishment because their behavior was motivated by religious devotion, the Court held, "would be to make the professed doctrines of religious belief superior to the law of the land, and in effect to permit every citizen to become a law unto himself. Government could exist only in name under such circumstances."

This skeptical attitude characterized the Supreme Court's general approach to the issue of constitutionally mandated accommodations of religion until the early 1960s, when the Court became much more amenable to accommodation claims by religious practitioners. In 1963, the Supreme Court effectively required governments to accommodate religious practitioners in many cases in which legal obligations and religious obligations conflicted. In Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398 (1963), the Court held that the state of South Carolina was required to provide unemployment benefits to a Seventh-Day Adventist woman who had been fired from her job because she had refused to work on Saturday, which was her Sabbath.

The state had refused to provide her benefits because the state unemployment statute denied benefits to anyone who refused "suitable work." The Court held that applying this provision to Sherbert forced her to "choose between following the precepts of her religion and forfeiting benefits, on the one hand, and abandoning one of the precepts of her religion in order to accept work, on the other hand." The Court held that this choice significantly burdened her free exercise of religion and could therefore only be justified by a compelling interest. Since the state had no compelling interest in refusing unemployment benefits to Sherbert while granting such benefits to others, it was required to accommodate her religious practices by providing her benefits.

The compelling interest analysis inaugurated in Sherbert prevailed on the Court until 1990. During this period the Court employed this analysis to require accommodations for Amish parents who sought to remove their children from school prior to the age designated in state mandatory attendance laws (Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205, 1972), Jehovah's Witness foundry employees who refused to work on armaments production (Thomas v. Review Board of Indiana, 450 U.S. 707, 1971), and Native American parents whose religious beliefs prohibited them from obtaining social security numbers for their children (Bowen v. Roy, 476 U.S. 693, 1986).

On the other hand, the Court also refused to protect religious practitioners in a number of cases. The Court held, for example, that despite the constitutional accommodation mandate, the government could collect social security payments from Amish employers (United States v. Lee, 455 U.S. 252, 1982), force Jewish members of the military to refrain from wearing yarmulkes on duty (Goldman v. Weinberger, 475 U.S. 503, 1986), deny tax-exempt status to a religious university whose religious precepts prohibited interracial dating (Bob Jones University v. United States, 461 U.S. 574, 1983), and tax the sale of religious literature (Jimmy Swaggart Ministries v. Board of Equalization of California, 493 U.S. 378, 1990). In short, although the Court required the government to assert a compelling interest to override the constitutional mandate of accommodation, it found that many government interests were sufficient to satisfy this standard.

Theories of Accommodation

Although the courts have focused mostly on the practical application of the accommodation mandate, judges and legal academics have also debated the theory behind religious accommodation. Proponents of accommodation argue that accommodation provides essential protection for religious minorities in a society defined by religious pluralism. Proponents of accommodation argue that the free exercise clause of the First Amendment is designed primarily to protect this culture of religious pluralism. They also argue that the theory of accommodation and religious pluralism should inform the courts' interpretation of the establishment clause. Under this approach, the need to accommodate religious practices would lead to a view of the establishment clause as fostering a spirit of what Chief Justice Warren Burger once labeled "benevolent neutrality." Granting property tax exemptions to religious organizations and permitting religious organizations to participate in government-funded social services programs are two examples of benevolent neutrality.

Proponents of accommodation also argue that accommodation is necessary to preserve the authority of religious institutions, which are (in the words of Professor Michael McConnell) "mediating structures" that provide citizens with the civic virtue necessary for successful democratic governance. Finally, proponents argue that accommodation is an overt recognition of the possibility that a supreme celestial authority exists. If God exists, they argue, then His sacred dictates must be deemed superior to those of any secular authority.

Opposition to mandatory accommodation revolves around the perceived discrimination built into the accommodation theory, which opponents believe is contrary to the underlying principles of the establishment clause. A central theme of establishment clause doctrine is that the government must be neutral toward particular religious faiths and religion in general. Mandatory accommodation rules, however, inevitably provide different levels of benefits to members of different faiths. Nonreligious individuals are automatically excluded from any accommodation regime. Members of religious groups that do not demand absolute conformity with strict behavioral decrees also will not benefit from accommodation mandates. In areas such as employment, moreover, the accommodation of religious practitioners will often have the effect of shifting burdens from one set of employees to another solely because of the employees' faith.

Under this view the internal contradictions of the oxymoron "benevolent neutrality" are evident: A system cannot be simultaneously "benevolent" and "neutral." If some citizens are given special dispensation to avoid complying with a general legal obligation based solely on their religious faith, then the system makes compliance with the law depend on one's religious faith. Such a system is not "neutral," as required by the establishment clause.

The Modern Standard

The Supreme Court has not formally adopted either position on the theory of accommodation, but in recent years the Court has significantly weakened the requirement that the government accommodate practices of religious adherents that violate otherwise applicable laws. In Employment Division v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872 (1990), the Supreme Court held that the First Amendment does not bar the government from applying a neutral, generally applicable law to individuals whose actions are motivated by religious faith. The Court therefore abandoned the requirement that the government must establish a compelling interest to apply general statutes to religious practitioners. The case involved the state of Oregon's refusal to grant unemployment compensation to two drug counselors who were fired from their jobs because they had used peyote in a religious ceremony conducted by the Native American Church. The Court held that the Oregon criminal law outlawing the use of peyote was not directed at members of the church. Violations of this law therefore justified denying unemployment benefits to anyone (including religious practitioners) using the prohibited substance.

After Smith, the Constitution requires governments to accommodate religion in only three relatively narrow circumstances: The government must (1) accommodate religion in statutes that provide benefits based on highly individualized governmental assessments of the reasons for the relevant conduct; (2) accommodate religion when the religious conduct is combined with some other constitutional right, such as free speech; and (3) still demonstrate a compelling interest before applying a statute that singles out religiously motivated practices for unfavorable treatment.

Although the Court has reduced the protection of religion through constitutionally mandated accommodation, the accommodation principle has been incorporated into several statutes protecting religious practitioners. The broadest of these statutes—the federal Religious Freedom Restoration Act—was held unconstitutional by the Supreme Court because it went beyond Congress's authority under section five of the Fourteenth Amendment. Congress subsequently enacted a narrower federal statute requiring the government to accommodate religious practitioners in the land use and prison contexts. Many states also have enacted statutes requiring the accommodation of religious practitioners, usually by reimposing the requirement that the government must prove a compelling interest before applying general legal regulations to individual actions motivated by religion. The Supreme Court has not yet ruled on the constitutionality of these statutes.

STEVEN G. GEY

References and Further Reading

- Eisgruber, Christopher L., and Lawrence G. Sager, The Vulnerability of Conscience: The Constitutional Basis for Protecting Religious Conduct, University of Chicago Law Review 61 (1994): 1245.
- Laycock, Douglas, The Remnants of Free Exercise, Supreme Court Review 1 (1990).
- Lupu, Ira C., Reconstructing the Establishment Clause: The Case Against the Discretionary Accommodation of Religion, University of Pennsylvania Law Review 140 (1991): 555.
- Marshall, William P., The Case Against the Constitutionally Compelled Free Exercise Exemption, Case Western Reserve Law Review 40 (1989–1990): 357.
- McConnell, Michael W., Accommodation of Religion, Supreme Court Review 1 (1985).
- , The Origins and Historical Understanding of Free Exercise of Religion, Harvard Law Review 103 (1990): 1410.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Bob Jones University v. U.S.*, 461 US 574 (1983)
- Bowen v. Roy*, 476 U.S. 693 (1986)
- Employment Division v. Smith*, 494 U.S. 872 (1990)
- Goldman v. Weinberger*, 475 U.S. 503 (1986)
- Jimmy Swaggart Ministries v. Board of Equalization of California*, 493 U.S. 378 (1990)
- Reynolds v. United States*, 98 U.S. 145 (1878)
- Sherbert v. Verner*, 374 U.S. 398 (1963)
- Thomas v. Review Board of Indiana*, 450 U.S. 707 (1981)
- United States v. Lee*, 455 U.S. 252 (1982)
- Wisconsin v. Yoder*, 406 U.S. 205 (1972)

See also Amish and Religious Liberty; Antipolygamy Laws; Belief–Action Distinction in Free Exercise Clause History; Conscientious Objection, the Free Exercise Clause; Exemptions for Religion Contained in Regulatory Statutes; Jehovah's Witnesses and Religious Liberty; Mormons and Religious Liberty; Release Time from Public Schools (For Religious Purposes); Religious Freedom Restoration Act; Seventh Day Adventists and Religious Liberty

ACCOMPLICE CONFESSIONS

A defendant in a multidefendant criminal trial who confesses to illegal conduct is making a direct admission regarding his acts. This confession is admissible against the confessing defendant in court. However, when a defendant's confession also implicates a co-defendant, the statement generally cannot be used as evidence in prosecuting the nonconfessing co-defendant. The confession is considered inadmissible hearsay violating the nonconfessing co-defendant's rights under the Sixth Amendment confrontation clause.

Accomplice confessions have long been an issue due to concern over how "voluntary" the confessions extracted by police really are, as well as the reliability of statements given by confessing co-defendants eager to shift blame for their criminal acts to others. The U.S. Supreme Court has addressed this issue in a number of important cases.

In Delli Paoli v. United States (352 U.S. 232, 1957), the Court held that a confession admitted by one defendant that also implicated a co-defendant was admissible if jurors were told to disregard that part of the confession. The Delli Paoli holding led the New Jersey Supreme Court Committee on Evidence to recommend that the law be changed to disallow defendant statements implicating a co-defendant, unless all references to the co-defendant could be eliminated. This recommendation was rejected and states were temporarily left to make their own decisions regarding the admissibility of such statements.

The Court readdressed the issue in Bruton v. U.S. (391 U.S. 123, 1968), where it overruled its holding in Delli Paoli. It held that jury instructions limiting the consideration of statements implicating co-defendants did not satisfy the Sixth Amendment confrontation clause. However, the Court soon relaxed its stance, finding that in certain circumstances, an error allowing such a statement (a Bruton error) could be deemed harmless and thus not amount to a breach of the Sixth Amendment's confrontation rights.

In 1970, the Court concluded that an exception to the rule against hearsay must be evaluated by the due-process standards of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments instead of the Sixth Amendment confrontation clause. Its reasoning was that the confrontation clause was not designed to cope with the many factors involved in passing evidentiary rules and ensuring the fairness of trials. (See Dutton v. Evans, 400 U.S. 74, 1970.)

One long-recognized exception to the hearsay rule was when the evidence established the existence of a conspiracy. In such cases, a statement by a co-conspirator made in furtherance of the conspiracy was admissible against other co-defendants and the declarant was not required to testify at trial. (See Rule 801 (d)(2)E, Federal Rules of Evidence.) In Bourjaily v. U.S., 483 U.S. 171 (1987), and U.S. v. Inadi, 475 U.S. 387 (1986), the Court held that this hearsay exception did not violate the confrontation clause. The Court later expanded this exception by allowing defendant pleas establishing the existence of a conspiracy to be admissible at trial without the declarant testifying.

EZEKIEL E. CORTEZ

References and Further Reading

- Campaigne, Carol, Joanne Constantino, Glenn A. Guarino, Kathy E. Hinck, Kristin McCarthy, Kristin, Caralyn A. Irwin J. Schiffres, Melissa K. Stull, Tim A. Thomas, and Mitchell J. Waldman. 29A American Journal 2d Evidence § 751 (1992).
- Choo, Andrew L. T. Hearsay and Confrontation in Criminal Trials. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1996.
- Coady, C.A.J. Testimony: A Philosophical Study. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1992.
- Wright, Charles Alan, and Kenneth W. Graham, Jr. 21A Federal Practices and Procedures 2d Evidence § 5064.1–5064.2 (West 1987).

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Bourjaily v. U.S.*, 483 U.S. 171 (1987)
- Bruton v. U.S.*, 391 U.S. 123 (1968)
- Delli Paoli v. United States*, 352 U.S. 232 (1957)
- Dutton v. Evans*, 400 U.S. 74 (1970)
- People v. Salko*, 47 NY2d 230 (1979)
- U.S. v. Inadi* (475 U.S. 387 (1986)
- United States Constitution, Fifth Amendment
- United States Constitution, Sixth Amendment
- United States Constitution, Fourteenth Amendment

See also Confrontation and Compulsory Process

ACT UP

ACT UP—the AIDS Coalition to Unleash Power—came together in March 1987 out of the charismatic exhortations of author and playwright Larry Kramer. Already central to the creation of the Gay Men's Health Crisis, Kramer had grown impatient with the responses by the government and pharmaceutical industry to the AIDS epidemic. No longer content simply to react to the crisis, ACT UP aspired to force change through direct action, confrontation, and media-savvy street theatre.

Central to the motivational ethos of the coalition was the conviction that persons living with AIDS (PWAs) were not passive victims of a disease, but individuals who must take control of their situations through self-empowerment, demanding that bureaucracies take the problem seriously. The Denver Principles announced this proactive stance. Framed in 1983, the Principles eschewed the labels "victim" and "patient" and enumerated the rights of PWAs along with recommendations and strategies to achieve those goals. ACT UP embraced the spirit of the Principles and gave flesh to what had been merely abstract ideas.

The group's first demonstration took place on March 24, 1987, when it staged a protest on Wall Street over the monopoly and profiteering by Burroughs Wellcome, the manufacturer of AZT. Of the two hundred fifty participants, seventeen were arrested, launching an innovative model for activist organizing.

Although all facets of the AIDS crisis fell within the group's mission, ACT UP came to be especially associated with three broad issues. First, it effectively pressured medical corporations to develop safe and effective drug treatments and offer them at affordable prices to those who needed them. Second, activists insisted that governmental agencies, such as the Food and Drug Administration, put new AIDS drugs on a fast-track for approval. Finally, any entity perceived to be complicating the lives and treatments of PWAs was singled out for public humiliation and embarrassing publicity.

Over the years ACT UP achieved astonishing successes. It shut down the FDA to international attention (October 11, 1988), convinced the government to adopt innovative drug testing procedures (June 4–9, 1989), and pressured Burroughs Wellcome to cut the price of AZT 20 percent by interfering with trading on the floor of the New York Stock Exchange (September 14, 1989).

ACT UP's singular success relied in part on its accurate sense of how to get its message out beyond its members. Its logo—the motto “Silence = Death” in front of a pink triangle—became one of the best known symbols of the period. From its inception the group valued praxis over theory. Going far beyond the traditional protest picket lines, its actions tended to be well-conceived, high-style mediagenic events designed for visual and symbolic impact, such as the “die in” on Wall Street.

A hallmark of an ACT UP action was an intrusion into “inappropriate” spaces. These actions were known as “zaps,” a term and strategy revived from earlier countercultural and gay liberationist campaigns. On the other hand, ACT UP rarely pursued its agenda in the courtroom. The few cases involving the organization more typically concerned its right to protest than AIDS issues per se.

At its height, ACT UP spawned more than seventy chapters around the country and the world. In addition, it spun off other, even more radical organizations such as Queer Nation, which fought against homophobia and assimilation of the gay community into heterosexual normalcy, and the Lesbian Avengers.

According to its own description, ACT UP is a group “united in anger.” Although that visceral drive accounts for its great intensity, such emotional intensity could not be sustained over an extended period. By the 1990s, ACT UP was in decline, and today comparatively few chapters remain active. AIDS claimed many of its early charismatic leaders, and others left to pursue AIDS-related causes in more professional roles. As better drugs made AIDS more manageable for many PWAs, there was less “anger” for ACT UP to draw upon. Finally, ACT UP chapters suffered internal dissensions over whether the organization should remain with its single focus or branch out into wider issues of social justice.

Whatever the fortunes of the organization, ACT UP has an enduring legacy in its achievements to improve the lives of PWAs—in terms of quantity, through the demand for new drugs made rapidly available at affordable prices, and quality, by confronting AIDS-negative policies wherever found. Its refreshingly uninhibited and creative protests have had an enduring impact on the way ordinary citizens come together to demand recognition of their civil liberties.

JAMES M. DONOVAN

References and Further Reading

- ACT UP-New York. ACTUP Capsule History, www.actupny.org.
 Kramer, Larry. Reports from the Holocaust: The Making of an AIDS Activist. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1989.
 Shepard, Benjamin, and Ronald Hayduk, eds. From ACT UP to the WTO: Urban Protest and Community Building in the Era of Globalization. London: Verso, 2002.

See also Demonstrations and Sit-ins; Gay and Lesbian Rights

ACTON, LORD JOHN (1834–1902)

Lord John Acton, the great liberal academic who dominated the field of history during the latter part of the Victorian Age, was born into a family of the upper echelon of society in Italy and moved to England at the age of three. There, Acton faced persecution for his Catholic religious beliefs. Lord Acton went on to become a member of the first Vatican Council, where he advocated for political and religious freedom. At times throughout his career, he was highly critical of the Vatican for intolerance and persecution. He attended university in Germany, was elected a member of the House of Commons in 1859, and acquired and was the editor of the periodical the Rambler, which he shaped into a liberal journal of Catholicism. In 1895, Acton was appointed the Regius Professor of Modern History at Cambridge University. He began work on a universal history that would track religious virtue and the expansion of liberty, but he died before completion.

Acton can be characterized as being critical of excessive power in only a few hands at the national level, in his Catholic Church as well as in government. Acton is best known for the famous phrase “power tends to corrupt, and absolute power corrupts absolutely.” He was suspicious of unchecked nationalism, meaning a political system that governs by a general will for an entire state, since it stood to undermine traditional liberties. For example, he hailed the secession of the South from the Union in the Civil War as the realization of states’ rights as the only check on absolutist rule.

Acton favored the slow evolution of institutions above broad-sweeping reactionary measures; law ought to parallel, not spur, history. He called for expanded personal freedom but viewed the central government as a hindrance to society’s progress on this front. He believed that a national government must have its authority divided in order safeguard liberty, akin to checks and balances. Acton also believed that liberty encompassed the rights of minorities—persons who fall outside the so-called majority group that controls the government. Acton’s views on nationalist power and liberty for all are manifest in the American system of checks and balances. This includes the Supreme Court’s protection of the civil liberties of so-called minority groups from laws that persecute them, such as the Amish or Jehovah’s Witnesses, while striking a necessary balance with majoritarian rule.

JAMES F. VAN ORDEN

References and Further Reading

- Acton, Lord John Emerich Edward. Lectures on Modern History. London: Macmillan and Co., 1930.
- Matthew, David. Lord Acton and His Times. University, Ala.: University of Alabama Press, 1968.
- Watson, George. Lord Acton’s History of Liberty: A Study of His Library, with an Edited Text on His History of Liberty Notes. Aldershot, England: Scolar Press, 1994.

ACTUAL MALICE STANDARD

In the landmark case of The New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 25 (1964), the Supreme Court developed the actual malice concept. An advertisement (equivalent to a story for the Court) appeared in the Times that contained false and defamatory information about a commissioner of the city of Montgomery, Alabama. The commissioner sued, but the Supreme Court, while acknowledging the falsity and defamatory nature of the story, ruled that if the press was to have freedom to write about public officials, it needed to be given a substantial amount of legal protection. A newspaper would only be culpable, the Court ruled, if it acted with actual malice, which the Court went on to define as “with knowledge that it [the story] was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not.” In Sullivan this applied to suits brought by public figures; the argument was that these individuals had thrust themselves into the limelight and should expect more critical stories about themselves, and that, given their public position, they would have an easier opportunity to rebut allegations and set the record straight.

In later cases the Court extended the applicability of the actual malice standard to public figures (in Sullivan it was limited to public officials), but it declined to extend it to public issues. Deciding who is a public figure, however, has proven to be no easy matter. It also has not proven straightforward to obtain the information necessary to determine whether a paper acted with actual malice in its reporting.

MILTON HEUMANN

References and Further Reading

- O’Brien, David. Constitutional Law and Politics, 5th ed., vol. 2. New York: W.W. Norton and Company, 2003.
- Sullivan, Kathleen, and Gerald Gunther. Constitutional Law, 15th ed. New York: Foundation Press, 2004.

Cases and Statutes Cited

The New York Times Company v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 25 (1964)

See also Freedom of the Press: Modern Period (1917–Present); Herbert v. Lando, 441 U.S. 153 (1979); Public Figures; Public Officials

ADMINISTRATIVE SEARCHES AND SEIZURES

The Fourth Amendment requires all searches and seizures to be reasonable. The Supreme Court has interpreted reasonableness to require a warrant based on probable cause, unless a recognized exception to this general rule applies. One such exception is for “administrative searches,” in which the government claims that the search advances administrative interests, not traditional law enforcement objectives.

The Court first recognized an “administrative search” exception to usual Fourth Amendment rules in the 1967 companion cases of Camara v. Municipal Court, 387 U.S. 523, and See v. City of Seattle, 387

U.S. 541. At issue in the cases was the constitutionality of warrantless entries into private property to inspect for municipal housing code and fire code violations, respectively. In addressing the reasonableness of the searches, the Court treated the warrant and probable cause requirements differently. On the one hand, emphasizing the historical importance of search warrants, the Court found no justification for the government to conduct administrative inspections without a warrant, in the absence of an emergency or consent.

On the other hand, the Court reasoned that requiring the government to articulate individualized suspicion that violations existed within the areas to be searched would threaten the efficacy of an administrative inspection program designed to prevent such violations. Instead, the Court developed a standard of “probable cause” for administrative searches that requires only that the search be “reasonable.” To measure reasonableness in the administrative context, the Court invoked a balancing test, weighing the government’s interest in the search against the privacy expectations implicated by the search.

Since Camara and See, the Court has backed away from its insistence upon a warrant to support administrative searches, emphasizing instead the more flexible requirement of reasonableness. For example, in New York v. Burger, the Court upheld a state statute that authorized police to conduct warrantless searches of businesses involved in the dismantling of automobiles. The Court reasoned that in the context of a “closely regulated” industry, individuals have reduced expectations of privacy. Therefore, both the warrant and probable cause requirements have reduced application. Departing from the earlier concept of an administrative warrant, the Court held that a regulatory scheme authorizing warrantless searches of a closely regulated industry is reasonable as long as three requirements are met: (1) the government must have a substantial interest in the scheme; (2) the warrantless inspections must be necessary to further the regulatory scheme; and (3) the inspection program must provide an adequate substitute for a warrant by notifying property owners that the search is authorized and by limiting the discretion of the inspecting officers.

The Court’s willingness to rely on a balancing test to determine reasonableness, rather than on the warrant and probable cause rules, is not limited to searches of closely regulated industries. More recently, the Court has recognized a “special needs” exception that applies whenever a “special need” other than the ordinary needs of law enforcement renders the warrant and/or probable cause requirements impracticable. Applying this exception, the Court has upheld, for example, drug testing of railroad personnel to enhance railway safety, of certain U.S. Customs agents to ensure their fitness and integrity, and of public school students to detect and prevent drug use by youths.

Whether a search program advances administrative or otherwise “special” needs, as opposed to ordinary law enforcement, is not always apparent. In Burger (New York v. Burger, 482 U.S. 691, 1987), for example, the searches of automobile-dismantling businesses were conducted by police officers, and at least part of the statute’s purpose was to reduce criminal activity relating to car thefts. Nevertheless, the Court treated the warrantless inspections as administrative searches of a closely inspected industry, not as traditional law enforcement searches. In doing so, the Court did not appear troubled that the state’s ultimate objective may have been to reduce crime. Rather, the Court focused on the mechanism with which the state had chosen to pursue that objective, which the Court characterized as administrative.

In contrast, when the government’s mechanism for pursuing its objective bears too much resemblance to traditional law enforcement, the Court will treat it as such, despite the purportedly “special” purpose that motivates it. For example, in Ferguson v. Charleston, 532 U.S. 67 (2001), the Court addressed the constitutionality of testing pregnant women for drugs at public hospitals in order to reduce the number of drug-influenced babies. The threat of prosecution was used as leverage to encourage women who tested positive to obtain substance abuse counseling. The government argued that the drug testing advanced a special need beyond traditional law enforcement and, therefore, could be conducted without a warrant or probable cause. The Court disagreed, emphasizing not the government’s ultimate objective but the mechanism by which it had chosen to pursue that objective. Despite the government’s willingness to forego criminal charges against women who obtained counseling, the “immediate objective” of the drug testing was to generate evidence for use in a potential criminal case.

Although courts and commentators often treat administrative and special needs searches separately, both lines of cases can be seen as part of the same doctrinal approach. In both contexts, the Court relaxes or does away with the usual probable cause and warrant requirements because of the nature of the governmental interest; instead, it determines “reasonableness” by the balancing test first articulated in Camara. Courts similarly turn to balancing, and away from warrants and probable cause requirements, to weigh the reasonableness of border searches, airport searches, and checkpoints. These lines of cases could be increasingly important as mass surveillance continues to develop as a precautionary security mechanism, testing the line between traditional law enforcement and “special” objectives.

ALAFAIR S. BURKE

References and Further Reading

- Dressler, Joshua. Understanding Criminal Procedure, 3rd ed. New York: LexisNexis, 2002, 323–353.
- Stuntz, William J., Implicit Bargains, Government Power, and the Fourth Amendment, Stanford Law Review 44 (1992): 553.
- Sundby, Scott E., Protecting the Citizen “Whilst He Is Quiet”: Suspicionless Searches, “Special Needs” and General Warrants, Mississippi Law Journal 74 (2004): 501.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Camara v. Municipal Court*, 387 U.S. 523 (1967)
- Ferguson v. Charleston*, 532 U.S. 67 (2001)
- New York v. Burger*, 482 U.S. 691 (1987)
- See v. City of Seattle*, 387 U.S. 541 (1967)

See also Airport Searches; Checkpoints (roadblocks); Drug Testing; Probable Cause; Search (General Definition); Search Warrants

ADOLESCENT FAMILY LIFE ACT

In 1981, Congress enacted the Adolescent Family Life Demonstration Grants Act (AFLA) in response to the severe social and economic consequences that often follow pregnancy and childbirth among unmarried adolescents. The enactment of AFLA was also prompted by Congress’s insight that the federal government has a responsibility to help states develop adequate approaches to the serious and increasing problems of adolescent premarital sexual relations and pregnancy.

Among the stated purposes of the AFLA is to find effective means, within the context of the family, of reaching adolescents before they become sexually active in order to promote self-discipline and other prudent approaches to the problem of adolescent premarital sexual relations and to promote adoption as an alternative to abortion. The act further indicates that since the problems of adolescent premarital sexual relations, pregnancy, and parenthood are multiple and complex, such problems are best approached through a variety of integrated and essential services provided to adolescents and their families by other family members, religious and charitable organizations, voluntary organizations, and other groups in the private sector. Furthermore, despite the fact that teenage females had, at the time, a fundamental right to an abortion, grants were to be made only to programs that did not provide abortions, abortion referrals, or abortion counseling.

The only statutory restrictions on the use of AFLA funds are that none of the AFLA grants may be used for projects that provide abortion counseling, and the grants may be made only to projects or programs that do not promote, advocate, or encourage abortion. Furthermore, AFLA funds cannot be used to provide family planning services if such services are available elsewhere in the community.

The grants endorsed by AFLA are given to organizations providing two basic kinds of services: care services and prevention services. Care services, or necessary services for the provision of care to pregnant adolescent parents and adolescent parents, include pregnancy testing; maternity counseling; adoption counseling and referral services; primary and preventive health services, including prenatal and postnatal care; nutrition information and counseling; referral to appropriate pediatric care; referral to maternity home services and mental health services; child-care sufficient to enable the adolescent parent to continue his or her education; consumer education and homemaking; and transportation. Preventive services, or necessary services to prevent adolescent sexual relations, include referral for screening and treatment of venereal disease and educational services relating to family life and problems associated with adolescent premarital sexual relations, including information on adoption, education on the responsibilities of sexuality and parenting, and assistance to parents, schools, youth agencies, and adolescents and preadolescents concerning self-discipline in human sexuality.

The seminal case dealing with AFLA is Bowen v. Kendrick, 108 S. Ct. 2562 (1988). In 1983, this lawsuit against the Secretary was filed in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia by appellees, a group of federal taxpayers, clergymen, and the American Jewish Congress. Seeking declaratory and injunctive relief, appellees challenged the constitutionality of the AFLA on the grounds that, on its face and as applied, the statute violated the religious clauses of the First Amendment. Considering the federal statute on its face and as applied, the District Court ruled that the statute violated the establishment clause of the First Amendment insofar as it provided for the involvement of religious organizations in the federally funded program.

The U.S. Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the AFLA. The Court found that although the AFLA provided for grants to religious and other institutions, it did not have the primary effect of advancing religion. Moreover, the Court found that the AFLA would not lead to excessive government entanglement with religion.

After protracted litigation, the parties reached a settlement agreement on January 19, 1993, which established that AFLA-funded sexuality education may not include religious references, may not be offered in a site used for religious worship services, or offered in sites with religious iconography. Moreover, the agreement established that information disbursed by the AFLA-funded programs must be medically accurate.

The effect of the AFLA on civil rights in American has the potential to restrict or hinder an adolescent's ability to make an informed choice regarding her right to have an abortion. By the language of the act, institutions that receive grants are encouraged to provide information about adoption and implicitly discouraged from providing information dealing with any aspect of the adolescent's right to an abortion. This could particularly affect segments of the population that do not have the requisite financial resources to take their pregnant adolescents to private institutions, but rather must rely on those that receive AFLA grants.

MARIANGELA VALLE-PETERS

References and Further Reading

- Jones, Julie, Money, Sex, and the Religious Right: A Constitutional Analysis of the Federally Funded Abstinence-Only-Until-Marriage Sexuality Education, Creighton Law Review 35(2002): 1075.
- Petrich, Alexandra, Bowen v. Kendrick. Retreat from Prophylaxis in Church and State Relationships, Hastings Constitutional Law Quarterly 16 (1989): 513.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- 42 U.S.C. §300z(a)(5)
42 U.S.C. §300z-1(a)(7)
42 U.S.C. §300z-1(a)(4)
42 U.S.C. §300z-1(a)(8)
42 U.S.C. §300z-1(b)(1)
42 U.S.C. §300z(b)(2)
42 U.S.C. §300z(a)(8)(A)
42 U.S.C. §300z(a)(8)(B)
42 U.S.C. §300z(10)(a)
42 U.S.C. §300z-3(b)(1)
S. Rep. No. 161, 97th Cong., 1st Sess. 20 (1981)
S. Rep. No. 161, 97th Cong., 1st Sess. 4 (1981)

See also Abortion; Bowen v. Kendrick, 487 U.S. 589 (1988)

AFFIRMATIVE ACTION

Affirmative action has emerged as a controversial issue in American political and constitutional discourse. The phrase, which covers a range of meanings, encompasses programs designed to help women and particularly African Americans and other historically disadvantaged minorities.

Affirmative action only became a national preoccupation after the Supreme Court and Congress first took steps in the 1950s and 1960s to outlaw de jure discrimination. Although the Wagner Act of 1935 used the term as a remedy for unfair labor practices, President John F. Kennedy's Executive Order 10925 introduced it into civil rights discourse by directing government contractors to take "affirmative action" to employ persons without regard to "race, creed, color or national origin." This meaning of the concept, which looks to recruitment to expand applicant pools, has proved relatively uncontroversial. Yet, President Lyndon B. Johnson in his June 1965 speech at Howard University implied that more might be required. A second familiar application of affirmative action involves race-conscious decision-making that gives some degree of preference to disadvantaged minorities in college admissions, employment, or government contracting.

This latter use of the concept has proved controversial. Proponents of race-conscious programs argue that they are appropriate vehicles to remedy past discrimination against certain historically disadvantaged minorities and to create opportunity for members of those groups to succeed in America. Some, like John Hart Ely, argued that racial classifications that a white majority used to benefit minorities were of an entirely different character than those used to oppress minorities. Conversely, critics condemn affirmative action as reverse discrimination that unfairly disadvantages members of other groups who may have been innocent of any personal wrongdoing.

As a constitutional matter the issue turns in part on whether one believes that the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment forbids government from drawing racial classifications, in which case race-conscious programs are suspect, or whether it simply forbids subjugation of minority groups, in which case a constitutional distinction might be drawn between benevolent and malevolent racial classifications.

In a series of divided decisions, the Supreme Court has held that race-conscious programs must be subject to strict scrutiny that requires that any race classification be narrowly tailored to serve a compelling state interest. As such, it has refused to distinguish between race classifications that benefit or burden a disadvantaged minority. The Court has rejected redressing past societal discrimination as an interest justifying racial classification.

The Supreme Court's 2003 decisions in Grutter v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 306 (2003), and Gratz v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 244 (2003), addressed race preferences in university admissions. In Grutter, the Court held that diversity is a compelling state interest that justifies considering race as one diversity factor among others in a process that makes an individual judgment in each applicant. The Court deemed racial quotas unconstitutional but allowed schools to use numerical targets to guide decisions. Grutter expanded the diversity rationale by recognizing that it helped create “one nation indivisible.” In Gratz the Court rejected a formulaic approach that awarded a specified number of points to persons based on race.

JOEL K. GOLDSTEIN

References and Further Reading

- Anderson, Terry H. The Pursuit of Fairness: A History of Affirmative Action. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2004.
 Bowen, William G., and Derek Bok. The Shape of the River: Long-Term Consequences of Considering Race in College and University Admissions. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1998.
 Chin, Gabriel J., ed. Affirmative Action and the Constitution, 3 vols. New York: Garland Publishing, Inc., 1998.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Gratz v. Bollinger*, 539 U.S. 244 (2003)
Grutter v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 306 (2003)
Regents of the University of California v. Bakke, 438 U.S. 265 (1978)

See also Equal Protection of Law (XIV); Fourteenth Amendment; Johnson, Lyndon Baines

AGOSTINI v. FELTON, 521 U.S. 203 (1997)

In Agostini v. Felton, the U.S. Supreme Court reversed its 1985 decision in Aguilar v. Felton, 473 U.S. 402 (1985) (and portions of its companion decision in School District of Grand Rapids v. Ball, 473 U.S. 373, 1985), in which the Court had struck down government programs that provided remedial instruction in secular subjects on the grounds of religious schools. The Agostini decision, decided by a five-to-four vote, reflected a shift in the Court’s personnel between 1985 and 1997 and the ongoing modification of the Court’s strong separationist jurisprudence reflected in the two earlier decisions.

In Aguilar, the Court considered the constitutionality of the use of federal funds provided by Title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act (ESEA) to pay the salaries of public school teachers who taught remedial reading and math courses to low-income children attending parochial schools in New York City. The Court in Aguilar ruled in a five-to-four vote that the government’s monitoring of the activities of these publicly funded teachers constituted an excessive entanglement between church and state in violation of the establishment clause.

More than a decade after the Aguilar decision, petitioners filed motions seeking relief from the injunction previously entered in the case that barred the use of publicly funded teachers in the parochial schools of New York City. The petitioners argued that several of the Court’s more recent decisions called into question the ongoing validity of the Aguilar decision, especially the decision in Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills School District, 509 U.S. 1 (1993), in which the Court had refused to presume that a state-funded interpreter working in a religious school would engage in religious indoctrination or constituted a symbolic union of government and religion. The petitioners also noted that five of the Court’s justices had expressed the view in Board of Education, Kiryas Joel Village School District v. Grumet, 512 U.S. 687 (1994), that Aguilar should be reconsidered or overruled.

The Supreme Court took the Agostini case and reversed. Justice Sandra Day O’Connor, who had dissented in the Aguilar case, wrote the opinion for the majority, finding that the provision of remedial instruction in secular subjects by publicly funded teachers did not violate the establishment clause, even if the instruction took place on the grounds of a religious school. In particular, the Court rejected the presumption of the Aguilar decision that a public school teacher who teaches on the property of a religious school is likely to inculcate students with the religious beliefs of that school. The Agostini Court also emphasized that any governmental aid under Title I comes to the religious school “only as a result of the genuinely independent and private choices” of those low-income children (and their parents) who attended a religious school. This “private choice” aspect of the Court’s decision would prove important to the Court in subsequent cases.

The four dissenters sharply criticized the majority’s decision. Justice David Souter, for example, claimed that “there is simply no line that can be drawn between instruction paid for at taxpayers’ expense and the instruction in any subject that is not identified as formally religious.”

The Agostini decision became an important precedent for the Court as it considered additional cases involving other forms of government aid to religious schools that involved private choice. For example, in Zelman v. Simmons-Harris, 536 U.S. 639 (2002), the Court relied heavily on its Agostini decision to uphold the constitutionality of school vouchers.

DAVISON M. DOUGLAS

References and Further Reading

- Bunnow, Jeremy T., Reinventing the Lemon: Agostini v. Felton and the Changing Nature of Establishment Clause Jurisprudence, Wisconsin Law Review (1998): 1133–1180.
- Roberson, Doug, Recent Development: The Supreme Court of the United States, 1996 Term: The Supreme Court's Shifting Tolerance for Public Aid to Parochial Schools and the Implications for Educational Choice: Agostini v. Felton, 117 S. Ct. 1997 (1997), Harvard Journal of Law and Public Policy 21 (1998): 861–879.
- Whitehead, Daniel P., Note: Agostini v. Felton: Rectifying the Chaos of Establishment Clause Jurisprudence, Capital University Law Review 27 (1999): 639–666.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Aguilar v. Felton*, 473 U.S. 402 (1985)
- Board of Education, Kiryas Joel Village School District v. Grumet*, 512 U.S. 687 (1994)
- School District of Grand Rapids v. Ball*, 473 U.S. 373 (1985)
- Witters v. Washington Department of Services*, 474 U.S. 481 (1986)
- Zelman v. Simmons-Harris*, 536 U.S. 639 (2002)
- Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills School District*, 509 U.S. 1 (1993)

See also Establishment Clause (I): History, Background, Framing; State Aid to Religious Schools

AGUILAR v. FELTON, 473 U.S. 402 (1985)

In its 1985 decision in Aguilar v. Felton, the U.S. Supreme Court declared unconstitutional a government program that provided remedial instruction to low-income children attending parochial schools—a decision that reflected the strong separationist jurisprudence adhered to by a narrow majority of the Court's justices during that era.

Throughout the 1970s and early 1980s, the Court decided a large number of cases involving the constitutionality of various types of governmental financial assistance to religious schools. Throughout this time period, the Court assessed the constitutionality of such aid in accord with what was known as the “Lemon test,” drawn from the Court's highly influential decision in Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602 (1971). Under the Lemon test, in order for a governmental aid program to survive scrutiny under the establishment clause, (1) it must have a secular legislative purpose; (2) its principal or primary effect must be one that neither advances nor inhibits religion; and

(3) it must not foster an excessive government entanglement with religion.

In Aguilar v. Felton, the Court determined that the aid program in question violated the third prong of the Lemon test. In this case, New York City used federal funds it received under Title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act (ESEA) to pay, among other things, the salaries of public school teachers who taught remedial reading and math courses to low-income children attending parochial schools in the city. To avoid an establishment clause violation, these teachers taught in special classrooms at the religious schools that were devoid of religious symbols, used secular instructional materials, and were monitored by the city through unannounced visits to make sure that they did not unwittingly inculcate their students with the religious beliefs of the parochial schools during the course of their instruction. The Supreme Court, in a five-to-four decision with Justice William Brennan writing for the majority, found that this monitoring process constituted an excessive entanglement of church and state in violation of the establishment clause.

The same day as the Aguilar decision, the Court decided a similar case involving the constitutionality of a state program in Michigan that also provided remedial instruction to low-income children in parochial schools. In that case, School District of Grand Rapids v. Ball, 473 U.S. 373 (1985), the Court, in another five-to-four decision, found that the aid program had the potential to “impermissibly advance religion” in violation of the second prong of the Lemon test because “the teachers participating in the programs may become involved in intentionally or inadvertently inculcating particular religious tenets or beliefs.”

In a sense, the New York City program provided what was missing from the Michigan program: careful monitoring to make sure that such inculcation did not happen. But in Aguilar, the Court found that the monitoring process, which the Court described as “a permanent and pervasive state presence in the sectarian schools receiving aid,” unduly entangled the government in the activities of the parochial schools in violation of the establishment clause. Therefore, both aid programs—one with governmental monitoring and one without—were unconstitutional. As a result of the Aguilar decision, remedial instruction to low-income parochial school children in New York City continued but at considerable public expense: typically by providing instruction in a publicly provided trailer parked near a parochial school.

The majority's decisions in Aguilar and Ball provoked bitter dissents. Chief Justice Warren Burger, for example, in his Aguilar dissent accused the majority of exhibiting “paranoia” and “nothing less than hostility toward religion and the children who attend church-sponsored schools.” Justice Sandra Day O’Connor labeled the decision “tragic” and ridiculed the majority’s notion that teachers “are likely to start teaching religion because they have walked across the threshold of a parochial school.” She noted that the nineteen-year track record of the Title I program revealed not one instance in which a teacher “attempted to indoctrinate the students in particular religious tenets.”

In some ways, the Aguilar and Ball decisions constituted the “high-water” mark of the Court’s separationist jurisprudence. Thereafter, aided by personnel changes, the Court began to chip away at this jurisprudence and finally, in 1997, reversed the Aguilar and Ball decisions in Agostini v. Felton, 521 U.S. 203 (1997), in which it rejected its earlier presumption that publicly funded teachers of remedial reading and math in religious schools would inculcate their students with religious values.

DAVISON M. DOUGLAS

References and Further Reading

- Roberson, Doug, Recent Development: The Supreme Court of the United States, 1996 Term: The Supreme Court’s Shifting Tolerance for Public Aid to Parochial Schools and the Implications for Educational Choice: Agostini v. Felton, 117 S.Ct. 1997 (1997), Harvard Journal of Law and Public Policy 21 (1998): 861–879.
- Whitehead, Daniel P., Note: Agostini v. Felton: Rectifying the Chaos of Establishment Clause Jurisprudence, Capital University Law Review 27 (1999): 639–666.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Agostini v. Felton*, 521 U.S. 203 (1997)
- Lemon v. Kurtzman*, 403 U.S. 602 (1971)
- School District of Grand Rapids v. Ball*, 473 U.S. 373 (1985)

See also Burger, Warren E.; Establishment Clause (I): History, Background, Framing; Lemon Test; State Aid to Religious Schools

AIRPORT SEARCHES

Airplane piracy increased in occurrence and success in the 1960s, leading to the creation of a 1968 task force that developed a hijacker detection and deterrence system. The system included severe penalties for air piracy, notices to passengers of the possibility of a preboarding search, the use of a hijacker profile to identify “selectees” for further investigation, magnetometer searches, interviews with selected passengers, and frisks or searches of suspected passengers. As the program was originally crafted, passengers who triggered the magnetometer were only searched if they also were selected under the profile and could not provide sufficient identification. As a result of the government’s role in requiring the search and specifying its nature, courts concluded that airport searches, even when performed by privately employed guards, are subject to the Fourth Amendment. In United States v. Lopez, 328 F. Supp. 1077 (E.D.N.Y. 1971), a court relied upon the then recently decided opinion in Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968), to deem these initial passenger searches reasonable.

In 1973, the government expanded air piracy prevention efforts by requiring electronic screening of all passengers and their carry-on items. Passengers were subject to heightened screening if they exhibited suspicious behavior or triggered the magnetometer. While subject to the Fourth Amendment, the screening did not require a warrant on account of the extreme risk presented by passengers with weapons; because advanced warning of the search was given; because the search applied to all passengers and generally lacked stigma; and because the search occurred before other passengers and airline employees, thus reducing the risk of police wrongdoing. In United States v. Davis, 483 F.2d 893 (9th Cir. 1973), a court determined that the new scheme was reasonable and fell under the administrative search exception to the Fourth Amendment, provided that an individual could avoid the screening by not boarding the plane. Furthermore, the screening would be unreasonable if the administrative purpose of preventing air piracy was “distorted” by other general law-enforcement objectives, such as drug interdiction or searches for large amounts of currency.

Outside the boarding context, law enforcement agents accost individuals for an investigatory stop based on “drug courier” profiling. Such profiles alone do not grant police justification to engage in an investigatory stop. However, critics have argued that the courts have effectively allowed the profiles to justify a stop. David Cole, in No Equal Justice, argued that the “drug courier profile is a scattershot hodgepodge of traits and characteristics so expansive that it potentially justifies stopping anybody and everybody.”

The 9/11 event and the War on Terrorism focused public attention on the need to prevent air piracy, especially because the security regulations in place did not prohibit passenger possession of the box cutters and small knives used to hijack the four planes. Shortly after the attacks, the American Civil Liberties Union changed its 1973 position that the use of magnetometers violated the Fourth Amendment. The Department of Homeland Security assumed responsibility for passenger screening and implemented plans for the Enhanced Computer Assisted Passenger Prescreening System, a program to identify risky passengers, who are then subjected to heightened screening and interviews.

The agency considered a “trusted traveler” system, in which prescreened passengers could avoid the most intense screening. Checked baggage is now matched to passengers and removed from the plane if the passenger fails to board. Additionally, checked baggage is subjected to random electronic and hand searches, and dog sniffs. At times of high terrorism risk as determined by the agency, vehicles approaching airports can be subject to search as well.

CHRIS JAY HOOFNAGLE

References and Further Reading

- Airline Passenger Security Screening: New Technologies and Implementation Issues*. National Materials Advisory Board, National Academies Press, 1996.
- Becton, Charles L., The Drug Courier Profile: All Seems Infected That Th' Infected Spy, As All Looks Yellow to the Jaundic'd Eye, N.C.L. Rev. 65 (1987): 417.
- Brill, Steven. After, the Rebuilding and Defending of America in the September 12 Era. New York: Simon & Schuster, 2003.
- Cole, David. No Equal Justice, Race and Class in the American Criminal Justice System. New York: The New Press, 1999.
- LaFave, Wayne R. Search and Seizure, a Treatise on the Fourth Amendment, 3rd ed. St. Paul, MN: West Group 1996.
- United States v. Davis*, 482 F.2d 893 (9th Cir. Cal. 1973).
- United States v. Lopez*, 328 F. Supp. 1077 (E.D.N.Y. 1971).

Cases and Statutes Cited

- United States v. Davis*, 483 F.2d 893 (9th Cir. 1973) (Government's role in airport searches is dominant, subjecting such searches to the Fourth Amendment.)
- United States v. Lopez*, 328 F. Supp. 1077 (E.D.N.Y. 1971) (Initial passenger screening system is valid until Terry standard.)

See also Administrative Searches and Seizures; American Civil Liberties Union; Department of Homeland Security; Electronic Surveillance, Technological Monitoring and Dog Sniff; 9/11 and the War on Terrorism; Profiling (including DWB); Right to Travel; Search (General Definition); Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968); Warrantless Searches

AKRON v. AKRON CENTER FOR REPRODUCTIVE HEALTH, 462 U.S. 416 (1983)

After the 1973 decision of Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), a myriad of legislative responses to Roe held that the right of privacy encompasses a woman's right to decide whether to terminate her pregnancy. In these responses the states were attempting to determine which restrictions on and regulations of abortion were constitutionally valid. A February 1978 abortion ordinance passed by the city of Akron, Ohio, was part of this wave of legislative responses. The ordinance contained seventeen provisions, five of which were at issue in Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health. The Court, with three justices dissenting, found that all five of the provisions at issue were unconstitutional. In doing so the Court reiterated that a woman's right to an abortion is not unqualified; however, restrictive state regulations of a woman's right to choose must be supported by a compelling state interest.

The first provision of the ordinance that the Court addressed provided that abortions performed after the first trimester of pregnancy must be performed in a hospital. In finding the provision to be unconstitutional, the Court reaffirmed Roe's recognition of the state's interest in a woman's health. Thus, at the end of the second trimester, the state may regulate the abortion procedure if the regulation reasonably relates to the preservation and protection of maternal health. In this case, however, the hospital requirement imposed a heavy and unnecessary burden on a woman's access to an abortion; thus, the city failed to demonstrate a compelling interest.

The requirement was heavy because an abortion at a hospital would cost twice as much as at a clinic and because the woman might need to travel to find a hospital that would perform the abortion. The requirement was unnecessary because current medical knowledge indicates that second trimester abortions have become substantially safer. Furthermore, medical evidence indicates that second trimester abortions can be performed safely in outpatient clinics.

The second provision of concern to the Court was that a physician must obtain the informed written consent of one of the parents of a minor below the age of fifteen. In reviewing this provision, the Court acknowledged that the state has an interest in encouraging parental involvement in their minor child's decision to have an abortion. However, it found the consent provision in the ordinance to be unconstitutional because, contrary to the Court's holding in Bellotti v. Baird (Bellotti II), 443 U.S. 622, 1979), the ordinance did not create any procedures for allowing a minor to avoid the consent requirement.

The third provision required an attending physician to make certain specified statements to the patient and/or her parent (if parental consent was required) to ensure that the consent for the abortion was truly informed. In considering this provision, the Court reaffirmed its previous holding in Planned Parenthood of Central Mo. v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52 (1976), that a state could constitutionally require a woman to certify in writing her consent to the abortion and that her consent is informed and freely given. However, the Court found that it was the responsibility of the patient's physician to ensure that appropriate information was relayed to enable her to give informed consent. The state may not decide what information a woman must be given before she chooses to have an abortion. Furthermore, much of the information required to be given by the Akron ordinance was not designed to inform the woman, but rather to persuade her to carry the fetus to term.

In the fourth provision, a twenty-four-hour waiting period was mandated between the signing of the consent form and the performance of the abortion. The Court found that Akron failed to demonstrate that any legitimate state interest was furthered by an arbitrary and inflexible waiting period. There was no evidence that a waiting period would allow the abortion to be performed more safely or that the state's interest in the woman giving informed consent was reasonably served by the delay.

Finally, the fifth provision required that the fetal remains be disposed of in a humane and sanitary manner. The city of Akron contended that it enacted the provision to prevent the dumping of aborted fetuses on garbage piles. However, the Court found that there was uncertainty as to whether the provision had such limited intent. It was possible to interpret the statute as requiring that a decent burial be given to an embryo. The Court found that this uncertainty caused the provision to violate the due process clause in that the provision failed to give the physician the required fair notice as to what conduct was prohibited.

Although Akron answered a number of questions regarding the type of abortion regulations that a state could enact, it left a number of questions unanswered that would be the subject of subsequent abortion litigation.

JANET W. STEVERSON

Cases and Statutes Cited

Bellotti v. Baird, 443 U.S. 622 (1979)
Planned Parenthood of Central Mo. v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52 (1976)
Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)
 See also Abortion; Planned Parenthood of Missouri v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52 (1976); Reproductive Freedom; Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)

ALCORTA v. TEXAS, 355 U.S. 28 (1957)

In Alcorta, the Supreme Court held that the Fourteenth Amendment due process clause bars prosecutors from knowingly presenting perjured testimony in a criminal case.

Alcorta stabbed his wife to death after finding her in a parked car with another man, Castilleja. Charged with murder, Alcorta claimed that he should be convicted of a lesser offense because he acted in the heat of passion after seeing his wife kissing Castilleja. At Alcorta's trial, Castilleja testified that his relationship with Alcorta's wife was nothing more than a casual friendship, and Alcorta was convicted of murder. After the conviction, however, Castilleja admitted that he had been engaged in a sexual relationship with Alcorta's wife and that the prosecutor had told him not to volunteer any information about that sexual relationship.

After the state courts refused to order a new trial, Alcorta appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court, which unanimously reversed. The Court observed that Castilleja's testimony gave the false impression that his relationship with Alcorta's wife was mere friendship and thereby refuted Alcorta's claim that he acted passionately after seeing his wife kissing Castilleja. Since the prosecutor knew Castilleja's testimony was false, the Court concluded that Alcorta had been denied due process. The Court's emphasis on the prosecutor's duty to avoid presenting perjured testimony, later clarified and expanded in Napue v. Illinois, 360 U.S. 264 (1959), laid the groundwork for later cases, such as Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963), and Kyles v. Whitley, 514 U.S. 419 (1995), which required the prosecution to disclose evidence favorable to the defendant.

DAVID A. MORAN

References and Further Reading

Imwinkelried, Edwin, and Norman Garland. Exculpatory Evidence, 2nd ed. Charlottesville, VA: Michie Publications, 1996.
 Stacy, Tom, The Search for Truth in Constitutional Criminal Procedure, Columbia Law Review 91 (1991): 1369.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963)
Kyles v. Whitley, 514 U.S. 419 (1995)
Napue v. Illinois, 360 U.S. 264 (1959)
 See also Brady v. Maryland*, 373 U.S. 83 (1963); Due Process; Fourteenth Amendment; Kyles v. Whitley, 514 U.S. 419 (1995); Napue v. Illinois, 360 U.S. 264 (1959)

ALIEN AND SEDITION ACTS (1798)

Sedition may be defined as any illegal action tending to cause the disruption or overthrow of the government. In the Anglo-Saxon legal tradition, the concept of seditious libel (libel generally meaning any statement injurious of reputation) goes back to 1275, when an English statute outlawed falsehoods creating discord between the king and the people. By the early seventeenth century, English courts began to hold that even true libels could be criminally punished, since the truth of injurious statements made it much more difficult for the government to undo their harm. It became something of a maxim of English law that “the greater the truth the greater the libel.”

Such statements are particularly troubling in wartime when the existence of the nation may be threatened, forcing consideration of certain fundamental and enduring questions of civil liberty. Is dissent the equivalent of disloyalty? May national security concerns justify silencing dissent? What if partisans exploit the crisis to suppress legitimate criticism of government? Who will protect valued civil liberties in such turbulent times?

These questions run throughout American history and law. The nation first confronted them in the earliest years of the republic. Abuses of civil liberties occurred, but the more enduring legacy of this troubled period remains one of the great achievements of American constitutionalism.

Background: Faction and Xenophobia

Many of the Founders were suspicious of political parties, finding their “factionalism” contrary to republican government’s search for a common interest. By Washington’s second term, however, two parties were alive and well; they originated in the positions taken by the main supporters and opponents of the 1787 Constitution: Federalists and Anti-Federalists, respectively.

One group had coalesced around Alexander Hamilton and called themselves Federalists; the other group, led by James Madison and Thomas Jefferson, called themselves Republicans. More telling perhaps is what they called each other: Republicans characterized their opponents as monarchists or Tories, and Federalists saw their opponents as Jacobins (the twentieth century equivalent would be “Bolsheviks”) given to “licentiousness” and radical democracy instead of republicanism.

The Federalists generally represented mercantile, shipping, and financial interests, and some at least (most notably Hamilton) could even be characterized as cryptomonarchists. Republicans distrusted executive power, felt that the people had too little power, and opposed restrictions on the liberty of the press. Federalists took opposite positions, and perhaps nowhere was the contrast more stark than about the question of political opposition. Federalists tended to deny the legitimacy of such opposition, contemptuously described as “faction.” The term was Madison’s, although by the 1790s Madison had come to believe that the evils of parties could be mitigated—most notably by promoting political equality to prevent any group from exerting influence beyond its numbers.

Perhaps the most significant difference was that Republicans tended to support the French Revolution, while Federalists had become bitterly hostile to it and thoroughly distrustful of France and its growing influence on the continent. Federalists wanted to strengthen ties with England. Republicans, though not unmindful of the dangers posed by France, considered British monarchism a far greater threat to the young republic.

By 1792, the French Revolution had sparked an international war, and the European nations opposing France sought to rid themselves of domestic pro-French elements (as well as any lingering reformers, republicans, or radicals). Many of these refugees fled to the neutral United States. Federalists saw in their ranks the democratic “disorganizers” that Federalists so dreaded.

In 1793, President Washington proclaimed American neutrality between France and England, incurring the wrath of both countries. The Jay Treaty of 1794 calmed Anglo-American relations, but the French only became more belligerent, launching a campaign against American shipping. (Between June 1796 and June 1797, some 316 American ships had been seized.)

The election of 1796 brought the Federalist John Adams to the presidency; Adams narrowly defeated the leader of the Republican Party, Thomas Jefferson (who under the constitutional provision then in effect became vice-president). This first contested presidential election in American history exacerbated already sharp political divisions.

Among the feared immigrants from Europe, none proved more obnoxious to the Adams administration than the Irish. In 1798, Ireland was in revolt against the British, who responded with military repression. Many Irish patriots came to the United States to avoid lengthy prison terms or the hangman. They brought with them considerable political experience and a taste for democracy coupled with a distrust of constituted authority that quickly drew them into the ranks of the Republicans. (In fairness, it should be noted that some of these refugees, particularly the aristocratic immigrants from France, were seen as threatening Republican principles.)

Meanwhile, France had not only repelled a coalition of invaders led by England but also had seized Belgium, the Rhineland, and the Italian peninsula and was threatening to invade England. In America, anti-French sentiment was enflamed by the XYZ Affair, a clumsy attempt by agents of the French foreign minister to solicit a bribe from the United States in return for further negotiations. When the administration allowed the details to be made public, in 1798, Americans were outraged at the gall of the French. Adams, riding a wave of patriotic fervor, placed the country on a war footing without ever asking for a declaration of war. Thus began America's "half war" with France.

The rancor between Federalists and Republicans came to a head in the spring of 1798 when Congress debated the President's proposed defense measures. The arguments, heard for the first time in American history, have recurred in different contexts and with different enemies up to and including the War on Terrorism. The Republicans felt Adams was overreacting to the alleged threat. The Federalists raised the specter of French invasion, abetted by French sympathizers, spies, and enemy aliens who would undermine the country's defenses (marking the first but by no means the last time that American political discourse would center on the fear of internal subversion). Ignoring the line between dissent and treason, the Federalists accused the Republicans of disloyalty or worse.

The charges of the Federalists in Congress were taken up by several of the leading Federalist newspapers, branding the Republicans as "traitors." President Adams lambasted the Republicans for supporting policies that "would sink the glory of our country and prostrate her liberties at the feet of France."

The legislative program that the Federalists would soon enact was undoubtedly meant to respond to the threat of France. But Federalists also hoped that, by becoming the party of American patriotism, they might wound, perhaps mortally, the Republican Party as well.

The Alien Acts

In times of threat from foreign powers, suspicions immediately turn to the foreigners within: resident aliens, especially enemy aliens (natives of the nation that has become the enemy). Well before the "half war," Federalists were convinced that the greatest internal danger the country faced was the wave of foreigners—especially French, Irish, and German—who had come to America between 1790 and 1798. They were in a sense doubly dangerous: potential traitors and a source of votes for Republicans.

Congress initially attempted to reduce or even end the flow of aliens being admitted to U.S. citizenship and to prevent all foreign-born persons from voting or holding federal office. The proposal was defeated by a two-to-one majority. Ultimately, Congress enacted (though by single-vote margins in House and Senate) the Naturalization Act of June 18, 1798, which extended the period of residence required for naturalization from five years to fourteen—the longest in American history. While immigrants could vote because voter qualifications were set by the states, the Naturalization Act (repealed by the Republicans in 1802) prevented them from holding federal office until they became citizens and discouraged further immigration.

The more extreme Federalists now hoped to enact a law granting sweeping powers to the executive branch to deal with every variety of threats (from actual plots to seditious speech) from aliens and native citizens. But highly effective opposition from Albert Gallatin, a Republican leader in Congress, as well as some doubters within the ranks of the Federalists, led eventually to three separate pieces of legislation.

The Alien Enemies Act of July 6, 1798 gave the President authority—but only in the face of war or invasion—to identify citizens or subjects of a hostile nation residing in the United States and to apprehend, restrain, or remove them according to procedures in the act. This law was never used because open war with France never occurred. The approach embodied in this act has remained a part of American wartime policy to the present and arguably represents a reasonable concern about the potential for enemy aliens to act as spies or saboteurs.

On June 25, 1798, Congress approved the Alien Friends Act. It applied to all aliens, enemy or not, in times of peace or of war. Its provisions allowed the President to expel any non-naturalized foreign-born person judged by the President to be a threat to the "peace and safety" of the United States. This could be done without a hearing and without any statement of the President's reasons. Individuals who did not leave the United States within a specified time period could be imprisoned for up to three years and permanently denied American citizenship. While they were not immediately apparent, there were free speech implications to the act, since, as Geoffrey R. Stone notes in Perilous Times, "judgments about a person's 'dangerousness' are often predicated upon his expression, beliefs, and associations." But President Adams interpreted the act extremely narrowly; no one was deported under its provisions and it expired in June 1800.

Inevitably, though, such a fundamental assault on due process rights, right to counsel, and independent judicial review had its effects. Many French immigrants left the country, and few tried to enter. Those who remained (especially French and Irish) went to great pains to avoid public attention, and feelings of paranoia and suspicion were widespread.

Sedition Act: Theory

By far the most notorious piece of legislation introduced by the Federalists was the Sedition Act of July 14, 1798. The law made it a crime to utter or publish “any false, scandalous, and malicious writing or writings against the Government of the United States, or either House of the Congress . . . with intent to defame . . . or to bring them . . . into contempt or disrepute . . .” Punishment was a fine (up to $2000—the 2004 equivalent of $30,000) and prison up to two years. (The blatantly political motivation behind this legislation is well illustrated by the fact that the vice-president, the Republican Thomas Jefferson, was not included in the act’s coverage.)

The Sedition Act of 1798 is widely considered the first great clash between political liberties and the needs of national security in American history. Yet, as early as 1794 the Federalists had made a concerted effort to question the legitimacy of political criticism of the government by attacking the Democratic-Republican societies, groups of voluntary associations sharply critical of Federalist policy. From the Federalist perspective, these societies were illegitimate because their speech tended to foment insurrection and to undermine representative government. The Republicans, of course, insisted on the right of private citizens to organize and to criticize the actions of elected officials.

These same lines of debate surfaced in 1798, but now the Federalists were determined to pass legislation and to prosecute its violators. Given Federalist control of both houses of Congress and the presidency, even the strongest Republican arguments proved unavailing.

There is value in exploring the theoretical underpinnings of the arguments both sides presented in Congress and in the press, especially since the Federalists’ arguments were ultimately rejected wholeheartedly by the public and our political and legal process. The enactment of the Sedition Act, and subsequent prosecutions (discussed in the next section), proved a Pyrrhic victory indeed and constituted a major factor in the decisive electoral defeat of the Federalists in the election of 1800.

While there were certainly public policy reasons for supporting or opposing the Sedition Act, much of the discussion centered on two essential constitutional issues:

How could a government of enumerated powers enact a law touching on seditious speech, given the absence of any such power in the text of the Constitution and what would appear to be a specific prohibition on such a law, that is, the First Amendment?

Was the law an infringement on the powers of the states, given that libel laws had traditionally been considered the exclusive concern of states and thus reserved to them by implication and by the specific text of the Tenth Amendment?

With respect to the first question, the Federalists argued that such a power in the national government could be inferred as a matter of self-preservation. All governments have a right to protect themselves from activities that might lead to their destruction. As far as the First Amendment went, the Federalists in turn argued that it did not go very far. They echoed an interpretation of English law given by William Blackstone, who argued that in England freedom of the press meant freedom from prior restraints (in essence, no governmental censorship prior to publication), but not freedom from punishment if the speech or publication proved to be criminal. For the Federalists, the First Amendment did not overturn English common law.

Instead, Republicans began to expand upon a crucial insight—the indispensability of free expression to the political process, especially one that saw governors as the servants of the people and thus subject to the people’s scrutiny and criticism. To the Federalists, this was dangerous Jacobinism and mob rule undermining the policies of the enlightened ruling elite.

On the issue of state vs. federal power over sedition, the most famous statement of the Republican position came not in the congressional debates but in the Kentucky and Virginia Resolutions (drafted secretly by Thomas Jefferson and James Madison) passed by those state legislatures in the fall of 1798. The resolutions’ essential argument was that the Constitution is a compact entered into by sovereign states. The federal government was limited to certain enumerated powers, and if the federal government exceeded its powers, states retained authority to protect their rights by declaring the federal action void and unenforceable. Here, the federal government had clearly exceeded its powers, since there is no enumerated power over seditious speech; there is, instead, a clear prohibition on such legislation—the First Amendment.

Sedition Act: Practice

The enmity and rancor that marked these debates continued in the prosecutions brought under the Sedition Act. The role of Grand Inquisitor was assumed by Secretary of State Thomas Pickering, one of the most extreme of the Federalists.

Seventeen indictments for seditious libel were issued; all but three were under the Sedition Act and the remaining ones were based on the common law. Pickering led the charge, mindful of the upcoming presidential election of 1800 and determined to muzzle the leading Republican newspapers. He brought charges against four of the five most important Republican newspapers as well as some lesser ones. Because of these prosecutions, two newspapers closed forever and others were forced to suspend publication until their editors were released from jail.

In the period from July 1798 until the act expired (on March 3, 1801—the last day of the Adams administration), twenty-five prominent Republicans were arrested under the act; fifteen of these arrests led to indictments and ten cases went to trial. Each resulted in a conviction. Several of the trials were presided over by Supreme Court Justice Samuel Chase (in his capacity as circuit judge) with a degree of partisan judicial improprieties not seen before in an American court and referred to as “Chase’s Bloody Circuit.” Other Federalist judges were almost as bad.

In November 1799, Adams sent a peace mission to Paris and gradually America’s fear of Jacobinism began to dissipate. In the 1800 election, Jefferson won seventy-three electoral votes and Adams sixty-five. Republicans took control of the House by a margin of sixty-five to forty-one. The death knell of the Federalist Party was being sounded. Indeed, Republicans would dominate national politics for the next quarter-century.

In one of his first official acts as president, Jefferson pardoned all those who had been convicted under the Sedition Act and ordered the release of those still in jail, commenting, as quoted by Geoffrey R. Stone, that in his view the Sedition Act was a “nullity as absolute and as palpable as if Congress had ordered us to fall down and worship a golden image.”

On July 4, 1840, Congress ordered the repayment, with interest, of all fines paid under the Sedition Act. The congressional committee report in favor of the repayment legislation said that the act was an ill-judged exercise of power, was null and void, and that its unconstitutionality had been “conclusively settled.”

Lessons and Legacy

Public opinion, the “revolution of 1800” (as Jefferson described that election), the judgment of history, and the evolution of First Amendment law all contributed to the conclusive settlement of the unconstitutionality of the Sedition Act. In its landmark 1964 decision, New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964), the Supreme Court for the first time in the country’s history held public officials to First Amendment standards when they brought libel actions against critics of their official conduct. In the course of his opinion for the Court, Justice William J. Brennan spoke of a “profound national commitment to the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open” and that such debate might include “vehement, caustic, and sometimes unpleasantly sharp attacks on government and public officials.” He described the Sedition Act and the controversy it aroused as “first crystalliz[ing] a national awareness of the central meaning of the First Amendment.” He noted that the Sedition Act had never been tested in the Supreme Court, but that “the court of history” clearly found it wanting.

In defending the act, Federalists celebrated it as an improvement over the English law of seditious libel because, unlike in England, the American version made malicious intent an essential element of the crime, made truth of the libel a defense, and provided that the jury rather than the judge determine an utterance’s seditious tendency. Republicans found little consolation in these “liberalizing” elements, foreseeing (correctly) that juries would reflect popular hysteria even more than judges and that most of the statements prosecuted under the act would involve opinions rather than provable facts. The notion of a false political opinion is profoundly inconsistent with the First Amendment, and in 1974 in Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323 (1974), the Supreme Court agreed: “under the First Amendment there is no such thing as a false idea.”

Political debate must indeed be vigorous, caustic, and spirited. Dissent about government policies is not the same as disloyalty. Punishing allegedly false political opinions is fundamentally incompatible with the First Amendment. These lessons of America’s initial experience with seditious libel prosecutions were eloquently articulated by Jefferson in his 1801 inaugural address:

Every difference of opinion is not a difference of principle We are all republicans—we are all federalists If there be any among us who would wish to dissolve this Union or to change its republican form, let them stand undisturbed as monuments of the safety with which error of opinion may be tolerated where reason is left free to combat it.

PHILIP A. DYNIA

References and Further Reading

- Chesney, Robert M., Democratic–Republican Societies, Subversion, and the Limits of Legitimate Political Dissent in the Early Republic, North Carolina Law Review 82 (June 2004): 1525–1579.
- Curtis, Michael Kent. Free Speech, “The People’s Darling Privilege.” Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 2000.
- Elkins, Stanley, and Eric McKittrick. The Age of Federalism. New York: Oxford University Press, 1993.
- Smith, James Morton. Freedom’s Fetters. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1956.
- Stone, Geoffrey R. Perilous Times: Free Speech in Wartime. New York: W.W. Norton and Company, 2004.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc.*, 418 U.S. 323 (1974)
- New York Times Co. v. Sullivan*, 376 U.S. 254 (1964)
- Alien Enemies Act*, Act of July 6, 1798, 1 Stat. 577 (1798)
- Alien Friends Act*, Act of June 25, 1798, 1 Stat. 570 (1798)
- Naturalization Act*, Act of June 18, 1798, 1 Stat. 566 (1798)
- Sedition Act*, Act of July 14, 1798, 1 Stat. 596 (1798)

See also Aliens, Civil Liberties of; Bache, Benjamin Franklin; Blackstone and Common-Law Prohibition on Prior Restraints; Due Process in Immigration; Franklin, Benjamin; Freedom of Speech and Press: Nineteenth Century; Freedom of Speech and Press under the Constitution: Early History (1791–1917); Non-U.S. Citizens Civil Liberties; Philosophy and Theory of Freedom of Expression; Ratification Debate, Civil Liberties in; Theories of Civil Liberties; Zenger Trial (1735)

ALIENS, CIVIL LIBERTIES OF

The extent to which the Constitution’s Bill of Rights and other political freedoms are enjoyed by noncitizens is a question that has existed since the founding of the United States. Even prior to the ratification of the Bill of Rights, the Constitution’s text distinguished between citizens of the United States and noncitizens, suggesting that the framers intended differential treatment between the groups, at the very least when it limited several federal offices to citizens. Arguably, the two most important differences wrought by citizenship status are the inability of noncitizens to vote and the fact that noncitizens are subject to exclusion and deportation.

Limits on other civil rights—such as the freedom of speech and the free exercise of religion—can be best understood by appreciating the limits on the voting rights of, and the exclusive application of immigration laws to, noncitizens. First, because noncitizens do not enjoy the right to vote, they rely upon citizens to protect their political interests, thereby limiting their ability to secure their rights. Second, because noncitizens are subject to exclusion and deportation under immigration law, their ability to exercise their civil rights in the United States may effectively be denied by removing them to their home countries. Finally, it should be noted that within the group of noncitizens, American constitutional and statutory law generally affords greater liberty and protection to lawful long-term residents than to temporary visitors or undocumented migrants.

The debate over the citizen–noncitizen divide with respect to civil liberties focuses on balancing the desire to preserve the exclusivity of citizenship as a status that ensures a person’s full membership in a polity against the recognition that noncitizens are human beings deserving of a basic level of dignity and liberty. The nation’s first test of the divide came with the passage of the Alien and Sedition Act of 1798. Because it permitted the president exclusive power to deport suspicious noncitizens without being subject to judicial oversight, the act pitted those committed to ensuring that noncitizens be provided the same due-process protections afforded citizens against those who believed the Constitution was created solely for the benefit of U.S. citizens.

On the one hand, Thomas Jefferson, James Madison, and other Democratic–Republicans saw the act as unconstitutionally depriving noncitizens due process of law by failing to subject their executive deportations to procedural check. On the other, Hamiltonian Federalists argued that foreign nationals were not parties to the Constitution, were not its beneficiaries, and therefore could claim no rights under it. In Chae Chan Ping v. United States, 130 U.S. 581 (1889), the Supreme Court sided with the Federalists by recognizing the plenary power of the federal political branches over immigration and noncitizens, citing a nation’s decision to deny entry to a noncitizen as incident to its sovereignty.

Analogously, current Supreme Court jurisprudence recognizes few constitutional due-process and equal-protection limits to federal immigration power, but generally places strict restrictions on the states’ powers to discriminate against noncitizens residing in the United States. Over time, the Supreme Court has reaffirmed Congress’s plenary power over immigration decisions to exclude or deport noncitizens, but has also stated that noncitizens legally within the United States were entitled to a rational-basis review of federal legislation that draws alienage distinctions. Because states do not possess Congress's plenary power over immigration law, in contrast, the Court has subjected state laws that discriminate against noncitizens to strict review. The Constitution's Article VI supremacy clause also provides textual support for the idea that where the federal government has chosen to regulate a field exclusively, as it has with immigration law, then contrary state laws are preempted by the federal, rendering the former unconstitutional.

Thus, while in Mathews v. Diaz, 426 U.S. 67 (1976), the Court upheld a federal law limiting the grant of Medicaid benefits only to certain noncitizens, in Graham v. Richardson, 403 U.S. 65 (1971), the Court struck down state laws limiting public benefits to certain individuals based on citizenship. The Court's protection of noncitizens against state discrimination has extended to undocumented immigrants. In Plyler v. Doe, 457 U.S. 202 (1982), the Court struck down a Texas law that denied free public education to the children of undocumented migrants. The sole exception that the Court has recognized is that a state may limit certain occupations to U.S. citizens when the jobs involved go to the heart of democratic government, as in the case of state troopers (Foley v. Connelie, 435 U.S. 291, 1978) and public school teachers (Ambach v. Norwick, 441 U.S. 68, 1979).

Aside from protecting foreign nationals by employing this federal-state divide in its constitutional alienage jurisprudence, the Court has sometimes chosen to avoid interpreting the constitutionality of a federal immigration act altogether, presumably because it believes its hands are tied by the plenary power or preemption doctrines. Instead, the Court has relied on liberal interpretations of ostensibly anti-immigrant legislation, choosing to uphold and affirm the foreigner's humanity through the approval of the legislation at issue.

Thus, in Woodby v. Immigration and Naturalization Service, 385 U.S. 276 (1966), the Court held that the government must prove a noncitizen's deportability subject to a "clear, unequivocal, and convincing evidence" standard, which is more stringent than the "preponderance of the evidence" norm generally used in civil cases, of which deportation proceedings are a kind. Although not based on its interpretation of the Constitution, the Woodby court's embrace of a standard more protective of noncitizen rights suggests that the judiciary's willingness to cross Congress's constitutionally approved plenary power over noncitizens and immigration when the Court believes some fundamental personhood norm might be violated, even if the challenged statute's language might suggest a stricter reading.

VICTOR C. ROMERO

References and Further Reading

- Cole, David. Enemy Aliens: Double Standards and Constitutional Freedoms in the War on Terrorism. New York: New Press, 2003.
- Johnson, Kevin R. The "Huddled Masses" Myth: Immigration and Civil Rights. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 2004.
- Motomura, Hiroshi, Immigration Law After a Century of Plenary Power: Phantom Constitutional Norms and Statutory Interpretation, Yale Law Journal 100 (1990): 545–613.
- Neuman, Gerald L. Strangers to the Constitution: Immigrants, Borders, and Fundamental Law. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1996.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Ambach v. Norwick*, 441 U.S. 68 (1979)
- Chae Chan Ping v. United States*, 130 U.S. 581 (1889)
- Foley v. Connelie*, 435 U.S. 291 (1978)
- Graham v. Richardson*, 403 U.S. 65 (1971)
- Mathews v. Diaz*, 426 U.S. 67 (1976)
- Plyler v. Doe*, 457 U.S. 202 (1982)
- Woodby v. Immigration and Naturalization Service*, 385 U.S. 276 (1966)

See also Citizenship; Equal Protection of Law (XIV)

COUNTY OF ALLEGHENY v. ACLU, 492 U.S. 573 (1989)

In the mid-1980s, the Supreme Court first considered the constitutionality of religious holiday displays in Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668 (1984), involving a city's display of a nativity scene among other symbols of the Christmas holiday. There, a sharply divided Court upheld the display, concluding that the nativity scene, when accompanied by other, secular holiday symbols, had neither the purpose nor the effect of advancing religion and did not amount to an excessive entanglement between government and religion. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor concurred separately, suggesting that the appropriate inquiry was whether the city's action had the purpose or effect of endorsing religion. Unconstitutional endorsements of religion, according to her analysis, sent messages to those not adhering to the favored religion that they were outsiders and less than full members of the political community. In a series of concurrences in establishment clause cases following Lynch, O'Connor continued to argue for use of the no-endorsement test. County of Allegheny is significant because it was the first case in which an opinion for the Court articulated a decision in terms of O'Connor's test.

In County of Allegheny v. ACLU, the Court revisited the issue of religious holiday displays. The case presented the Court with two different displays. The first display included a nativity scene bearing a banner proclaiming "Gloria in Excelsis Deo!" located on the grand staircase of a county courthouse. The display was surrounded by a fence, with poinsettias eventually placed in front of the fence and small evergreen trees, with red bows, stationed at the ends of the fence. A small sign informed observers that the display had been donated by a Roman Catholic organization.

Announcing the judgment of the Court, Justice Harry Blackmun, applying the no-endorsement test, concluded that the display of the nativity scene was unconstitutional since it had the effect of endorsing religion. Blackmun noted that, unlike the nativity scene in Lynch, the nativity scene in the courthouse was not accompanied by other holiday emblems or symbols that might have detracted from the religious message of the scene. The poinsettias and small evergreens did not have this effect. Accordingly, he concluded, the effect of this display was one of endorsing the Christian message associated with the nativity scene.

The second display consisted of a 45-foot high Christmas tree outside one of Pittsburgh's public buildings, at the foot of which was a sign with the mayor's name titled "Salute to Liberty." Under the title the sign contained a holiday message saluting liberty and reminding observers of their "legacy of freedom." An 18-foot menorah, a symbol of the Jewish holiday Chanukah, stood beside the Christmas tree. Justice Blackmun concluded that this display did not violate the establishment clause, since its multiple symbols—partially Christian, partially Jewish, and partially secular—did not collectively convey an endorsement of Christianity and Judaism, but simply recognition of cultural diversity. Justice O'Connor concurred with both results.

Justice Kennedy, joined by Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justices White and Scalia, partially dissenting and partially concurring, concluded that both displays were constitutional. He argued that the Establishment Clause permitted "some latitude in recognizing and accommodating the central role religion plays in our society" and that a contrary view would amount to "latent hostility" toward religion. Justice Kennedy's opinion suggested an attempt to pose a new framework for understanding the essential prohibition of the establishment clause in terms only of a bar against government action coercive of religious belief or practice and action with the tendency of establishing a state religion. Justice Kennedy again emphasized the issue of coercion in Lee v. Weisman, 505 U.S. 577 (1992), where, writing for the Court's majority, he explained why prayers offered at a middle-school graduation ceremony violated the establishment clause.

But the notion that coercion must be a defining characteristic of establishment violations has failed to find the support of a majority of the Court. Justices Brennan and Stevens filed opinions partially concurring and partially dissenting from the judgment in the case. They, along with Justice Marshall, who joined their respective opinions, would have held both displays unconstitutional.

In terms of specific results, County of Allegheny reinforced the view of many observers after Lynch v. Donnelly that the Court had implicitly embraced what is sometimes referred to as the "reindeer rule." By this it was understood that nativity scenes would survive constitutional challenge so long as they were accompanied by secular symbols of the Christmas holiday, such as reindeer. In practice, the constitutionality of government-sponsored religious symbols has tended to turn on whether these symbols are part of a larger context that includes secular symbols as well. This judicial approach is a clear retreat from the "wall of separation" rhetoric of the Court's earlier establishment clause cases in favor of an emphasis on norms of equality. The possibility of a court finding an endorsement of religion declines as particular religious symbols take their place among other symbols.

This trend in the Court's treatment of religious symbols parallels its treatment of religious speakers during the same period. During the last two decades of the twentieth century, the Court repeatedly considered whether religious speakers were entitled to equal access to various public forums on terms comparable to those enjoyed by other speakers. The Court generally concluded that they did and, in so doing, rejected views of the establishment clause that would have denied this access as an impermissible aid to religion or as amounting to an unconstitutional breach in the wall separating government and religion. So long as religious speakers took their place in contexts with other speakers, the establishment clause did not forbid their speech and the free speech clause required that this speech be protected.

As to the Court's establishment clause jurisprudence, it appeared at the time that County of Allegheny might have represented a triumph of Justice O'Connor's no-endorsement test over the three-part Lemon test (Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602, 1971). The case was the first in which an opinion for the Court had relied on the no-endorsement test. Subsequent cases, however, suggested that Justice O'Connor's test serves merely to supplement rather than to replace the Lemon test. The Court continues to examine government actions in terms of whether they have the purpose or effect of advancing religion.

TIMOTHY L. HALL

References and Further Reading

- Feldman, Stephen M. Please Don't Wish Me a Merry Christmas: A Critical History of the Separation of Church and State. New York: New York University Press, 1997, 239–242.
- Karst, Kenneth L., Justice O'Connor and the Substance of Equal Citizenship, Supreme Court Review 55 (2003): 357–458.
- Levy, Leonard W. The Establishment Clause: Religion and the First Amendment, 2nd rev. ed. Chapel Hill: The University of North Carolina Press, 1994, 206–212.
- Nowak, John E., and Ronald D. Rotunda. Constitutional Law, 7th ed. St. Paul, MN: Thompson-West, 2004, 1422–1427.
- Shiffren, Steven H., The Pluralistic Foundations of the Religion Clauses, Cornell Law Review 90 (2004): 34–38.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Lee v. Weisman*, 505 U.S. 577 (1992)
- Lemon v. Kurtzman*, 403 U.S. 602 (1971)
- Lynch v. Donnelly*, 465 U.S. 668 (1984)

See also Lemon Test; Lynch v. Donnelly*, 465 US 668 (1984); Religion in “Public Square” Debate

ALLEN v. ILLINOIS, 478 U.S. 364 (1986)

The Allen Court decided the issue of whether proceedings under the Illinois Sexually Dangerous Persons Act are “criminal,” such that they open the door to the Fifth Amendment’s protection against self-incrimination.

Allen began when the Circuit Court charged Allen with the crimes of unlawful restraint and deviate sexual assault. The State of Illinois filed a petition to have him declared a sexually dangerous person under the Illinois Dangerous Persons Act. Pursuant to the act, the Court ordered Allen to undergo two psychological evaluations. During trial, the state presented testimony about the evaluation results. Allen objected, claiming that the state elicited information from him in violation of his Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination. The Court determined that Allen was a sexually dangerous person under the act.

The U.S. Supreme Court affirmed the ruling of the Illinois Supreme Court. Both courts held that the Fifth Amendment privilege was not available in sexually dangerous person proceedings because those proceedings are civil in nature and Fifth Amendment protections extend only to criminal proceedings.

However, Allen’s statements to the court-ordered psychological evaluator could not be used against him in any subsequent criminal proceeding.

In examining the issue, the Court determined that the act was civil in nature because its goal was to provide treatment, not punishment, to persons whom the Court found to be “sexually dangerous.” The act failed to promote retribution or deterrence, the traditional aims of punishment, and its text clearly stated that it was to be a civil act.

Illinois restricted the scope of the act by requiring the state to file criminal charges against a person before the state could file a petition asking the Court to determine whether that person was sexually dangerous. The limitation of the scope of the act to persons with criminal charges, rather than the mentally ill population at large, did not transform the civil proceeding into a criminal one. Strict procedural safeguards failed to alter the nature of the proceedings, as did the commitment of sexually dangerous persons to a maximum-security institution also housing convicts in need of psychological care. Involuntary commitment alone did not trigger criminal procedure protections, as noted in Addington v. Texas, 441 U.S. 418 (1979), and the state met its treatment goals by committing sexually dangerous persons to institutions designed to provide psychological care.

The Court found that the Fourteenth Amendment due process clause did not require the application of the Fifth Amendment self-incrimination privilege to be applied to the act because the constitutional purpose of the privilege was not to enhance the reliability of fact-finding determinations. Procedurally, the act satisfied the Court by requiring the state to prove more than just the commission of a sexual assault.

Allen has helped states discover the bounds of mental health proceedings. It guides them in fashioning legislation directed toward mentally ill persons, specifically sexually dangerous persons, and it further defines the scope of the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination.

ALISON P. RIVCHUN

References and Further Reading

- American Bar Association. “Case Law Developments.” Mental and Physical Disability Law Reporter 29 (January/February 2005):16–36.
- Bilionis, Louis D., Conservative Reformation, Popularization, and the Lessons of Reading Criminal Justice as Constitutional Law, UCLA Law Review 52 (April 2005): 979–1060.
- Blair, W. Wylie, The Illinois Sexually Dangerous Persons Act: The Civilly Committed and Their Fifth Amendment Rights, or Lack Thereof, Southern Illinois University Law Journal 29 (Spring 2005): 461–479.

ALLEN v. ILLINOIS, 478 U.S. 364 (1986)

Weitzel, Travis D., The Constitutionality of Quasi-Convictions, Rutgers Law Journal 36 (Spring 2005): 1029–1072.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Addington v. Texas, 441 U.S. 418 (1979)
Estelle v. Smith, 451 U.S. 454 (1981)
French v. Blackburn, 428 F. Supp. 1351 (MDNC 1977)
In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1 (1967)
Kennedy v. Mendoza-Martinez, 372 U.S. 144 (1963)
Lefkowitz v. Turley, 414 U.S. 70 (1973)
Malloy v. Hogan, 378 U.S. 1 (1964)
Mathews v. Eldridge, 424 U.S. 319 (1976)
McCarthy v. Arndstein, 266 U.S. 34 (1924)
Middendorf v. Henry, 425 U.S. 25 (1976)
Minnesota v. Murphy, 465 U.S. 420 (1984)
One Lot Emerald Cut Stones and One Ring v. U.S., 409 U.S. 232 (1972)
People v. English, 31 Ill. 2d 301 (1964)
People v. Nastasio, 19 Ill. 2d 524 (1960)
People v. Pembrock, 62 Ill. 2d 317 (1976)
Rogers v. Richmond, 365 U.S. 534 (1961)
U.S. v. Ward, 448 U.S. 242 (1980)
USCA Const. Amendment 5
725 ILCS 205 (Illinois Sexually Dangerous Persons Act)

See also In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1 (1967)

AMALGAMATED FOOD EMPLOYEES UNION LOCAL 590 v. LOGAN VALLEY PLAZA, 391 U.S. 308 (1968)

The conflict between the First Amendment rights of persons to speak and the rights of private property owners to exclude individuals from their property raises thorny questions at the intersection of state action doctrine and the First Amendment. Logan Valley concerned labor picketers who wished to inform the public of the nonunion status of a supermarket located in a large, privately owned shopping center. Accordingly, the Court needed to decide whether private property rights of the shopping center owner to declare picketers as trespassers were superior to any asserted right of the protestors to speak and to inform the public under the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the federal constitution.

The Court found that if the picketing had taken place in front of a supermarket located on the public streets, the picketers would have had a First Amendment right of access. Accordingly, the Court extended its 1946 decision in Marsh v. Alabama, 326 U.S. 501 (1946), concerning a company-owned town to declare that private property may under some circumstances be treated as though it were public. The Logan Valley Mall was the functional equivalent of the business block of the town in Marsh. Once an owner opened his property generally to the public, the more his property rights became circumscribed by the Constitution. The difficulty of the issue is illustrated by the fact that the Court would revisit the issue four years later in Lloyd Corp. v. Tanner, 407 U.S. 551 (1972), and completely reverse course in Hudgens v. NLRB, 424 U.S. 507 (1976).

TODD BROWER

References and Further Reading

Garvey, John H. What Are Freedoms for? Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1996, 242–251.
Tribe, Lawrence H. American Constitutional Law, 2nd ed. Minneola, NY: Foundation Press, 1988, 1708–1711.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Hudgens v. NLRB, 424 U.S. 507 (1976)
Lloyd Corp. v. Tanner, 407 U.S. 551 (1972)
Marsh v. Alabama, 326 U.S. 501 (1946)

See also Lloyd Corporation v. Tanner, 407 U.S. 551 (1972)

AMBACH v. NORWICK, 441 U.S. 68 (1979)

Interpreting the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, the Supreme Court has generally subjected all state and local laws that discriminate on the basis of alienage to the strictest scrutiny, noting that, unlike the federal government, state entities do not have the power to regulate the admission or expulsion of noncitizens. The Court has nonetheless created a “public function” exception whereby the state is allowed to reserve certain occupations for U.S. citizens only if these jobs require their holders to perform functions intimately related to democratic self-governance. Hence, police officers exercise discretionary authority sufficiently connected to the development of state public policy that, in Foley v. Connelie, 435 U.S. 291 (1978), the Court upheld state laws precluding noncitizens from such service.

In Ambach, the Court extended this exception to uphold New York’s bar against certain noncitizens who wished to become public school teachers. Citing the importance of teachers in instilling democratic values and civic virtue among their pupils, the five-person majority held that the state’s decision to preclude noncitizens who were eligible but unwilling to apply for U.S. citizenship was rationally related to its goal of promoting democracy. The four dissenters questioned whether proxies for loyalty such as citizenship were rational, especially when applied against otherwise well-qualified teacher applicants. In the end, Ambach's legacy may depend on the extent to which the case is limited to its facts. After all, the New York statute only precluded those who decided not to naturalize, a choice that the majority decided to hold against the noncitizens.

VICTOR C. ROMERO

References and Further Reading

- Carrasco, Gilbert Paul, Congressional Arrogation of Power: Alien Constellation in the Galaxy of Equal Protection, Boston University Law Review 74 (1994): 591–641.
 Scaperlanda, Michael A., Partial Membership: Aliens and the Constitutional Community, Iowa Law Review 81 (1996): 707–73.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Foley v. Connelie, 435 U.S. 291 (1978)

AMERICA ONLINE

America Online (AOL), founded in 1985 as Quantum Computer Services and since 2000 part of Time Warner, is one of the world's largest Internet service providers (ISPs). It has been involved in litigation with significant civil liberties implications.

In Cyber Promotions v. America Online, 948 F. Supp. 436 (E.D. Pa.1996), a mass-mailer of e-mail advertisements (a spammer) sued AOL for deliberately blocking its messages to AOL subscribers. This, the plaintiff claimed, violated its First Amendment right to have its communications delivered. A federal district court held, however, that a private ISP that is not a state actor may legally block mass-mailed e-mail messages.

The court explained that the plaintiff had not established state action under any of the three established tests: the exclusive public function test (whether the private entity has exercised powers that are traditionally the exclusive prerogative of the state); the state-assisted action test (whether the private entity has acted with the help of or in concert with state officials), or the joint participant test (whether the state has insinuated itself so far into a position of interdependence with the private entity that the state is a joint participant in the challenged activity). Similar results were reached in Noah v. AOL Time Warner, Inc., 261 F. Supp. 2d 532 (E.D. Va. 2003), and Green v. AOL, 318 F.3d 465 (3rd Cir. 2003).

In Zeran v. America Online, 129 F. 3d 327 (4th Cir. 1997), AOL was sued for defamation by the victim of an Internet prank in which messages posted on an AOL bulletin board advertised T-shirts with tasteless slogans relating to the bombing of the Oklahoma City federal building. Plaintiff Ken Zeran received numerous hostile telephone calls, as well as some death threats, and claimed that AOL delayed unreasonably in removing the offending messages. The Court found that AOL was protected by the Communications Decency Act, which insulates ISPs from liability for information originating with third parties.

AARON SCHWABACH

References and Further Reading

- AOL: Who We Are*, <http://www.corp.aol.com/whoweare/history.shtml#1985>, visited August 23, 2005.
 Sheridan, David R., Zeran v. AOL and the Effect of Section 230 of the Communications Decency Act Upon Liability for Defamation on the Internet, Alb. L. Rev. 61 (1997): 147.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Cyber Promotions v. America Online*, 948 F. Supp. 436 (E.D. Pa.1996)
Green v. America Online, 318 F.3d 465 (3rd Cir. 2003)
In re America Online, Inc., 168 F.Supp.2d 1359 (S.D. Fla. 2001)
Noah v. AOL Time Warner, Inc., 261 F. Supp. 2d 532 (E.D. Va. 2003)
Zeran v. America Online, Inc., 129 F. 3d 327 (4th Cir. 1997)
Communications Decency Act, 47 U.S.C. sec. 230

See also Communications Decency Act (1996); Defamation and Free Speech; State Action Doctrine; Threats and Free Speech

AMERICAN ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY

At its inaugural meeting on December 4, 1833, the American Anti-Slavery Society (AASS) declared an unconditional commitment to the immediate abolition of slavery and equal rights for free black men. Loath to engage in violence and political compromise, the new organization was dedicated to "moral suasion" as a vehicle for social change. The American Colonization Society's proposals for the emancipation and resettlement of slaves in Liberia were anathema to the members of the AASS. Led by the Tappan brothers of New York and Liberator editor William Lloyd Garrison, the group sought to secure a perpetual place for African Americans within the United States.

In the mid-1830s, the AASS sent a seemingly endless stream of petitions to Congress, calling, most notably, for the abolition of slavery in Washington, D.C. Largely the result of female members' efforts, this campaign eventually provoked the highly controversial “gag rules,” which precluded congressional debate regarding slavery until 1844. With the constitutional right to petition Congress in doubt in 1834, the AASS supplemented its petition drive by deluging southern mails with its tracts and periodicals (the National Anti-Slavery Standard and the Liberator, for example). When the first shipment of literature reached Charleston Harbor on July 29, however, it was promptly deemed “incendiary” and confiscated by the postmaster-general of the city and later destroyed by a mob of angry citizens.

Faced with this patently illegal censorship of the mails, the Jackson administration chose to turn a blind eye rather than challenge slaveholding interests. While the vast majority of white northerners opposed abolition, such repression of AASS reform efforts inspired a good deal of rights-conscious opposition from moderate and conservative northerners. Ultimately, AASS agitation laid bare the federal government’s willingness to compromise such civil liberties as freedom of the press and freedom of speech on behalf of minority interests.

By 1840, the AASS faced something of an identity crisis. The role of women in the movement, its responsibility to support reforms aside from abolition, and the merits of political participation were all sources of division that ultimately led to the collapse of the organization and the end of a united national opposition to slavery. While the radical elements in the group remained loyal to Garrison, those who favored a more focused, political approach defected in 1840, forming the American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Organization.

With statements like Wendell Phillips’s 1844 The Constitution, a Proslavery Document, the Garrisonian wing went on to assume an uncompromisingly disunionist position. It also took up the controversial cause of women’s rights during the 1840s. The organization’s assiduous agitation on behalf of the oppressed placed civil liberties at the center of public discourse. After its 1840 schism, AASS became the first organization in the United States actively to promote the universality of the principles enshrined in the Declaration of Independence.

JAMES CORBETT DAVID

References and Further Reading

- Ericson, David F. The Debate Over Slavery: Antislavery and Proslavery Liberalism in Antebellum America. New York: New York University Press, 2000.
- Kraditor, Aileen S. Means and Ends in American Abolitionism: Garrison and His Critics on Strategy and Tactics, 1834–1850. New York: Pantheon Books, 1969, c. 1967.
- Jeffrey, Julie Roy. The Great Silent Army of Abolitionism: Ordinary Women in the Antislavery Movement. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1998.
- Mayer, Henry. All on Fire: William Lloyd Garrison and the Abolition of Slavery. New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1998.
- Van Broekhoven, Deborah Bingham. “American Anti-Slavery Society.” In Macmillan Encyclopedia of World Slavery, vol. 1, Paul Finkelman and Joseph C. Miller, eds. New York: Simon & Schuster and Prentice Hall International, 1998, 48.

AMERICAN BOOKSELLERS ASSOCIATION, INC. ET AL. v. HUDNUT, 771 F. 2ND 323 (1985)

The feminist movement in the 1960s and 1970s in the United States and other countries raised anew issues of discrimination and violence against women. In America, Andrea Dworkin and Catherine MacKinnon played critical intellectual and political roles in developing and pressing for a radically new perspective of how to interpret sexually explicit portrayals of women in films, books, or other works. Their ideas ignited heated debates in the United States and Canada as well as in other countries. Their perspective sparked commentary by the media, informed conferences and commission reports, and led to the passage of city ordinances in Minneapolis and Indianapolis. Their ideas also shaped an opinion of the Supreme Court of Canada ruling (R. v. Butler, 1 S.C.R. 452, 1992) that Canadian governments could prohibit pornography that harmed or dehumanized women through sexual depictions of their subordination or humiliation.

The Indianapolis ordinance was challenged in federal court by a large coalition of groups that also filed numerous amicus curiae briefs; the legal battle attracted national attention. The ordinance defined “pornography” very differently from how Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15 (1973), identified “obscenity.” Pornography, according to the ordinance, was “the graphic sexually explicit subordination of women, whether in pictures or in words” that included one or more of six different forms or portrayals of subordination. The inclusion of any of these depictions or performances in a work was sufficient to prohibit the work; the work as a whole or its artistic or scientific value was not considered. Appeals to prurient interest, patent offensiveness, or standards of the community, the three basic components of the Miller test, were ignored. The ordinance prohibited trafficking in pornography as defined by the ordinance, coercing others into pornographic performances, and forcing pornography onto others; anyone injured by someone who saw or read pornography had a right of action against the maker or seller of the pornographic material. Scienter or prior knowledge that the material was pornographic was generally not a defense.

The southern district court for Indiana in the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals declared the ordinance was unconstitutional. A circuit court panel, whose opinion was written by Easterbrook, a Reagan appointee, affirmed the lower court's decision; the request for an en banc rehearing was denied. The lower court concluded the ordinance regulated speech and, accordingly, could be justified only by a compelling state interest in reducing sex discrimination, which Indianapolis did not establish. The trial judge ruled the ordinance vague, overbroad, and a prior restraint on speech.

For Easterbrook, the crux of the problem was that, given the ordinance's definition of pornography, it effectively legislated into a law a particular viewpoint: "The ordinance discriminates on the ground of the content of the speech." Depictions of women involved in sexual conduct as equals to men, regardless of the explicitness of the conduct, were lawful while portrayals of women enjoying humiliation or being submissive were unlawful without regard for the work's literary, artistic, or political qualities. "This is thought control," Easterbrook proclaimed. "It establishes an 'approved' view of women . . . Those who espouse the approved view may use sexual images; those who do not, may not."

Even if the premise underlying the ordinance is accepted—namely, that pornography is "an aspect of dominance" and that depictions of subordination tend to perpetuate subordination of women—"this simply demonstrates the power of pornography as speech." Easterbrook suggested various actions the city could take to save parts of the ordinance, but the fundamental problem, blunting these efforts, is that the law's definition of "pornography" is "defective root and branch."

ROY B. FLEMMING

References and Further Reading

- Downs, Donald Alexander. The New Politics of Pornography. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1989.
- Lacombe, Dany. Blue Politics: Pornography and the Law in the Age of Feminism. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1994.
- MacKinnon, Catharine A. In Harm's Way: The Pornography Civil Rights Hearings. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1997.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- American Booksellers Association, Inc. et al. v. Hudnut*, 771 F. 2d 323 (1985)
- Miller v. California*, 413 U.S. 15 (1973)
- R. v. Butler*, 1 S.C.R. 452 (1992)

AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION

The American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) is a private nonprofit organization dedicated to the defense of civil liberties. The ACLU defines civil liberties as rights enjoyed by individuals over and against the power of government. The ACLU's agenda of civil liberties issues includes First Amendment rights, including freedom of speech, press and assembly, the free exercise of religion, and a prohibition of a government establishment of religion; equal protection of the laws, including equality for racial and ethnic minorities, women, and other groups that have experienced discrimination; due process of law, including protection against unreasonable searches and seizures and protection against self-incrimination; and the right to privacy, including reproductive rights and the privacy of personal information. In addition, since the 1970s, the ACLU has fought issues related to national security and the war on terrorism that result in violations of civil liberties by the federal government.

The ACLU was founded in New York City in January 1920. It grew out of the National Civil Liberties Bureau (NCLB), which had been created in 1917 to fight the suppression of freedom of speech and other violations of civil liberties during World War I. The NCLB was founded and led by Crystal Eastman and Roger Baldwin, who were political activists opposed to the involvement of the United States in World War I. Health problems soon forced Eastman to withdraw and Baldwin became the leader of the NCLB. Following the war, Baldwin and others in the NCLB felt there was a need for a permanent organization to continue to fight for civil liberties. They created the ACLU with Baldwin as director. In 1920, the ACLU had only about 1,000 members nationwide and membership remained low for several decades.

Roger Baldwin led the organization until his retirement in 1950. Over that thirty-year period he was widely recognized as the principal advocate of civil liberties in the United States. When the ACLU was founded, the political and legal climate of the United States was extremely hostile to the idea of civil liberties. Many people associated the phrase "free speech" with disloyalty and radical political doctrines. There were no Supreme Court decisions or statutes protecting freedom of speech or other civil liberties. In a series of World War I-related cases, the Court ruled that the government could prosecute individuals for speech that posed a "clear and present danger" to society (Schenk v. United States, 1919). The clear and present danger test was interpreted very broadly, however, to include virtually any criticism of the government.

Faced with extreme hostility to civil liberties in the courts and in legislatures, the ACLU in its first two decades devoted its efforts primarily to public education. It issued numerous pamphlets and statements about particular controversies and occasionally staged public protests to dramatize a particular issue. During these early years the ACLU's litigation program was very limited. Much of the ACLU's work in its first years was devoted to the rights of working people and labor unions. Courts were very sympathetic to employer requests for injunctions denying workers the right to hold public demonstrations in favor of organizing labor unions.

The first case to bring the ACLU favorable national attention was the so-called "Scopes Monkey Trial" in 1925. The ACLU challenged a Tennessee law outlawing the teaching of evolution in the public schools, representing biology teacher John T. Scopes, who was prosecuted under the law. The July 1925 trial in Dayton, Tennessee, created a sensation, drawing journalists from around the world. Scopes was convicted at trial, but a state appellate court overturned the conviction because the judge erred in imposing the punishment. The state did not retry Scopes, and as a result the issues of constitutional law raised by the case never reached the U.S. Supreme Court. The Scopes case is one of the most famous trials in American history, dramatizing the issues of the freedom to teach unpopular ideas and opposition to government establishment of religion.

The Scopes case was part of the ACLU's long defense of academic freedom. It has fought attempts to have public school teachers and college professors fired because of unpopular ideas and has also fought loyalty oaths for teachers, which were widely used during the cold war period. In the 1960s, the ACLU expanded its work on academic freedom to include the rights of students. This has included the right of students to express unpopular ideas and due process rights for students facing discipline.

The ACLU enjoyed its first significant victories in the Supreme Court in 1931. The Court overturned the conviction of a California woman convicted of possessing a red flag (Stromberg v. California, 283 U.S. 359, 1931) and ruled that the First Amendment prohibited prior restraint of newspapers (Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697, 1931). The Supreme Court did not begin to affirm civil liberties protections to a significant degree until the late 1930s, however. In a famous footnote in the case of U.S. v. Carolene Products, 304 U.S. 144 (1938), the Court declared that its role was to protect political and civil liberties, particularly of powerless people. In response, the ACLU altered its priorities and began to put more emphasis on litigation as a strategy for protecting civil liberties.

With the Supreme Court increasingly sympathetic to civil liberties after 1938, the ACLU exerted an enormous influence over the development of American constitutional law. One historian estimates that the ACLU was involved, directly or indirectly, in 80 percent of all recognized landmark civil liberties cases decided by the U.S. Supreme Court in the twentieth century. The ACLU initially confined its role to filing amicus ("friend of the court") briefs in court cases, addressing only the civil liberties issues involved in a case. In the 1960s, it began providing direct legal representation to its clients, handling cases at the initial trial level.

The ACLU's basic principle on free speech is that the First Amendment prohibits any restrictions on expression based on the content of the ideas expressed. Consequently, the organization has consistently defended the free-speech rights of communists and advocates of other radical political ideas. Under the same principle, the ACLU has fought censorship of literature containing allegedly offensive material. In one of its most famous cases, it overturned a U.S. Customs Bureau ban on the James Joyce novel Ulysses. The ACLU has also taken a broad definition of expression, arguing in cases that "expression" includes nonverbal as well as verbal expression. In 1967, the ACLU won a landmark case upholding the right of a public school student to wear an arm-band protesting the Vietnam War.

The ACLU defended the rights of Jehovah's Witnesses in a long series of cases and controversies from the late 1930s to the early 1950s. Because their doctrines and tactics were extremely unpopular, the Jehovah's Witnesses were subject to restrictive laws and attacks by vigilante groups. Several cases helped to define First Amendment protection for the free exercise of religion. The most famous controversy involved the refusal of public school students who were members of the Jehovah's Witnesses to participate in compulsory salutes of the American flag. In the landmark case of West Virginia v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943), the Supreme Court affirmed the principle that the government cannot compel a person to express a belief that is contrary to his or her conscience.

The ACLU has been particularly controversial because of its position on the separation of church and state. The ACLU has held that the establishment clause of the First Amendment prohibits any government support or endorsement of religious activity. Since the 1925 Scopes case, the ACLU has fought other efforts to prohibit the teaching of evolution or to require the teaching of religious views of the creation of the universe. In the 1940s and 1950s, the ACLU fought government financial support for religious activities in public schools. In 1962, the ACLU won one of its most controversial cases when the Supreme Court ruled that mandatory religious prayers in public schools violated the establishment clause of the First Amendment. The organization has also generated controversy by opposing religious displays in public buildings. The majority of these controversies involved religious displays in front of courthouses and other public buildings during the Christmas season or Christmas programs in public schools. In 2004 and 2005, the ACLU also sought to remove displays of the Ten Commandments from courthouses and public parks.

Because of its position on separation of church and state, and school prayers in particular, the ACLU has been attacked by religious conservatives as “Godless” and “antireligion.” The group has responded by arguing that the free exercise of religion clause of the First Amendment protects religious expression. In addition to its support for the Jehovah’s Witnesses in the 1930s and 1940s, the ACLU in the 1990s defended the right of Native Americans to use peyote, a drug that is generally illegal, in religious ceremonies. Together with many religious organizations, the ACLU supported the 1993 Religious Freedom Restoration Act designed to overturn an unfavorable Supreme Court ruling.

During World War II the ACLU defended the rights of nearly 120,000 Japanese Americans who had been evacuated from the West Coast of the United States and interned in concentration camps. Because of popular support for the war effort, the ACLU was the only national organization to provide significant support for the Japanese Americans, representing them in the major cases that reached the Supreme Court. The Court upheld the government’s actions in Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U.S. 81 (1943), and Korematsu v. United States, 323 U.S. 214 (1944), but public opinion and subsequent court cases have supported the ACLU argument that the treatment of the Japanese Americans was a gross violation of civil liberties.

The most divisive internal controversy in ACLU history occurred in 1940 when the Board of Directors adopted a policy barring individuals who belonged to totalitarian organizations from positions of leadership in the ACLU. It then expelled Elizabeth Gurley Flynn from the Board. Many dissident ACLU members accused the organization of imposing the same kind of political test that it had always opposed. The controversy simmered for many years. Eventually, in 1976, the ACLU Board, led by a new generation of civil libertarians, reinstated Flynn posthumously to the Board.

During the cold war period of the late 1940s and 1950s, the ACLU opposed many anticommunist measures as violations of freedom of belief and association. It challenged the Federal Loyalty Program created in 1947 because it barred people from federal employment simply because they had once belonged to an organization alleged to be subversive. It also called for abolition of the House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC) because it investigated people’s beliefs and associations. The ACLU opposed the 1940 Smith Act, which outlawed advocating the overthrow of the government. At the state level, ACLU affiliates opposed loyalty oaths for teachers and legislative investigations of people’s beliefs and associations.

On civil rights issues, the ACLU worked closely with the NAACP from 1920 onward. In the 1920s, the ACLU called on local authorities to prevent Ku Klux Klan-led violence against African Americans, and in the 1930s joined the unsuccessful campaign for a federal law making lynching a crime. The ACLU was active in the Scottsboro case in the 1930s, which involved eight young African-American men accused of raping a white woman in Alabama. This was the first civil rights case to attract national attention. The ACLU handled two Supreme Court cases that led to landmark rulings on criminal procedure (Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45, 1932; Patterson v. Alabama, 1935). The organization also filed an amicus brief in the landmark case of Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954), declaring racially segregated public schools unconstitutional. Beginning in the 1970s, the ACLU supported affirmative action programs in employment.

In the 1960s and 1970s, the ACLU’s agenda expanded enormously to include new areas of civil liberties, including women’s rights, prisoners’ rights, children’s rights, the right to abortion, the rights of lesbian and gay people, and many others. This development generated considerable controversy. Many people argued that the Constitution did not guarantee rights in these areas. Some prominent ACLU members resigned from the organization over these issues, arguing that it should adhere to its traditional role of defending First Amendment rights. In general, however, the ACLU was very successful in persuading the courts to adopt its interpretation of the Constitution. The single most important case in this regard was the 1973 decision in Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), holding that the constitutional right to privacy guaranteed women a right to an abortion.

The ACLU has had a major impact on the American criminal justice system. Its briefs were extremely influential in the Supreme Court cases of Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961), and Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966), protecting the rights of criminal suspects. The group has also supported the creation of independent agencies to review citizen complaints against police officers. ACLU attorneys brought the first prisoners' rights cases in the 1960s and in the 1970s; it created the National Prison Project, which challenged the constitutionality of prison conditions in virtually every state in the country.

The Vietnam War and the Watergate scandal led the ACLU to devote more effort to civil liberties issues related to war and national security. The organization and its affiliates brought several unsuccessful cases seeking to have the courts declare the Vietnam War unconstitutional. During the Watergate scandal, the ACLU was one of the first national organizations to call for the impeachment of President Richard Nixon because of his abuse of presidential power.

In one of the most controversial First Amendment cases in its history, the ACLU in 1977 defended the right of a small American Nazi group to hold a demonstration in the heavily Jewish community of Skokie, Illinois. The organization was heavily criticized for defending the rights of a group associated with the Holocaust and it lost many members. The ACLU replied to critics with its traditional view that restrictions on speech based on the content of the message were impermissible and that the First Amendment guarantees "freedom for the thought we hate." The federal courts eventually upheld the ACLU's position and affirmed the right of the Nazi group to hold a demonstration in Skokie.

The ACLU took up the issue of abortion rights in the 1960s and filed an amicus brief in the landmark case of Roe v. Wade (1973), which established a constitutional right to an abortion. In the 1970s, the ACLU created its Reproductive Rights Project, which fought to defend the Roe decision and worked on other related reproductive rights issues. The ACLU also created a Women's Rights Project in the early 1970s. Under the leadership of Ruth Bader Ginsburg, the project won the first important cases on women's rights in the Supreme Court, beginning with Reed v. Reed (1971).

In the 1970s, the ACLU began to place more emphasis on legislation as the Supreme Court became less sympathetic to civil liberties. Originally staffed by only one person, by 2005 the ACLU Washington office had a staff of over twelve full-time lobbyists. In addition, ACLU affiliates lobby in state legislatures and several affiliates employ full-time lobbyists. In the 1980s, the ACLU began to strengthen its public education program, creating a separate Public Education Department in the national office. This development reflected the belief that public opinion was increasingly hostile or indifferent to civil liberties issues.

Two former leaders of the ACLU have been appointed associate justices of the U.S. Supreme Court. Felix Frankfurter, who was among the original founders of the ACLU in 1920, was appointed to the Court in 1939 and served until 1962. Ruth Bader Ginsburg was the first director of the ACLU Women's Rights Project in the early 1970s. In that capacity she argued and won a series of landmark women's rights cases before the Court. She was appointed to the Court in 1993.

The terrorist attacks on the United States on September 11, 2001, had a dramatic effect on civil liberties. Many Americans felt that it was necessary to restrict individual liberties in order to protect against terrorism. Congress quickly passed the PATRIOT Act, which included many provisions the ACLU regarded as threats to civil liberties. Most important, the law authorized the federal government to conduct searches without notifying the person whose home or office was to be searched (so-called "sneak and peak" search warrants). The ACLU also protested interviews with Arab Americans by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, charging that the practice represented discriminatory profiling on the basis of national origins. In challenging aspects of the war on terrorism, the ACLU enjoyed significant public support. Immediately after the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, it developed a working coalition with conservative groups and leaders who were also concerned about expanded government powers. The membership of the ACLU grew by 30 percent between late 2001 and mid-2005.

The ACLU is a national organization with about five hundred thousand members. It maintains a national office in New York City, a legislative office in Washington, D.C., and staffed affiliate offices in all fifty states. The work of the ACLU is financed by members' dues, tax-deductible contributions, and grants to support specific projects. Grants from private foundations and donors support a series of special projects related to specific civil liberties issues. These include the Voting Rights Project, with an office in Atlanta, Georgia, the Reproductive Rights Project, the Women's Rights Project, and others.

SAMUEL WALKER

References and Further Reading

- Cottrell, Robert C. Roger Nash Baldwin and the American Civil Liberties Union. New York: Columbia University Press, 2000.
- Larson, Edward J. Summer for the Gods: The Scopes Trial and America's Continuing Debate over Science and Religion. New York: Basic Books, 1997.
- Murphy, Paul L. World War I and the Origin of Civil Liberties in the United States. New York: Norton, 1979.
- Walker, Samuel. The American Civil Liberties Union: An Annotated Bibliography. New York: Garland, 1992.
- . In Defense of American Liberty: A History of the ACLU, 2nd ed. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1999.

AMERICAN COMMUNICATION ASSOCIATION v. DOUDS, 339 U.S. 382 (1950)

In 1947, Congress added Section 9(h) to the National Labor Relations Act; this section required all labor union officers to sign annual affidavits stating that they did not belong to the Communist Party or support the unlawful overthrow of the U.S. government. Unions whose officers refused to sign noncommunist affidavits were denied access to the National Labor Relations Board for relief from unfair labor practices. Congress justified the affidavit requirement as necessary to protect the free flow of Interstate Commerce from political strikes. In American Communication Association v. Douds, the Supreme Court upheld the statute despite noting that it “discourag[ed] the exercise of political rights protected by the First Amendment.”

In an opinion written by Chief Justice Vinson, the Court concluded that the affidavit provision was designed by Congress to regulate harmful conduct in the form of political strikes, but not harmful speech. Because the statute had what the Court viewed as only an indirect effect on speech, the Court applied a balancing test, rather than the clear and present danger test, to determine the requirement’s constitutional validity. After considering the competing interests, the majority concluded that protecting the national economy from disruptive political strikes outweighed any burden on the ability of a “relative handful” of union members to express their political views.

The holding’s precedential value today is questionable. While not explicitly overruling Douds, the Court invalidated a later version of Section 9(h) as an unconstitutional bill of attainder in United States v. Brown, 381 U.S. 437 (1965).

NICOLE B. CÁSAREZ

References and Further Reading

Currie, David P., The Constitution in the Supreme Court: 1946–1953, Emory Law Journal 37 (1988): 249–294.
 Kalven, Harry Jr. A Worthy Tradition: Freedom of Speech in America. New York: Harper & Row, 1988.

Cases and Statutes Cited

United States v. Brown, 381 U.S. 437 (1965)

See also Balancing Approach to Free Speech; Bill of Attainder; Clear and Present Danger Test; Interstate Commerce; National Labor Relations Board; Vinson Court

AMERICAN INDIAN RELIGIOUS FREEDOM ACT OF 1978

Congress announced that the policy of the United States was to “protect and preserve” the rights of American Indians, Alaskan Natives, and Native Hawaiians “to believe, express, and exercise” their “traditional religions” in a joint resolution adopted in 1978, now known as the American Indian Religious Freedom Act (AIRFA). The AIRFA defined the practice of “traditional religions” to include, without limitation, “access to sites, use and possession of sacred objects, the freedom to worship through ceremonies and traditional rites.”

The impetus for the AIRFA was a study conducted by the House of Representatives that concluded the federal government was restricting Indian religious freedom in at least three ways. First, federal agencies such as the U.S. Forest Service, National Park Service, and the Bureau of Land Management frequently prevented Indians from entering federal land where sacred sites were located. Moreover, the agencies refused to allow the burial of tribal leaders in tribal cemeteries located on federal land. Second, federal law-enforcement officials regularly confiscated substances, such as peyote, used by Indians for religious purposes, even though federal cases had protected the use of these substances as a bona fide religious sacrament. Federal officials also confiscated the use of animal parts from endangered species, such as turkey and eagle feathers, that Indians used in religious ceremonies.

Third, the House found that federal agents directly and indirectly interfered with tribal ceremonies and religious practices. For example, federal officers had a long history of opposing and restricting the practice of tribal religions through the enforcement of Bureau of Indian Affairs-authored reservation law-and-order codes that flatly prohibited most tribal religious ceremonies. These law-and-order codes were enforced in the Courts of Indian Offenses, with judges hand-picked by federal officers. Federal courts in cases such as United States v. Clapox, 35 F. 575 (D. Or. 1888), upheld federal regulations, thus allowing the prosecution of Indians engaging in traditional religious practices. On-reservation federal Indian agents, as a matter of administrative practice, obstinately remained on the grounds at Rio Grande pueblos during religious ceremonies requiring that no non-Indian be present. Federal law-enforcement officers would also do little or nothing to stop unwelcome on-lookers from interfering in tribal religious ceremonies. The House also found that federal officials had directly interfered or allowed interference in tribal religious practices because the officials rejected Indian religions.

As a mere joint resolution, the AIRFA does not have the full force of federal law. Importantly, it did not include an enforcement and penalty provision. This status has undermined the effectiveness of the act in tough cases, such as Lyng v. Northwest Indian Cemetery Protective Association, 485 U.S. 439 (1988). There, the Supreme Court upheld a federal road project that would cut through the heart of tribal sacred sites located near the Hoopa Valley Reservation in California, even though the Ninth Circuit had determined that the project would destroy areas central to the religions of the Yurok, Karuk, and Tolowa tribes. The Court refused to enforce the act, largely because, without an enforcement clause, it had “no teeth in it.”

The Court evinced greater hostility to tribal religious practices in Employment Division v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872 (1990). There, the state of Oregon denied unemployment benefits to individuals who had been fired for good cause. The state denied benefits to two Indians who had been fired for using peyote as a religious sacrament outside of work. The Court upheld the regulation on the theory that the regulation was a neutral law not designed to restrict religion. As such, the Court applied the rational basis test to scrutinize Oregon’s action under the free exercise clause.

Congress attempted to reverse the holding in Smith and other freedom of religion cases by enacting the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA). This statute would require the Court to apply a compelling interest test, but the Court struck it down in City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507 (1997), as applied to state and local governments.

In 1996, President Clinton issued Executive Order No. 13007 that requires all federal agencies to accommodate access to sacred sites for Indian religious practitioners and avoid negatively affecting those sites. This executive order also does not contain an enforcement provision. In short, the AIRFA, along with Executive Order No. 13007, is little more than the imposition of a duty on federal agencies to take into consideration tribal interests, to consult with tribal leaders on the subject of Indian religion, and not to interfere with tribal religious practices.

MATTHEW L. M. FLETCHER

References and Further Reading

- Carpenter, Kristen A., A Property Rights Approach to Sacred Sites Cases: Asserting a Place for Indians as Non-owners, UCLA Law Review 52 (2005): 4:1061–1148.
 Cohen, Felix S., The Erosion of Indian Rights, 1950-1953: A Case Study in Bureaucracy, Yale Law Journal 62 (1953): 3:348–390.
 Epps, Garrett. To an Unknown God: Religious Freedom on Trial. New York: St. Martin’s Press, 2001.

Petoskey, John. “Indians and the First Amendment.” In American Indian Policy in the Twentieth Century, Vine Deloria, Jr., ed. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1985, 221–238.

Pevar, Stephen L. The Rights of Indians and Tribes, 3rd. ed., Carbondale and Edwardsville: University of Southern Illinois Press, 2002, 260–266.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- City of Boerne v. Flores*, 521 U.S. 507 (1997)
Employment Division v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872 (1990)
Lyng v. Northwest Indian Cemetery Protective Association, 485 U.S. 439 (1988)
Native American Church of New York v. United States, 468 F. Supp. 1247 (S.D. N.Y. 1979), aff’d, 633 F.2d 205 (2nd Cir. 1980)
People v. Woody, 61 Cal. 2d 716, 40 Cal. Rptr. 69, 394 P.2d 814 (1964)
United States v. Clapox, 35 F. 575 (D. Or. 1888)
Wilson v. Block, 708 F.2d 735 (D.C. Cir.), cert. denied, 464 U.S. 956 (1983)
American Indian Religious Freedom Act, S.J. Res. 102, Aug. 11, 1978, Pub. L. 95-341, 92 Stat. 469, codified in part 42 U.S.C. § 1996
Religious Freedom Restoration Act, 42 U.S.C. § 2000bb et seq

See also Accommodation of Religion; City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507 (1997); Drugs, Religion, and Law; Employment Division, Department of Human Resources v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872 (1990); Lyng v. Northwest Indian Cemetery Protective Association, 485 U.S. 439 (1988); Native Americans and Religious Liberty; Religious Freedom Restoration Act

AMERICAN REVOLUTION

The Subjects of Liberty

The words “liberty” and “rights” had far different connotations for people in the American colonies, depending on their status as slaves, free blacks, Native Americans on their homeland, women, indentured servants, loyalists, conscripted soldiers, religious dissidents, radical patriots, or propertied white males. The term “civil liberties” was not a term used in the period between 1760 and 1783. Many of the colonists depended on the rights they claimed as English citizens. For those with limited rights based on their English origins, a new understanding of rights was required; for others, the rights they claimed had far different origins in their understandings as indigenous peoples of the American or African continent.

Most of the history of the era has focused on the propertied white male colonist and his revolution against the British king and Parliament. Whether his battle was to retain rights as a citizen of the British Empire or to retain the unique habit of independence as an American colonist, he remained at the heart of the investigation of the causes of the American Revolution.

Many colonists viewed the indigenous populations as “savages” existing outside the polity of the colonial, state, or federal governments. The sovereign nations had their own views of the rights of people in relation to community. The five nations of the Haudenosaunee, in their Great Binding Law (Gayanashgowa, for example), demonstrated working concepts of confederation, and included, for example, rights of the people to deliberate and be consulted in times of dire threat to the tribes. The question of the relations between the revolutionary government and the tribal nations was not an issue of civil rights. The growing protection for colonial property rights, however, increasingly allowed the revolutionary states to encroach on Native American sovereign lands.

The free black population, particularly in the northern colonies, gradually increased as the events moved toward revolution. Slaves and free blacks expected that the cry for liberty and civil rights by the American colonists should include freedom and the end of slavery in the colonies. Petitions were sent to colonial governments seeking the end of slavery as well as, in some cases, receipt of land as compensation for involuntary servitude. While these petitions had little effect on the colonial governments, they did resonate with a number of state governments once the war began.

Between 1780 and 1804, eight states—including the fourteenth state, Vermont—abolished slavery outright or passed gradual abolition laws to end slavery over the course of the next few decades. Pennsylvania’s Gradual Abolition Act of 1780 noted the inconsistency of fighting for liberty against the British while maintaining slavery. In some states, including New York, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, and Vermont, blacks gained complete political equality; in others they gained freedom, but not the ballot. The southern states did not end slavery, but a few, such as Virginia, allowed for voluntary manumission of slaves and most reduced the harshness of punishments for slaves and free blacks.

Many black males were manumitted in exchange for long service in the continental army. Some entered military service of their own accord and others were volunteered to substitute their service for the service of their white slave owners. Many white southerners objected to allowing blacks to serve in the army. They feared uprisings among the slave population and objected to serving alongside black slaves or freedmen. In some cases the black soldiers were given service functions, such as jobs as cooks, drivers, or laborers, instead of fighting positions. Often, however, events necessitated an abandonment of this policy as the battles intensified. Black soldiers performed heroic acts in many of these battles; many had been slaves at the beginning of the Revolution and were able to gain their freedom through military service.

An undetermined number of white male indentured servants sometimes were released from their contractual bond in exchange for enlistment in the army. The rights of indentured servants were not, however, a focus of the revolutionary efforts to secure political and civil rights.

Women were represented by every possible status within the colonies, and whether they were southern female slaves or patriot or loyalist wives of propertied colonists, their plight was ignored by those who articulated the goals of the revolution. Their rights, except in the case of those included in manumissions, were not significantly improved as a result of the Revolution. The rights of white married women and widows may have diminished after the revolution as the law became more rigidly applied to their limited legal identity. Prior to and during the revolution, some of these women exercised a wider range of economic and legal power under circumstances that necessitated their action. Single women retained the power to own property, sue in court, and inherit property. However, during and after the Revolutionary period, some women, such as Mercy Otis Warren, participated in politics by writing essays and pamphlets. In New Jersey women gained the right to vote during the Revolution, although they would lose this right in the early 1800s.

The fight for liberty in the face of governmental oppression did not necessarily pertain to colonists, labeled “Tories” or “Loyalists,” who refused to join the revolutionary cause. They suffered loss of life, liberty, and due-process protections at the hands of American patriots who were fighting to secure liberties for themselves. Loyalty oaths were demanded of all men over the age of sixteen. Taxes were imposed at much higher rates than those imposed on patriots. Property was confiscated; many opponents of the revolutionary cause were imprisoned, tarred and feathered, or exiled. The military and the colonial governments asserted jurisdiction to investigate, bring to trial, and punish those who spoke in support of remaining loyal to the king.

Despite the denial of due process or freedom of expression to Tories, the Revolution had a profound affect on civil liberties. Before the war, the British used arbitrary searches—writs of assistance—to look for smuggled goods and weapons. The British tried to move trials of Americans overseas, denying them access to witnesses, counsel, and juries of their peers. The war began with the British trying to seize the munitions of the Concord militia. The colonists petitioned the king, but received no response and felt cut off from having a voice in government. During the war, pamphleteers and newspaper editors pushed the patriot agenda with the printed word. These experiences led to demands after the war that culminated in the Bill of Rights, protecting the rights of petition and jury trials, banning warrantless searches, and prohibiting the federal government from disarming the state militias. Even the deprivations of Tory rights affected Americans. A number of states used bills of attainder to arrest Tories, but they did so with some discomfort, knowing that such behavior violated fundamental rights. Not surprisingly, such behavior was banned in the Constitution.

Historical Interpretations of the Revolution

Any description of liberties and rights during the period from 1760 until 1783 must take into account the different perspectives, the changes of the components of liberty and rights articulated by the people over time, and the school of historical thought reflected by the particular description of the period. Perhaps no period has received so much attention from historians with so little agreement.

During the nineteenth century George Bancroft's ten-volume History of the United States offered the accepted "Whig" interpretation of the American Revolution. The Whig party opposed the power of the Stuart kings in the seventeenth century on the basis that the English tradition of liberties was protected in the unwritten constitution. Bancroft and earlier historians, including Mercy Otis Warren and David Ramsay, described the Revolution as the reaction against parliamentary conspiracies to deprive the colonists of their rights as English citizens. American colonists viewed themselves as retaining the rights identified in England with the grant of the Magna Carta in 1215 and the Petition of Rights in 1628. Although not always followed by king or Parliament, these documents limited their powers and guaranteed that freemen could not be taken, imprisoned, or disseized of life, property, or liberties without due process of law.

Parliamentary actions that allowed general warrants to search any colonial home for smuggled goods (Writs of Assistance 1761) and imposed taxes and duties on commercial items including paper (The Stamp Act of 1765), sugar (The Sugar Act of 1774), and tea (The Townshend Revenue Act of 1767) pushed the colonists to articulate their right to give consent by way of proper representation in Parliament before property could be taken from them. James Otis, one of the early opponents of the use of arbitrary power against the colonists, resigned his government position in order to argue against the practice of searching homes without specific warrants. In boycotts and other acts of open defiance to taxes imposed by Parliament, the colonists vigorously objected to being deprived of property without representation and also fought to ensure their right to petition concerning their grievances against the king and Parliament. Freedom of the press was understood as an essential tool in efforts to oppose arbitrary and oppressive use of power. Free speech was an idea initially subsumed by the fight for a free press.

In response to the punitive "coercive"/"intolerable acts" of 1774, the colonists met in Philadelphia at the First Continental Congress and identified a number of the rights that were threatened by Parliament at that time. "The Declaration and Resolves" issued by the Congress on October 14, 1774, reaffirmed their belief that colonists retained all of their rights as free natural-born subjects of England, and reiterated the right not to be deprived of life, liberty, or property without consent; the right to be tried by a jury of their local peers before an independent judiciary; and the right to peaceably assemble and petition the king with their grievances. In further documents, the Congress criticized the expanded jurisdiction of admiralty and vice admiralty courts that deprived the colonists of their right to a jury trial.

The focus of this early historical interpretation pits the struggles of the enfranchised male colonist against the arbitrary exercise of power and oppression by the British Parliament and the king. The developing nationalist unified view shared by all such colonists led to the ensuing revolution and creation of the Declaration of Independence. It also fostered a sense of rights and liberties that needed protection from arbitrary and oppressive interference from government. According to this view the colonists were primarily influenced by John Locke's theories.

The arguments of the wealthy, intellectual colonists, for the most part, did not focus on the interests of the "middling" classes of artisans, tradesmen, seamen, laborers, and small rural farmers, or the increasing numbers of immigrant poor who were flocking to the cities. "New Left" historians, including Gary Nash, have described the role of the common person in the pre-Revolutionary identification of rights and liberties. The resentment toward the wealthy merchants, lawyers, and politicians grew as measures were passed ignoring the plight of the poor, the artisans, and the tradesmen while increasing the revenues for the rich colonists. In these historical accounts the poor claimed as many grievances against the wealthy colonists and their influence over government as they did against the dominance of the English parliament and king. They participated in demonstrations, uprisings, and petitions that reflected a demand for a more egalitarian society than that which existed in the goals of the elite merchants, politicians, and farmers.

As the revolution progressed, the new state governments began the task of writing their constitutions. Each of these new governments adopted its version of a declaration or bill of rights reflecting its previous colonial efforts to create written laws, its adaptations of English rights, and the unique interests of the particular state ratifying conventions. The Bay Colony reduced to writing its Massachusetts Body of Liberties in 1641 and the Laws and Liberties of Massachusetts in 1648. In 1780, their constitution began with "a declaration of the rights of the inhabitants of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts." As described by Professors Conley and Kaminski in The Bill of Rights and the States, when the new states prioritized the rights that were important:

New Yorkers championed freedom of expression; Rhode Islanders passionately defended religious liberty and church-state separation; Delawareans showed an unusual preoccupation with the right to keep and bear arms; Massachusetts men stoutly objected to unreasonable searches and seizures; Vermonters led the way in abolishing slavery; Rhode Islanders and North Carolinians exalted states' rights as an antidote to centralized power; and Pennsylvanians and Virginians pioneered in asserting a broad range of individual freedoms.

Because the states were viewed as the primary protectors of the rights of citizens of the states, the Articles of Confederation did not need a declaration of rights.

Progressive historians of the early twentieth century, including Charles Beard, identified conflicting economic interests that divided classes in the colonies and motivated the colonists. These historians examined the self-interest of revolutionary leaders and eventual founding fathers of the Constitution. The economic incentives of those holding wealth and power in the colonies also pitted the Colonists against the British, particularly against Parliament's imposition of external and internal taxes. The progressive historians focused much of their attention on identifying the incentives that would protect property rights of self-interested individuals. In this explanation, the rights of the disenfranchised, those held in slavery, or other powerless individuals were not the primary motivation of these revolutionary activities.

A major revision in the history of the causes of the American Revolution occurred with the work of Bernard Bailyn, Gordon S. Wood, and J.G.A. Pocock in what has been termed "a republican revival" or "neo-Whig" history. This interpretation agreed with the earlier Whig interpretations of history that suggested that the colonists feared conspiratorial efforts by Parliament to deprive them of their rights as English citizens. The work of Bailyn and Wood located the intellectual origins of the colonists' revolutionary rhetoric and action in seventeenth century radical Whig oppositional thought in England.

The civil rights and liberties of the revolutionary era are best understood individually as the states adopted their declarations of rights and the Constitution of 1787 was ratified with a promise of a Bill of Rights. No unified view existed, and all versions excluded many of the peoples of the new governments.

JANIS L. McDONALD

References and Further Reading

- Bailyn, Bernard. The Ideological Origins of the American Revolution. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1967; enl. ed., Cambridge: Belknap Press, 1992.
- Beard, Charles A. An Economic Interpretation of the Constitution of the United States. New York: Macmillan, 1913.
- Bancroft, George. History of the United States, vols. 4-7, New York: D. Appleton, 1834-1874.
- Berlin, Ira. "The Revolution in Black Life." In The American Revolution, Explorations in the History of American Radicalism, Alfred F. Young, ed. Dekalb: Northern Illinois University Press, 1976, 349-382.
- Calhoun, Robert M. The Loyalists in Revolutionary America, 1760-1781. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1973.
- Conley, Patrick T., and John P. Kaminski. The Bill of Rights and the States, The Colonial and Revolutionary Origins of American Liberties. Madison, WI: Madison House, 1992.
- Higginbotham, Don. "Loyalist Experiences and Civil Liberties in Wartime." In The War of American Independence: Military Attitudes, Policies, and Practice, 1763-1789. New York: Macmillan Co., 1971.
- Kerber, Linda. Women of the Republic: Intellect and Ideology in Revolutionary America. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1980.
- Lemisch. "Revolution from the Bottom up." In Towards a New Past: Dissenting Essays in American History, Barton J. Bernstein, ed. New York: Pantheon Press, 1968.
- . "The Radicalism of the Inarticulate: Merchant Seamen in the Politics of Revolutionary America." In Dissent: Essays in the History of American Radicalism, Alfred F. Young, ed. Dekalb: Northern Illinois University Press, 1964.
- Morgan, Edmund S., and Helen M. Morgan. The Stamp Act Crisis: Prologue to Revolution. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1953.

- Nash, Gary. Red, White and Black: The Peoples of Early America. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 1974.
- . “Social Change and the Growth of Pre-Revolutionary Urban Radicalism.” In The American Revolution, Explorations in the History of American Radicalism, Alfred F. Young, ed. Dekalb: Northern Illinois University Press, 1976, 3–36.
- . “Also There at the Creation: Going Beyond Gordon S. Wood.” WMQ, 3d Ser., XLIV (1987), 602.
- Norton, Mary Beth. Liberty’s Daughters: The Revolutionary Experience of American Women, 1750–1800. Boston, MA: Little, Brown and Company, 1980.
- Otis, James. A Vindication of the Conduct of the House of Representatives of the Province of Massachusetts-Bay. Boston: 1762.
- . The Rights of the British Colonies Asserted and Proved. Boston: 1764.
- Pocock, J. G. A. The Machiavellian Moment: Florentine Political Thought and the Atlantic Republican Tradition. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1975.
- Potter, Janice. The Liberty We Seek: Loyalist Ideology in Colonial New York and Massachusetts. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1983.
- Ramsay, David. The History of the American Revolution, 2 vols. Foreword by Lester H. Cohen. Indianapolis, IN: Liberty Fund, 1990.
- Reid, John Phillip. Constitutional History of the American Revolution: The Authority of Rights. Madison: The University of Wisconsin Press, 1986.
- Wilson, Joan Hoff. “The Negative Impact of the American Revolution.” In Major Problems in American Women’s History Series, Mary Beth Norton, ed. Lexington, MA: D. C. Heath and Company, 1989.
- Warren, Mercy Otis. The History of the Rise, Progress, and Termination of the American Revolution, Interspersed With Biographical, Political and Moral Observations. Boston, MA: 1814; reprinted in New York: AMS Press, 1970.
- Wood, Gordon S. The Creation of the American Republic: 1776–1787. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1969.
- . The Radicalism of the American Revolution. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1992.

AMERICANS UNITED FOR SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE

Americans United for Separation of Church and State (Americans United) is a Washington, D.C.-based public interest organization committed to preserving the principles of separation of church and state and religious liberty through litigation, lobbying, and public education. Americans United advocates a broad interpretation of the establishment and free exercise clauses of the First Amendment to the Constitution, sometimes described as a “strict” separationist approach. The organization’s primary focus and bulk of activity have been on establishment clause issues, opposing government financial support of religious institutions—including most forms of public aid to religious schools—officially sponsored prayer and Bible reading in public schools, and the public display of religious symbols on public property. The organization publishes Church & State magazine.

Americans United was founded in 1947 by moderate and evangelical Protestant leaders and professional educators who became alarmed at the U.S. Supreme Court decision in Everson v. Board of Education (1947) upholding public payment of transportation expenses for children to attend parochial schools. The organizers also opposed President Harry S. Truman’s efforts to appoint an ambassador to the Vatican, claiming that the action provided official recognition of a religious body. The organization was founded as “Protestants and Other Americans United for Separation of Church and State” (POAU), with its support coming largely from Baptist, Methodist, Presbyterian, and Seventh-Day Adventist bodies, as well as organizations such as the Baptist Joint Committee on Public Affairs, the National Association of Evangelicals, the National Education Association, and several Masonic groups. The organization’s name, its primary opposition to parochial school funding, and its often highly charged rhetoric led to early claims that POAU was anti-Catholic.

In 1948, Americans United hired Glen Archer, dean of Washburn University Law School, as its first executive director. Archer, an effective public speaker and consummate fund-raiser, served as executive director for twenty-eight years, growing the membership to over two hundred thousand by the mid-1950s. Early supporters of Americans United, according to the organization, included Eleanor Roosevelt and Supreme Court Justice Hugo Black. An early affiliate of and spokesperson for Americans United was Paul Blanshard, author of the best selling American Freedom and Catholic Power (1949) and God and Man in Washington (1959), both works criticized as being anti-Catholic in orientation.

From its beginnings, Americans United has been a leading litigation organization on establishment clause issues. Americans United’s earliest cases involved challenges to joint operating agreements between public and parochial schools (common in many rural areas during the 1940s and 1950s) and religiously based censorship of books and motion picture films. However, Americans United’s greatest impact came through its litigation against public funding of parochial schools and religious colleges. Americans United, sometimes in conjunction with other groups, litigated several of the leading funding cases before the U.S. Supreme Court, including: Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83 (1968); Lemon v. Krutzman, 403 U.S. 602 (1971); Tilton v. Richardson, 403 U.S. 672 (1973); Meek v. Pittenger, 421 U.S. 349 (1975); Grand Rapids School District v.

Ball, 473 U.S. 373 (1985); Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793 (2000); and Zelman v. Simmons-Harris, 536 U.S. 639 (2002). The only Supreme Court decision bearing its name, however, is Valley Forge Christian College v. Americans United, 454 U.S. 464 (1982), an Article III standing case.

By the late 1960s, Americans United had dropped its earlier name, "Protestants and Other Americans United," and its anti-Catholic rhetoric had softened, indicating developing attitudes following Vatican II. Membership declined in the 1970s and 1980s, particularly following the retirement of Glen Archer in 1976, and the organization floundered under the leadership of several short-term directors. During the 1980s, Americans United expanded its involvement in issues concerning religion and public education and the free exercise of religion. The organization also became outwardly critical of the activities of the ascending religious Right, including groups such as the Moral Majority and the Christian Coalition. Also, by the 1980s, Americans United's support base had shifted from moderate and evangelical Protestants to liberal Protestants, Unitarians, Reform Jews, and non-believers. Americans United's transformation to a secular-oriented civil rights organization was completed by the 1992 appointment of Barry Lynn, a former American Civil Liberties Union official, as executive director. Membership and name recognition subsequently grew under Lynn's directorship.

Currently, Americans United litigates and lobbies in Congress and in state legislatures on a range of church-state issues, including private school vouchers, public school prayer and Bible reading, the teaching of evolution or creationism, charitable choice (public funding of religious charities), and the official display of the Ten Commandments and other religious symbols. Americans United cosponsored litigation in various voucher cases, including Zelman v. Simmons-Harris (2002). The organization also supported the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (1993) and the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (2000).

STEVEN K. GREEN

References and Further Reading

- Berg, Thomas C., Anti-Catholicism and Modern Church-State Relations, Loyola University Chicago Law Journal 33 (2001): 121-172.
- Creedon, Lawrence P., and William D. Falcon. United for Separation: An Analysis of POAU Assaults on Catholicism. Milwaukee, WI: The Bruce Publishing Company, 1959.
- Jeffries, John C., and James E. Ryan, A Political History of the Establishment Clause, Michigan Law Review 100 (2001): 279-370.

- Lowell, C. Stanley. Embattled Wall. Washington, D.C.: Americans United, 1966.
- Lowell, C. Stanley, and Herbert S. Southgate. "POAU Position on Church-State Relations." Journal of Church and State 5 (1963):41-60.
- Salisbury, Franklin C. The Separationist Position on Church State Relations. Washington, D.C.: Americans United, 1965.
- Stokes, Anson Phelps, and Leo Pfeffer. Church and State in the United States, rev. ed. New York: Harper & Row, Publishers, 1964.
- Who's Who in the P.O.A.U.?* Huntington, IN: Our Sunday Visitor, 1951.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Flast v. Cohen*, 392 U.S. 83 (1968)
- Grand Rapids School District v. Ball*, 473 U.S. 373 (1985)
- Lemon v. Krutzman*, 403 U.S. 602 (1971)
- Meek v. Pittenger*, 421 U.S. 349 (1975)
- Mitchell v. Helms*, 530 U.S. 793 (2000)
- Tilton v. Richardson*, 403 U.S. 672 (1973)
- Valley Forge Christian College v. Americans United*, 454 U.S. 464 (1982)
- Zelman v. Simmons-Harris*, 536 U.S. 639 (2002)
- See also Christian Coalition; Zelman v. Simmons-Harris, 536 U.S. 639 (2002)

AMISH AND RELIGIOUS LIBERTY

The Amish seem to be an unlikely group to shape American law. These simple folk distance themselves from the trappings of modernity by living in largely isolated, rural communities. Moreover, they generally avoid relying on the courts to resolve disputes. ("Going to law," as it is called in the scriptures, is anathema to them.) Yet, remarkably, members of the faith have been at the center of several important legal cases that have helped to define the scope of judicial safeguards for religious liberty.

The Amish faith has its roots in the Reformation. Among the Protestant faiths to arise from that tumultuous period was Anabaptism, practiced by pious dissidents who made a particularly radical break with the Catholic hegemony that had long dominated political and religious life in Europe. Adhering to what might be best described as a primitive form of Christianity, they rejected infant baptism and disavowed state control of the church. In time, a group of Anabaptists who followed the teachings of Jakob Ammann splintered off and came to be known as the Amish. They followed Ammann's directives on such matters as personal adornments. Clothes were to be fastened with hooks and not buttons; beards were to be untrimmed; and hats, dresses, stockings, and other garments were to be uniformly plain.

When the Amish started flocking to the New World in the eighteenth century, they steered clear of cities and settled in rural areas. Doing so allowed the Amish to distance themselves from the innumerable perils of what they called “worldliness.” For members of the faith, the call for separation from the corruption of the world at large came most clearly from Romans 12:1–2, which advises, “Be not conformed to this world, but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind that ye may prove what is that good and acceptable and perfect will of God.” No single admonition from the scriptures was more central to the lives of the Amish who fled Europe for the New World, and it would remain a basic tenet of their faith for the remainder of the millennium.

Despite their best efforts, the Amish were unable to distance themselves completely from the tentacles of state power. Throughout the early and middle parts of the twentieth century, members of Amish communities in several states—including Iowa, Kansas, Ohio, and Pennsylvania—clashed with state authorities who attempted to force them to comply with compulsory school attendance laws and related measures (such as curricula and the certification of teachers). The Amish resisted such laws in part because they seemed to threaten the faith’s tradition of not sending children to school beyond the age of fourteen. Several legal cases resulted from disputes over the application of school attendance laws to the Amish, among them Kansas v. Garber, 419 P. 2d 896 (Kan. 1966). In that case, the Kansas Supreme Court ruled that such measures did not impose an unconstitutional burden on the religious liberty of the Amish.

A trio of Amish farmers from Wisconsin fared better than their Kansas brethren when they challenged the constitutionality of their state’s school attendance law. In its landmark religious liberty opinion in Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205 (1972), the U.S. Supreme Court held that compulsory attendance measures did in fact burden the right of the Amish to exercise their religion freely. According to Chief Justice Warren Burger, who wrote for the high court’s majority striking down the application of the law on the Amish, the impact of the statute on the Amish was “not only severe, but inescapable, for the Wisconsin law affirmatively compels them, under threat of criminal sanction, to perform acts undeniably at odds with fundamental tenets of their religious beliefs.”

Yoder marked in many ways a high point not only for religious liberty jurisprudence in general but also for the Amish in particular. Never again would the courts provide such stout protections for free-exercise rights. This was demonstrated in the next significant Amish case to reach the U.S. Supreme Court. United States v. Lee, 455 U.S. 252 (1982), involved an Amish man who claimed that he deserved a faith-based exemption to paying Social Security taxes for his employees. According to Chief Justice Burger, who wrote for the Court’s majority, whereas the circumstances of Yoder had lent themselves to permitting a narrow accommodation for members of one particular religious group, the complexities of the tax system involved in Lee made providing faith-based exemptions a hopelessly complicated endeavor. “Because the broad public interest in maintaining a sound tax system is of such high order,” he wrote in the Court’s denial of the Amish man’s claim, “religious belief in conflict with the payment of taxes affords no basis for resisting the tax.”

The Yoder precedent proved more useful when the Amish opposed the application of state laws mandating the display of bright red and orange reflective triangles on slow-moving vehicles (SMVs). In 1996, the Wisconsin Supreme Court ruled in Wisconsin v. Miller (538 N.W. 2d 573, Wisc. 1995) that application of that state’s SMV measure to the Amish—who had argued that placing the SMV emblem on their buggies was too “worldly”—violated their religious liberty. In determining that the state constitution’s protections of conscience shielded the Amish, the court relied in part on the interpretive framework established by the U.S. Supreme Court in Yoder and its forebears. Yoder had proved similarly important in earlier SMV emblem cases in Kentucky, Ohio, and Michigan.

Such cases are all the more noteworthy because the Amish are famously hesitant to “go to law.” This disinclination is rooted in large part in their adherence to the ethical principles detailed in the Sermon on the Mount. There, as he counsels meekness and nonresistance, Christ admonishes: “If any man sue you at law, and take away thy coat, let him have thy cloak also.” To the Amish, being sued or prosecuted is not quite the same as suing, for defendants in legal cases typically have not chosen to invoke the law; in most instances, they have been dragged into the courts by other people. Not all members of the faith approve of these dealings with the courts, but some justify them on the grounds that the Amish typically are defendants in criminal actions rather than plaintiffs in civil matters.

SHAWN FRANCIS PETERS

References and Further Reading

- Hostetler, John. Amish Society, 4th ed. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1993.
- Kraybill, Donald. The Riddle of Amish Culture, rev. ed. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2001.
- Peters, Shawn Francis. The Yoder Case: Religious Freedom, Education, and Parental Rights. Lawrence, KS: University Press of Kansas, 2003.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Kansas v. Garber, 419 P. 2d 896 (Kan. 1966)
United States v. Lee 455 U.S. 252 (1982)
Wisconsin v. Miller 538 N.W. 2d 573 (Wisc. 1995)
Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205 (1972)

AMNESTY INTERNATIONAL

Amnesty International (Amnesty), an organization dedicated to advancing human rights and ending arbitrary detention, has been active worldwide for over forty years. By the early 1990s, Amnesty had worked on behalf of 33,500 prisoners and has since added to its long list of successes. With hundreds of researchers and full-time employees combating injustice around the globe, Amnesty International has become among the world's most visible Non-Governmental Organizations (NGOs).

The group has articulated four major objectives: (1) securing the release of prisoners of conscience (Amnesty defines a prisoner of conscience as one who is imprisoned on the basis of sex, religion, national origin, or belief who has not used or advocated violence.); (2) fair trials for political prisoners; (3) an end to torture, cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment; and (4) an end to executions. It pressures governments to comply with international law obligations embodied in treaties such as the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which nearly all nations have ratified.

Amnesty was the brainchild of Peter Benenson, a Catholic lawyer of Jewish descent. Having been previously involved in human rights advocacy, Benenson, at the age of forty, was spurred into action in 1961 at reports that two Portuguese students had been sentenced to prison for raising their glasses in public and toasting to freedom. He recruited Eric Baker, a prominent Quaker, and Louis Blom-Cooper, an internationally known lawyer, and they began an effort to pressure Portugal's Salazar regime to release the students as well as to address and publicize the status of political and religious prisoners throughout the world.

The campaign was called "An Appeal for Amnesty, 1961" and was launched when the influential liberal British Sunday newspaper The Observer agreed to provide a platform for an exposé highlighting the plight of eight prisoners of conscience entitled "The Forgotten Prisoners." The article attracted worldwide media attention along with a flood of letters and donations. What began as a one-year campaign soon morphed into a permanent effort. Branches soon appeared in France, Ireland, Greece, Switzerland, Norway, the United States, and others. In over 160 countries Amnesty volunteers are now working to further the organization's goals.

The group has campaigned for causes such as exposing the use of child soldiers in Africa, responsible economic development and globalization, the rights of refugees, and arms control. Amnesty was particularly active in documenting and exposing human rights abuses in Argentina during its period of military rule and in Chile under Gen. August Pinochet. More recently, it has successfully campaigned for a permanent International Criminal Court, whose statute was adopted by the U.N. General Assembly in 1998. Amnesty has assured its impartiality and independence by refusing to accept monetary contributions from governments.

Amnesty has developed a successful formula of aggressive on-site investigation to uncover abuses, followed by an intensive letter-writing campaign supplemented by posters, advertisements, and media spots designed to publicize human rights violations and to pressure governments to end them. Its efforts have paid off. In 1963, of the 770 individuals "adopted" by Amnesty International, 140 had been freed from detention. In 1975, 1,403 of its adopted prisoners had been released. In 1978, the group won the United Nations Human Rights Prize for "outstanding contributions in the field of human rights," and by 1992 its membership had exceeded one million.

The group has attracted members and publicity in innovative ways. During the 1980s, Amnesty began to organize rock concerts designed to spread awareness of human rights issues. The 1986 "Conspiracy of Hope" concert sponsored by Amnesty's U.S. section was followed in 1988 by the "Human Rights Now!" concert tour (featuring Sting, Bruce Springsteen, and others) to mark the fortieth anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

Although its primary focus has often been elsewhere in the world, Amnesty has been involved in the United States from the beginning. Of the eight individuals profiled in its 1961 launch piece, one of them was Ashton Jones, a sixty-five-year-old minister who had been beaten, harassed, and imprisoned several times in Louisiana and Texas for his activities in support of civil rights for African Americans.

Its activities in the United States, however, have long focused on the issue of capital punishment. In 1965, Amnesty circulated a resolution at the United Nations that sought to suspend or outright abolish executions for peacetime offenses. In 1977, the group gathered delegates from over fifty countries to Stockholm, Sweden, to denounce the death penalty, labeling it a cruel, arbitrary, and irrevocable punishment that does not deter crime. In this sense, Amnesty's opposition to the death penalty is well received by domestic opponents of capital punishment, who argue that it constitutes a type of “cruel and unusual” punishment proscribed by the Eighth Amendment. Amnesty has been particularly critical of the United States for executing child offenders—those under eighteen at the time of their crime—which Amnesty characterizes as being “in contravention of international law.” Moreover, it also decries execution of criminals with histories of mental illness.

More recently, the group has been particularly vocal in denouncing U.S. government tactics in prosecuting what President George W. Bush had dubbed the Global War on Terror, or GWOT. Amnesty has focused particularly heavily on revelations of torture at the Abu Ghraib detention facility in Iraq (see Abu Ghraib entry) and has accused the American administration of sanctioning interrogation techniques that violate the Convention on Torture. The detentions of suspected terrorists in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, has also been criticized. Although the United States maintains that detainees at the facility do not qualify for protections under the Geneva Conventions and may be held indefinitely without judicial review, Amnesty has protested the prolonged detentions without charge or access to U.S. courts. In its 2005 annual report, the organization pilloried President Bush’s proposal to try certain suspects using military tribunals and has similarly denounced the practice of renditions—in which suspects in American hands are transferred to third-party countries to be interrogated and possibly tortured.

ANDREW FINKELMAN

References and Further Reading

Power, Jonathan. Amnesty International: The Human Rights Story. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1981.
Amnesty International Website, available at: <http://www.amnesty.org>.

AMSTERDAM, ANTHONY G. (1935–)

Anthony Amsterdam, law professor and opponent of the death penalty, earned an A.B. from Haverford College in 1957 and an L.L.B. in 1960 from the University of Pennsylvania. Amsterdam became an ardent opponent of capital punishment in 1963, after Justice Arthur Goldberg had written an unusual dissenting opinion on cases that had not been accepted for review. Goldberg’s dissent addressed six cases in which the defendants had been sentenced to death and noted that the death penalty was barbaric and constituted excessive punishment. Amsterdam, then a University of Pennsylvania law professor, formed a partnership with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People Legal Defense and Education Fund to mount a challenge to the constitutionality of the death penalty.

Amsterdam successfully argued for the abolishment of the death penalty in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), when the Supreme Court ruled that the death penalty as then applied was inherently arbitrary and therefore unconstitutional. However, this moratorium on the death penalty did not last long. In 1976, the Court in Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153 (1976), ruled that Georgia’s new capital punishment system had sufficiently dealt with the problem of arbitrariness.

While perhaps most noted for his argument against the death penalty, Amsterdam has litigated cases involving claims of free speech and the press, privacy, and equality for racial minorities and the poor. His teaching career has included teaching positions at the University of Pennsylvania, Stanford University, and, as of 1981, New York University, where he developed the ground-breaking course Lawyering Theory Colloquium, which researches how law school experiences later affect lawyering roles and behavior. Throughout his career he has extended pro bono services to numerous civil rights, legal aid, and public defender organizations. Professor Amsterdam has established himself as a leading American legal scholar by writing extensively on issues such as legal pedagogy, experimental education, and cultural influences on Supreme Court opinions and rulings.

BA-SHEN WELCH

References and Further Reading

Amsterdam, Anthony G., and Jerome Bruner. Minding the Law. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2000.
Tushnet, Mark. Constitutional Issues: The Death Penalty. New York: Facts on File, Inc., 1994.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972)
Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153 (1976)

ANARCHY

See Anti-Anarchy and Antisyndicalism Acts.

ANDERS v. CALIFORNIA, 386 U.S. 738 (1967)

In Douglas v. California, 372 U.S. 353 (1963), the Supreme Court held that an indigent defendant was entitled to have counsel appointed to handle the appeal of his conviction. Anders v. California, 386 U.S. 738 (1967), then addressed an inevitable result of Douglas: a situation in which assigned counsel found no meritorious issues to present on appeal.

In Anders, the defendant was convicted of marijuana possession and requested appointed counsel on appeal. The assigned attorney reviewed the record and consulted with his client before determining the appeal lacked merit; the lawyer advised the court by letter to this effect and asked to withdraw. The defendant's request for another attorney was denied.

The Supreme Court acknowledged that assigned counsel should be allowed to withdraw from "wholly frivolous" cases, but deemed the procedure utilized by the lawyer in this case inadequate. Rather, the Court recommended that, first, after reviewing the record and finding the case frivolous, assigned counsel should notify the court and ask to withdraw, including with that request a brief referring to anything in the record that might arguably support the appeal. Second, the court should examine the case to decide whether it is wholly frivolous. If the court concurs with the attorney's assessment, it should grant the request to withdraw and dismiss the appeal subject to certain limitations; however, if the court finds any of the legal points arguable on the merits, then it must afford the defendant with the assistance of counsel to argue the appeal.

Whereas Anders set in motion the procedure for grappling with a "no-merit" appeal—and states responded by creating procedures along the lines of the Court's suggestions—the case failed to offer guidance as to what constitutes a frivolous issue, leaving that question for a later day.

DANIEL S. MEDWED

References and Further Reading

- Bentle, Ursula, and Eve Cary. Appellate Advocacy: Principles and Practice, 4th ed. 2004, 304–332.
 Duggan, James E., and Andrew W. Moeller. "Make Way for the ABA: Smith v. Robbins Clears a Path for Anders Alternatives." Journal of Applied Practice and Process 3 (2001):65.
 Warner, Martha C., Anders in the Fifty States: Some Appellants' Equal Protection Is More Equal Than Others, 23 Fla. St. U. L. Rev. 625 (1996).

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Douglas v. California*, 372 U.S. 353 (1963)
Ellis v. United States, 356 U.S. 674 (1958)
Eskridge v. Washington State Board, 357 U.S. 214 (1958)
Lane v. Brown, 372 U.S. 477 (1963)

See also Due Process; Equal Protection Clause and Religious Freedom; Ineffective Assistance of Counsel; Right to Counsel

ANNE HUTCHINSON TRIAL

The Puritans of the early Massachusetts Bay Colony formed a tightly knit community with a common belief system enforced by civil and ecclesiastical law. Yet, as the colony began to grow, divergent interpretations of scripture and the relationship between society and religion began to emerge, to the consternation of the Puritan clergy. Among the dissenters was Anne Hutchinson (1591–1643), whose radical interpretations of church doctrine directly challenged the authority of the Puritan establishment to regulate the secular and religious lives of the Massachusetts Bay settlers. Hutchinson was a follower of Minister John Cotton, whose teachings emphasized salvation by grace, bestowed directly by God upon worthy individuals, over salvation by works, which implied obedience to religious and secular authority. Hutchinson interpreted the teachings of Cotton as suggesting that those possessed with divine grace are not obligated to obey the laws of church or state. In defiance of Puritan traditions barring women from the pulpit, Hutchinson preached this doctrine, known as antinomianism, during informal meetings in her home, drawing the ire of Puritan authorities for the content of her teachings and the fact that her congregations included both men and women.

Puritan authorities first unsuccessfully tried to get Hutchinson to change her views, then arrested her brother-in-law on heresy charges. Yet Hutchinson persisted in her teachings and was arrested for heresy in November 1637 and sentenced to banishment from the Massachusetts Bay Colony, a sentence that was deferred pending an ecclesiastical trial held in March 1638. During her trial, Hutchinson befuddled her Puritan inquisitors with her intellectual acuity, engaging them in spirited theological debate for several days before declaring that her beliefs were the product of divine revelation, a clear heresy under Puritan law. She was excommunicated from the church and the sentence of banishment was imposed. A pregnant Hutchinson then fled on foot with her husband and children to the colony of Rhode Island, which had been founded by another Puritan dissenter, Roger Williams, banished from Massachusetts three years earlier under similar circumstances. There Hutchinson and her followers established a settlement that would become Portsmouth, Rhode Island. Following the death of her husband in 1642, Hutchinson moved to New York, where she and all but one of her family members were killed by Native Americans in 1643.

The trial of Anne Hutchinson is often cited as a seminal event in the shaping of American concepts of religious freedom and gender equality. By challenging the theocratic government of the Massachusetts Bay Colony, Anne Hutchinson followed in the footsteps of fellow outcast Roger Williams in questioning the relationship between church and state and the role of civil authority in regulating the private beliefs of individuals, giving rise to a longstanding debate that would inspire constitutional prohibitions of government establishment of religion in the new United States, as well as myriad legislative acts and court decisions that collectively established clear boundaries between American religious and civil institutions. By defying the circumscribed roles assigned to women in Puritan society, Hutchinson also became a pioneer in the struggle for women's rights.

MICHAEL H. BURCHETT

References and Further Reading

- Battis, Emery. Saints and Sectaries: Anne Hutchinson and the Antinomian Controversy in the Massachusetts Bay Colony. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1962.
- Cooper, James F., Jr. "Anne Hutchinson and the 'Lay Rebellion' against the Clergy." The New England Quarterly 61(3) (September 1988):381.
- LaPlante, Eve. American Jezebel: The Uncommon Life of Anne Hutchinson, the Woman who Defied the Puritans. San Francisco: Harper San Francisco, 2004.

See also Puritans; Quakers and Religious Liberty

ANONYMITY AND FREE SPEECH

Anonymity has long been an important issue in American politics and jurisprudence. The key tension in American anonymity law is between the potentially chilling effects on speech stemming from compelled disclosure of identity and the desire to hold individuals accountable for harmful speech. But while early cases like Lewis Publishing Co. v. Morgan, 229 U.S. 288 (1913), drew this balance in favor of accountability, holding that mandatory disclosure requirements advanced knowledge by preventing deceptive propaganda, modern anonymity law strongly supports the right to speak and associate anonymously. This rich constitutional tradition of support for anonymous speech and association reflects America's historical experience with persecution and ostracism of "un-American" communists, members of disfavored religious sects, and advocates for racial equality. Today, anonymity has again become controversial with the rise of the Internet and privacy-enhancing technologies like encryption.

At its simplest, anonymous speech is speech that is not attributed to an author. But anonymity is more than the mere concealment of identity. An author might use a pseudonym to establish an identity distinct from his or her "true" identity; some individual framers of the Constitution used pseudonyms in writing the essays that later came to be known as the Federalist Papers. The U.S. Supreme Court in McIntyre v. Ohio Elections Commission, 514 U.S. 334 (1995), treated this aspect of anonymity—an author's choice about whether and how to identify himself or herself—as part of the "content" of the speech, subject to strict scrutiny.

In the modern era, the Supreme Court has consistently protected anonymity as an aspect of the First Amendment freedoms of speech and association. The basic theme of this jurisprudence has been the benefit of anonymity to free speech. In Talley v. California, 362 U.S. 60 (1960), which invalidated a state law restricting the distribution of any handbill unless it included the name and address of the person who printed, wrote, compiled, manufactured, or distributed it, the Supreme Court noted that "[a]nonymous pamphlets, leaflets, brochures and even books have played an important role in the progress of mankind," and that "identification and fear of reprisal might deter perfectly peaceful discussions of public matters of importance."

The Supreme Court has also been protective of anonymous association. In NAACP v. Alabama ex rel. Patterson, 357 U.S. 449 (1958), the Court refused to permit the state of Alabama to compel the state NAACP chapter to produce its membership records, saying that advocacy is "undeniably enhanced by group association," and recognizing "the vital relationship between freedom to associate and privacy in one's association." Well aware of the racial animus in the South, the Court noted that disclosure "may induce members to withdraw . . . and dissuade others from joining it because of fear of exposure of their beliefs shown through their associations and of the consequences of this exposure." Similarly, in Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U.S. 479 (1960), the Court invalidated an Arkansas statute requiring public school teachers to reveal to the state annually their group memberships and contributions for the previous five years, noting that "[e]ven if there were no disclosure to the general public, the pressure upon a teacher to avoid any ties which might displease those who control his professional destiny would be constant and heavy."

Today, the accountability or traceability aspect of anonymity has become more important as civil litigants and law enforcement agencies seek to discover Internet users' identities in defamation, intellectual property, and criminal cases. The law has continued to be relatively protective of anonymity; for instance, in Columbia Insurance Co. v. Seescandy.com, 185

F.R.D. 573 (N.D. Cal. 1999), a federal district court observed that litigants' need to seek redress "must be balanced against the legitimate and valuable right to participate in online forums anonymously or pseudonymously This ability to speak one's mind without the burden of the other party knowing all the facts about one's identity can foster open communication and robust debate. Furthermore, it permits persons to obtain information relevant to a sensitive or intimate condition without fear of embarrassment." Modern communications technology, on the other hand, tends to expose identity unless speakers take precautions such as using encryption, anonymous remailers, or anonymous proxies. Whether governments will restrict the use of such precautionary technologies remains an open question.

LEE TIEN

References and Further Reading

- Froomkin, A. Michael, Anonymity and Its Enemies, 1995 J. Online L. art. 4.
 Kreimer, Seth F., Sunlight, Secrets, and Scarlet Letters: The Tension Between Privacy and Disclosure in Constitutional Law, U. Pa. L. Rev. 140 (1991): 1.
 Marx, Gary. "Identity and Anonymity: Some Conceptual Distinctions and Issues for Research." In Documenting Individual Identity, J. Caplan and J. Torpey, eds. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2001.
 Thompson, E. P. "The Crime of Anonymity." In Albion's Fatal Tree: Crime and Society in Eighteenth-Century England. 1975, 255.
 Tien, Lee, Who's Afraid of Anonymous Speech? McIntyre and the Internet, Or. L. Rev. 75 (1996): 117.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Columbia Insurance Co. v. Seescandy.com*, 185 F.R.D. 573 (N.D. Cal. 1999)
Lewis Publishing Co. v. Morgan, 229 U.S. 288 (1913)
McIntyre v. Ohio Elections Commission, 514 U.S. 334 (1995)
NAACP v. Alabama ex rel. Patterson, 357 U.S. 449 (1958)
Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U.S. 479 (1960)
Talley v. California, 362 U.S. 60 (1960)
Watchtower Bible and Tract Society v. Village of Stratton, 536 U.S. 150 (2002)

ANONYMITY IN ON-LINE COMMUNICATION

The current Internet architecture allows most on-line communications to be traced back to the author's computer. That tracing process depends on the cooperation of Internet Service Providers (ISPs). Changes in the Internet architecture, however, could someday end the debate over on-line anonymity, by evolving to a state of perfect identification or perfect anonymity.

Today, however, most legal challenges involving on-line anonymity involve identity seekers who demand, usually through a subpoena, that ISPs disclose identifying information about their customers. Some statutes and judicial decisions require little more than the identity seeker's signature to support its subpoena. Authors have challenged the constitutionality of such subpoenas in a variety of contexts, and a few courts have required the identity seeker to establish the merits of its claim before ordering disclosure.

Legislatures and courts considering whether to protect on-line anonymity must balance competing interests. On-line anonymity fosters free speech and association and allows authors to maintain their privacy. The Supreme Court has recognized the traditional value of anonymous speech in the United States. On the other hand, on-line anonymity can immunize authors from civil or criminal liability and can allow criminals and terrorists to communicate secretly.

Much of the justification for protecting on-line anonymity in the United States derives from the First Amendment. Other countries, however, may have different views on the value of on-line anonymity. International organizations may eventually debate whether to recognize protection for on-line anonymity, just as the United Nations and the European Union have recognized protection of privacy rights.

SHAUN B. SPENCER

References and Further Reading

- Nicoll, Chris et al., eds. Digital Anonymity and the Law: Tensions and Dimensions. The Hague: T. M. C. Asser Press, 2003.
 Sobel, David L., The Process That "John Doe" Is Due: Addressing the Legal Challenge to Internet Anonymity, Virginia Journal of Law & Technology 5 (2000): 3, <http://www.vjolt.net/vol5/symposium/v5i1a3-Sobel.html>.
 Spencer, Shaun B., CyberSLAPP Suits and John Doe Subpoenas: Balancing Anonymity and Accountability in Cyberspace, John Marshall Journal of Computer & Information Law (2001): 493–521.

ANSLINGER, HARRY JACOB (1892–1975)

Harry Anslinger was born in Altoona, Pennsylvania, the son of an immigrant railroad worker. He earned an associate degree in engineering and business management and then went to work for the Pennsylvania Railroad as an investigator. After rising to a captain of the railroad police, he worked for a variety of military and police organizations around the world between 1917 and 1928, with a focus on stopping a growing international trade in narcotics. After a two-year tour with the Bureau of Prohibition—where Anslinger won a reputation as an honest and incorruptible agent in an agency noted for corruption—he became the first Commissioner of the Federal Bureau of Narcotics (FBN). He held that position for the next thirty-two years, a term rivaled only by J. Edgar Hoover's tenure at the FBI.

Anslinger claimed that he knew what his life's work would be from the age of twelve, when he heard the screams of a young morphine addict, screams that ended only when another boy returned from the pharmacist with more of the drug. Anslinger reported that he was appalled at how easy it was for children to secure such strong drugs.

He became an inveterate foe of all drug use, but especially of marijuana. In the 1920s, a movement of legislators, yellow journalists, and citizen groups started pressing for a federal ban on the use of marijuana, which supposedly played a major role in the corruption of youth, especially young girls. Scholars note that in addition to the moral elements of the crusade, chemical companies with an interest in eliminating hemp products, and southerners wanting to control cheap Mexican labor, also joined in the clamor.

William Randolph Hearst, whose papers led the fight, offered Anslinger space in his papers and magazines, and Anslinger gladly availed himself of the opportunity. He filled article after article with scare stories that not only warned against the alleged dangers of hemp, but also were overtly racist. "Colored students at the University of Minnesota partying with female students (white) smoking [marijuana] and getting their sympathy with stories of racial persecution. Result pregnancy." In another story he wrote that "Two Negroes took a girl fourteen years old and kept her for two days under the influence of marijuana. Upon recovery she was found to be suffering from syphilis."

Medical opinion at that time did not believe marijuana to be so dangerous a drug, and some doctors argued that it had beneficial medicinal properties. Anslinger made sure that when there were legislative hearings on drug bills, at the state or the national level, members of the medical profession did not receive notice until it was too late for them to testify. When the American Medical Association (AMA) failed to appear before a congressional hearing, Anslinger lied to the committee and told them that the AMA favored strict regulation of marijuana.

In August 1937, Congress passed the Marijuana Tax Act, which provided the first block in erecting a comprehensive scheme for federal regulation of the drug. It classified marijuana as a narcotic and thus gave Anslinger's FBN still another target to go after. For the next twenty-five years Anslinger spearheaded the federal drive against drugs. Ironically, there is some evidence that in the early 1950s Anslinger secretly supplied morphine to Senator Joseph McCarthy.

Thin-skinned at all times, Anslinger did not handle criticism well and, later in his career, was reprimanded for failing to desist from harassing critics of his policies, especially Indiana University professor Alfred Lindsmith, whose books and articles attacked the war on drugs and Anslinger's leadership of it.

In 1962, Anslinger retired at the mandatory age of seventy and, for the next two years, served as a member of the American delegation to the United Nations. By then he had become completely blind and suffered from a variety of ailments, including an enlarged prostate and angina. Some thought it ironic—even hypocritical—that in his later years he became a regular user of morphine to control his pain.

MELVIN I. UROFSKY

References and Further Reading

- McWilliams, John C. The Protectors: Anslinger and the Federal Bureau of Narcotics (1930–1962). Newark, NJ: University of Delaware Press, 1990.
- Sloman, Larry. Reefer Madness: A History of Marijuana in America. Indianapolis, IN: Bobbs-Merrill, 1979.

ANTHONY, SUSAN B. (1820–1906)

Susan B. Anthony, reformer and women's suffragist, was born in Adams, Massachusetts, to Daniel Anthony and Lucy Read, one of eight children. When Anthony was six, the family moved to Battenville, New York, where Daniel Anthony managed a large cotton mill. Due to Daniel Anthony's Quaker heritage, the family believed in egalitarian education for their children, and Susan attended Deborah Moulson's Female Seminary. The Anthonys prospered until the panic of 1837, when the mill closed, the children returned from boarding school, and they lost their home. Susan aided the family by teaching, but in 1845, the family moved to a farm in Rochester, New York.

After the move, Anthony taught for a decade, ending her teaching career as headmistress of the female section of Canajoharie Academy. As a teacher, Anthony enjoyed her independence but recognized the unequal pay scale between men and women. In 1849, Anthony gave her first public speech at a Daughters of Temperance meeting, starting her involvement in reform. The same year, Anthony returned to Rochester to manage the family farm and continued her involvement in temperance reform and became dedicated to the antislavery cause. Within a few years, Anthony met some of the most prominent abolitionists and women's rights advocates—Frederick Douglass, Stephen and Abby Foster, Isaac and Amy Post, and Elizabeth Cady Stanton. Stanton called the 1848 Seneca Falls Women's Rights Convention and, although a wife and mother, was dedicated to reforming laws to benefit women. Stanton and Anthony forged a friendship that would last more than fifty years.

When Anthony realized that women were welcome in the temperance movement only if they were taciturn and did not expect egalitarian treatment, she and Stanton founded the Women's State Temperance Society in 1852, but left when men voted them out of their elected positions. The two wove the women's rights and temperance movements together, going before the state legislature (the first time a women's group in the United States did this) calling for temperance laws and, later, coeducation, women's suffrage, liberal divorce laws, and married women's property rights. The women donned bloomers, an outfit associated with women radicals, and called numerous women's rights conventions. Anthony traveled extensively throughout New York, lecturing, petitioning, organizing, and fundraising. Anthony's energy never ceased; she traveled most of her next forty years, campaigning for women's rights. In 1855, she lectured at least once in each of New York's sixty-two counties and was called the movement's Napoleon.

In 1856, the American Anti-Slavery Society hired Anthony as New York's chief agent. She served the society until the Civil War, but was disheartened with the passage of the Fifteenth Amendment in 1870, which enfranchised former male slaves but ignored women. Anthony realized that women's suffrage might be won by the next generation.

Anthony worked for women's rights in numerous ways: she gave lectures; petitioned the state legislature and Congress; organized state, national, and international conventions; and formed the National Woman Suffrage Association with Stanton, which later merged with its rival, the American Woman Suffrage Association. She also wrote and distributed pamphlets, published the Revolution newspaper, had her biography written, and penned History of Woman Suffrage with Stanton and Matilda Joslyn Gage.

One of the most notable women's rights efforts consisted of women voting, in an attempt to amend laws judicially. The suffragists tested the Constitution through the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments, which linked citizenship and enfranchisement. Since women were citizens, several dozen asserted their right to vote. When they were denied the right, they intended to take their case to the Supreme Court. Anthony tried the theory in 1872 and was, surprisingly, permitted to cast a ballot. Several weeks later she was arrested for violating a federal law. Anthony's trial was a sham; it was rescheduled in another county because the judge believed she prejudiced any possible jury. Judge Ward Hunt wrote his decision before the trial began and ordered the jury to find Anthony guilty. Clearly, Anthony did not have a fair trial. At its conclusion, Hunt only fined her, refusing to put the suffragist in jail. Because of this, she could not carry her case to the Supreme Court based on applying for a writ of habeas corpus. When Hunt asked if she had any comments at the end of the trial, Anthony lambasted him and refused to pay the $100 fine.

Undaunted by her trial ordeal, Anthony remained dedicated to her cause. She presided over the National-American Woman Suffrage Association from 1892 until her eightieth birthday in 1900. Anthony remained active in the women's rights movement, traveling until a month before her death in Rochester. Her legacy is documented in her speeches and books but most importantly in the passage of the Nineteenth Amendment, which granted women the right to vote, in 1920. Anthony was the first nonallegorical woman to appear on U.S. currency, with the Susan B. Anthony dollar minted from 1979 to 1981 and in 1999.

HEIDI SCOTT GIUSTO

References and Further Reading

- Anthony, Katharine Susan. Susan B. Anthony; Her Personal History and Her Era. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1954.
- Anthony, Susan Brownell. An Account of the Proceedings on the Trial of Susan B. Anthony on the Charge of Illegal Voting, at the Presidential Election in November, 1872, and on the Trial of Beverly W. Jones, Edwin T. Marsh and William B. Hall. Rochester, NY: Daily Democrat and Chronicle Book Print, 1874.
- Anthony, Susan Brownell, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, and Matilda Joslyn Gage, eds. History of Woman Suffrage, reprint ed. Salem, NH: Ayer Co., 1985.
- Barry, Kathleen. Susan B. Anthony: A Biography of a Singular Feminist. New York: New York University Press, 1988.
- Dorr, Rheta Childe. Susan B. Anthony, the Woman Who Changed the Mind of a Nation. New York: Frederick A. Stokes Company, 1928.
- DuBois, Ellen C., ed. Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Susan B. Anthony, Correspondence, Writings, Speeches. New York: Schocken Books, 1981.
- Flexner, Eleanor. Century of Struggle: The Women's Rights Movement in the United States, rev. ed. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1996.
- Gordon, Ann D., ed. Papers of Elizabeth Cady Stanton and Susan B. Anthony. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1997.

Harper, Ida Husted. Life and Work of Susan B. Anthony. Indianapolis, IN: Hollenbeck Press, 1898–1908.

Stanton, Elizabeth Cady. Eighty Years and More. New York: European Publishing Company, 1898.

See also American Anti-Slavery Society; Douglass, Frederick; Habeas Corpus: Modern History; Stanton, Elizabeth Cady

ANTI-ABOLITIONIST GAG RULES

The First Amendment to the Constitution provides for the right of the people “to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.” Starting in the 1830s, opponents of slavery inundated Congress each session with petitions seeking to end slavery wherever the federal government had jurisdiction, such as the territories and the District of Columbia. What had started as a trickle swelled to a flood, and in 1837 and 1838, abolitionists sent more than 410,000 petitions to Congress bearing more than one million signatures.

Southerners responded with outrage, and in 1836 Representative Henry L. Pinckney of South Carolina proposed a “gag rule” that provided that all petitions relating to slavery “shall, without being either printed or referred, be laid upon the table, and that no further action whatever shall be taken thereon.” The rule passed by a large majority but not without opposition, especially from former president John Quincy Adams, now a congressman from Massachusetts. “I hold the resolution to be a direct violation of the Constitution,” he declared, and of “the rules of this House, and the rights of my constituents.”

The House renewed the Pinckney gag at each new session until 1840, when it became a standing rule. At every session, Old Man Eloquent, as Adams was nicknamed, protested, often alone, that the rule was unconstitutional. Despite threats of censure and expulsion from his proslavery colleagues, Adams gradually gained support from other northern congressmen. Adams did not agree with many of the petitions, he told the House, but he held the right to petition as one of the inalienable freedoms handed down to Americans from their English heritage. The English Bill of Rights of 1689 had confirmed this right, as had the resolutions of the Stamp Act Congress of 1765 and the First Amendment.

Finally, in 1844, Adams’s perennial resolution calling for the elimination of the gag rule carried the day.

MELVIN I. UROFSKY

References and Further Reading

Bemis, Samuel Flagg. John Quincy Adams and the Union. New York: Knopf, 1956.

ANTI-ABORTION PROTEST AND FREEDOM OF SPEECH

The concept of a “buffer zone” was first raised in the 1990s. It was based on two things: increasingly violent and intrusive protests by anti-abortion forces and clinic actions to try to keep protesters a certain distance away from the clinics. In response, the groups filed counterchallenges in court, stating that their First Amendment rights to freedom of speech were being violated.

The central issue became one of how to differentiate between noninjurious and nonthreatening speech, which could be allowed under the First Amendment, and actions that effectively prohibited clients from entering clinics, which were outlawed under the federal FACE Act of 1994. The first Supreme Court case on the issue was Madsen vs. Women’s Health Center, 512 U.S. 753 (1994). The case started with Operation Rescue protests at the Melbourne, Florida, Aware Woman Center for Choice in 1991. These consisted of street marches and slogans shouted through bullhorns, directly confronting clients, following clinic staff home to demonstrate against them, and blockading clinic doors (which was outlawed by the 1994 FACE Act). When the clinic applied to the state court for an injunction against such protests, the court granted it and limited demonstrators to participating outside a “buffer zone” consisting of a 36-foot radius from the clinic; they were also prohibited from making loud noises or displaying graphic images near the facility. It also prohibited protesters from approaching patients who were within 300 feet of the facility and from demonstrating within 300 feet of any clinic employee’s residence, thus upholding a type of buffer zone at employees’ homes as well. The court specified that it did not seek to limit protestors’ First Amendment rights (Mezey, 2003, 266–268). This decision was upheld by the Florida Supreme Court in 1992.

Operation Rescue and other groups appealed the case to the Supreme Court, arguing that the restrictions were based on the content of the speech and therefore impermissible under the First Amendment. In its 1994 Madsen decision, the Supreme Court upheld some of the previous restrictions and struck others down. The significance of the case was found largely in its formulation of a new test for restricting public speech by court injunction based on a heightened level of constitutional scrutiny—that of a “significant” government interest. The Court did not grant Operation Rescue’s desire for the highest level of constitutional scrutiny, strict scrutiny, to be used. However, the fact that the level of constitutional scrutiny was raised from the lowest, minimal level meant that speech restrictions would be harder to uphold in the future.

The new test entailed that an injunction (restriction or prohibition) against speech would be upheld unless it prevented more types of speech than necessary to promote a significant government interest (www.firstamendmentcenter.org). In this decision, the Supreme Court upheld the 36-foot buffer zone, provided it did not affect private property, and the prohibitions against loud noise within earshot of the clinic and within 300 feet of employees' homes. On the other hand, the decision struck down the previous prohibitions on displaying images outside clinics. It also significantly narrowed the restrictions concerning the 300-foot buffer zones around clinics and employees' homes, overturning the prohibitions against approaching clients within 300 feet of the clinic or "peacefully picketing" within 300 feet of employee residences. Overall, the Court stated that its decision did not impermissibly restrict speech but rather "the activities of the demonstrators who had repeatedly violated the earlier injunctions" (Mezey, 267). According to this formulation, the Court was not restricting the content of the speech and not privileging one point of view over another.

Court challenges since Madsen have focused on the type of activity to be prohibited, the type of buffer zone allowed (whether a fixed parameter or a "floating" one related to protesters' following a moving car or individual), and the question of whether unrelated, privately owned property such as a business or house may be included in a clinic's buffer zone against the owner's will. The 1997 Supreme Court case, Schenk vs. Pro-Choice Network of NY, 519 U.S. 357 (1997), focused on the first two sets of questions. This case concerned protests by Operation Rescue and affiliate organizations against physicians and clinics near Rochester and Buffalo and included the types of blockades and obstructions rendered illegal by the FACE Act of 1994. The other question had to do with the fact that the federal district court had issued an injunction against protesters' actions within a fixed 15-foot buffer zone away from the clinic as well as against their activity within a 15-foot radius from a moving car or person.

Based on the Madsen test, the Supreme Court found in this case that the fixed buffer zone did not "burden any more speech than necessary to serve the government interests of ensuring public safety and order and protecting women's freedom to seek abortions or other health-related services." On the other hand, the floating buffer zone was overly broad because it could include those "simply lining the sidewalks to demonstrate peacefully" and thus was struck down.

In the Supreme Court case of Hill vs. CO, 530 U.S. 703 (2000), the Court upheld a buffer zone passed by the Colorado Legislature in 1993 requiring protesters to remain 8 feet away from clients who were within 100 feet of the clinic. Anti-abortion activists challenged the statute three times on First Amendment grounds, losing at the Court of Appeals level in Colorado in 1997, the Colorado Supreme Court in 1999, and the U.S. Supreme Court in the 2000 case. In upholding the prohibition, the Supreme Court stated that it was not a regulation of speech but rather a "regulation of the places where some speech may occur." The Court also emphasized that the law applied to all demonstrators, regardless of viewpoint, and that other types of institutions may also show government interest in protection from protest, including schools, polling places, and courthouses.

MELISSA HAUSSMAN

References and Further Reading

- Mezey, Susan Gluck. Evasive Equality: Women's Rights, Public Policy, and the Law. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 2003.
- Websites of the First Amendment Center, www.firstamendmentcenter.org, and the Center for Reproductive Rights, www.reproductiverights.org.

ANTI-ANARCHY AND ANTI-SYNDICALISM STATUTES

From the "Salem witch trials" to the criminal prosecutions that constitute part of the government's "war on terror," American criminal law has been used to stamp out threats, perceived or actual, to federal and state governments. Federal and state legislatures have proscribed conduct that they believe could challenge their continued existence. Courts, in turn, have generally upheld the constitutionality of these statutes as legitimate exercises of legislative power.

Anarchy and syndicalism have commonly been perceived as threatening to government, and both have been regulated, not surprisingly, in federal and state criminal codes. Criminal anarchy is defined as seeking to overthrow organized government by force, violence, or other unlawful means. Criminal syndicalism is generally defined as advocating or aiding and abetting the commission of sabotage or unlawful acts of force, violence, or terrorism for the sake of accomplishing a change in industrial ownership or control. More specifically, criminal syndicalism is understood to encompass such actions when those involved intend to effect political upheaval.

The majority of federal and state criminal codes regulating anarchy and syndicalism have been enacted since the turn of the twentieth century. However, the history of anti-anarchy and anti-syndicalism statutes extends back to the founding of the country. The Sedition Act of 1798, for example, prohibited criticism of the government with the intent to bring it, or any of its high-ranking officials, into contempt or disrepute. While the constitutionality of the Sedition Act was never tested prior to its expiration in 1801, the U.S. Supreme Court has noted that “the attack upon its validity has carried the day in the court of history” (New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 276 & n.16, 1964).

Laws such as the Sedition Act were used and threatened to be used against anarchists and syndicalists, notwithstanding the lack of an explicit prohibition on anarchy and syndicalism. Such an express prohibition against either category of conduct did not occur until the early twentieth century. As anticapitalist theories gained worldwide momentum and with the emerging domestic popularity of the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW), state governments quickly enacted laws directly targeting alleged anarchists and syndicalists. Idaho passed the nation’s first antisyndicalism statute in 1917, and twenty-three other states and two territories followed suit by 1922. By 1935, twenty-two states and one territory had passed anti-anarchy statutes. Many of these states were loci of activity of the IWW. States without a significant IWW presence, on the other hand, acted out of fear of an imminent IWW organizing drive or otherwise fell within the grips of the nationwide antiradical and antilabor drives.

Simultaneously, a push for federal anti-syndicalism and anti-anarchy legislation began to take shape. Five anti-syndicalism bills were introduced before Congress in the 1920s and 1930s, only one of which made it out of committee and was subsequently passed by the Senate. This lone bill, however, never came to a vote in the House of Representatives. (Anti-syndicalism provisions also found their way into at least nine broader bills [for example, sedition statutes]. However, none of these statutes was enacted.)

Efforts to ban anarchistic conduct on the federal level were more successful. On the eve of World War II, for example, Congress enacted the Alien Registration Act of 1940, 18 U.S.C. § 2385, also known as the Smith Act, which prohibited advocating for the overthrow of the government by force or violence. Upholding the constitutionality of the Smith Act, the U.S. Supreme Court noted: “That it is within the power of the Congress to protect the Government of the United States from armed rebellion is a proposition which requires little discussion No one could conceive that it is not within the power of Congress to prohibit acts intended to overthrow the Government by force and violence” (Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494, 501, 1951, plurality; see also Yates v. United States, 355 U.S. 66, 1957).

Although the Smith Act has not been repealed, it is seldom used because, after Yates, the government must prove that a defendant actually intended to advocate forcible overthrow of the government, a burden that is difficult, if not impossible, to satisfy in most cases. On the state side, few anti-anarchy and anti-syndicalism laws have been repealed outright, though many states have deleted provisions proscribing mere membership in an organization promoting anarchy or syndicalism. When these state laws were first challenged, ten state supreme courts and the U.S. Supreme Court upheld them as constitutional. (See, for example, Whitney v. California, 274 U.S. 357, 1927; Fiske v. Kansas, 274 U.S. 380, 1927; Gitlow v. New York, 268 U.S. 652, 1925; Ex parte McDermott, 183 P. 437, Cal. 1919, per curiam; Berg v. State, 233 P. 497, Ok. 1925; State v. Moilen, 167 N.W. 345, Minn. 1918).

Eventually, however, the judicial tide began to turn, culminating in the U.S. Supreme Court’s opinion in Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969) (per curiam). The Brandenburg Court reviewed the constitutionality of Ohio’s criminal syndicalism act, which punished individuals who “advocate or teach the duty, necessity, or propriety of violence as a means of accomplishing industrial or political reform . . . or who voluntarily assemble with a group formed to teach or advocate the doctrines of criminal syndicalism.” Striking down the statute as unconstitutional, the Court declared that “constitutional guarantees of free speech and free press do not permit a State to forbid or proscribe advocacy of the use of force or of law violation except where such advocacy is directed to inciting or producing imminent lawless action and is likely to incite or produce such action” (at 447).

In reaching this decision the court overturned the Whitney and Fiske line of cases, thereby striking a middle ground: anti-anarchy and antisyndicalism statutes may pass constitutional muster when written and construed narrowly to proscribe only conduct that was intended to, and in fact will, produce imminent lawless action.

The line between lawful advocacy and unlawful incitement is blurry and, in some cases, arbitrary. The history of anti-anarchy and anti-syndicalism acts suggests that the line between advocacy and incitement is unlikely to be tested unless and until the government believes a significant threat exists to its security. However, in light of recent attempts to combat terrorism, it is not inconceivable to imagine circumstances under which the government might employ anti-anarchy and anti-syndicalism legislation to punish potentially threatening conduct or fervent dissent.

ADAM B. WOLF

References and Further Reading

- Dowell, Eldridge F. A History of Criminal Syndicalism Legislation in the United States. Baltimore, MD: The Johns Hopkins Press, 1939.
- Stone, Geoffrey R., War Fever, Missouri Law Review 69 (2004): 4:1131–1155.
- Whitten, Woodrow C. Criminal Syndicalism and the Law in California: 1919–1927. Philadelphia: The American Philosophical Society, 1969.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Brandenburg v. Ohio*, 395 U.S. 444 (1969) (per curiam)
- Dennis v. United States*, 341 U.S. 494 (1951) (plurality)
- Fiske v. Kansas*, 274 U.S. 380 (1927)
- Gitlow v. New York*, 268 U.S. 652 (1925)
- New York Times Co. v. Sullivan*, 376 U.S. 254 (1964)
- Whitney v. California*, 274 U.S. 357 (1927)
- Yates v. United States*, 355 U.S. 66 (1957)
- Alien Registration Act of 1940* (“Smith Act”), 18 U.S.C. § 2385

See also Alien and Sedition Acts (1798); Freedom of Speech and Press: Nineteenth Century

ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE OF B'NAI B'RITH

The Anti-Defamation League (ADL) was founded in 1913 by Sigmund Livingston, a Chicago lawyer, to combat the anti-Semitism and discrimination against Jews that was prevalent at the time. The charter of the league states: “The immediate object of the League is to stop, by appeals to reason and conscience and, if necessary, by appeals to law, the defamation of the Jewish people. Its ultimate purpose is to secure justice and fair treatment to all citizens alike and to put an end forever to unjust and unfair discrimination against and ridicule of any sect or body of citizens.” Livingston’s action was in direct response to the infamous case of Leo Frank, the Jewish manager of a Georgia factory, who was falsely convicted of the murder of a young female worker and later dragged from his jail cell and lynched by a mob after the governor of Georgia announced he was commuting Frank’s death sentence.

From its inception the ADL has been associated with the Independent Order of B’nai Brith, a Jewish fraternal and service organization founded in New York City in 1843. The parent organization is engaged in a wide variety of community service and welfare activities, including the promotion of human rights, assisting hospitals and victims of natural disasters, and, through the ADL, opposing anti-Semitism and other forms of racism.

In the first three decades after its founding, the ADL mission centered on combating anti-Semitism. It pursued this goal in two major ways. First, it sought to expose and counter the bigotry of groups such as the Ku Klux Klan and individuals, such as Henry Ford, whose newspaper, The Dearborn Independent, was notoriously anti-Semitic, even going so far as to publish the notorious Czarist anti-Semitic forgery The Protocols of the Elders of Zion. In the 1930s, with the ascendance of Adolf Hitler, the ADL also had to combat the rise of domestic groups eager to mimic the Nazi’s anti-Semitic actions, including German-American Bund and the Christian Front, headed by Father Charles Coughlin. Second, the league combated the pervasive economic and social discrimination against Jews, as exemplified by quotas on Jewish applicants to colleges and professional schools; company, or even industry-wide, policies barring the hiring of Jews; and discrimination against Jews in hotels, restaurants, and other public accommodations.

After the Second World War, the ADL expanded its mission to include the eradication of bias and discrimination against people of all races and religions. The organization at this time began filing amicus curiae briefs in Supreme Court cases involving religious freedom and civil rights and has remained active in this area ever since. The league has, for example, filed an amicus brief in every major Supreme Court case concerning church–state separation since 1947, as well as numerous cases on affirmative action, hate crimes, and other subjects.

The positions the league has taken in its amicus briefs are generally unsurprising given its stated goals. In religion-clause cases, it has argued for a strict view of the separation of church and state, tempered by a broad view of religious accommodation in cases in which minority religions may be threatened. Thus, it opposed a Christmas display on government property in County of Allegheny v. ACLU, 492 U.S. 573 (1989), and the display of the Ten Commandments on such property in Van Orden v. Perry, 125 S.Ct. 2854 (2005), and McCreary County v. ACLU of Kentucky, 125 S.Ct. 2722 (2005); opposed school prayer in Engel v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421 (1962), and Santa Fe Independent School District v. Doe, 530 U.S. 290 (2000); and opposed publicly funded tuition vouchers for religious schools in Zelman v. Harris-Simmons, 536 U.S. 639 (2002), and government aid in the form of instructional materials and equipment to religious schools in Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793 (2000). However, the organization defended the constitutionality of a federal statute that protects the religious rights of prisoners as a valid accommodation of religion in Cutter v. Wilkinson, 125 S.Ct. 2113 (2005).

With the founding of the State of Israel in 1948, the ADL began combating what it viewed as anti-Zionist organizations and publications. In more recent years, the intense debate over the Palestinian–Israeli conflict has led the league to attack what it views as a new form of anti-Semitism: the claim that Jews and Jewish organizations unfairly tag any criticism of the State of Israel with an anti-Semitic label. The league has explicitly stated that criticism of specific Israeli actions or policies in and of itself does not constitute anti-Semitism, but also notes that there are those who attempt to mask anti-Semitism under the guise of criticism of Israel or Zionism.

In the 1960s, the organization became actively involved in the emerging civil rights movement and actively worked for the passage of the Civil Rights Acts of 1964 and 1968 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965—three of the most important pieces of legislation that resulted from movement. As happened with other predominantly white organizations involved in the movement, tensions emerged between the ADL and the African-American community in the 1970s and have continued to some degree to the present, in light of differing positions on affirmative action, the Israeli–Palestinian conflict, Louis Farrakhan and the Nation of Islam, and other issues. Affirmative action in education has been a major dividing point between the two groups, with the ADL filing amicus briefs opposed to racial preferences in Bakke (Regents of the University of California v. Bakke, 438 U.S. 265, 1978) and Grutter v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 306 (2003). Despite these tensions, the league remains strongly committed to cooperative efforts with the African-American community in fighting racial prejudice.

In more recent years, the ADL has identified and responded to new forms of bigotry and prejudice seen from the white-supremacist movement and other domestic hate groups. The organization has also expressed grave concern about the effect that the religious Right is having in eroding what the league views as the appropriate degree of separation between church and state in the United States. Finally, the ADL has grown increasingly concerned about, and is actively seeking to combat, what it perceives as the growth of anti-Semitism on American college campuses and the efforts by evangelical Christians to bring an explicitly religious message into public schools.

ALAN C. WEINSTEIN

References and Further Reading

ADL in the Courts: Litigation Docket, Anti-Defamation League, New York 1991 through 2001.

Dinnerstein, Leonard. The Leo Frank Case. Athens, GA: University of Georgia Press, 1999.

Ivers, Greg. To Build a Wall: American Jews and the Separation of Church and State. Clinch Wise, VA: University of Virginia Press, 1995.

www.adl.org.

Cases and Statutes Cited

County of Allegheny v. ACLU, 492 U.S. 573 (1989)

Cutter v. Wilkinson, 125 S.Ct. 2113 (2005)

Engel v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421 (1962)

Grutter v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 306 (2003)

McCreary County v. ACLU of Kentucky, 125 S.Ct. 2722 (2005)

Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793 (2000)

Regents of the University of California v. Bakke, 438 U.S. 265 (1978)

Santa Fe Independent School District v. Doe, 530 U.S. 290 (2000)

Van Orden v. Perry, 125 S.Ct. 2854 (2005)

Zelman v. Harris-Simmons, 536 U.S. 639 (2002)

ANTIDISCRIMINATION LAWS

Discrimination occurs when the civil rights of an individual are denied or interfered with because of the individual's membership in a particular group or class. Many statutes have been enacted to prevent discrimination on the basis of a person's race, sex, religion, age, previous condition of servitude, physical limitation, national origin, and, in some cases, sexual preference.

Congress's early foray into civil rights legislation was a series of laws—the Reconstruction Civil Rights Acts—enacted in 1866, 1870, 1871, and 1875. These laws guarantee that all persons shall have the same right in every state to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, give evidence, and to the full and equal benefit of all laws. Their primary purposes were to codify the rights of former slaves guaranteed under the newly enacted Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments and to protect noncitizens and persons not born in the United States within its coverage.

These acts were later codified as sections 1981 through 1985. Section 1981 established the general principle that no person may be denied, on the basis of race, equal protection of the laws. Specifically enumerated rights include the right to contract and to sue, and to give evidence, but this section has also been interpreted to include the right to earn a living, to participate in public benefits programs, and to fair use and access to justice. Section 1982 guarantees the right to inherit, own, and dispose of real and personal property. Section 1983 provides a civil cause of action for denial of equal rights but is limited to public and private individuals acting under the color of state law. There is no remedy under this provision for private discrimination. Section 1985 targets conspiracies to violate civil rights.

The most prominent civil rights legislation since reconstruction is the Civil Rights Act of 1964, enacted in response to pervasive discrimination against minorities and women. Title II proscribes discrimination or segregation based on race, color, religion, or national origin in places of public accommodation; Title III makes such unlawful conduct applicable to state and local entities; Title IV applies to public education; Title V deals with the reauthorization of the Commission on Civil Rights; and Title VI applies to programs or activities receiving federal funds.

Title VII prohibits employment discrimination against applicants and employees on the basis of race or color, religion, sex, and national origin, unless the discrimination is tied to a bona fide occupational qualification or to nonfulfillment of national security requirements. Sex discrimination includes claims of discrimination on the basis of pregnancy as well as claims of sexual harassment. Title VIII, commonly known as the Federal Fair Housing Act, makes it unlawful, with some exceptions, to discriminate in the sale, rental, or advertising of a dwelling on the basis of race, color, religion, national origin, sex, familial status, or handicap, and it prohibits real estate brokers from discriminating. Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972 prohibits discrimination or denial of benefits on the basis of sex under any educational program or activity receiving federal financial assistance. It protects employees and students and has been interpreted to encompass sexual harassment claims.

Congress has also passed federal antidiscrimination legislation to protect classes of persons other than women and minorities. The Age Discrimination in Employment Act of 1967 (ADEA) prohibits employers from discriminating against persons on the basis of age. Based on Congressional findings of marginalization and segregation of the disabled, Congress passed the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, which prohibits discrimination by any federal or federally funded program or activity, and the Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990 (ADA), guaranteeing disabled persons the same rights and benefits as non-disabled citizens.

The ADA addresses discrimination in employment, in the receipt or qualification of public benefits and services, and in the use of public accommodations and services. "Disabled" under the statute means that one or more major life activities are substantially limited by a physical or mental impairment. Major life activities include persons' abilities to care for themselves, use their hands, walk, see, hear, speak, breathe, learn, and reproduce. The Supreme Court has held that HIV/AIDS is a disability under the ADA. Discrimination within the statute encompasses not making reasonable accommodations for an individual's disability.

The constitutional authority permitting Congress to enact antidiscrimination laws derives from the commerce clause or the Fourteenth Amendment's enforcement clause. Recently, however, the Supreme Court has begun to restrict Congress's power to enact such laws. For example, in 1997, it held that the Religious Freedom Restoration Act exceeded the authority of Congress under the Fourteenth Amendment, and, in 2000, the Court held that neither the Fourteenth Amendment nor the commerce clause permitted Congress to abrogate state immunity under the ADEA and to enact a civil remedy provision within the Violence Against Women Act. For its part, Congress passed the Civil Rights Restoration Act of 1987 in order to nullify the effects of various Supreme Court decisions altering the scope and meaning of provisions in Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the ADA, the Rehabilitation Act, and Title IX of the Education Amendments.

The struggle for equality in America suffered many setbacks until the civil rights movement in the 1950s and 1960s. After ratification of the Thirteenth Amendment, southern states enacted black codes to severely restrict African-American life. In response, Congress enacted the Fourteenth Amendment, but by the end of Reconstruction, Jim Crow laws were in full effect and the Supreme Court had upheld the idea of separate but equal. The 1950s and 1960s finally saw an end to legal discrimination and the birth of a new era for all civil liberties and rights.

DEBORAH ZALESNE

References and Further Reading

- Lund, Nelson, The Rehnquist Court's Pragmatic Approach to Civil Rights, Northwestern University Law Review 99 (Fall 2004): 249–288.
- Post, Robert C., and Reva B. Siegel, Equal Protection by Law: Federal Anti-Discrimination Legislation After Morrison and Kimel, Yale Law Journal 110 (December 2000): 441–526.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Age Discrimination in Employment Act* of 1967, 29 U.S.C. §§ 621–634 (2000)
- Americans with Disabilities Act* of 1990, 42 U.S.C. §§ 12101–12213 (2000)
- Civil Rights Act of 1964*, 42 U.S.C. §§ 1971, 2000(a) (1994)
- Civil Rights Restoration Act* of 1987, Pub. L. No. 100–259 (1988)

ANTIDISCRIMINATION LAWS

Reconstruction Civil Rights Acts, 42 U.S.C. §§ 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984, 1985 (1866)

Rehabilitation Act of 1973, 29 U.S.C. §§ 701-797b (2004)

Religious Freedom Restoration Act of 1993, 42 U.S.C. §§ 2000bb to 2000bb-4 (1994)

Violence Against Women Act of 1994, Pub. L. No. 103-322, 108 Stat. 1902 (1994)

See also Civil Rights Act of 1964; Religious Freedom Restoration Act; Title VII and Religious Exemptions

ANTIPOLYGAMY LAWS

In the United States antipolygamy laws were exclusively aimed at the polygamous practices of the nineteenth-century Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (the Mormons) which began to publicly practice and advocate polygamy in 1852.

In 1827, Joseph Smith, Jr., found and translated gold plates that became the basis of a new religion that considered itself the true version of a Christianity that had lost its way. The Mormons believed Indians were a lost Hebrew tribe that had been visited by Jesus after the crucifixion. Smith's new religion was born in an era of religious enthusiasm and revivalism centered in the northeastern part of the United States. Mormons believe all the fundamental tenets of Christianity; in addition, they believe that Native Americans are one of the lost tribes of Israel and were visited by Christ after his crucifixion, deny original sin and stress that everyone can advance to godhood, and believe that they are the only true Christians.

Although Smith, who had as many as forty-eight wives, began practicing polygamy as early as the 1835, the church did not publicly announce its advocacy of polygamy until 1852, after Brigham Young, Smith's successor after his 1844 assassination by an angry mob, had taken the Mormons to the basin of the Great Salt Lake. The antipolygamy movement, which began immediately after the announcement, was linked to the antislavery movement. Authors penned novels featuring themes of plural wives as slaves, the lust of old men for young girls, and incest in polygamous families. Scientists said that the progeny of polygamous unions carried genetic defects, as was also true of miscegenous unions; polygamy was described as an un-Christian practice found among Africans or Asians but not civilized Europeans (that is, whites).

Congress responded with a series of increasingly draconian antipolygamy laws. First, fearing that the Mormons would attempt to bring the Utah Territory into the Union as a polygamous state, Congress enacted the Morrill Act of 1862, making polygamy a crime in all territories. However, enforcement of the act was left to local probate judges and local juries, most of whom were Mormon in the Utah Territory.

In 1874, hoping to prove that polygamy was protected by the First Amendment, the Mormons set up a test case involving Brigham Young's personal secretary, George Reynolds. But in the resulting case, United States v. Reynolds, a unanimous Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the antipolygamy act against this claim, analogizing polygamy to human sacrifice in the process. Because of these enforcement problems, Congress enacted the Poland Act in 1874 to shift enforcement of the Morrill Act to federally appointed judges. The act included a variety of procedural changes that sought to guarantee successful prosecution of polygamists.

Antipolygamy sentiment continued to grow in Congress. The resulting Edmunds Act of 1882 took away past and present polygamists' right to vote and allowed prosecutors to strike potential jurors not only for being polygamists but also for espousing belief in polygamy or even refusing to discuss their marital status. In addition, the act made "unlawful cohabitation" criminal, facilitating convictions when multiple marriages could not be proven. The even harsher Edmund-Tucker Act followed in 1887. This act made unrecorded marriages felonies, forced wives to testify against husbands, disinherited children of polygamous marriages, and allowed for the confiscation of virtually all church property.

Utah legislators began drafting an antipolygamy constitution the following year. On May 19, 1890, the Court upheld the constitutionality of the government's seizure of church property in Late Corp. of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints v. United States, 136 U.S. 1 (1890).

With Congress moving towards the passage of the Cullom-Stubble Bill, which took away all the citizenship rights of Mormons, Church President Wilford Woodruff issued the "Woodruff Manifesto" outlawing polygamy in 1890. However, the practice of polygamy continued, with more than 250 secret plural marriages performed until at least 1904. Although exact numbers are impossible to determine, today there are more than thirty thousand "Mormon fundamentalists" living mostly in Utah, Arizona, and Montana and practicing polygamy. Prosecution has been sporadic, notably prior to the 2002 Salt Lake City Winter Olympics and, in one case, that of Royston Potter, who was prosecuted following an appearance on the Phil Donahue television show.

The continued practice of polygamy prompted unsuccessful congressional efforts in 1902 to amend the U.S. Constitution to ban polygamy.

The Supreme Court has not examined the constitutionality of antipolygamy laws since the 1890 Late

Corp. of the Church of Jesus Christ case. Under the “Smith test” announced in the 1990 case of Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872 (1990), the Court held that a generally applicable criminal law was not unconstitutional even though it had a negative impact on a religious practice. Seemingly, this holding would protect antipolygamy laws from constitutional attack. However, in Church of the Lukumi Babalu Aye v. City of Hialeah, 508 U.S. 520 (1993), the Court found a criminal statute to be unconstitutional because, although it was of general applicability, it was aimed at a particular religion. This suggests the argument, untested to date, that polygamy statutes aimed at the Mormon practice could be unconstitutional.

Antipolygamy provisions are preserved in the present day state constitutions of Utah (Utah Const. art. III), Oklahoma (Okla. Const. art. I, § 2), Idaho (Idaho Const. art. I, § 4), and New Mexico (N.M. Const. art. XXI, § 1).

KEITH E. SEALING

References and Further Reading

- Ostling, Richard, and Joan Ostling. Mormon America: The Power and the Promise. New York: Harper, 1999.
- Sealing, Keith. Polygamists out of the Closet: Statutory and State Constitutional Prohibitions Against Polygamy Are Unconstitutional Under the Free Exercise Clause, Ga. St. U. L. Rev. 17 (2001): 691 (arguing that antipolygamy statutes are unconstitutional).
- Van Wagoner, Richard. Mormon Polygamy: A History. Gaithersburg, MD: Signature Books, 1989.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Church of the Lukumi Babalu Aye v. City of Hialeah*, 508 U.S. 520 (1993).
- Davis v. Beason*, 133 U.S. 333 (1890).
- Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith*, 494 U.S. 872 (1990).
- Late Corp. of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints v. United States*, 136 U.S. 1 (1890).
- Murphy v. Ramsey*, 114 U.S. 15 (1885).
- Reynolds v. United States*, 98 U.S. 145 (1878).

APODACA v. OREGON, 406 U.S. 404 (1972)

In Apodaca v. Oregon, the U.S. Supreme Court addressed the question of whether the Sixth Amendment’s right to a jury trial required a unanimous verdict. Robert Apodaca, Henry Morgan Cooper Jr., and James Arnold Madden were convicted of committing felonies by three separate Oregon juries, all of which returned less than unanimous verdicts. In a six-to-three decision, the Court denied that their convictions violated the Sixth Amendment and rejected the argument that the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment made the constitutional right to a jury trial applicable to the states. Specifically, it denied that the unanimity rule was essential to the function of a jury trial or necessary to support a conviction beyond a reasonable doubt.

The Court also rejected the contention that the unanimity rule was mandated by the Fourteenth Amendment’s requirement that juries reflect a cross section of the community. The Court reasoned that although the Constitution forbade the systematic exclusion of specific groups from juries, defendants may not challenge the makeup of the jury simply because no member of their race is on it. The Court further rejected the idea that minority groups serving on juries would be denied the opportunity to express their opinions because it found no proof that a majority would ignore the evidence and make a decision solely on the basis of prejudice. The Court recognized that unanimous juries were more likely to result in hung juries, but nevertheless felt that the interest of the defendant would be fairly served under both situations.

RANDA CAROLYN ISSA

See also Due Process; Jury Trial; Jury Trial Right; Jury Trials and Race

APPLICATION OF FIRST AMENDMENT TO STATES

Those responsible for adding the Bill of Rights to the new federal constitution intended those amendments to act as limits on the national government only, a point illustrated as succinctly as possible by the opening words of the First Amendment: “Congress [emphasis added] shall make no law . . .” Relying on the still recent history of the amendments’ framing and ratification, Chief Justice John Marshall in Barron v. Baltimore, 7 Pet. (32 U.S.) 243 (1833), confirmed that understanding by rejecting a claim that the Fifth Amendment’s prohibition on the taking of private property for public use without just compensation applied to state governments.

In 1868, the Fourteenth Amendment was added to the Constitution. Section 1 states (in part): “No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law . . .” The question of whether the amendment’s framers intended that one (or both) of these clauses would apply some or all of those first ten amendments to the states has been the subject of extensive scholarly and judicial commentary and controversy.

This incorporation debate (and the evolution of incorporation doctrine) need not be addressed here, except to note that, throughout the last decades of the nineteenth and early decades of the twentieth centuries, the Supreme Court read this language quite narrowly, stressing the importance of states' following due process in criminal cases. Indeed, the first case interpreting the new amendment (the Slaughterhouse Cases, 16 Wall., 83 U.S., 36, in 1873) read the "privileges and immunities" clause so narrowly as to in effect read it out of the Constitution (at least until the end of the twentieth century).

The majority of the justices in this era equated due process with "fundamental fairness" and with respect to Fourteenth Amendment "liberty" were far more concerned with protecting "liberty of contract" against efforts by state governments to regulate a variety of social and economic problems connected with America's rapid industrialization. The exception was Justice John Marshall Harlan (I) who, in three criminal procedures cases between 1884 and 1908, argued that the word "liberty" in the amendment was a kind of shorthand reference to the specific protections found in the Bill of Rights. (The most famous modern proponent of this "total incorporation" view was Justice Hugo Black, starting with his dissent in a 1947 case, Adamson v. California, 332 U.S. 46, 1947.)

Speech, Press, Assembly, and Petition

With respect to the First Amendment, an important watershed was the case of Gitlow v. New York, 268 U.S. 652, in 1925. In this case the defendant was charged with violating that state's Criminal Anarchy Act of 1902 by publishing several pamphlets that allegedly advocated the overthrow of New York's government by unlawful means. When Gitlow's appeal came before the Supreme Court, he argued that the New York law interfered with his freedom of speech, a "liberty" protected by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment against state abridgment.

In his opinion for the Court, Justice Sanford made constitutional history when he stated (in dictum): "For present purposes we may and do assume that freedom of speech and of the press . . . are among the fundamental personal rights and 'liberties' protected by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment from impairment by the States." Thus was freedom of speech "incorporated" into the Fourteenth Amendment. (The Court went on to uphold Gitlow's conviction, arguing that all constitutional liberties are subject to reasonable restrictions and that there is no constitutional protection for speech advocating criminal activity.)

Two years later, in Fiske v. Kansas, 274 U.S. 380 (1927), the Court confirmed the applicability of freedom of speech to the states, with a more positive outcome for the defendant, holding that a Kansas criminal syndicalism statute as applied to Fiske violated the Constitution. Any lingering doubts about the Court's new course were further dissipated in two 1931 cases. In Stromberg v. California, 283 U.S. 359 (1931), the Court struck down a California law prohibiting the display of red flags. Chief Justice Charles Evans Hughes favorably cited Gitlow and Fiske and also laid the groundwork for the modern Court's "symbolic speech" cases, recognizing that certain actions can be so expressive as to constitute protected communication. In Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697 (1931), the Court overturned a Minnesota law as violative of freedom of the press, reaffirming that a bedrock principle of freedom of speech and the press (now also incorporated into the Fourteenth Amendment) is that governments cannot engage in "prior restraints."

Freedom of assembly was incorporated in DeJonge v. Oregon, 299 U.S. 353 (1937), again involving a state criminal syndicalism law. DeJonge was charged with participation in a political rally organized by the Communist Party. The evidence against DeJonge consisted solely of party literature in his possession; no illegal activity was advocated at the meeting. The Oregon Supreme Court upheld his conviction, but the U.S. Supreme Court reversed. Chief Justice Hughes argued that peaceable assembly is a "right cognate to those of free speech and free press and is equally fundamental."

While no Supreme Court case has directly held that the right to petition is incorporated into the Fourteenth Amendment, the overwhelming implication of the Court's reasoning in the cases thus far discussed must be that this right is also protected against state government infringement.

Religion

In 1934, in Hamilton v. Regents of the University of California, 293 U.S. 245 (1934), Justice Cardozo's concurring opinion suggests that the Fourteenth Amendment's due process clause undoubtedly includes certain religious liberties, but neither his nor the Court's opinion specifically refers to the free exercise clause. Ultimately, very much like Benjamin Gitlow, Hamilton won the battle but lost the war. He argued that his religious conviction entitled him to an exemption from the University of California's military training requirement, but the Court held that Hamilton was not compelled to attend the university. But if he did, he could be subject to the school's rules and regulations.

Thus, by the late 1930s, the speech and press and free exercise of religion components of the First Amendment had been incorporated. There were also other cases (largely involving state criminal procedures, including those in which John Marshall Harlan (I) had dissented) in which the Court refused to incorporate some element of the Bill of Rights. The time was ripe for the Court to formulate a standard that would explain these disparate outcomes, and the task fell to Justice Benjamin N. Cardozo. In Palko v. Connecticut, 302 U.S. 319 (1937), Cardozo explained that only those rights that were fundamental were included in Fourteenth Amendment liberty, describing them as "those fundamental principles of liberty and justice which lie at the base of all our civil and political institutions" and "rooted in the traditions and conscience of our people" For his quintessential illustration, Cardozo mentioned "freedom of thought and speech," a freedom "that is the matrix, the indispensable condition, of nearly every other form of freedom."

In 1940, building on Hamilton v. Regents, the Court, in Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296 (1940), actually found in favor of the individual's claim of an infringement on free exercise. The Court held that Connecticut's conviction of a Jehovah's Witness for going door to door distributing religious literature was invalid. While the state may regulate the time, place, and manner of such solicitations, it could not forbid them entirely.

Would the Amendment's ban on establishment of religion—the only component not yet incorporated—now be added to the list of fundamental liberties applicable to the states? The answer came in a 1947 case, Everson v. Board of Education, 330 U.S. 1 (1947). There, speaking through Justice Black, the Court invoked Thomas Jefferson's "wall of separation between Church and State" and applied the ban on establishment of religion to state actions. At the same time, the Court decided that the wall had not been breached by the governmental action at issue in this case—New Jersey's statute authorizing boards of education to reimburse parents, including those whose children attended religious schools, for the cost of bus transportation to and from school. The Court did not see the program as prohibited aid to a specific religious institution, but rather as a general program to help all parents get their children, regardless of religion, to and from their schools.

Association

The First Amendment says nothing about "freedom of association," but in NAACP v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 449 (1958), the Court said that such a right was so essential to the enjoyment of rights enumerated in the amendment that it is protected against state infringements. The case must be seen, as the Court did, against the background of the struggle for civil rights for African Americans. In an attempt to frustrate the activities of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) on behalf of civil rights, Alabama ordered the organization to produce a variety of its records, including its membership list. The NAACP claimed that publicizing the names of its members would inevitably lead to various reprisals, including possible violence, against those members. The Supreme Court held that the organization could assert the constitutional rights of its members, including most importantly the right to pursue lawful interests and to freely associate for the purpose of furthering such interests. The fine and contempt judgment against the NAACP by an Alabama trial court were overturned.

PHILIP A. DYNIA

References and Further Reading

- Abraham, Henry J. and Barbara A. Perry. Freedom and the Court, 8th ed. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2003.
- Amar, Akhil Reed. The Bill of Rights: Creation and Reconstruction. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1998.
- Curtis, Michael Kent. No State Shall Abridge: The 14th Amendment and the Bill of Rights. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1986.
- . Free Speech, "the People's Darling Privilege": Struggles for Freedom of Expression in American History. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 2000.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Adamson v. California*, 332 U.S. 46 (1947)
- Barron v. Baltimore*, 7 Pet. (32 U.S.) 243 (1833)
- Cantwell v. Connecticut*, 310 U.S. 296 (1940)
- DeJonge v. Oregon*, 299 U.S. 353 (1937)
- Everson v. Board of Education*, 330 U.S. 1 (1947)
- Fiske v. Kansas*, 274 U.S. 380 (1927)
- Gitlow v. New York*, 268 U.S. 652 (1925)
- Hamilton v. Regents of the University of California*, 293 U.S. 245 (1934)
- NAACP v. Alabama*, 357 U.S. 449 (1958)
- Near v. Minnesota*, 283 U.S. 697 (1931)
- Palko v. Connecticut*, 302 U.S. 319 (1937)
- Stromberg v. California*, 283 U.S. 359 (1931)
- Slaughterhouse Cases*, 16 Wall. (83 U.S.) 36 (1873)

See also Establishment Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence; Free Exercise Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence; Incorporation Doctrine; Privileges and Immunities (XIV)

APPRENDI v. NEW JERSEY, 530 U.S. 466 (2000)

This case was designed to protect the Sixth Amendment right to a “speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury” and the right inherent in the due process clauses of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to have every element of a criminal offense proven beyond a reasonable doubt. Charles Apprendi fired shots into the home of an African-American family and pleaded guilty to a number of state weapons offenses, the most serious punishable by up to ten years in prison. At sentencing, the New Jersey trial judge applied the state’s statute providing for enhanced sentences for “hate crimes.” Pursuant to this statute, Apprendi faced not ten but twenty years, maximum, and was sentenced to twelve years’ imprisonment. The factual finding that Apprendi acted with racial animus was made by the judge, using a preponderance of evidence standard. Apprendi objected, and the U.S. Supreme Court reversed. Justice Stevens, writing for a five-member majority, declared, “Other than the fact of a prior conviction, any fact that increases the penalty for a crime beyond the prescribed statutory maximum must be submitted to a jury, and proved beyond a reasonable doubt.”

In a dissent representing four justices, Justice O’Connor found the majority’s holding unsupported by history, and she argued that it would disadvantage defendants and undermine three decades of sentencing reform. Under federal sentencing guidelines and state determinate sentencing regimes, judges currently make numerous factual findings that can increase a defendant’s sentence for a particular offense—usually by a preponderance of the evidence standard and generally based upon certain characteristics surrounding the offense (such as whether the offense was committed with a gun) and the offender (such as the extent of his or her criminal history). The goal of the sentencing reform movement is to ensure equality of sentencing for similarly situated defendants in an efficient manner; a shift back to pure judicial discretion in sentencing or jury findings of all facts relevant to sentencing would halt this reform.

Moreover, Justice O’Connor suggested that the majority’s holding amounted to a “meaningless and formalistic” rule that legislatures could easily avoid.

For example, New Jersey could increase the maximum sentence for weapons offenses from ten to twenty years’ imprisonment and allow a judge to reduce the penalty to ten years by finding that the defendant did not act with racial animus. Finally, Justice O’Connor predicted that this “watershed” rule would unleash a “flood of petitions by convicted defendants seeking to invalidate their sentences.”

In the years since Apprendi was rendered, only one of Justice O’Connor’s predictions has born fruit. Though many state and federal statutes contain facts that boost maximum penalties, prosecutors have adjusted by charging those facts in the indictment and submitting them to the jury. Due to structural democratic constraints, neither Congress nor state legislatures have attempted to avoid Apprendi’s holding by raising statutory maximums. Likewise, Apprendi has not threatened completed criminal prosecutions; the vast majority of those sentences have been upheld on appeal via procedural hurdles such as harmless error, bars against successive petitions, and nonretroactivity (see Schriro v. Summerlin, 124 S.Ct. 2519 [2004]).

However, Apprendi’s negative impact on sentencing reform has been profound. In Ring v. Arizona, 536 U.S. 584 (2002), six justices held that because Arizona conditioned eligibility for the death penalty upon the presence of an aggravating fact that was not an element of first-degree murder, the Sixth Amendment guaranteed the defendant a right to a jury determination of that fact. This threatens the capital sentencing schemes in nine states.

In Blakely v. Washington, the five justices comprising the majority in Apprendi held that the relevant “statutory maximum” for Mr. Blakely’s offense of kidnapping was the fifty-three-month sentence provided for by the Washington state sentencing guidelines and not the ten-year statutory maximum specified for the offense. Thus, the judge could not impose a ninety-month sentence based upon his finding that the defendant acted with “deliberate cruelty.” This decision threatens the sentencing schemes in fourteen states and the federal system. In United States v. Booker, 543 U.S. (2005), five members of the Court held that the Sixth Amendment as construed by Blakely applies to judicial findings of fact under federal sentencing guidelines; however, a different five-member majority held that the remedy was not to submit those facts to the jury, but rather to transform the guidelines from mandatory rules (providing statutory maximum sentences) to advisory guidelines for federal judges.

SUSAN R. KLEIN

References and Further Reading

- Bowman, Frank O., III, Train Wreck? Or Can the Federal Sentencing System be Saved? A Plea for Rapid Reversal of Blakely v. Washington, Am. Crim. Law Rev. 41 (2004): 215.
- Chaneson, Steven L., The Next Era of Sentencing Reform, Emory Law Journal 54 (forthcoming 2005).
- King, Nancy J., and Susan R. Klein, Apres Apprendi, Federal Sentencing Reporter 12 (2000): 331.
- , Essential Elements, Vanderbilt Law Rev. 54 (2001): 1467.
- , Apprendi and Plea Bargaining, Stanford Law Rev. 54 (2001): 295.
- , Beyond Blakely, Federal Sentencing Reporter 16 (June 2004): 413.
- Klein, Susan R., and Jordan M. Steiker, The Search for Equality in Criminal Sentencing, Supreme Court Rev. 2002 (2003): 223.
- Levine, Andrew M., The Confounding Boundaries of "Apprendi-land": Statutory Minimums and the Federal Sentencing Guidelines, Am. Crim. L. 29 (2002): 377.

APPROPRIATION OF NAME OR LIKENESS

Appropriation of name or likeness, the oldest and most widely recognized branch of the invasion of privacy tort, imposes liability for unauthorized use of another's name, likeness, or other identifying characteristics. Although the tort applies whenever the defendant, for his or her benefit (pecuniary or otherwise), appropriates the plaintiff's identity, the great majority of appropriation cases involve "commercial" uses like advertising or merchandising.

Although initially understood as protecting a dignity or autonomy interest, this tort is now seen as protecting an economic interest as well. In a significant number of jurisdictions, individuals have a "right of privacy," which protects them from the indignity and embarrassment of having their personalities commercialized without their consent, and a "right of publicity," which affords them exclusive control of the commercial value of their identities. Whereas the former is a purely personal right, the latter is assignable by contract and, in many jurisdictions, descendible.

The appropriation tort's impact on the news media is limited because a news disseminator is generally privileged to use a person's name or image in connection with an article or program on a matter of public interest. This privilege, however, does not apply if there is no discernible relationship between the plaintiff and the content of the news report, if the report's content is deliberately fabricated, or if the report is a disguised advertisement. The use of a person's identity in commentary, entertainment, and creative works is ordinarily privileged as well. However, in Zacchini v. Scripps-Howard Broadcasting Co., 433 U.S. 562 (1977), the Supreme Court held that the First Amendment does not bar liability for the unauthorized television news broadcast of a performer's "entire act."

MICHAEL MADOW

References and Further Reading

- Keeton, W. Page et al. Prosser and Keeton on the Law of Torts. St. Paul, MN: West Publishing, 1984.
- Madow, Michael, Private Ownership of Public Image, 81(1) California Law Review 125–240 (1993).
- McCarthy, J. Thomas. The Rights of Publicity and Privacy. Eagan, MN: Thomson West, 2005.
- Nimmer, Melville, The Right of Publicity, Law & Contemporary Problems 19 (Winter 1954): 203–223.
- Prosser, William L., Privacy, California Law Review 48 (1960): 3:383–423.
- Restatement (Second) of Torts*, Sec. 652C (1976).
- Warren, Samuel D. and Brandeis, Louis D., The Right to Privacy, Harvard Law Review 4 (1890): 5:193–220.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Zacchini v. Scripps-Howard Broadcasting Co., 433 U.S. 562 (1977)

See also Invasion of Privacy and Free Speech; Right of Privacy

APTHEKER v. SECRETARY OF STATE, 378 U.S. 500 (1964)

Aptheker is an important civil liberties case involving the right to travel. In Aptheker v. Secretary of State, 378 U.S. 500, 84 S.Ct. 1659 (1964), the U.S. Supreme Court overturned a federal law that the Court believed unconstitutionally interfered with the freedom of American citizens to travel abroad.

Herbert Aptheker (1915–2003), an historian and political activist, joined the Communist Party in 1939 and subsequently served in the U.S. military in World War II, the struggle for civil rights in the South, and the movement against the War in Vietnam. When his passport was revoked by the U.S. State Department, along with those of other Communist Party leaders, he legally challenged the governmental action.

The U.S. Supreme Court held that section 6 of the Subversive Activities Control Act, which permitted the State Department to refuse to issue or renew passports for members of communist organizations, was unconstitutional on its face. No specific circumstances surrounding application of the law could cure its constitutional infirmity since it "too broadly and indiscriminately restricts the right to travel and thereby abridges the liberty guaranteed by the Fifth Amendment.” The Court had previously held the right to travel abroad was an important aspect of a citizen’s liberty and that liberty was violated by a subversive activities law ignoring an “individual’s knowledge, activity, commitment, and purposes in and places for travel.” Aptheker is one of a series of cases decided by the U.S. federal courts in the beginning of the 1960s that indicated a trend away from abject judicial acquiescence in cold-war interference with civil liberty and due process.

ANTHONY CHASE

ARIZONA v. FULMINANTE, 499 U.S. 279 (1991)

Arizona v. Fulminante considered whether a state court properly found a defendant’s confession was coerced in violation of the Fifth Amendment and whether admission of a coerced confession is properly evaluated using harmless error analysis.

Although the defendant was suspected of murdering his eleven-year-old stepdaughter, the state had insufficient evidence to file charges against him. While he was incarcerated in New Jersey for an unrelated felony, he was befriended by another inmate, a former officer, masquerading as an organized crime figure. The officer-turned-informant told the defendant that he knew that the defendant was “starting to get some tough treatment” from other inmates because of a rumor that he murdered a child. He offered to protect the defendant from the other inmates, but told him “You have to tell me about it, . . . for me to give you any help” (499 U.S. at 283). At that point, the defendant admitted killing and sexually assaulting the child and the confession was used to convict him for the murder.

The Court held that the state court accurately applied the “totality of the circumstances” test to determine the voluntariness of the confession (Schneekloth v. Bustamonte, 412 U.S. 218, 1973). Because the confession was tendered in the belief that the defendant’s life was in jeopardy, the lower court appropriately found that it was “a true coerced confession in every way” (778 P.2d 602, 627, 1988).

Over the strong dissent of four justices, the majority held that harmless error analysis could be applied to admission of a coerced confession. Under this test, the state must be able to show that introduction of the confession was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt (Chapman v. California, 386 U.S. 18, 24, 1967). Unable to do so in this case, the Court affirmed the state court’s decision to grant the defendant a new trial. By allowing the application of harmless error analysis, the Court effectively overruled the blanket exclusion of coerced confessions.

EMILY FROMSON

Cases and Statutes Cited

Chapman v. California, 386 U.S. 18, 24 (1967)

Schneekloth v. Bustamonte, 412 U.S. 218 (1973)

See also Coerced Confessions/Police Interrogations; Due Process

ARIZONA v. HICKS, 480 U.S. 321 (1987)

In Hicks, the Supreme Court announced that probable cause is required to justify the search or seizure of items discovered in “plain view” during an unrelated search. Police entered an apartment after shots were fired through its floor, injuring a man in the apartment below. While they were searching for the shooter, weapons, and other victims, an officer noticed several pieces of expensive stereo equipment that he suspected were stolen. He read and recorded the serial numbers of all the items, moving at least one of them—a turntable—to do so. The equipment was identified by these numbers as having been stolen in an armed robbery, for which the respondent Hicks was indicted.

The state trial court and the Arizona Court of Appeals granted the respondent’s motion to suppress, reasoning that the officer’s obtaining the serial numbers exceeded the scope of the exigency that justified the search following the shooting. After the Arizona Supreme Court denied review, the Supreme Court granted the state’s petition for certiorari.

By a vote of six to three, the Court held that the evidence should be suppressed because, although the recording of the serial numbers was not a “seizure,” the moving of the turntable constituted a separate search, unrelated to the exigency justifying the officers’ entry. To be reasonable under the Fourth Amendment, that separate, warrantless search required probable cause. The majority declined to adopt the dissent’s suggestion that a lesser “cursory search” could be justified in connection with a plain-view inspection, holding instead that “a search is a search.”

JULIE A. BAKER

References and Further Reading

Milstein, Lee C., Note, Fortress of Solitude or Law of Malevolence? Rethinking the Desirability of Bright-Line Protection of the Home, N.Y.U.L. Rev. 78 (2003): 1789.

Sundby, Scott C., A Return to Fourth Amendment Basics: Undoing the Mischief of Camara and Terry, Minn. L. Rev. 72 (1988): 383.
 Wallin, Howard E., Plain View Revisited, Pace L. Rev. 22 (2002): 307.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Coolidge v. New Hampshire, 403 U.S. 443 (1971)
Illinois v. Andreas, 463 U.S. 765 (1983)
Mincey v. Arizona, 437 U.S. 385 (1978)
Payton v. New York, 445 U.S. 573 (1980)
Texas v. Brown, 460 U.S. 730 (1983)

See also Plain View; Probable Cause; Scalia, Antonin; Search (General Definition); Seizures; Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968); Warrantless Searches

ARIZONA v. YOUNGBLOOD, 488 U.S. 51 (1988)

In Youngblood, a divided Supreme Court held that the Fourteenth Amendment due process clause does not require the government to preserve evidence that could conclusively prove the defendant innocent.

Weeks after a young boy was abducted and raped, Youngblood was arrested and charged with the crime after the boy picked his photo from a lineup. Youngblood maintained his innocence and requested that a semen stain on the boy's clothing be tested to determine the rapist's blood type. Unfortunately, such testing could not be performed because the police had neglected to refrigerate the stained clothing. Youngblood was convicted at trial, but an appellate court reversed the conviction because the destroyed evidence deprived Youngblood of an opportunity to prove his innocence.

The U.S. Supreme Court reinstated Youngblood's conviction by a vote of six to three. Relying on California v. Trombetta, the majority ruled that the government's failure to preserve potentially exculpatory evidence violates due process only if the government intentionally destroys the evidence in bad faith. Since the police did not intentionally allow the evidence to deteriorate in Youngblood's case, the Court reasoned that he was not entitled to any relief even though the police's negligence deprived him of an opportunity to establish his innocence conclusively. Youngblood thus sharply limits the responsibility of the government to preserve potentially exculpatory evidence for testing.

In 2000, twelve years after the Court sent Youngblood back to prison, he was exonerated when more advanced DNA testing on the stained clothing established that he was not the rapist.

DAVID A. MORAN

References and Further Reading

Imwinkelried, Edwin, and Norman Garland. Exculpatory Evidence, 2nd ed. Charlottesville, VA: Michie Publications, 1996.
 Stacy, Tom, The Search for Truth in Constitutional Criminal Procedure, Columbia Law Review 91 (1991): 1369.
 Whitaker, Barbara. "DNA Frees Inmate Years After Justices Rejected Plea." The New York Times, August 11, 2000.

Cases and Statutes Cited

California v. Trombetta, 467 U.S. 479 (1984)

See also California v. Trombetta, 467 U.S. 479 (1984); Due Process; Fourteenth Amendment

ARRAIGNMENT AND PROBABLE CAUSE HEARING

Depending on whether the crime charged is brought federally or within a state jurisdiction, an individual accused of a crime could be faced with a few different pretrial proceedings. In a federal case, once a person is arrested, the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure mandates a defendant be brought before a magistrate judge, or other lawful substitute, without unnecessary delay and be advised of his rights and the charges alleged. Most state jurisdictions mirror this requirement. A second type of hearing, as required by the Fourth Amendment of the Constitution, requires a preliminary hearing/examination to determine whether or not there is probable cause for the underlying arrest (pre-indictment) (Gerstein v. Pugh, 420 U.S. 107, 1975). While each of the pretrial hearings serves separate functions, it is not unusual if they are combined and heard simultaneously in some jurisdictions.

In addition, the U.S. Supreme Court has put a time clock on the probable cause hearing so that it is to be held within forty-eight hours for those arrested without a warrant (Riverside v. McLaughlin, 500 U.S. 44, 1991). Furthermore, in the federal criminal system, if the defendant is determined to be a danger or a flight risk and is detained after this initial appearance, the government then has ten days to seek a grand jury indictment or a finding of "probable cause" by a magistrate judge at a preliminary hearing. If the defendant is not detained, the government then has twenty days to seek grand jury indictment. Furthermore, even a finding of "probable cause" by a federal magistrate judge does not substitute for the Fifth Amendment's requirement for indictment by a grand jury in a federal case. Thus, the case must still be presented to a grand jury. It should also be noted that states are not required to bring a criminal charge by a grand jury and therefore may generally proceed on a case with a finding of probable cause by a judge.

A preliminary hearing is the vehicle used to determine whether there is “probable cause” to believe that an offense has been committed and whether the defendant committed it. The proceeding does not establish guilt or innocence and does not preclude a subsequent grand jury from considering the same case for indictment. Therefore, even if a magistrate judge does not find probable cause to support the arrest and dismisses the complaint with a release of the accused, this does not prevent a prosecution for that same offense.

Subsequent to indictment or other charging document (for example, information), an arraignment must be held. Like the initial appearance in court after an arrest, the arraignment is merely part of the initial steps in the criminal process. At the arraignment, retained counsel represents the defendant or, if the defendant is considered indigent, court-appointed counsel is provided. In addition, the defendant is provided a copy of the charging document and asked to plead to the allegations. Normally, a defendant will initially enter a plea of “not guilty” to allow for time to receive and inspect discovery, investigate the charges, and consult with counsel. Finally, the arraignment is also significant in that it serves as a trigger for many procedural rules, such as the “speedy trial clock” (if the defendant is out of custody), discovery deadlines, and the multiple “notices,” as prescribed by the procedural rules such as insanity or alibi.

ROBERT DON GIFFORD

Cases and Statutes Cited

Gerstein v. Pugh, 420 U.S. 107 (1975)

Riverside v. McLaughlin, 500 U.S. 44 (1991)

ARREST

The fact of an arrest and the definition of an arrest are of fundamental importance. An arrest is a significant intrusion upon the liberty of the person arrested. Another reason the term is important is because, when a valid arrest is made, the right of the police to search the person arrested is automatic. It is also significant because, if an arrest is made without probable cause, the subsequent seizure of evidence may be considered a fruit of that unlawful arrest and cannot be used against the suspect in a criminal trial. The timing of an arrest is also important in civil actions for claims of false arrest.

Throughout most of the history of the United States, the law of arrest was largely unregulated by the strictures of Fourth Amendment theory. There are two primary reasons for this. First, the exclusionary rule was not adopted to regulate the activities of federal authorities until the early part of the twentieth century. Only at that point, as Telford Taylor has observed, was there a “good reason” to contest the validity of a search incident to arrest. Second, law enforcement has been, and still remains, primarily a state and local issue. Given that the rule excluding illegally obtained evidence from criminal trials was not made applicable to state actors until 1961, the Fourth Amendment’s requirements did not regulate the great bulk of interactions between law enforcement officials and citizens. Accordingly, the concept of an arrest developed primarily outside the body of Fourth Amendment jurisprudence.

Most of the development of the law on arrest occurred at common law. Several centuries of precedent and many commentators have produced what appear to be irreconcilable definitions of what constitutes an arrest. This is because the common law definition of arrest, like many common law principles, has proved to be very malleable and has been engrafted with factual considerations and burdened by broad generalizations. One must look beyond each factual situation and eliminate the extraneous gloss on the definition created by some authorities. Once that is done, two essential components of the common law definition of an arrest by a law enforcement officer acting pursuant to real or pretended authority emerge: (1) the officer must obtain “custody” of the suspect; and (2) the officer must intend to obtain that custody.

The concept of “custody” at common law did not require a trip to the police station, booking, or the institution of formal charges to constitute an arrest. Rather, an arrest was equated with any form of intentional detention and began at the moment of the detention. Indeed, as has been stated by Alexander in his treatise, the word arrest “is derived from the French word arreter, which means to stop, detain, to hinder, to obstruct.” Custody occurs when the police officer physically touches the suspect with the intent to arrest him or when the suspect submits to the officer’s show of authority.

Intent to arrest is the second element of the common law definition of arrest. An officer’s act of obtaining custody must be intentional—that is, he or she must do the acts that would otherwise constitute an arrest with the intent to arrest the suspect. There is no required manifestation of an intent to arrest beyond the acts sufficient to obtain custody. Also, an officer must not intend to do anything with the suspect beyond the intent to detain him.

The U.S. Supreme Court has generally followed the common law rule to define an arrest. However, to permit a search incident to arrest, the Court has sometimes required more, such as an intent by the police to take the person to the police station before they are allowed to search. An arrest is justified when the police have probable cause that the person arrested has committed a crime. Probable cause is a fair probability that the person has committed the crime. In measuring probable cause, a court examines the factual and practical considerations of everyday life upon which reasonable persons act.

Modern authority to arrest is governed by statute in most jurisdictions, with each jurisdiction specifying the types of offenses that permit an arrest. Arrests are generally made for the purpose of prosecuting the person for a criminal offense. However, arrests for other purposes are also sometimes permitted, including detaining material witnesses to an offense to obtain information from them. Police officers will also exercise their authority to arrest persons for a variety of reasons, such as separating persons involved in domestic disputes or fights, but will then exercise their discretion and let the arrestees go without charging them. These are just a few of the many reasons why a large percentage of arrests do not result in prosecution.

THOMAS K. CLANCY

References and Further Reading

- Alexander, C. The Law of Arrest. 1949 § 45.
 Clancy, Thomas K., What Constitutes an "Arrest" within the Meaning of the Fourth Amendment? Vill. L. Rev. 48 (2003): 129.
 Sherman, Lawrence W., Defining Arrest: Practical Consequences of Agency Differences, Crim. L. Bull. 16 (1980): 376.
 Taylor, Telford. Two Studies in Constitutional Interpretation. 1969.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Barnhard v. State*, 587 A.2d 561 (Md. App. 1991), aff'd, 602 A.2d 701 (Md. 1992)
Brinegar v. United States, 338 U.S. 160, 175 (1949)
California v. Hodari D., 499 U.S. 621 (1991)
Knowles v. Iowa, 525 U.S. 113 (1998)
Michigan v. DeFillippo, 443 U.S. 31, 37 (1979)
State v. Oquendo, 613 A.2d 1300 (Conn. 1992)
Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968)
Weeks v. United States, 232 U.S. 383 (1914)

See also Arrest Warrants; Search (General Definition); Seizures

ARREST WARRANTS

Law enforcement officials in America and in England in the period preceding the American Revolution did not have broad inherent authority to search and seize; such actions required authorization, and the warrant system was the primary means to confer that authority. Those were simple times and warrantless searches and seizures were virtually nonexistent. Only one type of warrantless seizure may have been common: the arrest of a suspected felon. Such arrests were rarely made except in hot pursuit of the felon. The common law also permitted warrantless arrests for misdemeanors committed in the officer's presence.

There existed at common law the legal process of obtaining an arrest warrant for criminal offenses. An arrest warrant was a command to the sheriff of the county or the marshal of the court to apprehend the suspect and bring him or her to court. This warrant was issued upon a showing of probable cause that the person had committed a felony. It was issued by the court after examining the requesting party under oath and reducing that examination to writing concerning whether a crime had been committed and the party's grounds for suspicion. The person suspected of the crime had to be named.

A similar legal process to obtain a warrant continues to this day. The contemporary authority of the police to arrest with or without warrants varies from state to state based on each state's law. Some of those considerations are whether the crime is a misdemeanor or felony and whether the crime occurred in the officer's presence.

In the twentieth century, the Supreme Court in two separate cases addressed the question of whether the Fourth Amendment required law enforcement officials to obtain a warrant before arresting a suspect. The Court made a distinction between arrests in the home and arrests in public. For arrests in a person's home, the Court in Payton v. New York, 445 U.S. 573 (1980), mandated that an arrest warrant was required and that that warrant carried the implicit authority to enter the home to arrest the suspect.

For arrests occurring in public, however, the Court in United States v. Watson, 423 U.S. 411 (1976), established that no warrant was required. The distinction between the two situations was based on the Court's view that the physical intrusion into a person's home is the "chief evil" that the Fourth Amendment is designed to prevent and that an intrusion into a home to arrest invades its sanctity and privacy. Thus, as Payton said, the "Fourth Amendment draws a firm line at the entrance of the house." Accordingly, absent exigent circumstances, a warrant is needed. In contrast, Watson relied heavily on the prevailing common law view that no warrant is needed for an arrest occurring in public.

THOMAS K. CLANCY

ARREST WARRANTS

References and Further Reading

- Clancy, Thomas K., What Constitutes an "Arrest" within the Meaning of the Fourth Amendment, Vill. L. Rev. 48 (2003): 129.
- , The Role of Individualized Suspicion in Assessing the Reasonableness of Searches and Seizures, Memphis L. Rev. 25 (1995): 483.
- Coke, Edwardo. Institutes of the Laws of England. 1797, 177.
- Davies, Thomas Y., Recovering the Original Fourth Amendment, Mich. L. Rev. 98 (1999): 547.
- Grano, Joseph D., Rethinking the Fourth Amendment Warrant Requirement, Am. Crim. L. Rev. 19 (1982): 603.
- Hale. The History of the Pleas of the Crown. 1847, 85–104.
- Wasserstrom, Silas J., The Incredible Shrinking Fourth Amendment, Am. Crim. L. Rev. 21 (1984): 257.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Payton v. New York*, 445 U.S. 573 (1980)
- United States v. Watson*, 423 U.S. 411 (1976)

See also Arrest; Seizures

ARREST WITHOUT A WARRANT

An arrest constitutes a seizure and must therefore satisfy the Fourth Amendment's requirement that all searches and seizures be reasonable. In order to be reasonable, all arrests must be supported by probable cause to believe that a crime has been committed and that the person to be arrested has committed it. A further, more difficult question is whether the determination of probable cause must be made prior to the arrest by a magistrate issuing an arrest warrant or whether police may lawfully make the arrest without a warrant so long as a magistrate subsequently finds probable cause.

The rules dictating the necessity of a warrant are best understood as not protecting the arrestee's freedom from seizure, but rather any legitimate privacy interests in the physical area that police must enter to make the arrest. Viewed from that perspective, it is not surprising that the rules governing warrants vary depending on the location of the arrest.

In United States v. Watson, 423 U.S. 411 (1976), the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of warrantless arrests made in public places. The Court's opinion in Watson relied heavily on a history that permitted such arrests. The common law authorized police to make warrantless arrests for misdemeanors that occurred in the officer's presence and for all felonies. The traditional common law rule became prevailing contemporary practice under federal and state laws. In light of the national consensus, the Court declined in Watson to impose a different rule under the Fourth Amendment. The Court had no opportunity in Watson to address the constitutionality of warrantless arrests for misdemeanors committed outside a police officer's presence. However, such arrests are rare because most state statutes prohibit officers from making custodial arrests for misdemeanors unless they are committed in their presence.

Suspects who are arrested without a warrant are entitled under Gerstein v. Pugh, 420 U.S. 103 (1975), to a "prompt" judicial determination of probable cause following their arrest. In Riverside v. McLaughlin, 500 U.S. 44 (1991), the Court explained that probable cause hearings provided within forty-eight hours of arrest are presumed to be prompt, absent a contrary showing. After forty-eight hours, the burden shifts to the government to demonstrate extraordinary circumstances justifying the delay.

Despite the Court's allowance of warrantless arrests in public places, strategic or practical considerations may nevertheless persuade police to obtain an arrest warrant. For example, police may be uncertain whether their evidence amounts to probable cause. A judicial determination in advance of arrest mitigates the risk of an unlawful arrest based on the lack of probable cause. Obtaining arrest warrants and maintaining a computerized database of them also facilitates future arrests of wanted suspects during happenstance encounters such as traffic stops.

In contrast to arrests in public places, the Supreme Court has construed the Fourth Amendment to require warrants when police must search a home to make the arrest. In Payton v. New York, 445 U.S. 573 (1980), the Court held that the Fourth Amendment prohibits the warrantless entry into a suspect's home to make an arrest. The Court explained that its holding was not intended to protect the suspect's freedom of movement, implicated by the arrest, but rather the suspect's privacy interests in the home, implicated by the police's nonconsensual entry.

Typically, police are required to obtain a search warrant to justify entry into a person's home. A search warrant is specific about location and requires the issuing magistrate to find probable cause that the person or thing to be seized is likely to be found on the premises to be searched. An arrest warrant, in contrast, only requires probable cause to believe that the suspect has committed a crime; the magistrate makes no determination about the suspect's current location. Despite the general rule requiring search warrants, the Court held in Payton that a suspect's privacy interests are sufficiently protected if the police enter an arrestee's home with an arrest warrant and reason to believe that the arrestee is currently home.

If police seek to arrest a suspect in the home of a third party, however, yet another rule applies, and police must obtain a search warrant. In Steagald v. United States, 451 U.S. 204 (1981), the Court held that an arrest warrant for a suspect who lives elsewhere is insufficient to justify entering a third party's home to make the arrest. To protect the third party homeowner's privacy interests, police must obtain a search warrant based on probable cause to believe that the arrestee will be found on the premises.

Although the three rules established in Watson, Payton, and Steagald are relatively straightforward, their application can raise trickier issues. For example, it may be unclear whether the arrest is in a public place. In United States v. Santana, the defendant was standing directly in her open doorway at the threshold of her home. The Supreme Court noted that the doorway was private in the same sense as a defendant's yard, but nevertheless held that the defendant was in a "public place" for purposes of applying Watson and could be arrested without a warrant. Currently, lower courts remain divided on the question of whether the Watson rule or Payton rule applies when police arrest the suspect in a commercial establishment that is not open to the general public.

Another issue that complicates the application of the rules is the defendant's ability to challenge a violation of them. A person who challenges a police search must have a reasonable expectation of privacy in the area searched (see Rakas v. Illinois, 439 U.S. 128, 1978). Accordingly, if police violate Steagald by entering a third party's home to arrest a wanted suspect, the suspect will not be permitted to challenge the unlawful search if he or she lacks reasonable privacy expectations in the third party's home. Because the Steagald rule is intended to protect privacy rights and not the suspect's liberty, any challenge of the search would need to be made by a person who enjoys privacy rights in the home. If no such person has an incentive to complain, the Fourth Amendment violation may never be challenged at all.

ALAFAIR S. BURKE

References and Further Reading

Dressler, Joshua. Understanding Criminal Procedure, 3rd ed. Understanding Series. New York: LexisNexis, 2002.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Gerstein v. Pugh, 420 U.S. 103 (1975)
Payton v. New York, 445 U.S. 573 (1980)
Rakas v. Illinois, 439 U.S. 128 (1978)
Riverside v. McLaughlin, 500 U.S. 44 (1991)
Steagald v. United States, 451 U.S. 204 (1981)
United States v. Watson, 423 U.S. 411 (1976)

See also Arraignment and Probable Cause Hearing; Arrest; Arrest Warrants; Probable Cause; Search (General Definition); Search Warrants; Seizures

ASHCROFT v. FREE SPEECH COALITION, 535 U.S. 234 (2002)

Congress passed the Child Pornography Prevention Act of 1996 that, among other things, dealt with "virtual" pornographic images of minors. The act prohibited not only the production, distribution, or advertising of pornographic images of actual children but also any visual depiction of what "appears to be" or "conveys the impression" of minors engaged in sexually explicit conduct. The lead respondent, Free Speech Coalition, a lobbying group for the adult entertainment industry, challenged the law on the grounds that the two provisions were constitutionally invalid.

A federal district court for the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals in 1997 upheld the act's constitutionality, ruling the law was content neutral and legitimately discouraged child pornography's secondary effects, like pedophilia. Two years later, a panel for the Ninth Circuit reversed the district court in a two-to-one vote. From 1999 to 2001, however, four other circuit courts sustained the validity of the act. The Supreme Court granted certiorari and declared the "appears to be" and the "conveys the impression" provisions were overbroad, affirming the Ninth Circuit's decision. Justice Kennedy wrote for Justices Stevens, Souter, Ginsburg, and Breyer. Thomas concurred with the judgment. Justice O'Connor concurred in part and dissented in part. Justices Rehnquist and Scalia dissented.

According to Justice Kennedy, "This case provides a textbook example of why we permit facial challenges to statutes that burden expression." The imposition of criminal penalties on protected speech is a "stark example of speech suppression." The law prohibited the production of images "without using any real children" and thus went beyond New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747 (1982), which sustained state interest in preventing the exploitation of actual minors involved in pornography. Virtual images do not involve real minors nor does the production of the images harm or exploit them.

Moreover, the law made no effort to conform to Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 015 (1973). Materials did not have to appeal to prurient interests; depictions of sexually explicit activity, regardless of their literary, artistic, political, or scientific value, were proscribed. Also, it was not necessary for the images to be patently offensive or contravene community standards, as Miller requires. In addition, materials or images were not considered as a whole or in their entirety; a “single graphic depiction” of sexual activity could lead to severe criminal penalties.

Finally, the Court dismissed the government’s secondary effects arguments regarding child pornography. As Justice Kennedy concludes, “The Government has shown no more than a remote connection between speech that might encourage thoughts or impulses and any resulting child abuse. Without a significantly stronger, more direct connection, the Government may not prohibit speech on the ground that it may encourage pedophiles to engage in illegal conduct.”

Justice Rehnquist’s dissent, joined by Justice Scalia, argued that the act’s explicit definition of proscribed sexual activity did not reach protected images or materials. He accordingly claimed that if properly construed, based on its definition of child pornography, the act, would reach only “computer-generated images that are virtually indistinguishable from real children engaged in sexually explicit conduct. The statute need not be read to do any more than precisely this, which is not offensive to the First Amendment.”

In response to the Court’s decision, Congress enacted the Prosecutorial Remedies and Other Tools to End the Exploitation of Children Today Act of 2003 (PROTECT Act) that adopted the dissent’s language to ban some nonobscene pornography produced without an actual minor.

ROY B. FLEMMING

References and Further Reading

- Jenkins, Philip. Beyond Tolerance: Child Pornography on the Internet. New York: New York University Press, 2003.
- Kende, Mark S. “The Supreme Court’s Approach to the First Amendment in Cyberspace: Free Speech as Technology’s Hand-Maiden.” Constitutional Commentary 14(3) (1997):465–480.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition*, 535 U.S. 234 (2002)
- Miller v. California*, 413 U.S. 015 (1973)
- New York v. Ferber*, 458 U.S. 747 (1982)

ASHCROFT, JOHN (1942–)

John Ashcroft served as attorney general during the first term of the administration of George W. Bush, and in his last year in office analysts were terming him the worst attorney general in the nation’s history. Certainly in terms of civil liberties, Ashcroft showed no sympathy for or even understanding of due process and other constitutional protections. Under the banner of the war on terrorism, Ashcroft defended every infraction as necessary for the nation’s security.

Ashcroft probably would not have become attorney general except for a freak political event. A conservative and very popular with the religious Right, Ashcroft had been governor of Missouri and then in 1994 won a seat to the U.S. Senate. He ran for reelection in 2000 against the popular Democratic governor, Mel Carnahan, who was killed in a plane crash just a few weeks before the election. Too late to replace his name on the ballot, Democrats urged voters to cast their votes for Carnahan, and the lieutenant governor said he would appoint Carnahan’s widow to the seat until a special election could be scheduled. Carnahan won, the first time in history that a dead man won a federal election, and Bush then named Ashcroft to head the Justice Department.

Clearly the attacks of September 11, 2001, and the resulting “war on terror” shaped Ashcroft’s and the administration’s policies. Historically, civil liberties have always been at risk in wartime, but this “war” took place in an era with technological possibilities of invading the privacy and rights of individuals far greater than in any previous conflict. Ashcroft determined to make full use of what he considered the unlimited power of the executive branch in wartime along with all the tools of surveillance to ferret out would-be terrorists. If he had found and prosecuted any terrorists caught in these webs, he might have offered some justification for his actions; but in fact there were none. Much of the activity in federal courts consisted of men caught in a web of often lawless tactics trying to secure minimal due process of law. As for these efforts, Ashcroft cavalierly dismissed them, saying due process in wartime could be found outside the federal court system and attacking federal judges who questioned the administration’s tactics as unpatriotic and allies of the terrorists.

In the wake of 9/11, the administration rounded up hundreds of men of Arab descent and held them virtually incommunicado for weeks and months. It fought every effort by civil liberties groups to get lawyers to these men and declared that, under the war powers, so-called “enemy combatants” were not entitled to the basic constitutional protections. In the end a number of these men were deported, not for terrorist activity, but for violations of immigration law; the rest were eventually released without any charges made against them and no apology from the government. Ashcroft considered the round-up justified by the circumstances; moreover, he argued that the president’s war powers allowed him to arrest and hold indefinitely not only aliens but also American citizens, and he condemned as “proterrorist wimps” those who objected to such a claim.

The bad behavior of American troops in treating prisoners in Afghanistan and Iraq eventually led journalists to discover that the Justice Department had advised the administration that in wartime it was not bound by international bans against torture. When called to testify before the Senate Judiciary Committee in June 2004, Ashcroft argued that these memoranda were nothing more than talking points and that the United States did not justify torture and the president had not ordered it. But he refused to state that torture was wrong and would never be used or justified by the administration.

Following the hurried passing of the USA PATRIOT Act in late 2001, civil libertarians warned that the broad powers given to the government in terms of surveillance posed a great threat to civil liberties. Ashcroft at the time denied that such violations would occur, but in fact they did. During his tenure, the FBI engaged in massive surveillance of suspected domestic terrorists, which included groups that had no ties to Al-Qaeda or other Muslim fundamentalist terror operations. Although the law established a special court to deal with requests for warrants for secret wiretaps, the Bush administration chose to bypass this tribunal and engage in illegal wiretaps on its own authority.

Even if there had been no 9/11, which some theorists believed could in fact justify the type of extralegal activities engaged in by the Bush administration, Ashcroft's record in other, nonterrorist-related areas also showed a blatant disregard for civil liberties. When he was governor of and then senator from Missouri, Ashcroft had been a strong conservative, who counted as among his strongest supporters members of the so-called Christian right. An adherent of the ultra-conservative Assembly of God church, he fully shared the Christian right's opposition to abortion and their demand for greater morality in public life.

He certainly tried to impose his brand of morality while attorney general. In one of the more ludicrous policies, he insisted that a blue cloth be draped over the torso of the "Spirit of Justice" statue in the Justice Department's great hall, the place where the attorney general normally holds his or her press conferences. It appears that the bare breast of the larger-than-life statue offended his sense of morality as well as those of his religious supporters.

With his defense of antipornography legislation and other attempts by Congress to regulate the Internet, Ashcroft also kept the solicitor general busy. All were struck down by the courts as violating the First Amendment.

A long time opponent of abortion, Ashcroft paid attention to some religious anti-abortion groups who equated physician-assisted suicide with termination of pregnancy. The Supreme Court in 1990 had ruled that although there was no constitutional right to physician-assisted suicide, states were free in their power to regulate medical practice to allow such an end-of-life choice. The Court even pointed to the example of Oregon, which through a referendum had adopted a model assisted-suicide law, as one option open to the states.

But Ashcroft would have none of it, and he attempted to use provisions of the federal narcotics law to nullify the Oregon plan, even going so far as to threaten criminal prosecution of doctors who prescribed lethal drugs to qualified patients. Oregon fought back, and in the federal district court as well as in the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, the judges slapped Ashcroft down, in effect saying he was an intermeddling busybody who had no power or authority under federal law to interfere. (That case went on appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court, but Ashcroft had left office when the justices granted certiorari.)

The Ashcroft Justice Department showed little interest in civil rights, and a number of lawyers left the civil rights section in protest. Ashcroft also aroused the ire of federal attorneys when he moved to restrict their discretion in prosecuting certain types of cases. Under federal law, some offenses, such as killing a federal officer, are considered capital crimes; this means that a death penalty may be sought. Federal prosecutors often determined to allow the defendant to plea bargain down to a lesser punishment in return for cooperation, such as providing the names of drug dealers higher up in the organization. Usually, the prosecutor informs the Justice Department of his or her decision to do this, and the officials in Washington usually defer to the judgment of the attorney handling the case.

But John Ashcroft wanted federal prosecutors to go for the death penalty in every possible instance, and it would seem that he did not care at all about other matters such as ensnaring gang leaders or large drug dealers. Ashcroft's intervention in these cases, often after a judge had approved the plea bargain, brought him enormous criticism from federal attorneys and from judges as well. Upon his leaving office there was widespread anticipation that his successor, Alberto Gonzalez, would be flooded with requests to review and overturn many of Ashcroft's decisions in this area.

At the time of the terrorist attack in September 2001, many people warned that if the United States ignored its long tradition of rule by law and protection of civil liberties, it would be no better than the enemy and that, in fact, this would mean that the terrorists had won. Interestingly, when the administration began planning what powers it could utilize,

Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld, aware of the violations of civil liberties in previous wars, convened a panel of respected, nongovernment lawyers to advise him and the administration on what they could and could not do. They warned him against the types of orders Bush was planning to use against noncitizens before special military panels, and to assure that traditional American rights, such as trial by jury and right to counsel, were not ignored. John Ashcroft, however, intervened to make sure that these recommendations were never implemented.

MELVIN I. UROFSKY

ASSISTED SUICIDE

It was not until the last decade of the twentieth century that the U.S. Supreme Court decided three cases in which the Court began what remains a tentative exploration of whether (if at all) the U.S. Constitution guarantees a choice concerning the time and manner of one's death. The Court seemed especially concerned that it leave room for the political process to address the so-called "right to die"—a term of art, covering a broad array of factual settings raising end-of-life issues, most notably physician-assisted suicide (PAS), decisions by competent adults to refuse or remove life-sustaining treatment, and choices made on behalf of children or incompetent adults. In 2004, the nation was riveted with the Terri Schiavo case, an especially powerful illustration of the legal and political complexities that abound in this area of individual liberty.

Legal Context

American law has long recognized a constitutional right to refuse medical treatment. Like all rights, it is not absolute and subject to reasonable state regulation. As early as 1905 (Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 197 U.S. 11), the Supreme Court upheld a compulsory vaccination law, justified by the government's interest in stopping the spread of communicable diseases.

The first case to bring to widespread public attention the issue of hastening the death of a dying person came in 1976, when a U.S. appellate court upheld the right of close family members to allow the termination of life support for a patient, Karen Ann Quinlan, in a persistent vegetative state. Other cases soon followed and all states enacted laws recognizing the legal right to withhold or withdraw life-sustaining medical treatment. There emerged a legal consensus on three fundamental principles: (1) Competent persons have a right to refuse medical treatment, even if the result is death; (2) persons without decision-making capacity have a right to have their family decide to withhold or withdraw treatment; (3) a "bright line" exists between "passively" hastening a person's death by withholding or withdrawing treatment and more "active" means such as assisted suicide and active euthanasia.

The U.S. Supreme Court began its tentative forays into the problem in 1990 in the case of Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Department of Health, 497 U.S. 261 (1990). The parents of Nancy Cruzan, who was in a persistent vegetative state with no hope of regaining consciousness, sought to terminate food and hydration, ending her life.

The Court's decision was in three parts. First, the Court said that competent adults have a constitutional right to refuse medical care. (Only Justice Antonin Scalia refused to recognize such a right.) That principle, Chief Justice William Rehnquist wrote, "may be inferred from our prior decisions." Rehnquist "assumed" that there was a right to refuse food and water and thus hasten death. Five other justices stated explicitly that such a right exists. This liberty was grounded in the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The second major portion of the opinion held that before treatment is terminated, a state may require solid evidence that a person wanted that result. The third major component of the opinion held that states have the power to prevent family members from making this decision for another. The right to end treatment is uniquely personal, and a decision by others, even close family, may not necessarily be motivated by the best interests of the patient.

Key questions were left unresolved. The right recognized here was not deemed "fundamental" and thus the opinion gave no guidance as to what level of judicial scrutiny (strict or some lower level) was appropriate. The Court also did not address what kind of proof is needed to constitute clear and convincing evidence of the person's desires in these matters. The strong implication of the Court's language was that a written "living will" would meet the test but that a state could refuse to recognize oral testimony. Finally, the Court left open the question of whether a state is or is not required to defer to the decision of a surrogate or guardian if there is "competent and probative evidence" that the patient wished that surrogate to decide.

In 1997, the Court turned its attention to PAS in two cases, Washington v. Glucksberg, 117 U.S. 2258 (1997), and Vacco v. Quill, 117 U.S. 2293 (1997). While the Court rejected facial challenges to state laws punishing persons aiding a suicide and the claim that there is a constitutional right to PAS, there was an even greater tentativeness to many of the justices' opinions than had been seen in previous cases. While the effect of the decisions was to uphold laws in forty-nine states prohibiting assisting another in committing suicide, a majority of the justices went to some pains to leave open the possibility of state laws protecting such a right consistent with the U.S. Constitution.

In Washington v. Glucksberg, the Court rejected the notion that the Fourteenth Amendment includes a fundamental right to assisted suicide. Reasoning that a right is fundamental under the due process clause only when grounded in history or tradition, Chief Justice Rehnquist's opinion noted that for "over 700 years" the "Anglo-American common-law tradition has punished or otherwise disapproved of both suicide and attempting suicide." Moreover, in almost every state in the United States and in most Western democracies it is a crime to assist suicide. Thus, the right is not fundamental; the Washington law could be upheld as long as it had a rational basis, which Rehnquist found in the state's concerns to preserve life, protect the integrity and ethics of the medical profession, protect vulnerable groups, and avoid the slippery slope to voluntary and possibly even involuntary euthanasia.

The constitutional issue in Vacco v. Quill was somewhat different: Do laws prohibiting PAS violate the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment? Rehnquist, again writing for the majority, held that such laws do not discriminate against a suspected class (for example, a racial minority) and do not violate a fundamental right, since Glucksberg refused to recognize the claimed right as fundamental. Under established equal protection analysis, the law must be upheld as long as it meets the rational basis test, and the state's rational interests for such laws had also been spelled out in Glucksberg.

States remain free to enact laws protecting this right. The Court indicated that nothing in the Constitution limits a state's ability to prohibit or allow PAS. (In 1994, the Oregon Death With Dignity Act legalized PAS for competent, terminally ill adults. Other states have considered or will consider similar laws.) Five justices in concurring opinions indicated that PAS prohibitions might be unconstitutional as applied in specific cases. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor said (several times) in her concurrence that suffering patients in the last days of their lives may have a constitutional right to relief of that suffering. Justice Stephen Breyer very clearly indicated that there may be a constitutional right to PAS in a specific case if the person's core claim is "avoidance of severe physical pain (connected with death)." He noted pointedly that the Washington and New York laws "do not prohibit doctors from providing patients with drugs sufficient to control pain despite the risk that those drugs themselves will kill."

Political Context

Against the backdrop of totalitarian abuses in Russia and Germany, post-World War II America saw a heightened concern for fundamental human rights such as equality, personal liberty, and privacy. The African-American civil rights movement and Vietnam war protests paved the way for the liberation movements of the 1970s with respect to the rights of women, gays, other racial and ethnic minorities, and people with disabilities. Starting with the Cruzan case, the 1990s brought a movement for the rights of the dying.

As often happens (for example, the right of privacy recognized in Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965), and the right to abortion in Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113, 1973), the Supreme Court comes on the scene only after challenges to laws at the state and local level. (In 1965, every state except Connecticut recognized a right to use contraception. In 1973, most states had legalized abortion.) Thus, some of the Court's tentativeness regarding the "right to die" undoubtedly reflects a genuine desire to allow states to engage fully in the political and legal experimentation that Justice Louis D. Brandeis hailed as one of the benefits of the federal system.

Liberation movements often spark backlash; the reaction of abortion foes to Roe v. Wade is an especially vivid example. The "right to die" is no exception. Perhaps nothing better epitomizes the intensity of conflict in this area than the case of Terri Schiavo, which sparked in Florida "Terri's Law," arguably one of the more extreme legislative interferences (if one discounts the U.S. Congress's subsequent interjections into the Schiavo case) with the judicial process and individual rights. Many conservative groups in that state applied concerted pressure on Florida legislators to pass the law, certainly out of a concern for Schiavo, but also as a means to advance their broader prolife and anti-abortion agenda.

Shortly after Oregon's Death with Dignity law went into effect, the federal Drug Enforcement Administration threatened Oregon doctors with loss of federal prescribing privileges if they provided dying patients with services authorized by the state law. Attorney General Janet Reno ruled that this was an improper use of the federal regulations. In the midst of the 9/11 crisis, Attorney General John Ashcroft reversed his predecessor's decision. The U.S. District Court for Oregon held that Ashcroft lacked authority under the federal Controlled Substances Act (CSA), and the Ninth Circuit affirmed. On February 22, 2005, the U.S. Supreme Court granted certiorari in Gonzales v. Oregon (368 F. 3d 1118, 9th Cir. 2004, cert. granted, No. 04-623, U.S. Feb. 22, 2005) and will consider whether the attorney general's interpretation of the CSA prohibiting distribution of federally controlled substances for the purpose of facilitating an individual's suicide, regardless of state law, is a permissible interpretation. A decision was expected by the end of the Court's October 2005 term.

The legal and political future of PSA and other components of "the right to die" remains an open question, one of the first great civil liberties issues of the twenty-first century.

PHILIP A. DYNIA

References and Further Reading

- Allen, Michael P., The Constitution at the Threshold of Life and Death: A Suggested Approach to Accommodate an Interest in Life and a Right to Die, American University Law Review 53 (June 2004): 971–1021.
- Glick, Henry. R. The Right to Die: Policy Innovation and Its Consequences. New York: Columbia University Press, 1992.
- Law, Sylvia A. "Choice in Dying: A Political and Constitutional Context." In Physician Assisted Dying, Timothy E. Quill and Margaret P. Battin, eds. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2004, 300–308.
- Stutsman, Eli D. "Political Strategy and Legal Change." In Physician Assisted Dying, Timothy E. Quill and Margaret P. Battin, eds. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2004, 300–308.
- Winslade, William J. "Physician-Assisted Suicide: Evolving Public Policies." In Physician Assisted Suicide, Robert F. Weir, ed. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1997, 224–242.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Department of Health*, 497 U.S. 261 (1990)
- Gonzales v. Oregon*, 368 F. 3d 1118 (9th Cir. 2004), cert. granted, No. 04-623 (U.S. Feb. 22, 2005)
- Griswold v. Connecticut*, 381 U.S. 479 (1965)
- Jacobson v. Massachusetts*, 197 U.S. 11 (1905)
- Roe v. Wade*, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)
- Vacco v. Quill*, 117 U.S. 2293 (1997)
- Washington v. Glucksberg*, 117 U.S. 2258 (1997)

See also Compelling State Interest; Cruzan v. Missouri, 497 U.S. 261 (1990); Gay and Lesbian Rights; Kevoorkian, Jack; Privacy; Privacy, Theories of; Refusal of Medical Treatment and Religious Beliefs; Washington v. Glucksburg, 521 U.S. 702 (1997)

ASYLUM, REFUGEES, AND THE CONVENTION AGAINST TORTURE

The United States provides several forms of relief to refugees, or individuals fleeing persecution in their home country. The legal framework governing refugees derives principally from international law and has been implemented in statutes and regulations. It is the principal means by which those fleeing persecution or torture in their home countries may seek safety and possible resettlement in the United States or a third country.

Refugees may be divided into two general categories: (1) those individuals who are still outside the United States but who are seeking to resettle in the United States or another nation that receives refugees (known under U.S. law as "overseas refugees"); and (2) those individuals who have been able to reach the United States on their own and who are seeking to remain in the United States or to avoid return to their country of origin for fear of persecution (known under U.S. law as "asylum seekers"). The same definition of a "refugee" applies to both categories.

The definition of a refugee derives from the 1951 United Nations Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees and the 1967 United Nations Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees. The 1951 refugee convention was drafted in response to atrocities that took place in Europe following World War II and was limited in both time and duration. The 1967 protocol sought to expand the protections of the 1951 convention to refugees worldwide without temporal limitations.

A refugee is defined as an individual who is outside his or her country of origin due to "a well-founded fear of being persecuted for reasons of race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group, or political opinion." Civil war or other internal strife does not provide a basis for establishing refugee status, unless the individual is fleeing persecution based upon one of the five protected grounds. An essentially identical definition of refugees is contained in the Refugee Act of 1980. The prohibition against returning refugees to countries where they would face persecution is known as the principle of nonrefoulement.

Persecution does not have a precise definition; it includes a wide range of harms and is not limited to threats to one's life or freedom. An applicant for asylum may establish a well-founded fear of persecution based upon persecution that occurred in the past or based upon a fear that persecution might occur in the future, as long as that fear is well founded. The Supreme Court has said that a person's fear is "well founded" if the chance of persecution is one in ten (INS v. Cardoza-Fonseca, 480 U.S. 421, 1987). An asylum applicant, however, must show not only that the fear of persecution is well founded but also that the persecution is on account of one of the five protected grounds. Thus, an asylum applicant must produce evidence of a persecutor's motives and not just evidence of persecution. The applicant, moreover, must show that this persecution is on account of the applicant's political opinion or other protected characteristic and not the persecutor's (INS v. Elias-Zacharias, 502 U.S. 478, 1992). This "nexus" requirement prevents people who fear harm or even death from establishing refugee status absent a sufficient connection to one of the five protected grounds of the refugee definition.

Of the five protected grounds, membership in a particular social group is the most fluid. It was designed to include categories of people who should be protected as refugees but who did not fall within one of the other four categories. A "particular social group" has been defined to include individuals who "share a common immutable characteristic," whether it is innate (like kinship ties) or based upon shared past experience (Matter of Acosta, 19 I. & N. Dec. 211, BIA 1985). Over the years, this category has been expanded to include members of certain clans, homosexuals, and women subject to female genital mutilation.

To qualify for asylum, an applicant must also establish that he is not subject to one of the statutory bars to relief, which range from convictions of certain crimes to the failure to apply for asylum within the mandated deadline. Once an individual has demonstrated his eligibility, asylum may be granted at the discretion of the agency. After an individual is granted asylum, he has the opportunity to apply for permanent residence. While in theory there is no limit to the number of individuals who may be granted asylum, in practice that number generally does not exceed fifteen thousand annually.

A second form of relief under U.S. law is known as withholding of removal, which implements the United States' duty of nonrefoulement under the refugee convention. As for asylum, an individual must demonstrate that he or she meets the definition of a refugee. But to qualify for withholding of removal, an applicant must meet a higher standard of proof and show a clear probability of persecution or that the persecution would be more likely than not to occur (INS v. Stevic, 467 U.S. 407, 1984). Unlike asylum, withholding of removal is mandatory for those who qualify.

A third form available to those fleeing persecution is based on the United Nations Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment (commonly referred to as CAT). An individual need not meet the definition of a refugee to qualify for relief under CAT and its implementing regulations. Instead, he must show that it is more likely than not that he would be tortured if he were returned to the country from which he seeks protection. The definition of torture includes physical and mental harm, as long as that harm is intentionally inflicted and sufficiently severe. It is absolutely prohibited to return an individual who qualifies for relief under CAT. CAT has thus become an increasingly important form of relief as other avenues of obtaining relief from removal have been curtailed, particularly for individuals with criminal convictions. Unlike asylum, however, CAT provides only temporary relief from removal and does not provide a basis for obtaining permanent residence in the United States.

JONATHAN L. HAFETZ

References and Further Reading

- Anker, Deborah E. Law of Asylum in the United States, 3rd ed. RLC Publications, 1999.
 Goodwin-Gill, Guy S. The Refugee in International Law. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1998.
 Hathaway, James C. The Law of Refugee Status. Toronto: Butterworths, 1991.
 Hughes, Anwen. Asylum and Withholding of Removal—A Brief Overview of the Substantive Law. New York: Practising Law Institute, 2005.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- INS v. Cardoza-Fonseca*, 480 U.S. 421 (1987)
INS v. Elias-Zacharias, 502 U.S. 478 (1992)
INS v. Stevic, 467 U.S. 407 (1984)
Matter of Acosta, 19 I. & N. Dec. 211 (BIA 1985)
Refugee Act of 1980, Pub. L. No. 96-212, 94 Stat. 102 (1980)

See also Aliens, Civil Liberties of; Noncitizens and Civil Liberties

ATHEISM

Although the first two clauses of the First Amendment concern the establishment and free exercise of "religion," the amendment long has been understood to protect the liberty and equality of nonbelievers. The amendment comprehends "the infidel, the atheist" as much as "the adherent of a non-Christian faith" and "the Court has unambiguously concluded that the individual freedom of conscience protected . . . embraces the right to select any religious faith or none at all" (Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38, 1985, 52–53). The presence in the United States of a substantial minority that disclaims religious belief thus has helped maintain an expansive interpretation of the protections afforded by the amendment that extends beyond religion per se to include a broader realm of individual conscience.

The term “atheism” is a contentious one. In general, it indicates the lack of belief in God, gods, or other divine beings or principles. Its exponents range from those who actively disparage religious ideas as false and incompatible with progressive human emancipation to agnostics, who dispute the possibility of ascertaining the existence of the divine and so forswear religious belief. The U.S. Census Bureau states that, in 2001, 14 percent of respondents asked to identify their religion reported having none, a figure that would indicate a nonbelieving population of about 29.4 million. Other surveys have estimated that American atheists fall between 6 and 9 percent of the American population; a minority have offered figures as low as 3 and as high as 16 percent.

As a matter of national identity, atheists have historically held an ambiguous status. Many of the founders were deists, such as Benjamin Franklin and Thomas Jefferson, and they are claimed as ancestors of modern atheism. Moreover, the Protestant context in which American conceptions of religious liberty developed placed special emphasis on safeguarding the individual conscience as the seat of voluntary religious choice, a position favorable to the protection of atheistic belief. James Madison’s “Memorial and Remonstrance” (1785) and Madison’s and Jefferson’s “Bill for Establishing Religious Freedom” (1786) sought to protect the free minds of nonbelievers at the same time that they protected those of Christians. Indeed, Jefferson’s foundational First Amendment metaphor, that a “wall of separation” had been built between church and state, was expressed in a letter solicited by a group of Baptists in Connecticut, highlighting the alliance between Enlightenment and evangelical thinkers in their mutual efforts to protect the self from coercion.

At the same time, the United States was founded by many who were deeply committed to their faith and sought to provide religious practice with special protection—not because it was a matter of individual conscience, but rather because of its status as religion. Notably, some of the great documents of American liberty, including the “Bill for Establishing Religious Freedom,” begin with an invocation of God. In this light, according to some, while the First Amendment prevents government from favoring one religious group over another, it by no means requires the state to maintain a neutral position between religion and nonbelief or to refrain from promoting religion generally. Within constitutional law, this position, labeled “nonpreferentialism” in contrast to the approach of “voluntarism and separatism,” has never gained a majority on the Court, though it represents the view of a powerful segment of the voting public, which has been inspired to organize, in part, to resist the challenge of atheism and secularization.

While atheists once were subject to some legal disabilities based on their beliefs, they never experienced the systematic persecution faced by atheists in Britain, and those disabilities were fully eliminated in principle or practice over the course of the twentieth century as the First Amendment was applied to the states through the constitutional process of incorporation. Atheists today are competent witnesses in court; they do not fear prosecution for blasphemy and they need not swear a religious oath to serve in public office. Atheists have continued, however, to challenge two forms of public expression in which government can be said to prefer religion over nonbelief in violation of the establishment clause: prayer in public schools and those appeals to religion outside the school context often labeled “ceremonial deism.”

Challenges to prayer in public schools have been consistently successful. In its inaugural analysis of the issue, the Court in Engel v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421 (1962), prohibited the recitation of a daily nondenominational prayer; in Abington School District v. Schempp, 374 U.S. 203 (1963), it struck down the reading of verses from the Bible at the opening of the school day; in Wallace v. Jaffree (1985), it struck down a law authorizing schools to set aside a one-minute moment of silence for “meditation or voluntary prayer”; and in Lee v. Weisman, 505 U.S. 577 (1992), it struck down a banally ecumenical invocation of God’s blessings at a high school graduation. Similarly, in Stone v. Graham, 449 U.S. 39 (1980), the Court struck down a law requiring the posting of the Ten Commandments in public school classrooms, and in Edwards v. Aguillard, 482 U.S. 578 (1987), it struck down a law requiring the teaching of “creation science” in classrooms that also taught evolutionary biology.

Challenges to the state use of nondenominational religious appeals outside the school context have met with mixed success. Some public religious holiday displays, such as nativity scenes, have been upheld against challenge, as in Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668 (1984), while others have not, as in County of Allegheny v. ACLU, 492 U.S. 573 (1989). As in most First Amendment litigation, the outcome of such cases has depended heavily on close scrutiny of the factual context at issue. Challenges to traditional invocations of the deity as an aspect of national civic culture—for instance, the use of the national motto “In God We Trust” on federal currency—have failed or are highly unlikely to succeed. When upheld, such religious appeals have been said to “have lost through rote repetition any significant religious content” and to be “uniquely suited” to achieve “such wholly secular purposes as solemnizing public occasions, or inspiring commitment to meet some national challenge” (Lynch, 716–717).

MARK S. WEINER

References and Further Reading

- Borden, Morton. Jews, Turks, and Infidels. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1984.
- Dorsen, Norman, The Religion Clauses and Nonbelievers, William & Mary Law Review 27 (1986): 5:863–873.
- Hartogensis, B.H., Denial of Equal Rights to Religious Minorities and Non-Believers in the United States, Yale Law Journal 39 (1930): 659–681.
- Laycock, Douglas, “Nonpreferential” Aid to Religion: A False Claim About Original Intent, William & Mary Law Review 27 (1986): 5:875–923.
- Zuckerman, Phil. “Atheism: Contemporary Rates and Patterns.” In The Cambridge Companion to Atheism, Michael Martin, ed. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2007.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Abington School District v. Schempp*, 374 U.S. 203 (1963)
- County of Allegheny v. ACLU*, 492 U.S. 573 (1989)
- Edwards v. Aguillard*, 482 U.S. 578 (1987)
- Engel v. Vitale*, 370 U.S. 421 (1962)
- Lee v. Weisman*, 505 U.S. 577 (1992)
- Lynch v. Donnelly*, 465 U.S. 668 (1984)
- Wallace v. Jaffree*, 472 U.S. 38 (1985)

See also American Civil Liberties Union; Americans United for Separation of Church and State; Bible Reading in Public Schools, History of before and after Abington School District v. Schempp; Defining Religion; Legislative Prayer; Lemon Test; No Coercion Test; No Endorsement Test; Prayer in Public Schools; Religious Symbols on Public Property; Scopes Trial; Secular Humanism and the Public Schools; Ten Commandments on Display in Public Buildings; Wall of Separation

AUTOMOBILE SEARCHES

The Fourth Amendment was added to the U.S. Constitution in 1791 as part of the Bill of Rights. The amendment regulates government actors and provides, in part, the “right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures.” The Supreme Court, in Weeks v. United States, 232 U.S. 383 (1914), described the protection against unreasonable searches and seizures as recognizing the principle that “a man’s house was his castle.” The amendment also provides that “no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause.” In general, the Court has determined that a search or seizure is unreasonable unless it is based on probable cause and a warrant, or probable cause and an exception to the warrant requirement.

Searches of automobiles and any containers or occupants therein implicate Fourth Amendment protections. These searches typically occur without warrants, subsequent to a traffic stop. Recognizing the difficulties in getting a warrant for a moving vehicle, the Court has fashioned an exception to the warrant clause for automobiles and containers therein. As long as police have probable cause to believe that an automobile contains an item subject to seizure, they can stop the vehicle and perform a warrantless search of the interior and any containers inside that are capable of holding the suspected item.

The Court first addressed a warrantless search of an automobile in 1925 in Carroll v. United States, 267 U.S. 132 (1925), a Prohibition-era case. In Carroll, federal agents had no warrant but did have probable cause to believe that a car contained illegal liquor. Agents stopped the car, searched its interior, and found illegal alcohol. In finding the search reasonable, the Court recognized first the inherent mobility of an automobile. The Court distinguished between a house, or other permanent structure, and an automobile; because an automobile can quickly be moved out of the jurisdiction, it is not practical for police to obtain a warrant. The Court also reasoned that one has a diminished expectation of privacy in an automobile, unlike in a house. Given these factors, the Court determined that an automobile search based upon probable cause is an exception to the warrant requirement.

In subsequent cases, the Court has developed and expanded the exception. In doing so, the Court has continued to rely on the two rationales of mobility and reduced expectation of privacy, but has found that the exception can apply even to vehicles that are stationary or are also being used as homes. In Chambers v. Maroney, 399 U.S. 42 (1970), pursuant to a lawful traffic stop and arrest, police drove the defendant’s car back to the police station, where it was searched some time later. The Court determined the warrantless search was justified because police could have lawfully searched the car without a warrant at the scene of the arrest. In California v. Carney, 471 U.S. 386 (1985), police conducted a warrantless search, based upon probable cause, of a parked motor home and discovered marijuana. In finding that the search was reasonable, the Court stressed the mobility of, and the reduced expectation of privacy in, a motor home. Motor homes, like automobiles, are regulated by the government in a manner not applicable to fixed dwellings. In Carney, the Court noted that an objective observer could also conclude that it was being used as a vehicle and not a home.

AUTOMOBILE SEARCHES

Probable cause to search an automobile extends to any containers within the vehicle, including those belonging to passengers, that are capable of concealing the suspected item. For example, if police have probable cause to believe a vehicle contains illegal weapons, they may, without a warrant, open only those containers inside the vehicle large enough to hold such weapons.

Probable cause to believe that a container alone, not the vehicle, contains contraband or evidence does not justify a warrantless search of the entire vehicle. In such a situation, police may lawfully stop the automobile, seize the container, and search only it without a warrant. In California v. Acevedo, officers had probable cause to believe that a paper bag in a car's trunk contained marijuana. Without a warrant, officers stopped the vehicle, opened the trunk and the paper bag, and discovered marijuana inside the bag. The lower court held that police acted properly in seizing the bag. However, because the officers did not have probable cause to believe that the defendant's car otherwise contained contraband, the court found that the officers violated the Fourth Amendment by opening the bag without a warrant. The Supreme Court reversed and found that, while a warrantless search of the entire vehicle would have been unreasonable because there was no probable cause, the warrantless search of the bag was justified because the officers had probable cause to believe that it contained marijuana. Interpreting Carroll as governing all warrantless automobile cases, the Court explained that "police may search an automobile and the containers within it where they have probable cause to believe contraband or evidence is contained."

Subsequent to a lawful impoundment of a vehicle, police may also perform a warrantless search in the course of inventorying its contents. Such an inventory search, however, must be conducted in accordance with standard procedures established by the jurisdiction's law enforcement agency.

While Carroll set forth the rule for warrantless automobile searches, other case law controls Fourth Amendment issues surrounding warrantless searches and seizures of occupants of an automobile. If an officer lawfully stops an automobile, he or she can ask all occupants to step out of the car as a result of the lawful stop, even without any indication that the occupants are engaging in illegal activities. If the officer has probable cause to arrest an occupant of the vehicle and take that person into custody, incident to that custodial arrest, he or she can search not only the arrestee but also the passenger compartment, including any closed or open containers, without a warrant. While the arrest alone does not provide the authority for a warrantless search of the trunk, what is discovered during the search of the passenger compartment might provide the necessary justification for such a search.

MARGARET M. LAWTON

References and Further Reading

- Allen, Ronald Jay, Joseph L. Hoffmann, Debra A. Livingston, and William J. Stuntz. Comprehensive Criminal Procedure, 2nd ed. New York: Aspen Publishers, 2005, 333–336; 489–493.
- American Jurisprudence*, 2nd ed., vol. 68 (Searches and Seizures). St. Paul, MN: West Group, 2000, sec. 268 (Vehicular Searches).
- Investigation and Police Practices: Warrantless Searches and Seizures: Vehicle Searches, Container Searches, and Inventory Searches*, The Georgetown Law Journal 34th Annual Review of Criminal Procedure, 91–101 (2005).
- LaFave, Wayne R., Jerold Israel, and Nancy J. King. Criminal Procedure: Criminal Practice Series, vol. 2. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 1999, Chapter 3, sec. 2(e) and 7 (a – f).
- Loewy, Arnold H., Cops, Cars, and Citizens: Fixing the Broken Balance, Saint John's Law Review 76 (2002): 535–581.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- California v. Carney*, 471 U.S. 386 (1985)
- Carroll v. United States*, 267 U.S. 132 (1925)
- Chambers v. Maroney*, 399 U.S. 42 (1970)
- Florida v. Wells*, 495 U.S. 1 (1990)
- Knowles v. Iowa*, 525 U.S. 113 (1998)
- Maryland v. Wilson*, 519 U.S. 408 (1997)
- New York v. Belton*, 453 U.S. 454 (1981)
- Thornton v. United States*, 541 U.S. 615 (2004)
- United States v. Chadwick*, 433 U.S. 1 (1977)
- Weeks v. United States*, 232 U.S. 383 (1914)

See also Coolidge v. New Hampshire, 403 U.S. 443 (1971); Exclusionary Rule; Florida v. Jimeno, 500 U.S. 248 (1991); Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347 (1967); Plain View; Probable Cause; Search (General Definition); Seizures; South Dakota v. Opperman, 428 U.S. 364 (1976); United States v. Brignoni-Ponce, 422 U.S. 873 (1975); United States v. Robinson, 414 U.S. 218 (1973); Wyoming v. Houghton, 526 U.S. 295 (1999)

AUTOPSIES AND FREE EXERCISE BELIEFS

As government has grown in the United States, conflicts between religious observers and the law have increased proportionately. Modern dilemmas are easy to find. Members of the Native American church seek to use peyote despite laws prohibiting its possession. Catholic churches seek to expand their sanctuaries despite historic-preservation ordinances.

One of the best illustrations of the depths to which law and religion can conflict is the class of cases involving autopsies. Autopsies are conducted by the state for many reasons, but most frequently to discover the cause of a person's death. States often have statutes requiring autopsies to be made in certain categories of cases, such as all cases of violent or sudden death.

Many religious groups, such as Orthodox Jews, Navajo Indians, the Amish, the Hmong, and several denominations of Muslims, object to autopsies. Some of these groups object to autopsies unequivocally, while others object to them only under certain circumstances. (Orthodox Jews, for example, will not generally object to autopsies conducted to detect hereditary illnesses.)

Their reasons for objecting vary as well. For Orthodox Jews, autopsies violate the Talmud's prohibitions on mutilating the dead. For the Hmong people, autopsies threaten the post-death existence of the deceased. The Hmong see funerals as times for the soul to make its way to the next life; the physical invasion inherent in an autopsy threatens that passage and can cut off the possibility of an afterlife. Indeed, it is fair to say that, for the Hmong, autopsy is the equivalent of homicide.

These objections may strike Western observers as quite foreign. For such observers, perhaps an analogy may help. Cremation is becoming increasingly popular in this country. In 1963, only 3 percent of those who died were cremated. By 1980, that number was 10 percent and, in 2005, the number is expected to be almost 30 percent. Yet, until very recently, cremation was thought to be fundamentally incompatible with Christianity. Cremation was a Roman tradition, abhorrent to the early Christians, who believed that their bodies would be physically resurrected. Indeed, it was not until 1989 that the Roman Catholic Church officially renounced its traditional opposition to cremation; the Eastern Orthodox Church continues to forbid it. If one can imagine what a governmental policy of forced cremation would mean for these Christians, then one can begin to understand the implications of forced autopsies for religious groups like Orthodox Jews and the Hmong.

In the face of this obvious conflict, one persistent question has been whether religious objectors will be exempted from mandated autopsies. The small size of these religious groups and the infrequent nature of these controversies have made these problems largely invisible to legislatures. Therefore, religious groups have turned to the courts for refuge, arguing that the free exercise clause of the Constitution entitles them to protection from forced autopsies. Until 1990, those claims might have enjoyed some success. But in 1990, the Supreme Court held that the free exercise clause does not protect religious adherents from laws that are generally applicable. The Religious Freedom Restoration Act, a federal statute designed to restore the pre-1990 standard, was passed in 1993. In 1997, however, it was declared beyond Congress's power to enact.

Since then, some similar statewide statutes have been passed. But the general rule has meant that religious objections to autopsies have generally not prevailed—even when the reasons for the autopsies are thin or almost nonexistent—as the cases cited here reflect. One example, which featured prominently in the legislative debate on the Religious Freedom Restoration Act and in the judicial opinions debating its constitutionality, was the case of Yang v. Sturner (728 F. Supp. 845, D.R.I., withdrawn, 750 F. Supp. 558, D.R.I. 1990). Yang involved the autopsy of a young Hmong man, performed over his parents' objections. The district judge who heard the case was outraged at the autopsy; he saw it as almost without purpose (given that there was no suspicion of foul play) and terribly painful for the family. But bound by the Supreme Court's 1990 opinion, the judge denied the Hmong family all relief. The judge's opinion has become a persuasive tool for those arguing for the need to accommodate autopsy objectors and religious objection more generally.

Autopsy cases are dramatic and compelling examples of religious objection in the regulatory state. But even more than that, autopsy cases encapsulate the free exercise clause; all of its complexity; all of its tensions, history, and theories can be seen through the lens of these simple cases.

CHRISTOPHER C. LUND

References and Further Reading

- Berg, Thomas C. The State and Religion in a Nutshell, 2nd ed. St. Paul, MN: West Publishing Group, 2004.
- Laycock, Douglas, The Religious Freedom Restoration Act, Brigham Young University Law Review 3 (1993): 221–258.
- Lund, Christopher C., A Matter of Constitutional Luck: The General Applicability Requirement in Free Exercise Jurisprudence, Harvard Journal of Law and Public Policy 26 (2003): 6:627–665.
- Stern, Marc D. Testimony on Behalf of the American Jewish Congress Before the Subcommittee on the Constitution of the Committee on the Judiciary, Mar. 26, 1998, available at <http://judiciary.house.gov/legacy/222390.htm>.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- City of Boerne v. Flores*, 521 U.S. 507 (1997)
- Employment Division, Dept. of Human Resources v. Smith*, 494 U.S. 872 (1990)
- Kickapoo Traditional Tribe of Texas v. Chacon*, 46 F. Supp. 2d 644 (W.D. Tex. 1999)

AUTOPSIES AND FREE EXERCISE BELIEFS

Montgomery v. County of Clinton, Michigan, 743 F.Supp. 1253 (W.D. Mich. 1990).

United States v. Hammer, 121 F. Supp. 2d 794 (M.D. Pa. 2000).

Yang v. Sturmer, 728 F. Supp. 845 (D.R.I.), withdrawn, 750 F. Supp. 558 (D.R.I. 1990).

42 U.S.C. § 2000bb (1994) (the Religious Freedom Restoration Act).

See also Accommodation of Religion; Belief–Action Distinction in Free Exercise Clause History; City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507 (1997); Conscientious Objection, the Free Exercise Clause; Employment Division, Department of Human Resources v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872 (1990); Equal Protection Clause and Religious Freedom; Establishment of Religion and Free Exercise Clauses; Free Exercise Clause (I): History, Background, Framing; Free Exercise Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence; Prisoners and Free Exercise Clause Rights; Refusal of Medical Treatment and Religious Beliefs; Religious Freedom Restoration Act; State Religious Freedom Statutes

B

BACHE, BENJAMIN FRANKLIN (1769–1798)

Born the grandson of Benjamin Franklin and educated in Geneva, Benjamin Franklin Bache epitomized early America's ambivalent relationship with the press. Raised largely in France, Bache was later trained as a type founder, and his famous grandfather's contacts in Philadelphia's publishing community were critical to Bache's early career. Few publishers have been as loved and as despised as Bache; profoundly partisan, he could be vicious and unforgiving toward his political enemies.

Bache began to make a name for himself as founder and editor of Philadelphia's General Advertiser. Indeed, he very quickly revealed both his liberal European education and his devotion to liberty. At a time when freedom of the press was perhaps not as well developed as in the twentieth century, Bache developed a reputation as a firebrand, as revealed by his nickname, "Lightning Rod Junior." His criticisms of the first two American presidents, George Washington and John Adams, while occasionally unfair and often perceptive, meant that Bache was not popular with Federalists.

By the beginning of Washington's second term, Bache had identified him as a legitimate target of liberal criticisms. First was the perception that Washington had aristocratic tendencies. His aloofness in public as well as his inclination toward grand and ceremonial events led Bache and others to the conclusion that Washington was a monarchist in disguise. As well, Washington's position as a slaveholder and rumors of financial malfeasance in the Washington administration made him vulnerable to pointed attacks. Further, as popular devotion to Washington culminated in public celebrations of his birthday, and as Bache observed a growing opinion that Washington was somehow beyond criticism, Bache began to attack the President through his newspaper. Bache endorsed the sentiments of one of his anonymous correspondents: "Opinion has so far consecrated the President as to make it hazardous to say that he can do wrong."

As Bache's criticisms grew more pointed, Washington was forced to lead the country's young army into action to put down an insurrection in western Pennsylvania, and Bache began a sustained attack on Washington. When Washington condemned the actions of the Whiskey Rebels and the Democratic Societies he believed were responsible for the rebellion, Bache published pieces that supported the Democratic Societies' right to exist (although he condemned any violence on their part), and blamed the administration for the excise policies that motivated the rebels. A member of the Philadelphia Democratic Society himself, Bache's suspicions about Washington drove him to a near obsession with the President.

When the Washington administration entered treaty talks with Britain over what would later be known as the Jay Treaty, Bache blasted them for their secrecy and for tendencies he believed to be as anti-French as they were pro-British. He acquired a copy of the treaty before it was made public and printed it, along with a detailed criticism of its major provisions:

he hated the fact that it created a political connection between a republican government and a monarchy; he could not stand the fact that it essentially forgave the British for various wrongs committed against America; and he had a particular problem with a conflict of interest—John Jay, the primary negotiator of the treaty, could potentially have the responsibility to approve the treaty in his role as chief justice of the Supreme Court.

When Washington decided to retire after two terms, and as it became clear that John Adams would stand for president as a Federalist, Bache found himself in a dilemma: he initially saw Adams as a welcome alternative to Washington, but Thomas Jefferson had a record that more closely matched Bache's own political sensibility. His primary criticism of Adams, then, was based on his close political affiliation to Washington. Meanwhile, the General Advertiser had folded, and Bache founded another newspaper, the Aurora.

Bache had also become the exclusive publisher and distributor of Thomas Paine's Age of Reason II, which further alienated him from Washington. By 1798 Bache had few friends in Washington. His relentless attacks on, first Washington, and then Adams, made him an easy target for those less inclined to support universal freedom of the press. The looming military conflict with France set the stage for a final showdown between Bache and the Federalists.

When Congress passed the Alien and Sedition Acts in 1798, it was clear that some politicians had newspaper editors like Bache in mind when the bills were drafted. The provisions were vague enough, and Bache was inflammatory enough, that many insiders predicted a challenge from Bache. Even though the acts technically allowed truth as an absolute defense against prosecution under the law, Bache attacked the laws with typical enthusiasm. He published an attack on the Alien and Sedition Acts as illegal; he argued that they violated the First Amendment, and that the acts' mere existence was evidence of the Federalists' unsophisticated view of freedom of speech and press. Anticipating trouble with Bache, the Federalists had filed a libel suit against Bache even before the Alien and Sedition Acts had been passed, but their passage gave them a more powerful vehicle to quiet Bache.

Bache was arrested "on the charge of libeling the President, and the Executive Government in a manner tending to excite sedition, and opposition to the laws, by sundry publications and re-publications." While awaiting trial in a Philadelphia jail, Bache contracted yellow fever and died.

Sometimes unfair in his criticisms, Bache nonetheless saw himself as a watchdog against the intrusion of monarchy or aristocracy. He took seriously the idea of republic. He was a pioneer in the American tradition of dissent and criticism.

JAMES HALABUK, JR.

References and Further Reading

- Smith, Jeffery A. Franklin and Bache: Envisioning the Enlightened Republic. New York: Oxford University Press, 1990.
- Tagg, James. Benjamin Franklin Bache and the Philadelphia "Aurora." Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1991.

BAD TENDENCY TEST

Emerging by the early nineteenth century, the bad tendency test remained the predominant judicial approach to determining the scope of free expression for over a century. The government could not impose prior restraints on expression, but it could impose criminal penalties for speech or writing that had bad tendencies or likely harmful consequences. Many courts added that the criminal defendant, to be convicted, must also have intended harmful consequences. Even so, under the doctrine of constructive intent, the courts typically reasoned that a defendant was presumed to have intended the natural and probable consequences of his or her statements. If a defendant's expression was found to have bad tendencies, then the defendant's criminal intent would be inferred.

People v. Croswell (1804), a seditious libel prosecution arising from the criticism of public officials, manifested the bad tendency approach. Croswell held that such expression is protected if it is truthful and published for good motives and justifiable ends. Statements with bad tendencies, though, contravened the common good and were therefore punishable. The Croswell standard, in effect, took Blackstone's justification for punishing seditious libel and transformed it into the definition of seditious libel. According to Blackstone, criticism of governmental officials was subject to criminal punishment because of its bad or pernicious tendencies. Under the Croswell standard, criticism of public officials was subject to criminal punishment if it had bad tendencies.

In a series of unanimous U.S. Supreme Court decisions arising during the World War I era, Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., articulated the scope of protection under the First Amendment in a variety of ways. Regardless of Holmes's precise phrasings, however, he resolved each case in accordance with the bad tendency test. In Schenck v. United States (1919), he used clear-and-present-danger language that in later cases would be reinterpreted more broadly: "The question in every case is whether the words used are used in such circumstances and are of such a nature as to create a clear and present danger that they will bring about the substantive evils that Congress has a right to prevent.” In Frohwerk v. United States (1919), Holmes concluded: “[I]t is impossible to say that it might not have been found that the circulation of the paper was in quarters where a little breath would be enough to kindle a flame and that the fact was known and relied upon by those who sent the paper out.” And in Debs v. United States (1919), Holmes approved a jury instruction that presented the bad tendency test in conventional terms: the jurors, as charged, “could not find the defendant guilty for advocacy of any of his opinions unless the words used had as their natural tendency and reasonably probable effect [to violate the law], and unless the defendant had the specific intent to do so in his mind.” Moreover, Holmes added that the jury could find constructive intent. In each of these cases, then, the Court relied on the bad tendency test despite Holmes’s inconsistent phrasings.

STEPHEN M. FELDMAN

References and Further Reading

- Chemerinsky, Erwin. Constitutional Law: Principles and Policies. 2nd ed. New York: Aspen Law & Business, 2002.
- Emerson, Thomas I. The System of Freedom of Expression. New York: Random House, 1970.
- Rosenberg, Norman L. Protecting the Best Men: An Interpretive History of the Law of Libel. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1986.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Debs v. United States*, 249 U.S. 211 (1919)
- Frohwerk v. United States*, 249 U.S. 204 (1919)
- People v. Croswell*, 3 Johns. Cas. 337 (N.Y. Sup. Ct. 1804)
- Schenck v. United States*, 249 U.S. 47 (1919)

BAIL

In 1791, the Eighth Amendment was added to the U.S. Constitution as part of the Bill of Rights for the purpose of prohibiting, among other things, the requirement of “excessive bail.” As applied in the context of the American criminal justice system, “bail” refers to the security or conditions ordered by a court to ensure the appearance of an accused for all court proceedings relating to a pending criminal case. As recognized by the U.S. Supreme Court in United States v. Salerno (1987), “[I]n our society liberty is the norm, and detention prior to trial . . . is the carefully limited exception.” This quote summarizes the fundamental notion of personal freedom embodied in the Fifth Amendment due process provisions and the Eighth Amendment prohibition against excessive bail.

History and Conception of Bail

The idea of bail can be traced back hundreds of years before the U.S. Constitution. Original theories of bail are apparent in seventh century Anglo-Saxon law, which provided that persons accused of a crime pay an amount to the family of the victim; the payment was returned if the person was eventually proven innocent.

More modern bail theory can be traced to the late ninth or early tenth century, when sheriffs were required to arrest and hold defendants until they could be brought to trial. Because it often took years before a traveling magistrate could appear for a trial, this system was unjust for the accused, whose liberty was restrained during this period of time, and was a significant imposition on the sheriff, who was often forced to detain prisoners in his own home. To remedy these deficiencies, defendants were permitted to post a monetary bond, or have friends or relatives act as sureties to ensure their appearance at trial. As such, bail was initially created to protect the liberty interests of persons accused of crimes, while ensuring their appearance at trial.

Under modern-day practices, the decisions of whether to grant bail and, if so, in what amount, are made after an individual is charged, arrested, and processed at a police station. Initial bail determinations are often made by magistrates, and may be reviewed later by the court.

History of Federal Bail Law

Congress enacted the first federal bail provision in 1789 as part of the Judiciary Act, which set the guidelines for courts in making bail decisions. The decision of whether to grant bail and the particular amount of bail were left largely to the discretion of the courts. In practice, pretrial release was not favored. There were no substantial changes to bail law until Congress passed the Bail Reform Act of 1966. Contrary to the 1789 Act, this act favored pretrial release in all non-death-penalty cases and focused mainly on the question of whether the accused was likely to flee the jurisdiction in an effort to avoid trial. The purpose of the Bail Reform Act was to eliminate unwarranted and oppressive bail conditions, especially in cases involving indigent defendants. However, many people criticized the Act because it did not address the issue of defendants committing crimes while on bail awaiting trial.

In an effort to address these public safety concerns, Congress enacted the District of Columbia Court Reform and Criminal Procedures Act of 1970. This act was the first federal law that permitted “preventive detention”—allowing courts to deny bail when an individual would pose a danger to the community if released pending trial, even if there is no evidence that the individual would flee the jurisdiction. Preventive detention is a controversial issue that continues to be hotly debated among attorneys, judges, and legal scholars. Critics of preventive detention argue that it denies defendants the presumption of innocence and allows the government to incarcerate individuals without a trial or any proof of wrongdoing, and merely on the basis of a prediction of future wrongdoing; while supporters argue that where a showing of future dangerousness is made, an individual’s liberty interest is outweighed by the government’s interest in ensuring community safety. In 1981, the District of Columbia Court of Appeals considered these arguments and upheld the 1970 Act in United States v. Edwards (1981).

Between 1970 and 1984, thirty-four states enacted statutes similar to the District of Columbia statute, all providing for preventive detention. The U.S. Supreme Court upheld constitutional challenges to many of these statutes, labeling them regulatory, rather than penal, in nature. In 1981, the U.S. Attorney General’s Office released a report recommending adoption of federal preventive detention provisions. Then-Supreme Court Chief Justice Warren Burger also supported the need for more flexible bail standards that would allow courts to consider future dangerousness when making pretrial release decisions.

In response to these recommendations and rising public concern regarding crimes committed by persons released pending trial, Congress enacted the Bail Reform Act of 1984, which replaced the Bail Reform Act of 1966. Pursuant to the 1984 act, a federal court may order preventive pretrial detention of an accused if the government demonstrates that no release condition(s) will reasonably ensure the safety of other persons and the community. A federal court may also order pretrial detention if the government shows that no release conditions(s) will reasonably ensure the presence of the accused at trial. The act also set forth specific factors to be considered by the court in setting pretrial release conditions. Specifically, courts are to consider the nature and seriousness of the charged offense, the weight of the evidence against the accused, the history and characteristics of the defendant, and the nature and seriousness of the danger that would be posed to the community by releasing the accused pending trial.

In United States v. Salerno (1987), the Supreme Court rejected constitutional challenges to the preventive detention provisions of the 1984 Bail Reform Act, finding that such detention is consistent with both due process guarantees and protections against excessive bail embodied in the Eighth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

The Bail Decision

In a criminal case, bail is generally set within a very short time after arrest. Although each jurisdiction implements its own requirements and procedures for setting bail in criminal cases, many use what are commonly referred to as “bail schedules” or “master bond schedules” to set bail initially. These schedules set bail according to the offense with which a defendant is charged and do not take into account other circumstances such as a defendant’s financial condition, ties to the community or prior criminal history. Some jurisdictions have discontinued the use of such schedules because they fail to take into account issues relevant to ensuring the defendant’s presence at trial or assuring community safety. In Ackies v. Purdy (1970), a federal district court ruled that the use of a master bond list to set bail violates both the due process and equal protection rights of defendants.

Jurisdictions not using bond schedules often rely on pretrial services agencies to gather information relevant to the bail decision. Such agencies interview defendants to determine the extent of their financial resources, ties to the community, and prior criminal history. This information is then reviewed by the court to determine what amount of bail and other release conditions are necessary to ensure the defendant’s appearance at trial and the safety of the community.

When setting bail, a court may consider many forms of monetary and other conditions. Monetary conditions include secured bonds, unsecured bonds, property bonds, and personal recognizance bonds. Under a personal recognizance bond, defendants are not required to submit money to secure their release but are required to pay a set amount if they fail to appear for trial. In addition to, or in lieu of, monetary requirements, defendants may be subject to release conditions such as a requirement to maintain employment, refrain from contacting the alleged victim, report to a pretrial services agency on a regular basis, submit to random drug or alcohol testing, refrain from leaving the jurisdiction, or refrain from committing any criminal acts. The Bail Reform Act includes a preference for pretrial release on personal recognizance or an unsecured appearance bond without additional conditions. Only if such release conditions will not reasonably ensure the defendant's appearance for trial or the safety of the community are other pretrial bail conditions permitted.

Defendants are permitted to request reductions in the amount of bail set or changes in the release conditions while their case is pending. Likewise, prosecutors may also request changes in a defendant's release conditions, including a request that a previously ordered bond be revoked pending trial. Generally, these requests are made in the form of a motion filed with the court before which the case is pending. However, in some circumstances, courts may allow bail reduction requests to be made orally, such as at the conclusion of a preliminary hearing or a pretrial motion to suppress evidence. Bail requests for release pending an appeal after conviction may also be made; however, such requests are rarely granted.

JUDITH M. BARGER

References and Further Reading

- Dressler, Joshua. "Pretrial Release of the Defendant." In Understanding Criminal Procedure. 3rd ed. Newark, N.J.: LexisNexis Publishing, 2002.
- Metzmeier, Kurt X., Preventive Detention: A Comparison of Bail Refusal Practices in the United States, England, Canada and Other Common Law Nations, Pace International Law Review 8 (1996): 399–436.
- Scott, Thomas E., Pretrial Detention Under the Bail Reform Act of 1984: An Empirical Analysis, American Criminal Law Review 27 (1989): 1–51.
- Wisotsky, Steven, Use of a Master Bond Schedule: Equal Justice Under Law? University of Miami Law Review 24 (1970): 808.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Ackies v. Purdy*, 322 F.Supp. 38 (S.D. Fla. 1970)
- United States v. Edwards*, 430 A.2d 1321 (D.C. 1981)
- United States v. Salerno*, 481 U.S. 739 (1986)

BALANCING APPROACH TO FREE SPEECH

"Balancing" refers to a method of adjudication used by judges to reach decisions through weighing the parties' competing interests or rights. In the context of legal disputes over free speech rights, "balancing" typically means judges weighing the government's interests in restricting speech against the speaker's

First Amendment free speech rights. For some courts, balancing also entails explicit cost-benefit comparisons.

Balancing approaches are usually contrasted with "categorical" approaches to free speech. Balancing requires judges to examine carefully the specific facts of each case and articulate the competing interests and rights at stake before weighing their relative strengths. In contrast, categorical approaches depend on a preestablished system of classifications or categories; judges decide which category the specific case before them belongs to, and then they apply legal rules already developed for that category. Thus, in a free speech case, the court would classify the nature of the speech as "protected" or "unprotected" by the First Amendment, categorize the setting of the speech as a "public forum" or "non-public forum" for speech, and determine whether the type of speech restriction at issue is "content based" or "content neutral." The outcome of that sequence of categorical moves would determine yet another category, the level of scrutiny ("strict" or "rational basis") that the court would apply to the government's speech restriction.

Advocates of balancing approaches believe that they ensure more nuanced, case-specific, fact-sensitive adjudication that is also more honest and transparent about the policy questions implicit in the dispute. Advocates of balancing also assert that it is more flexible and adaptable, and therefore better suited to the complexity of free speech disputes, where restrictions may not be easily classifiable as content based or content neutral, where the nature of the forum is not readily ascertainable, and where multiple speakers compete. Such complexities are often seen in cases concerning speech rights in rapidly evolving new media like cable and the Internet. See, for example, Denver Area Educational Telecommunications Consortium, Inc. v. Federal Communications Commission (1996) and United States v. American Library Association (2003).

Critics of balancing approaches argue that they are subjective, offer little predictability or certainty, and invite judges to usurp the role of legislatures by making policy determinations. Critics further charge that there is no real "weighing" because the rights and interests being compared are incommensurate. Balancing approaches have been strongly criticized in the context of free speech law for chilling speech (because speakers cannot be sure how a court would "weigh" their speech rights) and for unfairly favoring majoritarian government interests against the First Amendment rights of unpopular speakers. In this view, balancing approaches fail to safeguard speech because courts are likely to be swayed in their assessment of the government's interests by the perceived exigencies and societal fears of the day.

Justification for such criticisms of balancing can be found in a series of speech-repressive cases in the communism-phobic McCarthy era, when the U.S. Supreme Court applied the balancing approach repeatedly to find that government interests in speech restrictions outweighed the speaker's right to speak. Dennis v. United States (1951) is the prime example.

Balancing has been making a comeback as a legitimate approach to free speech jurisprudence. As Kathleen Sullivan, a leading constitutional scholar, and others have argued, neither balancing nor categorical approaches are inherently liberal or conservative, speech protective or speech restrictive; the approaches themselves are neutral, and not always even clearly distinguishable. Supreme Court justices who are strong proponents of balancing approaches include Justices Stevens, O'Connor, Breyer, and Souter. See, for example, Justice O'Connor's concurrence in Rosenberger favoring balancing over categorical approaches. A move towards balancing is evident in the Court's development of intermediate scrutiny levels, somewhere in between "strict" and "rational basis," that assess government's reasons for the speech restriction as weighed against the effects on speech. Such "heightened scrutiny" balancing has been used in commercial speech cases since Central Hudson Gas & Electric (1980), and in speech cases involving new technologies like cable broadcasting (for instance, Turner Broadcasting I [1994] and II [1997]).

The debate between advocates of balancing and advocates of categorizing parallels debates between advocates of "standards" and advocates of "rules."

IRENE SEGAL AYERS

References and Further Reading

- Barron, Jerome A., The Electronic Media and the Flight from First Amendment Doctrine: Justice Breyer's New Balancing Approach, University of Michigan Journal of Law Reform 31 (1998): 817.
- Huhn, Wilson R., Assessing the Constitutionality of Laws that Are Both Content-Based and Content-Neutral: The Emerging Constitutional Calculus, Indiana Law Journal 79 (2004): 801.
- Rubinfeld, Jed, Comment: A Reply to Posner, Stanford Law Review 54 (2002): 753.
- Schlag, Pierre, An Attack on Categorical Approaches to Freedom of Speech, University of California-Los Angeles Law Review 30 (1983): 671.
- Smolla, Rodney A. Smolla and Nimmer on Freedom of Speech. Vol. 1. St. Paul, Minn.: West Group, 2003.
- Sullivan, Kathleen M., Post-Liberal Judging: The Roles of Categorization and Balancing, University of Colorado Law Review 63 (1992): 293.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Central Hudson Gas & Electric v. Public Service Commission*, 477 U.S. 557 (1980)
- Dennis v. United States*, 341 U.S. 494 (1951)
- Denver Area Educational Telecommunications Consortium, Inc. v. Federal Communications Commission*, 518 U.S. 727 (1996)
- Rosenberger v. University of Virginia*, 515 U.S. 819, 846–852 (1995)
- Turner Broadcasting System v. FCC*, 512 U.S. 622 (1994), and Turner II, 520 U.S. 180 (1997)
- United States v. American Library Association*, 539 U.S. 194 (2003)

See also Absolutism and Free Speech; Categorical Approach to Free Speech; Central Hudson Gas and Electric Corp. v. Public Service Commission of New York, 477 U.S. 557 (1980); Content-Based Regulation of Speech; Content-Neutral Regulation of Speech; Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494 (1951); Intermediate Scrutiny Test in Free Speech Cases; Public Forum Doctrines; Public/Nonpublic Forums Distinction; Rosenberger v. Rector and Visitors of the University of Virginia, 515 U.S. 819 (1995); Turner Broadcasting Sys., Inc. v. FCC (Turner I), 512 U.S. 622 (1994); 520 U.S. 180 (1997) (Turner II)

BALANCING TEST

In constitutional adjudication, the balancing test is the predominant mode of case resolution, although major differences exist on "how to strike the balance." The balance that must be struck is between individual freedoms and societal needs such as the need to preserve order. There is only one theory of constitutional decision making in which balancing does not occupy a position—the absolutist position. Proponents—most notably Justice Hugo Black—argued that the specific provisions of the Constitution and Bill of Rights are often stated in absolute terms. For example, when the First Amendment says, "Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech," Justice Black was fond of saying that this meant "no" law, plain and simple. Most other justices and legal scholars, however, disagree with this absolutist position, and opt instead for balancing between individual liberties and government needs. Some would weigh equally the government's need and constitutional protections. Greater protection is given to individual freedoms in the famous "clear and present" test. Here governments are forbidden to transgress on protected liberties unless there is both a "clear" and "present" danger. Finally, even more protection is given to individual liberties by the "preferred position" rule. Under this standard, individual protections are to be given very special protection, and only substantial, grave, imminent threats justify government encroachment. Balancing becomes especially acute during crisis times. For example, does/has/should 9/11 justify tipping the scales more in the direction of government powers, trading off individual liberties to obtain a higher likelihood of safety in our society? What are the costs of these tradeoffs? Balancing allows these decisions to be made but remains silent on any hard and fast rule about how to strike the balance.

MILTON HEUMANN

References and Further Reading

Black, Hugo, The Bill of Rights, New York University Law Review 35 (April 1960): 865–31.
Pritchett, C. Herman. The American Constitution. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1968.

See also Absolutism and Free Speech; Bad Tendency Test; Balancing Approach to Free Speech; Clear and Present Danger Test; 9/11 and The War on Terrorism

BALDUS STUDY (CAPITAL PUNISHMENT)

The Baldus Study, conducted by Professors David Baldus, George Woodworth, and Charles Pulaski, was a sophisticated empirical analysis of 2,484 Georgia homicide cases that were charged and sentenced in the 1970s. The study found, among other results, that black defendants convicted of killing white victims were more likely to receive the death penalty than any other racial combination of defendant and victim.

The raw data showed that 11 percent of those charged with killing a white person were sentenced to death, whereas only 1 percent of those charged with killing a black person were sentenced to death. Because intraracial murders (victims and defendants of the same race) were more common than interracial murders (victims and defendants of different races), 7 percent of white defendants were sentenced to death as opposed to 4 percent of black defendants. However, death sentences resulted in 21 percent of cases involving black defendants and white victims, but only 8 percent of cases with white defendants and white victims.

The study also analyzed 230 potentially aggravating, mitigating, or evidentiary nonracial factors. Based on a regression analysis involving the most significant thirty-nine factors, the study found that death sentences were 4.3 times more likely for defendants charged with killing white rather than black victims, and that this result was largely due to the choices of prosecutors rather than juries.

The Baldus Study was presented in McCleskey v. Kemp to show that Georgia operated an unconstitutional racially discriminatory capital punishment system. The defendant's claims were rejected, however, on the grounds that the study failed to show either a constitutionally significant risk of racial bias in the operation of Georgia's system or a discriminatory purpose specifically in McCleskey's case.

ANTONY PAGE

References and Further Reading

Baldus, David C., George Woodworth, and Charles A. Pulaski, Jr. Equal Justice and the Death Penalty: A Legal and Empirical Analysis. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1990.
Baldus, David C., George Woodworth, David Zuckerman, Neil Alan Weiner, and Barbara Broffitt, Racial Discrimination and the Death Penalty in the Post-Furman Era: An Empirical and Legal Overview, with Recent Findings from Philadelphia, Cornell Law Review 83 (1998): 1638–770.
Kennedy, Randall L., McCleskey v. Kemp: Race, Capital Punishment, and the Supreme Court, Harvard Law Review 101 (1988): 1388–433.

Cases and Statutes Cited

McCleskey v. Kemp, 481 U.S. 279 (1987)

See also Capital Punishment; Capital Punishment and Equal Protection Clause Cases; Capital Punishment and Race Discrimination; Capital Punishment: Eighth Amendment Limits; Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972); Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153 (1976); McCleskey v. Kemp, 481 U.S. 277 (1987)

BALDWIN, ROGER (1884–1981)

Roger Baldwin was the founder of the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) and served as its director from 1920 to 1950. He was widely recognized as the foremost advocate of civil liberties in the United States during those years.

Baldwin was born January 21, 1884, in Wellesley, Massachusetts to an old New England family that traced its roots back to the first English settlers. His father was a successful businessman in the leather goods industry. His religious background was in the Unitarian Church, and Baldwin inherited a liberal, freethinking outlook that emphasized social reform. Family members associated with prominent social and political reformers. Through his father, for example, he met attorney and future Supreme Court Justice Louis Brandeis. His uncle William Baldwin was president of the Long Island Railroad and actively involved in social reform, including child labor and racial justice. Baldwin graduated from Harvard University in 1905 and earned a graduate degree in social work the following year.

He moved to St. Louis in 1906 to take a job as a social worker and remained there until early 1917. A person of boundless energy, Baldwin immediately became a prominent social reformer whose views reflected the goals of Progressive Era reforms. In 1910, he organized and became the secretary of the St. Louis Civic League, and through this organization was involved in many social reform issues. He taught social work courses at Washington University from 1906 to 1910. He helped to establish the first juvenile court in St. Louis and co-authored with Bernard Flexner Juvenile Courts and Probation (1914), a detailed manual on the goals and management of a juvenile court that gained a national audience. Baldwin was also active in the National Probation Association and other national organizations. Articles by or about him appeared in national publications, and he earned a national reputation as an energetic reformer.

Despite his subsequent claims, Baldwin was not an advocate of civil liberties during his years in St. Louis. He met controversial birth control advocate Margaret Sanger and anarchist Emma Goldman when they spoke in St. Louis. Although they and other speakers faced restrictions on their right to speak, Baldwin remained a rather conventional Progressive Era reformer who optimistically believed that they could and should serve the interests of the majority of the people. He did not at this time see a fundamental conflict between government actions reflecting majority opinion and the rights of individuals or unpopular groups. Baldwin was a vigorous advocate of racial equality at a time when few whites supported the rights of African Americans. He generated controversy, for example, in presenting an African-American speaker at Washington University. Race played a significant role in moving Baldwin's political thinking in a more radical direction. A referendum in St. Louis that approved racial segregation in housing greatly disillusioned his faith in majoritarian democracy. The outbreak of war in Europe in 1914, meanwhile, shattered his optimism about social progress.

By early 1917, Baldwin was increasingly concerned about possible American entry into World War I, and in March of that year he moved to New York City to work with the American Union Against Militarism (AUAM), a pacifist organization opposing American entry into the war. He and Crystal Eastman soon established a Civil Liberties Bureau (CLB) within the AUAM to provide assistance to young men facing military service who sought conscientious objector status. At this point Baldwin's understanding of civil liberties took shape.

After the United States declared war in April 1917, the Civil Liberties Bureau not only provided assistance to conscientious objectors but also opposed censorship of individuals and organizations opposed to the war. Eventually, the CLB's own publications were banned from the mails by the U.S. Post Office. Baldwin and Eastman's activities in this regard provoked a split within the AUAM. The organization's leaders did not want to alienate the Wilson administration in the hope that they would be able to influence the eventual peace ending the war. In July 1917, the two factions agreed to split, and Baldwin and Eastman established a separate organization, the National Civil Liberties Bureau (NCLB). The NCLB was the direct forerunner of the ACLU.

In the summer of 1918, Baldwin received notice to report for induction into the military. Although he was thirty-four years old, the draft had been extended to cover people up to age thirty-five. Opposed to conscription as a matter of principle, he refused to report for induction and was subsequently convicted and sentenced to prison. A number of prominent reformers attended his trial, and his speech to the judge setting forth the reasons for his opposition to conscription was reprinted and widely circulated around the country. Baldwin served eight months in prison in New Jersey. During this time he reflected on the issues of free speech and due process raised by the wartime repression of dissent.

Upon leaving prison in July 1919, Baldwin traveled around the country for several months, often working in blue-collar jobs and contemplating his future. This experience was his first direct contact with working people and the labor movement. Later that year, Baldwin and other former NCLB leaders concluded that a permanent organization was needed to fight for civil liberties. They established the ACLU, which was officially born in January 1920 with Baldwin as its director.

Baldwin immediately established the style of activity that he would maintain over the next thirty years as director of the ACLU. He devoted his energies primarily to public education about civil liberties, giving numerous speeches and writing many articles. Almost all of his writings were topical, addressing particular cases or controversies. Baldwin himself was not an intellectual and never wrote a complete statement of his philosophy of civil liberties. He described himself as a philosophical anarchist, but he never subscribed to any specific political doctrine. For many years, Baldwin took trips across the United States, speaking on civil liberties and enlisting support for the ACLU. These trips helped to establish his national reputation as a civil liberties advocate.

The ACLU was governed by a board of directors that met weekly in New York City to decide on organizational policy. Although a strong advocate of democracy, Baldwin was very much an autocrat within his own organization, maintaining strong control over his own board of directors. Baldwin's major contribution to the organization was his energy and magnetic personality, which brought into the ACLU individuals who were experts in particular areas of civil liberties. These included such notable figures as future Supreme Court Justice Felix Frankfurter and the longtime co-general counsels of the ACLU, Arthur Garfield Hays and Morris Ernst. He was also able to secure contributions from wealthy individuals, many of them Quakers who provided critical financial support for the small ACLU. In its first years, the ACLU had only about a thousand members.

In 1919, Baldwin married Madeline Z. Doty, who was also a social reformer. They divorced in 1936, and Baldwin married Evelyn Preston that same year.

In the 1920s, the courts at both the state and federal levels were not sympathetic to civil liberties. Consequently, under Baldwin's leadership the ACLU gave relatively little emphasis to litigation, especially compared with later decades. Typically, the ACLU would issue a public statement regarding a particular violation of civil liberties. In this respect, Baldwin's role as speaker and writer was a major part of the ACLU's activity. Legislatures were also very hostile to civil liberties, and the ACLU devoted relatively little energy to legislation.

Baldwin involved the ACLU in numerous civil liberties issues. He was particularly concerned about the rights of working people and labor unions. During this period, courts routinely granted requests from employers to enjoin union organizers from picketing or in some instances holding meetings to discuss unionization. Baldwin was also very active in the defense of Sacco and Vanzetti, two anarchists who had been convicted of murder and whose case became a symbol of the antiradical, anti-immigrant attitudes of the 1920s. The ACLU was particularly active in fighting race discrimination, protesting mob violence against African Americans led by the Ku Klux Klan. Baldwin always arranged to have a leader of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) on the ACLU board of directors.

As part of his commitment to the rights of labor, Baldwin led a demonstration in Paterson, New Jersey in 1924, protesting a court injunction prohibiting labor union picketing and meetings. Many other

ACLU leaders in this period engaged in direct action in support of civil liberties. Baldwin was arrested and convicted of violating a 1796 state law against rioting that had never been previously used. In 1928, a state appeals court overturned the conviction in one of the few decisions in that decade upholding the right of freedom of assembly.

The most important ACLU case in the 1920s was a challenge to a Tennessee law prohibiting the teaching of evolution in the public schools. Baldwin placed a notice in a Tennessee newspaper indicating the ACLU's willingness to represent anyone arrested for violating the law. In this manner, the ACLU represented John T. Scopes. The 1925 trial was a national sensation that brought the first important favorable publicity to the ACLU. Baldwin himself did not play a direct role in the trial, however.

Throughout his career, Baldwin was involved with innumerable organizations and causes. The ACLU was only one of four organizations that he established in 1920 alone. One of the most important organizations Baldwin founded in the 1920s was the American Fund for Public Service (AFPS). Charles Garland inherited a large sum of money and wanted to use the money to advance social change. Baldwin convinced him to give the money to the AFPS, which he helped establish in 1922 and which was directed by Baldwin's friends and associates. Through the 1920s the Fund supported many civil liberties, liberal, and leftwing causes. The fund, for example, supported the early litigation program by the NAACP. The Depression wiped out the fund's assets after 1929 and it soon became defunct.

Baldwin always had an interest in international human rights, traveled frequently, and corresponded with rights activists in other countries. In 1927, he visited the Soviet Union, and upon his return published Liberty Under the Soviets (1928), a detailed account of the treatment of religious, racial, and ethnic minorities in that country.

Since its founding in 1920, Baldwin and the ACLU primarily had to fight restrictions on the free speech rights of communists and other leftwing activists. In the mid-1930s, following the rise of domestic Nazi groups, they had to confront the issue of whether the First Amendment protected the free speech rights of fascists and other advocates of totalitarianism. After a brief internal debate, Baldwin and the ACLU issued a formal statement supporting the First Amendment rights of all extremist groups, including communists and Nazis.

In the late 1930s, Baldwin's views of the federal government and civil liberties underwent a major shift. As a result of his World War I experience, he had always been extremely skeptical of virtually all government power. By the mid-1930s, however, he developed a favorable view of President Franklin D. Roosevelt's administration, seeing that some New Deal agencies, such as the new National Labor Relations Board, supported civil liberties. He immediately began to spend more time in Washington, D.C., cultivating sympathetic officials in the Roosevelt administration. This shift was prompted in part by his disillusionment with the Soviet Union under Joseph Stalin. In the early 1930s, as a result of the Depression and the rise of fascism in Europe, Baldwin became more sympathetic to radical leftwing politics. In 1933 and 1934, he made a number of statements expressing sympathy for communism that were later used by ACLU critics against him. This very radical phase was brief, however, and Baldwin soon moved to a more moderate political point of view. Along with many other liberals and leftwing activists, he was shocked by Stalin's purge of other Soviet leaders in the famous Moscow trials. In the United States, Baldwin also became disgusted with what he saw as manipulative tactics by American communists participating in the Popular Front, a coalition of liberal and leftwing organizations. As a result, Baldwin became a strong anticommunist.

Baldwin's new anticommunist outlook set the stage for the most controversial episode in his career and in the history of the ACLU. In 1940, the ACLU board of directors adopted a policy under which no supporter of totalitarian organizations could serve in an official capacity in the ACLU. Under the policy, the board then quickly removed Elizabeth Gurley Flynn from its ranks because she was a member of the Communist Party. Many critics accused the ACLU of imposing the very same kind of political test that it had long fought against, and the incident tarnished the reputation of both Baldwin and the ACLU for several decades.

Although there was no widespread suppression of dissent as there had been during the First World War, World War II presented some difficult challenges for Baldwin. He strongly opposed the evacuation and internment of the Japanese-Americans by the federal government, but a majority of the ACLU board of directors limited the terms on which the ACLU would act. The result was a major conflict within the board of directors and between the ACLU national office and the organization's affiliates in San Francisco and Los Angeles. In the end, the ACLU brought the court cases that unsuccessfully challenged the government's program (Hirabayashi and Korematsu). Baldwin played a major role in organizing the Supreme Court cases, raising necessary funds and arranging for attorneys to write the court briefs and argue the cases before the Supreme Court.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) in 1941 secretly designated Baldwin for detention in case of a national emergency. Although his political views had become more moderate, he was still regarded as a dangerous radical by the FBI. The FBI's secret emergency detention program did not become known until the 1970s, when the Watergate scandal exposed a number of abuses of power by federal agencies. The FBI maintained extensive surveillance of Baldwin over the years. Major portions of Baldwin's FBI file were released in the 1980s and were deposited with the Baldwin and ACLU archives at Princeton University.

In one of the most curious episodes in his career, Baldwin was invited to Japan in 1947 to advise General Douglas MacArthur on developing a constitution for postwar Japan. Somewhat surprisingly, the ACLU leader and the very conservative general established a close rapport.

Baldwin's role during the Cold War has been a subject of considerable controversy. Because of the removal of Elizabeth Gurley Flynn from the ACLU board in 1940, critics accused Baldwin and the ACLU of not opposing Cold War-era restrictions on freedom of speech and association with sufficient vigor. Baldwin had formed a personal relationship with FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover when the latter was first appointed in 1924, and he remained somewhat uncritical of the Bureau in the years that followed. And while Baldwin opposed the House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC) since it was created in 1938, some other ACLU leaders had close and private relations with the committee. Despite the criticisms, however, both Baldwin and the ACLU strongly opposed most Cold War restrictions on civil liberties, including loyalty oaths, prosecutions under the 1940 Smith Act, and blacklisting in the entertainment industry.

In 1950, the ACLU board of directors decided to remove Baldwin as director, and he was given a vague "ambassadorial" position focusing on international issues. The decision to remove him was prompted by the feeling that Baldwin had not kept up with changing times. Always an autocrat who sought to maintain strong control of the organization, Baldwin had opposed any effort to increase the ACLU's membership or to create a network of affiliates across the country. In 1950, there were about 10,000 members and four affiliates with staff members. His successor embarked on a membership and affiliate development campaign that proved to be enormously successful. This development vindicated the decision of the ACLU board in removing Baldwin as director.

After being removed as executive director, Baldwin continued to work on human rights issues for another thirty-one years, devoting most of his energies to international issues and working through the International League for the Rights of Man. In this effort, he was as tireless as he had been previously. He traveled extensively around the world, giving speeches and writing articles.

Baldwin's legacy for civil liberties is enormous. Without his energy and devotion to the organization, the ACLU probably would not have survived. Nor was there any other person who tirelessly advocated the cause of free speech and other rights during the 1920s and 1930s. The history of civil liberties in the United States would have been very different without the efforts of Roger Baldwin. President Jimmy Carter awarded Baldwin the Medal of Liberty in January 1981. Roger Baldwin died on August 26, 1981.

SAMUEL WALKER

References and Further Reading

- Baldwin, Roger N. Liberty Under the Soviets. New York: Vanguard Press, 1928.
- Cottrell, Robert C. Roger Nash Baldwin and the American Civil Liberties Union. New York: Columbia University Press, 2000.
- Lamson, Peggy. Roger Baldwin, Founder of the American Civil Liberties Union: A Portrait. Boston: Little, Brown, 1976.
- Walker, Samuel. In Defense of American Liberties: A History of the ACLU. New York: Oxford University Press, 1990.

BALLEW v. GEORGIA, 435 U.S. 223 (1978)

The manager of an adult theater was charged in a state court with distributing obscene materials, a misdemeanor. Pursuant to state law, and over his claim that the Sixth Amendment right to a jury trial required a jury of at least six members, he was tried and convicted by a jury of five people.

The purpose of a jury trial is to provide protection against government oppression by having members of the community participate in the determination of guilt, Duncan v. Louisiana. Although a jury traditionally comprised twelve members, the U.S. Supreme Court held in Williams v. Florida that the Sixth Amendment does not require a jury of that number; rather, it merely mandates a jury of sufficient size to encourage group deliberation, to shield members from outside deliberation, and to supply a representative cross-section of the community. In Williams, the Court concluded that a jury of six members can fulfill the functions of a jury trial, and therefore is not unconstitutional. In Ballew v. Georgia, however, the Supreme Court unanimously held that a five-person jury does not comport with the requirements of the Sixth Amendment. The Court relied heavily on empirical studies raising doubts about the reliability of decisions by juries of fewer than six members, and indicating that such juries are less likely to contain members of minority groups and thus not truly represent their communities. In addition, the Court concluded that no significant state interest justified a reduction from six members to five.

DAVID S. RUDSTEIN

References and Further Reading

- LaFave, Wayne R., Jerold H. Israel, and Nancy J. King. Criminal Procedure. 4th ed. St. Paul, Minn.: Thompson-West, 2004.
- Rudstein, David S., C. Peter Erlinder, and David C. Thomas. Criminal Constitutional Law. Newark, N.J. and San Francisco: LexisNexis-Matthew Bender, 1990, 2004.
- Singley, Carl E., Ballew v. Georgia: Five Is Not Enough, Temple Law Quarterly 52 (1979): 2:217–58.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Duncan v. Louisiana*, 391 U.S. 145 (1968)
- Williams v. Florida*, 399 U.S. 78 (1970)

See also Duncan v. Louisiana*, 391 U.S. 145 (1968); Incorporation Doctrine; Jury Trial; Jury Trial Right

BALLOT INITIATIVES

Method by which the people of various states exercise their retained right to initiate and adopt legislation directly. Proponents argue that the process is a particularly effective means of political expression, and of circumventing a legislature that is lethargic or captured by interest groups. Detractors focus on the weaknesses of the initiative process, including the misleadingly simplistic advertising used to explain complicated proposals to voters, the growing expense of getting measures on the ballot, and the related risk that the process is falling under the control of the same special interest groups it seeks to restrain.

The method of state lawmaking is not new; California, for example, adopted the process in 1911 and has deployed it with increasing frequency and importance over the last three decades. Californians have directly passed important laws doing everything from reducing local property taxes, creating new state agencies, abolishing race-based affirmative action, widening the scope of the death penalty and lifetime imprisonment, and imposing term limits on members of the state legislature. But today critics of the process, including many California voters themselves, are expressing some support for reforming the initiative process.

In states that use initiatives, to get a measure on the ballot supporters must collect a threshold number of citizen signatures, often tied to a percentage of the turnout at the last state election. The procedural details of the initiative power vary from state to state (and sometimes from locality to locality), but initiatives may be used to adopt state statutes, amendments to the state constitution, or both. States with an indirect initiative process require an intermediary step of submitting the proposed measure to the legislature. If approved by the legislature, the measure becomes law. If rejected, the measure will go to the people for their approval or rejection at the next election. By contrast, a direct initiative device allows measures to go straight onto the ballot after the signature threshold has been met and certified, without the measure having to be presented to the legislature for its consideration.

VIKRAM D. AMAR

BALTIMORE CITY DEPARTMENT OF SOCIAL SERVICES v. BOUKNIGHT, 493 U.S. 549 (1990)

Maurice M, after being hospitalized at age three months with fresh and partially healed bone fractures, was placed into shelter care by a court order but was later returned to his mother Jacqueline's custody. After a hearing, he was permitted to remain with her, provided that she complied with extensive conditions in a protective order. When Social Services later alleged that Bouknight had violated every such condition, the court granted a petition to remove Maurice from her control. Upon her repeated refusal to produce Maurice, the court ordered her imprisoned for civil contempt until she produced her son or revealed his location.

The juvenile court rejected Bouknight's later claim that the contempt order violated the Fifth Amendment's privilege against self-incrimination, which declares, "No person . . . shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself," although the state court of appeals disagreed.

The U.S. Supreme Court reversed. The privilege applies only to the state's compelling the making of an act with a "testimonial or communicative nature" providing a link in a chain to potential criminal prosecution. Maurice's body would be physical, not testimonial, but the act of producing him would communicate the testimonial facts of his existence, authentic identity as Bouknight's son, and her possession of him. Nevertheless, the Court found the privilege inapplicable, partly because it does not extend to "collective entities," like corporations, or to their representatives, such as records custodians, because they lack "private enclaves" needing protection. The Bouknight Court apparently viewed Bouknight as having custody of Maurice on behalf of the state as a "collective entity."

The Court also relied on the required records doctrine as taking the case outside the Fifth Amendment privilege. This doctrine requires first, that the purpose of government action is regulatory rather than furthering criminal investigation; and, second, that the records themselves have a "public aspect [making] them analogous to public documents," a phrase generally requiring balancing the public need against the intrusion upon the individual. Furthermore, the required records doctrine likely cannot extend to inquiries directed not at the general public but at a "highly selective group inherently suspected of criminal activities," such as requiring illegal gamblers to report their ill-gotten income to the Internal Revenue Service.

For the Bouknight Court, the demand to produce Maurice served the state's regulatory interest in protecting his safety, counterbalanced any intrusion upon Bouknight, and was not aimed at a "selective group inherently suspect of criminal activities" because a child may be placed by Social Services with foster parents or relatives not suspected of any crime. Without deciding the question, however, the Court noted that some privilege protection might remain for child custodians under certain circumstances.

Bouknight remained incarcerated for more than seven years after the Supreme Court's opinion. After her release, attorneys portrayed her "as a champion of civil disobedience, comparing her to the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr." State officials disagreed, adding that they feared her son was dead.

ANDREW E. TASLITZ

References and Further Reading

Merker Rosenberg, Irene, Bouknight: On Abused Children and the Parental Privilege Against Self-Incrimination, Iowa Law Review 76 (1991): 535.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Fisher v. United States, 425 U.S. 391 (1976)
Haynes v. United States, 390 U.S. 85 (1968)
Marchetti v. United States, 390 U.S. 39 (1948)
Shapiro v. United States, 335 U.S. 1 (1948)
United States v. Doe, 465 U.S. 605 (1984)

See also Coerced Confessions/Police Interrogation; Self-Incrimination (V): Historical Background

BAPTISTS IN EARLY AMERICA

From the time in the early 1600s that some of the early Puritans came to believe that infant baptism could not be justified on biblical grounds, to the final abolition of the last remaining compulsory religious taxation system in Massachusetts in 1833, the Baptists bore the brunt of the religious persecution and discrimination meted out in early American communities. The Baptists countered by waging a struggle against governmental support for established religion more persistently and effectively than any other dissenting group. While they could not have prevailed in this struggle without significant assistance from other quarters, the Baptists are to be credited with exerting unsurpassed influence on the pace and course of the emergence of religious liberty in America.

The Baptists' struggle began in the New England colonies, whose Puritan founders believed themselves to constitute the vanguard of a "New Reformation" that would complete the work that Luther and Calvin had begun by restoring the purity of the early church. The Puritans believed that theirs was the one and only true church and faith, and all New England colonists were expected to support the New Reformation project by supporting the Puritan congregations in their local communities. Any who could not bring themselves to do so were free to leave, in the eyes of the Puritan leadership. Any who would not leave were to be punished, in an effort to force the dissenters to abandon their ways and return to living in conformity with Puritan beliefs and expectations.

New England colonists who came to believe that infant baptism was illegitimate would become known to the civil authorities when they would refuse to have their own children baptized, and either turn their backs when the children of other families were being baptized or walk out of the church to avoid participating in such ceremonies. These early Baptists were then haled into court, where they were warned, fined, or even whipped if they gave any indication that they would repeat their offending behavior. Those who refused to pay the fine were imprisoned for an indeterminate period. Church authorities would inflict a parallel process of warnings, censure, and ultimately excommunication. These early Baptists were considered social pariahs, subjected to harassment and ostracism, and they were denied the right to vote or hold office. Most either left the colony as quickly as they could or decided that they would henceforth refrain from disrupting baptism ceremonies and keep their views to themselves. To worship openly together, much less organize formally as a church, was completely out of the question.

The Puritans were committed to maintaining some connection to the Church of England, in the hope of reforming it. Roger Williams, the pastor of the Puritan church at Salem, Massachusetts, came into conflict with Puritan officials when he advocated the view that the Church of England was a false church, and that the Puritans should separate themselves from it. Although the Puritans would become known as Congregationalists for their rejection of the Church of England's system of Episcopal authority over the local congregation, they could not accept Williams's call to break from the Church of England completely. The authorities banished Williams from the Massachusetts Bay Colony in 1635, and the next year he and some friends from the Salem church founded the colony of Providence Plantations, just to the south. After a number of English Baptists migrated to Providence between 1636 and 1639, Williams and his friends re-baptized themselves by immersion and formed the first Baptist church in America, in Providence. Although Williams would himself remain a Baptist for only a few months, the church continued on after him, and a second Baptist church was founded in nearby Newport by 1644.

In 1651 John Clarke, the pastor of the Newport church, and two of its members traveled to Lynn, Massachusetts, to preach in a private home. Massachusetts authorities arrested, tried, and gave them the choice of paying a fine or being whipped. Clarke and one of the others paid the fine, but the third, Obadiah Holmes, refused. He was tied to a stake on Boston Common, stripped to the waist, and given such a severe whipping that he was unable to leave Boston for several weeks. Clarke's account of this incident was published in London a year later in an unsuccessful effort to persuade Parliament to require New England colonies to tolerate dissent.

Baptists persisted in Massachusetts, despite the persecution that they faced there. In 1654, the president of Harvard College, Henry Dunster, shocked his community when he refused to have his child baptized and publicly declared his opposition to infant baptism. When church leaders tried to persuade him of his error, Dunster responded that no support can be found for the practice of infant baptism in either the Bible or the practice of the early church. The Massachusetts legislature responded by passing a law stating that all dissenters should be removed from teaching positions at Harvard and in the public schools. Dunster was publicly admonished, required to give bond ensuring his future good behavior, and forced to resign from Harvard.

By 1665, Boston Baptists were worshipping in the home of their pastor, Thomas Goold, who along with other members of the Boston church was arrested and disenfranchised, and later imprisoned and sentenced to be banished. One of the first openings toward religious liberty in Massachusetts followed, when sixty-six residents submitted a petition asking the authorities to free and tolerate him and the others. Instead, the authorities gave Goold only a three-day release to attend to some private business. While out of prison on leave, Goold slipped away to an island where he could conduct services unmolested, until a more tolerant governor came into office in 1673, which enabled Goold to return openly to the Boston Baptist community.

When the authorities learned in 1679 that Boston's Baptists had secretly built and begun to assemble in a meetinghouse, however, the legislature passed a law making it illegal to build any church structure without its permission. The Baptists agreed to stop using their building until later that year, when a letter arrived from King Charles II expressing his support for "freedom and liberty of conscience" for all non-Catholic Christians. From that point on, the Boston Baptist church was never bothered again, and no Baptist was ever again indicted in the Massachusetts Bay Colony.

Although the overt persecution of Baptists had ended in the colony, its system of collecting taxes to support Congregationalist ministers and erect church buildings for each settlement remained in place. When Baptists would refuse to pay the tax, they were subject to imprisonment, and some of their property (for example, livestock) could be seized and sold at auction to pay the bill. In 1708, three local tax collectors (two Quakers and one Baptist) from Dartmouth were imprisoned for refusing to collect the religious tax. The governor intervened to secure their release, but when the problem erupted again in Dartmouth the Quakers presented a petition to the King and the Privy Council, which responded by exempting the residents of Dartmouth from the tax. The Privy Council decision prompted the adoption of a series of laws in Massachusetts and other New England colonies designed to exempt dissenters from the religious tax.

By 1735, the Baptists and other dissenters were more fully tolerated in New England than in England or in the southern colonies, where Anglicanism was legally established. Had the Great Awakening not burst on the New England scene in 1740, the Baptists might have remained content indefinitely with the legal status that they had achieved. The Great Awakening, however, split New England's established churches between the New Lights, who were filled with evangelical fervor, and the Old Lights, who wished to retain prevailing styles of worship and beliefs. Over a period of years, many of the New Light Congregationalists who had separated from the established churches (who thus became known as Separates) adopted the Baptists' belief that infant baptism is illegitimate, and eventually were absorbed into the Baptist denomination (and became known as Separate-Baptists). In a series of cases during the first three decades after the Great Awakening, Massachusetts authorities cited legal technicalities in an attempt to prevent the Separate-Baptists from availing themselves of the existing exemption for Baptists from local religious taxes.

Meanwhile, beginning in about 1765 the Separate-Baptists began sending a number of evangelists into the South, especially North Carolina and Virginia. In Virginia, the authorities had been granting dissenting congregations a limited number of licenses. The Quakers, Presbyterians, and Baptists who were in Virginia prior to the Great Awakening generally complied with this law. The Separate-Baptists refused, and as a result from 1768 to 1775 about forty Separate-Baptists were jailed for preaching without a license.

The young James Madison was horrified at what he saw, but he saw little hope of redressing the situation through Virginia's colonial legislature. With the approach of the Revolutionary War, however, the tide began to turn. In 1775, with the assistance of Patrick Henry, the Virginia Baptist Association successfully petitioned for the right of Baptist ministers to minister to Baptist soldiers. In 1776, Virginia's Revolutionary Convention adopted the Virginia Declaration of Rights that, under Madison's influence, guaranteed to all "the free exercise of religion."

When war came, tax support for the Church of England was halted, and after the war the Baptists argued against the adoption of a tax system that would support religion in general. Their former ally, Patrick Henry, now led the effort to have such a system adopted. Madison credited the persuasiveness of his "Memorial and Remonstrance" for defeating the general religious assessment measure, but the signatures on petitions against the measure submitted by evangelicals, principally Baptists and Presbyterians, outnumbered those on Madison's document by five to one.

Seeing a valuable ally in Madison, John Leland, the leading Virginia Baptist champion of religious liberty, supported Madison's election to Virginia's convention to ratify the federal constitution and later to the U.S. House of Representatives in exchange for Madison's promise to secure an amendment to the federal constitution guaranteeing religious liberty. Once this was achieved, Virginia's Baptists then turned to the question of what was to be done with the property belonging to the former Church of England, now the Protestant Episcopal Church, which had been used to support its clergy. In a typical parish, this might include the parsonage and hundreds of acres of land.

For over a decade, Baptists petitioned Virginia's legislature, arguing persistently that this property belonged to all Virginians. By 1802, they had persuaded the legislature to create a system whereby this property would revert to the state as Episcopal clergy changed churches, retired, or died. This was the most sweeping social change that took place in Virginia during the Revolutionary era.

In Massachusetts, the laws exempting Baptists from religious taxation were widely accepted until 1773, when the regional Baptist association endorsed Separate-Baptist leader Isaac Backus's call for the total abolition of the religion tax system. When Backus's efforts failed to prevent Massachusetts from incorporating its religious tax system into the state constitution that it adopted post-independence to replace its colonial charter, the Baptists were left with challenging the system in court. In 1782, the Baptists succeeded in having a Bristol County court declare that the religious taxation system violated the state constitution, and by 1800 very few dissenters—whether Baptist, Universalist, Shaker, or Methodist—were being prosecuted for nonpayment of religious taxes.

The Baptists took the lead in persuading Vermont's legislature to abolish its religious tax system in 1807, and Connecticut and New Hampshire followed suit in 1818 and 1819, respectively. In Massachusetts, the Baptists had largely turned their attention away from religious liberty concerns to an ambitious program of mission and social reform efforts. In 1820, when Massachusetts called a constitutional convention to resolve the legal issues arising from the separation of Maine from Massachusetts in 1819, Baptists sought to remove the religious taxation provisions from the Massachusetts Constitution, but in the old Congregationalist elite's last stand they blocked the Baptist effort. It would be the Universalists who would eventually succeed in pushing for the abolition of Massachusetts' religious tax system in 1833.

DAVID T. BALL

References and Further Reading

- Buckley, Thomas E., Keeping Faith: Virginia Baptists and Religious Liberty, American Baptist Quarterly 22 (2003): 421–33.
- Isaac, Rhys, Evangelical Revolt: The Nature of the Baptists' Challenge to the Traditional Order in Virginia, 1765 to 1775, William and Mary Quarterly 31 (1974): 345–68.
- McLoughlin, William G. New England Dissent, 1630–1833: The Baptists and the Separation of Church and State. 2 vols. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1971.

BARCLAY v. FLORIDA, 463 U.S. 939 (1983)

Barclay was convicted of first-degree murder for his participation in the politically and racially motivated murder of a hitchhiker. After a separate sentencing hearing in which the jury recommended that Barclay be sentenced to life in prison, the trial judge imposed a death sentence. Under Florida law, a death sentence must be based on a finding of sufficient statutory aggravating circumstances that are not outweighed by any mitigating factors. Further, a jury's sentencing recommendation is only advisory; a judge may still impose a death sentence where the facts supporting it are so clear and convincing that no one could reasonably disagree.

Barclay argued that the trial judge relied on non-statutory aggravating factors in violation of Florida law and relied on statutory aggravating factors that did not apply in his case. The Court held that mere errors of state law do not ordinarily constitute a denial of due process. Because the Constitution does not require states to limit consideration of aggravating factors to those statutorily specified, the trial judge's reliance on a non-statutory factor did not violate the federal constitution. In addition, the Court determined that, despite the trial judge's improper reliance on a non-statutory aggravating factor, the Florida Supreme Court's harmless error analysis provided sufficient review of the relative weight of aggravating and mitigating factors. Barclay thus signals the Court's partial retreat from the demanding procedural restrictions adopted in the 1970s and the greater deference to state capital sentencing processes characteristic of its Eighth Amendment jurisprudence in the 1980s and 1990s.

MARY SIGLER

See also Capital Punishment and Sentencing; Capital Punishment: Due Process Limits; Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153 (1976)

BAREFOOTE v. ESTELLE, 463 U.S. 880 (1983)

Many capital punishment statutes permit jurors to consider evidence of a convicted capital murderer's "future dangerousness." In those jurisdictions, prosecutors often argue that the defendant should be executed because he is likely to commit more acts of violence and thus poses an ongoing danger to society. Evidence supporting such arguments includes such things as the defendant's recidivism, prison violence, and lack of remorse. The particular circumstances of the capital crime may suggest future dangerousness as well. But the most controversial evidence of future dangerousness is expert psychological and psychiatric testimony.

The validity of such testimony came under attack in the case of Barefoote v. Estelle, 463 U.S. 880 (1983). What is remarkable about the Supreme Court's opinion is that it approved of expert testimony on future dangerousness even though the overwhelming consensus among mental health experts regards such predictions as highly dubious. Most notable among the critics of future dangerousness testimony was, and still is, the American Psychiatric Association (APA). Empirical studies indicate that expert predictions of future dangerousness are wrong two out of three times. The Court brushed this and other concerns aside, reasoning instead that so long as future dangerousness is a valid factor for receiving the death penalty, jurors may hear the views of testifying mental health professionals. If lay jurors must assess future dangerousness, the Court explained, then "it makes little sense, if any, to submit that psychiatrists, out of the entire universe of persons who might have an opinion on the issue, would know so little about the subject that they should not be permitted to testify."

DANIEL R. WILLIAMS

References and Further Reading

The American Psychological Association Task Force on the Role of Psychology in the Criminal Justice System. American Psychologist 33 (1978): 1099. Reprinted in John Monahan, ed., Who Is the Client? The Ethics of Psychological Intervention in the Criminal Justice System. Washington, D.C.: American Psychological Association, 1980.

Carter, Linda E., and Ellen Kreitzberg. Understanding Capital Punishment Law. Newark, NJ: LexisNexis, 2004.

See also Capital Punishment; Capital Punishment and Race Discrimination; Capital Punishment and Equal Protection Clause Cases; Capital Punishment: Eighth Amendment Limits; Capital Punishment: Due Process Limits

BARENBLATT v. UNITED STATES, 360 U.S. 109 (1959)

In 1954, Lloyd Barenblatt was subpoenaed by the House Committee on Un-American Activities (HUAC), which was investigating communist activities and organizations. Barenblatt refused to say if he was a member of the Communist Party or had belonged to the Communist Party's Haldene Club while a graduate student at the University of Michigan. He was convicted in federal court of contempt of Congress, fined $250, and sentenced to six months in prison. He appealed the conviction, arguing that HUAC had violated his freedoms of thought, speech, press, and association. He added that, regardless of how he answered HUAC's questions, his social standing and ability to earn a living would be jeopardized. In 1959, a five-to-four majority of the Supreme Court rejected Barenblatt's arguments and reaffirmed his conviction.

The stage for the Barenblatt decision had been indirectly set by two 1957 decisions. In Watkins v. United States, the Court overturned a conviction for contempt of Congress for another communist sympathizer who had refused to answer HUAC's questions. In Yates v. United States, the Court ordered the acquittal of five communist defendants and sent back to the lower courts the cases of nine others in prosecutions under the federal Smith Act. Anticommunist conservatives were outraged by the decisions and dubbed June 17, 1957, the day on which both decisions were rendered, "Red Monday." Senator William Jenner of Indiana even introduced a bill to limit the Court's power to decide loyalty and subversion appeals.

The majority of the Court in Barenblatt retreated from Watkins, helped protect existing appellate jurisdiction, and to some extent defused political criticism. The authority of HUAC to conduct its investigation, Justice John Marshall Harlan II said, was unassailable, and it was indeed a violation of federal law when Barenblatt refused to answer. Furthermore, Harlan added, the balance between the individual and the government must be struck in favor of the government.

Dissenting justices were more sensitive to the civil liberties issues raised by the case. Justice Hugo Black, in a dissent joined by Chief Justice Earl Warren and Justice William O. Douglas, asserted that HUAC's goal was less investigative than judicial. HUAC wanted to try and punish suspected communists, but congressional committees did not have these judicial powers. Black also insisted that First Amendment protections were not to be balanced against government interests. "Ultimately all the questions in this case" he said, "really boil down to one—whether we as a people will try fearfully and futilely to preserve democracy by adopting totalitarian methods or whether in accordance with our traditions and our Constitution we will have the confidence and courage to be free."

In retrospect, the facts in Barenblatt illustrate the way that HUAC and other governmental bodies might disregard civil liberties while engaging in exposure for exposure's sake. The Supreme Court's tolerance for such activity, meanwhile, illustrates its own susceptibility to the anticommunist political hysteria of the 1950s.

DAVID RAY PAPKE

References and Further Reading

- Alfange, Dean, Congressional Investigations and the Fickle Court, University of Cincinnati Law Review 30 (1961): 113–71.
 Kutler, Stanley I. The American Inquisition: Justice and Injustice in the Cold War. New York: Hill & Wang, 1982.
 Rohr, Marc, Communists and the First Amendment: The Shaping of Freedom of Advocacy in the Cold War Era, San Diego Law Review 28 (1991): 1–116.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Watkins v. United States*, 354 U.S. 178 (1957)
Yates v. United States, 354 U.S. 298 (1957)

See also Communism and the Cold War; Vagueness and Overbreadth in Criminal Statutes; Warren Court

BARNES v. GLEN THEATRE, INC., 501 U.S. 560 (1991)

Nude dancing as an issue in earlier cases occurred in the context of alcohol regulations, such as California v. LaRue (1972), or zoning laws as in Schad v. Mt. Ephraim (1981). Although LaRue, in passing, suggested that nude dancing under certain circumstances might be “expressive conduct” entitled to some degree of First Amendment protection, Barnes is the first time that the Supreme Court directly confronted this issue. The question that emerges is whether nude dancing, if it is expressive conduct and not obscene, can be regulated without infringement on the First Amendment.

Indiana's public indecency law prohibited nudity in public places, and if individuals danced in the nude they were compelled to wear pasties and g-strings. Two establishments, The Kitty Kat Lounge and the Glen Theatre, wanted to provide totally nude dancing and together with one of the dancers challenged the law. The Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit declared nonobscene nude dancing performed as entertainment to be an expressive activity, protected by the First Amendment, and struck down Indiana's law.

In a five-to-four decision reversing the Court of Appeals' judgment, the members of the majority wrote three separate opinions. Rehnquist, O'Connor, and Kennedy, forming a plurality, stated that “nude dancing of the kind sought to be performed here is expressive conduct within the outer perimeters of the First Amendment, although we view it as only marginally so.” As expressive conduct falling within the ambit of the First Amendment, the standard for review depended on whether the law comported with the four-part test developed in United States v. O'Brien (1968) that wrestled with communicative conduct (in this instance, burning a draft card) or symbolic speech that combined both speech and nonspeech. Applying this test, the three justices concluded Indiana's statute passed Constitutional muster “despite its incidental limitations on some expressive activity” because it did not target nude dancing per se and because of the state's superior interest in “protecting societal order and morality.”

Scalia disagreed that Indiana's law implicated the First Amendment, and thus rejected the rationale of the plurality opinion. In his view, Indiana's law was a general law not specifically directed at expression or prohibiting conduct because of its particular communicative attributes. He favorably quotes the dissenting judge in the lower court who, arguing the law did not regulate dancing but public nudity, noted that “[a]lmost the entire domain of Indiana's statute is unrelated to expression, unless we view nude beaches and topless hot dog vendors as speech.” Scalia accordingly disagreed that more than normal scrutiny of the law was required or that the O'Brien test was appropriate.

The inability of the five justices to agree on why Indiana's law was constitutional was met with confusion in the lower courts. Thus, in 2000, the Supreme Court tried a second time to gather a majority around a definitive common rule to guide states and localities on the issue of public nudity statutes. City of Erie v. Pap's A.M. (2000) sustained Barnes and upheld the constitutionality of Erie's anti-nudity ordinance, which was nearly identical to Indiana's, but, once again, only a plurality (O'Connor, Rehnquist, Kennedy, and Breyer) coalesced around Barnes and its reasoning, while Souter, Scalia, and Thomas, the other members of the majority (Stevens and Ginsburg dissented) concurred only in the judgment.

ROY B. FLEMMING

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Barnes v. Glen Theatre, Inc.*, 501 U.S. 560 (1991)
California v. LaRue, 409 U.S. 109 (1972)
City of Erie v. Pap's A.M., 529 U.S. 277 (2000)
Schad v. Mt. Ephraim, 452 U.S. 61 (1981)
United States v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367 (1968)

BARRON v. BALTIMORE, 32 U.S. 243 (1833)

Barron v. Baltimore was an appeal to the Supreme Court from the Court of Appeals of Maryland, upon a writ of error through Section 25 of the Judiciary Act of 1789, on the grounds that a state action had violated the U.S. Constitution. The suit was begun by John Barron to recover damages from the city of Baltimore, which in paving streets and diverting streams had allegedly made his wharf useless from a buildup of sand that made the water too shallow for ships. Barron claimed that Baltimore's actions violated the takings clause in the Fifth Amendment, which stated "nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation." This raised the question of whether the Fifth Amendment and in general the Bill of Rights restricted the states as well as the federal government.

The Marshall Court answered in the negative, denying that it had jurisdiction and stating that the Bill of Rights did not apply to the states. In the opinion of the Court, Chief Justice John Marshall reasoned first, that in America the sovereign people through state constitutions empowered and restricted state governments and through the U.S. Constitution empowered and restricted the federal government. Unless expressly stated otherwise, the Constitution, including amendments to it, referred only to the federal government. Second, through textual analysis of the Constitution, Marshall compared the Bill of Rights to Sections 9 and 10 in Article I. Section 9, which he called a brief bill of rights with restrictions on the federal government, used general language. Section 10, which earlier in Fletcher v. Peck he called a brief bill of rights with restrictions on the states, clearly and expressly referred to only the states with each clause beginning with "No State shall." The first ten amendments are mostly in general language similar to Section 9. Third, he observed, "it is universally understood, it is a part of the history of the day" that during the ratification debate the Anti-Federalists demanded a bill of rights, almost every ratifying convention recommended amendments, and Congress proposed and the states ratified a bill of rights with safeguards against the new federal government, not the states.

Marshall's arguments are reinforced by the speeches in the First Congress by James Madison, the main author of the Bill of Rights, who proposed that the amendments be placed within the Constitution, mostly in the Article I, Section 9 restrictions on the federal government. Also, an amendment he proposed that would expressly apply to the states, which he wanted in the Section 10 restrictions on the states, failed to pass.

While there had been some discussion prior to the case, Barron settled in the courts that the Bill of Rights did not apply to the states, and, despite criticism by the abolitionists, the doctrine was maintained by the Court through to the Fourteenth Amendment, which used the language in Section 10 clearly expressing, "No state shall . . ." Through this amendment, by the Warren Court era, through a process of incorporation, the Court has applied most of the Bill of Rights to the states.

F. THORNTON MILLER

References and Further Reading

- Amar, Akhil Reed. The Bill of Rights: Creation and Reconstruction. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1998.
- Ely, James W., Jr. The Guardian of Every Other Right: A Constitutional History of Property Rights. 2nd ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Johnson, Herbert A. The Chief Justiceship of John Marshall, 1801–1835. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1997.
- White, G. Edward. The Marshall Court and Cultural Change, 1815–1835. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch 87 (1810)

See also Abolitionists; Application of First Amendment to States; Bill of Rights: Structure; Fourteenth Amendment; Incorporation Doctrine; Madison, James; Marshall, John; Marshall Court; Takings Clause (V); Warren Court

BARTKUS v. ILLINOIS, 359 U.S. 121 (1959)

In this decision, the Supreme Court upheld a state conviction following federal acquittal for the same crime, ruling that the so-called "double jeopardy clause" of the Fifth Amendment, which bars multiple convictions for the same crime, did not apply to the states. Alfonse Bartkus was tried in federal court for robbing a federally insured bank and acquitted, but he was later convicted in Illinois state court for the same crime and sentenced to life in prison. The defendant challenged his conviction on the grounds that the Fourteenth Amendment's due process guarantees disallowed multiple trials for the same crime. The Court declared that the Fourteenth Amendment's due process clause did not apply any of the first eight amendments to the states, and thus the ban against multiple prosecutions—the double jeopardy clause of the Fifth Amendment—did not apply to state courts. The Court relied on historical and federalist arguments that states were intended to remain separate from the federal government, beginning with their own constitutions, and their legal systems should be independent as well. Applying this “dual sovereignty” doctrine meant that the same crime could nevertheless be considered a separate offense in federal and state systems. The Court also relied on prior case law, in the Supreme Court and the states, upholding successive federal and state prosecutions, and invoked policy arguments that banning dual state and federal prosecutions would hinder states’ ability to protect themselves against crime. The strong dissent in this case argued that double prosecutions are contrary to the historical and moral precedents of civilized society.

DAVID D. BURNETT

References and Further Reading

- Dawson, Michael A., Note: Popular Sovereignty, Double Jeopardy, and the Dual Sovereignty Doctrine, Yale Law Journal 102 (1992): 46:281–303.
- Lopez, Dax Eric, Note: Not Twice for the Same: How the Dual Sovereignty Doctrine Is Used to Circumvent Non Bis In Idem, Vanderbilt Journal of Transnational Law 33 (2000): 1263–303.
- “Selective Preemption: A Preferential Solution to the Bartkus–Abbate Rule in Successive Federal–State Prosecutions.” The Notre Dame Lawyer 57 (1981): 340–63.

See also Double Jeopardy (V): Early History, Background, Framing; Double Jeopardy: Modern History; Due Process; Due Process of Law (V and XIV); Fourteenth Amendment; Substantive Due Process

BARTNICKI v. VOPPER, 532 U.S. 514 (2001)

Plaintiffs, a union president and a chief negotiator, had a cellular phone conversation in which threats were made against school board members. An unknown third party intercepted and taped the conversation, and left a copy with a local activist. The activist gave copies to the local media, which disclosed the contents to the public.

Plaintiffs sued the activist and media outlets under federal and Pennsylvania wiretap laws prohibiting the disclosure of an electronic communication when a party knows or has reason to know that the communication was unlawfully intercepted. The Supreme Court assumed that the defendants violated the statutes.

The sole question was whether the First Amendment barred the statutes’ application on the specific facts of these cases.

Justice Stevens, joined by five other justices, concluded that the plaintiffs’ actions were barred. He began by characterizing the wiretap laws as content neutral, but then emphasized that the publication of lawfully obtained truthful information about a matter of public concern could not be punished “absent a need . . . of the highest order” (quoting Smith v. Daily Mail Publishing Co. [1979]). He found the government’s interest in deterring unlawful interceptions to be inadequate, noting that the government could further this interest more directly by punishing interceptors and not law-abiding possessors who disclose the information. By contrast, he characterized the government’s interest in protecting privacy of communication as “important,” recognizing that “fear of public disclosure of private conversations might well have a chilling effect on private speech.” Stevens suggested that this interest in protecting privacy and fostering private speech might justify disclosure prohibitions in most cases. But in this instance, he found the interest outweighed by the competing interest in having truthful information about a matter of public concern published. In reaching this narrow result, Stevens avoided the larger question of whether a party who himself unlawfully obtained truthful information could be punished for publishing the information and not merely for its unlawful acquisition. Justice Breyer, in a concurrence joined by Justice O’Connor, emphasized that he joined the majority’s opinion only because the speakers’ legitimate privacy expectations were “unusually low,” and the public’s interest in publication was “unusually high.”

ALAN E. GARFIELD

References and Further Reading

- Fishman, Clifford S., Technology and the Internet: The Impending Destruction of Privacy by Betrayers, Grudgers, Snoops, Spammers, Corporations, and the Media, George Washington Law Review 72 (2004): 1503.
- Huhn, Wilson R., Assessing the Constitutionality of Laws that Are Both Content-Based and Content-Neutral: The Emerging Constitutional Calculus, Indiana Law Journal 79 (2004): 801.
- Terrell, Timothy P., and Anne R. Jacobs, Privacy, Technology, and Terrorism: Bartnicki, Kyllo, and the Normative Struggle Behind Competing Claims to Solitude and Security, Emory Law Journal 41 (2002): 1469.
- Volokh, Eugene, Freedom of Speech and Intellectual Property: Some Thoughts After Eldred, 44 Liquormart, and Bartnicki, Houston Law Review 40 (2003): 697.

BATES v. STATE BAR OF ARIZONA,
433 U.S. 350 (1969)

Two recent law graduates opened a law practice, which they called the “Legal Clinic of Bates and O’Steen.” The lawyers placed a print ad in a local newspaper, which asked “Do You Need a Lawyer?” and offered “Legal Services at Very Reasonable Fees.” The ad then listed the fees for certain routine legal services. The state bar brought a disciplinary proceeding against the two for violating a state rule of professional conduct that flatly prohibited any mass media advertising.

The Arizona Supreme Court upheld the sanction against the lawyers, reasoning that the advertising rule did not violate either federal anti-trust laws or the First Amendment (In re Bates and O’Steen). The U.S. Supreme Court agreed to review this decision, having decided in the previous term that a rule restricting the advertising of prescription drug prices was an unconstitutional limitation on the free flow of information about the availability and price of commercial services (Virginia State Board of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, Inc.).

The Court held that the protection for commercial speech applied to advertising by lawyers, and that the Arizona rule was unconstitutionally broad. Although the law is traditionally said to be a profession, not a “mere” business, there is no reason for lawyers to pretend that they are not interested in earning fees for their work. Moreover, advertising need not be inherently misleading or deceptive. Four dissenting justices argued that there should be some distinction between advertising for products, such as prescription drugs, and professional services.

W. BRADLEY WENDEL

Cases and Statutes Cited

Bates v. Arizona State Bar, 433 U.S. 350 (1977)
In re Bates and O’Steen, 555 P.2d 640 (Ariz. 1976)
Virginia State Board of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, Inc., 425 U.S. 748 (1976)

See also Commercial Speech; Lawyer Advertising; Virginia State Board of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, Inc., 425 U.S. 748 (1976)

BATSON v. KENTUCKY, 476
U.S. 79 (1986)

In Batson v. Kentucky, the Supreme Court addressed how a criminal defendant can establish that a prosecutor used a peremptory challenge against a prospective juror of the defendant’s race on the basis of race.

The Court had previously in a 1965 case, Swain v. Alabama, recognized that a state’s exercise of such a race-based peremptory challenge was unconstitutional under the equal protection clause. Swain, however, had imposed a virtually insurmountable evidentiary burden, in that a defendant needed to show a repeated pattern of discriminatory strikes across several cases in order to prevail.

The Batson defendant, an African American, was convicted of burglary and receipt of stolen goods by an all-white jury. The record showed that the prosecutor had used four out of six peremptory challenges to strike all of the African Americans from the venire. The defendant had moved to discharge the jury on the basis that the prosecutor’s use of peremptory challenges violated both the equal protection clause in the Fourteenth Amendment and the defendant’s Sixth Amendment right to a jury drawn from a fair cross-section of the community, as incorporated against the states by the Fourteenth Amendment. The trial court denied the motion without granting a hearing, and the Kentucky Supreme Court affirmed the conviction. On appeal, the defendant conceded that Swain precluded an equal protection claim based only on the peremptory challenges exercised in his own case.

Justice Powell, writing for the Court, overruled this part of Swain. The opinion outlined a three-step procedure drawn from other equal protection cases such as Washington v. Davis and modeled on several state court decisions. In the first step, the defendant must raise an inference that the prosecutor exercised a peremptory challenge on the basis of race. Such an inference could be drawn from all relevant circumstances, such as the prosecutor’s pattern of strikes, questions to the venire, or statements to the court.

In the second step, the burden of production—but not the burden of proof or persuasion—shifts to the prosecutor to supply a race-neutral reason. Later cases, in particular Purkett v. Elem., clarified that this was a formalistic step, in that any reason, even those that are “implausible,” “fantastic,” “silly,” or “superstitious,” would be adequate to survive step two, so long as the reason was facially neutral. Mere denials of discriminatory motivation or affirmations of good faith, however, remain inadequate.

In the third step, the judge determines whether the defendant has established the prosecutor’s “purposeful discrimination.” Whether purposeful discrimination requires subjective discriminatory intent, and if so, whether it is sufficient, remains unclear. In any event, the Supreme Court has stated in cases such as Miller-El v. Cockrell that the decisive question will be the prosecutor’s credibility. If the judge believes the neutral explanation, no matter how trivial, then the peremptory challenge must be sustained.

In an important concurrence, Justice Marshall objected that the Court's Batson framework would not end racial discrimination in jury selection. He advocated instead the complete elimination of peremptory challenges. Chief Justice Burger argued in dissent that the Court's decision had effectively ended the peremptory challenge because articulating a neutral explanation would be difficult.

The Sixth Amendment claim that a prosecutor's use of peremptory challenges might deny the defendant a jury representative of a cross-section of the community was finally rejected in Holland v. Illinois on the grounds that the Sixth Amendment was intended to ensure an impartial jury rather than a representative jury.

Batson was later expanded in Powers v. Ohio so that defendants could object to the exclusion of jurors of other races as well as their own race. Batson was extended to civil litigants in Edmonson v. Leesville Concrete Co., criminal defense counsel in Georgia v. McCollum, and to prevent peremptory challenges made on the basis of gender in J.E.B. v. Alabama ex. rel. T.B. The Supreme Court also stated in dicta in United States v. Martinez-Salazar that a peremptory challenge may not be exercised on the basis of ethnic origin. As the reach of Batson has expanded, the Court has clarified that the primary concern is the violation of the excluded juror's equal protection right rather than solely the rights of the litigants.

The bulk of academic commentary and empirical studies suggests that Batson has failed to eliminate the use of race as a factor in jury selection. Much of this commentary focuses on how dishonest lawyers can easily survive a Batson challenge by providing false but neutral reasons for their challenges. Commentators also note that limited misuse of peremptory challenges is unlikely to be discovered. Batson has, however, undoubtedly reduced the most egregious uses of race and gender in jury selection.

ANTONY PAGE

References and Further Reading

- Altschuler, Albert W., The Supreme Court and the Jury: Voir Dire, Peremptory Challenges, and the Review of Jury Verdicts, University of Chicago Law Review 56 (Winter 1989): 153–233.
- Cavise, Leonard L., The Batson Doctrine: The Supreme Court's Utter Failure to Meet the Challenge of Discrimination in Jury Selection, Wisconsin Law Review 1999 (1999): 501–52.
- Melilli, Kenneth J., Batson in Practice: What We Have Learned About Batson and Peremptory Challenges, Notre Dame Law Review 71 (1996): 447–503.
- Muller, Eric L., Solving the Batson Paradox: Harmless Error, Jury Representation, and the Sixth Amendment, Yale Law Journal 106 (October 1996): 93–150.

Page, Antony, Batson's Blind-Spot: Unconscious Stereotyping and the Peremptory Challenge, Boston University Law Review 85 (2005): 155–263.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Batson v. Kentucky*, 476 U.S. 79 (1986)
- Edmonson v. Leesville Concrete Co.*, 500 U.S. 614 (1991)
- Georgia v. McCollum*, 505 U.S. 42 (1992)
- Hernandez v. New York*, 500 U.S. 352 (1991)
- Holland v. Illinois*, 493 U.S. 474 (1990)
- J.E.B. v. Alabama ex. rel. T.B.*, 511 U.S. 127 (1994)
- Miller-El v. Cockrell*, 537 U.S. 322 (2003)
- Powers v. Ohio*, 499 U.S. 400 (1991)
- Purkett v. Elem.*, 514 U.S. 765 (1995)
- Swain v. Alabama*, 380 U.S. 202 (1965)
- United States v. Martinez-Salazar*, 528 U.S. 304 (2000)
- Washington v. Davis*, 426 U.S. 229 (1976)

See also Equal Protection of Law (XIV); Holland v. Illinois, 493 U.S. 474 (1990); Jury Selection and Voir Dire; Jury Trials and Race; Race and Criminal Justice; Swain v. Alabama, 380 U.S. 202 (1965)

BEAL v. DOE, 432 U.S. 438 (1977)

Indigents who were eligible for financial assistance under Title XIX of the Social Security Act's Medicaid program challenged a Pennsylvania statute that denied funding for their desired abortions. The state law limited such support to those abortions that were certified by physicians as medically or psychiatrically necessary.

According to the U.S. Supreme Court in Beal v. Doe, the only question was whether Title XIX required states to fund the cost of all abortions, including those that were elective. In ruling for the state limitation, Justice Powell reasoned that the language of the congressional statute did not specifically mention abortions and did not suggest that participating states were required to fund every medical procedure. States, he said, were only required to meet certain standards for determining eligibility under a plan that was consistent with the overall objectives of Medicaid. Next, he noted that in Roe v. Wade, the Court had expressly recognized the "important and legitimate interest [of the state] in protecting the potentiality of human life." He also found supporting history in the fact that when Title XIX was passed in 1965, nontherapeutic abortions were illegal in most states. Finally, he deferred to the interpretation of the law by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, the federal agency responsible for its administration, which was akin to the Court's rendition.

Beal was one of three cases that posed direct legislative challenges to the highly controversial abortion case, Roe v. Wade, decided just four years earlier. One of the most direct and effective state and local strategies for curbing the availability of abortions following Roe was simply to deny public funding and/or the use of public hospitals and facilities for the procedure. The leading case, Maier v. Roe, established that although women have a fundamental constitutional right to decide whether to have an abortion, there was no corresponding obligation on the part of state and local governments to provide funding for them. Maier upheld Connecticut's refusal to reimburse Medicaid recipients for the cost of an abortion unless a doctor certified that it was medically or psychiatrically necessary. In the third case, Poelker v. Doe, the Court voted to sustain the St. Louis, Missouri, policy of denying indigent pregnant women access to nontherapeutic abortions in the city's public hospitals.

These rulings were later reaffirmed in Harris v. McRae, when the Court upheld congressional restrictions on federal funding for abortions, and in Webster v. Reproductive Health Services, sustaining Missouri's 1986 ban on the use of public hospitals, facilities, and employees for the elective procedure. After more than a decade in which the Supreme Court legitimated governmental policies denying funding and the use of public hospitals for nontherapeutic abortions, there remained, in 1989, thirteen states with no restrictions on funding. Thirty-one states passed laws denying support for indigent women.

KENNETH F. MOTT

References and Further Reading

- Baer, Judith A. Historical and Multicultural Encyclopedia of Women's Reproductive Rights in the United States. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 2001.
- Bond, Jon R., and Charles A. Johnson. "Implementing a Permissive Policy: Hospital Abortion Services after Roe v. Wade." American Journal of Political Science 26 (1982): 1-24.
- Craig, Barbara Hinkson, and David M. O'Brien. Abortion and American Politics. Chatham, NJ: Chatham House, 1993.
- Hull, N.E.H., and Peter Charles Hoffer. Roe v. Wade: The Abortion Rights Controversy in American History. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2001.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Harris v. McRae*, 448 U.S. 297 (1980)
- Maier v. Roe*, 432 U.S. 464 (1977)
- Poelker v. Doe*, 432 U.S. 519 (1977)
- Roe v. Wade*, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)
- Webster v. Reproductive Health Services*, 492 U.S. 490 (1989)

See also Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980); Maier v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464 (1977); Poelker v. Doe, 432 U.S. 59 (1977); Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973); Webster v. Reproductive Health Services, 492 U.S. 490 (1989)

BEAUHARNAIS v. ILLINOIS, 343 U.S. 250 (1952)

In Beauharnais v. Illinois, the U.S. Supreme Court upheld the validity of a 1917 Illinois group libel statute, finding that such speech fell outside the protections of the First Amendment. Speaking for a divided Court, Justice Frankfurter's majority opinion drew on the reasoning in Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire wherein libel was excluded from Constitutional protection, and on Cantwell v. Connecticut for the authority of states to punish speech that would "incite violence and breaches of the peace." Subsequent decisions, however, have cast doubt on the continuing validity of the Court's decision in Beauharnais.

Joseph Beauharnais, president of the White Circle League of America, was arrested and convicted for distributing leaflets calling for a halt to the "further encroachment, harassment and invasion of white people, their property, neighborhoods and persons by the Negro . . .", and further claiming that whites were in danger of being "mongrelized" by "the Negro." The Illinois law, passed against the backdrop of deadly race riots in that state, made it illegal to manufacture, sell, distribute, or exhibit anything that defames a class of citizens when such publication would expose a member of such group to "contempt, derision, or obloquy or which is productive of breach of the peace or riots."

Noting that the Illinois Supreme Court characterized Beauharnais's words as "liable to cause violence or disorder" and that one traditional basis of criminal libel law was to punish words likely to cause a breach of the peace, Justice Frankfurter's deference to the legislature in this case was colored by the state's acknowledged long history of racial strife. The opinion extended the scope of unprotected speech from libelous statements made against individuals to an entire race, class, or group of citizens, since it would be "arrant dogmatism . . . for [the Court] to deny that the Illinois legislature may warrantably believe that a man's job and his educational opportunities and the dignity accorded him may depend as much on the reputation of the racial and religious group to which he willy-nilly belongs, as on his own merits."

The majority opinion was met with four dissents, including Justice Black whose expansive interpretation of the First Amendment led him to criticize the Court's reliance on Chaplinsky, confining the decision to face-to-face encounters directed at individuals, and to attack the Illinois law as overly broad and tantamount to "censorship." Justice Douglas warned of the dangers of allowing legislatures to determine which kinds of speech may be proscribed, as "[t]oday a white man stands convicted for protesting in unseemly language against our decisions invalidating restrictive covenants. Tomorrow a Negro will be ha[u]led before a court for denouncing lynch law in heated terms.”

Just as the Supreme Court seemed to uphold the validity of group libel laws, proponents of group libel legislation turned their focus away from prohibiting group defamation and towards bolstering freedom of expression and individual rights. The dissenters in Beauharnais proved to foreshadow the future direction of Supreme Court First Amendment jurisprudence, which expanded the protections afforded offensive speech in such cases as Brandenburg v. Ohio and Cohen v. California. Moreover, New York Times Co. v. Sullivan and Collin v. Smith cast doubt on the presumption of damage to the individual members of a group from criticism of a group, while the latter case also undermined the view that “fighting words need not be used in a personally abusive manner when they consist of language which defames a race or religion.” As such, the Beauharnais decision appears eclipsed by decisions more protective of provocative speech, and its precedential value damaged if not completely diluted.

ANDREW FINKELMAN

References and Further Reading

- Banks, Taunya Lovell, What Is a Community? Group Rights and the Constitution: The Special Case of African Americans, Margins Law Journal 1 (Spring 2001): 51.
- Eastland, Terry, ed. Freedom of Expression in the Supreme Court: The Defining Cases. New York: Rowman & Littlefield Publishers, Inc., 2000.
- Schultz, Evan P., Group Rights, American Jews and the Failure of Group Libel Laws, 1913–1952, Brooklyn Law Review 66 (Spring 2000): 71.
- Walker, Samuel. Hate Speech: The History of an American Controversy. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1994.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Brandenburg v. Ohio*, 395 U.S. 444 (1969)
- Cantwell v. Connecticut*, 310 U.S. 296 (1940)
- Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire*, 315 U.S. 568 (1942)
- Cohen v. California*, 403 U.S. 15 (1971)
- Collin v. Smith*, 447 F.Supp. 676 (N.D. Ill. 1978)
- New York Times Co. v. Sullivan*, 376 U.S. 254 (1964)

BECKER AMENDMENT

The Becker amendment was one of the more significant congressional attempts to overturn an unpopular holding of the U.S. Supreme Court. Congressman Frank Becker (R-NY) introduced the prayer and bible reading amendment of 1964, or “Becker amendment,” in response to two controversial Supreme Court decisions outlawing organized prayer and Bible reading in the nation’s public schools. Initially, when introduced, the Becker amendment had substantial congressional support and passage appeared likely. Ratification by three-fourths of the states seemed assured. The proposal stalled in legislative committee, however, and eventually died without a vote, primarily as a result of opposition from the religious community.

The impetus behind the Becker amendment lay in the public reaction to two Supreme Court decisions in 1962 and 1963. During the early 1960s, approximately one-half of the nation’s public schools conducted either daily or weekly religious exercises, often in the form of a short reading from the Bible (usually from the Protestant King James version) and a prayer given over the schools’ public address systems. Such “non-sectarian” exercises had been controversial since the mid-nineteenth century, particularly among Catholics, Jews, and other non-Protestants. Although a handful of state supreme courts had struck down such practices over the years, the majority of challenges had failed. In 1962, the U.S. Supreme Court heard a challenge to a New York law requiring public school students to repeat daily the following prayer, written by the state board of regents: “Almighty God, we acknowledge our dependence upon Thee, and we beg Thy blessing upon us, our parents, our teachers and our country.” In an eight-to-one decision, Engel v. Vitale, the Court struck down the practice as a violation of the establishment clause, writing that “government should stay out of the business of writing or sanctioning official prayers and leave that purely religious function to the people themselves and to those the people choose to look to for religious guidance.”

The Engel decision unleashed a public outcry, with public officials and religious leaders condemning the holding. In the weeks following the Engel decision, approximately seventy members of Congress, including Congressman Becker, introduced proposed constitutional amendments to permit religious exercises in public schools. The Senate Judiciary Committee held hearings on the proposals in July 1962, but took no action; by then the Court had granted review on two cases that considered the constitutionality of daily Bible readings and recitations of the Lord’s Prayer. The following year, in Abington Township School District v. Schempp and Murray v. Curlett, the high court struck down the practices by the same eight-to-one vote.

The public outcry in reaction to the Schempp and Murray decisions was greater than had occurred following Engel. Evangelist Billy Graham and Catholic Bishop Fulton J. Sheen condemned the holdings, while Senator Strom Thurman called the decisions “another major triumph of secularism and atheism which are bent on throwing God completely out of our national life.” The Schempp and Murray decisions provided renewed momentum for amendment proponents. Prior to the 1963 decisions, House Judiciary Committee Chair Emanuel Celler had opposed the proposed amendments and had refused to schedule a hearing. By the spring of 1964, Congressman Becker had gathered over 170 of the needed 218 signatures to have his proposed amendment discharged from the House Judiciary Committee, forcing Celler to hold hearings.

The final language of the Becker amendment, compiled from the various proposals, provided in part:

Nothing in this Constitution shall be deemed to prohibit the offering, reading from, or listening to prayers or biblical scriptures, if participation therein is on a voluntary basis, in any governmental or public school. . . . Nothing in this Constitution shall be deemed to prohibit making reference to belief in, reliance upon, or invoking the aid of God or a Supreme Being in any governmental or public document, proceeding, activity, currency, school [or] institution . . .

Congressman Becker worked tirelessly to build support for the amendment, and found natural allies among evangelical groups. Groups such as the National Association of Evangelicals and the fundamentalist International Council of Christian Churches organized grassroots support and sent their officials to testify in favor of the proposed amendment. Working in Becker’s favor was the fact that few members of Congress wanted to go on record as opposing prayer and Bible reading in the public schools.

Opponents of the proposed amendment, including the American Civil Liberties Union, Americans United for Separation of Church and State, the American Jewish Congress, and the Anti-Defamation League, recognized that the House Judiciary Committee would likely approve the Becker amendment if it came to a vote. These groups organized a coalition behind the public leadership of the Baptist Joint Committee on Public Affairs and the National Council of Churches (NCC). Rev. Dean Kelley of the NCC, a United Methodist minister, became the spokesperson for the coalition and quietly organized testimony from many of the nation’s religious leaders, including deans of leading seminaries. Most significant, Kelley was able to obtain testimony from several religious leaders with impeccable evangelical credentials. This testimony provided political coverage to wavering members of the committee, enabling Congressman Celler to allow the proposal to die without a committee vote. What had first appeared to be a significant threat to the First Amendment’s religion clauses was diffused primarily due to the efforts of religious groups.

STEVEN K. GREEN

References and Further Reading

- Alley, Robert S. Without a Prayer: Religious Expression in Public Schools. Amherst, NY: Prometheus Books, 1996.
- DelFattore, Joan. The Fourth R: Conflicts Over Religion in America’s Public Schools. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2004.
- Green, Steven K. “Evangelicals and the Becker Amendment: A Lesson in Church–State Moderation.” Journal of Church and State 33 (1991): 541–67.
- Phelps Stokes, Anson, and Leo Pfeffer, Church and State in the United States. New York: Harper and Row, 1964.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Engel v. Vitale*, 370 U.S. 421 (1962)
- Murray v. Curlett*, 374 U.S. 203 (1963)
- School District of Abington Township*, 374 U.S. 203 (1963)
- See also Abington Township School District v. Schempp*, 374 U.S. 203 (1963); Constitutional Amendment Permitting School Prayer; Engel v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421 (1962)

BELIEF–ACTION DISTINCTION IN FREE EXERCISE CLAUSE HISTORY

One of the central issues in free exercise clause jurisprudence has been the question of whether the state is obliged to give individuals exemptions from government regulations that interfere with their free exercise of religion. In resolving this issue, the U.S. Supreme Court has, for much of its history, distinguished between religious beliefs (which receive considerable protection under the free exercise clause) and religiously motivated conduct (which receives much less protection).

The Supreme Court first articulated the different constitutional protection enjoyed by religious beliefs and religiously motivated conduct in Reynolds v. United States (1878), a case involving the constitutionality of a congressional statute governing the Territory of Utah that made it a crime for a “person having a husband or wife living” to marry another person. Pursuant to this statute, George Reynolds, one of the leaders of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints (the Mormons) whose church doctrine at that time provided that it was a “duty of male members of said church . . . to practise polygamy,” was prosecuted. The question for the Court in Reynolds was “whether religious belief can be accepted as a justification of an overt act made criminal by the law of the land.” In holding that enforcement of the criminal prohibition on plural marriage against Reynolds did not violate the free exercise clause, the Court, with Chief Justice Waite writing, cited Thomas Jefferson for his “belief–action” distinction, which provided that religious beliefs and opinions enjoy greater protection from governmental interference than do actions motivated by religious beliefs and opinions. In his Bill for the Establishment of Religious Freedom, Jefferson had written that to permit “the civil magistrate to intrude his powers into the field of opinion, and to restrain the profession or propagation of principles on supposition of their ill tendency, is a dangerous fallacy which at once destroys all religious liberty,” but that it is legitimate for the magistrate “to interfere when principles break out into overt acts against peace and good order.” The Reynolds Court also cited Jefferson’s famous 1802 letter to the Danbury Baptists in which he wrote: “Believing with you that religion is a matter which lies solely between man and his God; . . . the legislative powers of the government reach actions only, and not opinions.” The Court in Reynolds placed great weight on the belief–action distinction articulated by Jefferson:

Coming as this does from an acknowledged leader of the advocates of the [free exercise clause], it may be accepted almost as an authoritative declaration of the scope and effect of the amendment thus secured. Congress was deprived of all legislative power over mere opinion, but was left free to reach actions which were in violation of social duties or subversive of good order Laws are made for the government of actions, and while they cannot interfere with mere religious belief and opinions, they may with practices [T]o permit [an exemption] would be to make the professed doctrines of religious belief superior to the law of the land, and in effect to permit every citizen to become a law unto himself [emphasis added].

Accordingly, the Court enforced the criminal sanction against Reynolds.

Since Reynolds, the Supreme Court has generally retained the distinction between beliefs and actions when deciding cases under the free exercise clause, generally striking down government regulation of religious beliefs. For example, in Torcaso v. Watkins (1961), the Court struck down a Maryland constitutional provision that required a “belief in the existence of God” in order to hold public office. The Court concluded that Maryland had “unconstitutionally invade[d] the appellant’s freedom of belief and religion” by denying him the right to hold public office on account of his nontraditional worldview.

Over the course of the twentieth century, the Court’s protection of religiously motivated conduct has varied—at times more protective than the Reynolds Court and more recently, about as protective as the Reynolds Court.

In Cantwell v. Connecticut (1940), the first case in which the Court applied the free exercise clause to state and local governments, the Court, with Justice Owen Roberts writing, reasserted the distinction between “freedom to believe and freedom to act” when evaluating the constitutionality of a criminal prosecution of Jehovah’s Witnesses for their aggressive proselytizing activities. “The first [freedom to believe] is absolute but, in the nature of things, the second [freedom to act] cannot be. Conduct remains subject to regulation for the protection of society.” But the Court went on to say that the “power to regulate must be so exercised as not, in attaining a permissible end, unduly to infringe the protected freedom.” In suggesting that some prohibitions on religiously motivated conduct might “unduly infringe” on free exercise rights, the Court invited a “weighing of two conflicting interests”: the state’s interest in “the preservation and protection of peace and good order” and the individual’s interest in engaging in religiously motivated conduct. In sum, the Court in Cantwell retained the belief–action distinction, but gave actions greater protection than they had enjoyed during the nineteenth century.

During the 1960s, the Court extended the constitutional protection afforded to religiously motivated conduct under the free exercise clause. In Sherbert v. Verner (1963), a Seventh Day Adventist challenged a decision to deny her unemployment benefits following her termination from her job for refusing to work on Saturday, her Sabbath. The Court articulated a new test for assessing whether religiously motivated conduct should be protected under the free exercise clause. The Court determined that if the state imposed a burden on an individual’s exercise of her religious belief—here, by denying unemployment benefits—then it must have a “compelling state interest” for so doing. The compelling state interest test offered greater protection under the free exercise clause for religiously motivated conduct than had been previously afforded by the Court. The Court retained this test until its decision in Employment Division v. Smith (1990).

In Employment Division v. Smith, the Court, in effect, jettisoned the Sherbert v. Verner compelling state interest test. Smith involved the constitutionality of the denial of unemployment benefits to Native Americans who were fired from their job for smoking peyote as part of a religious ceremony. The Smith Court held that state interference with a person's religiously motivated conduct did not violate the free exercise clause so long as the interference took place pursuant to a neutral, generally applicable regulatory provision. After Smith, the state no longer had to justify its interference with religiously motivated conduct by demonstrating a compelling state interest. The Court continues to follow the Smith principle today, although both Congress and state legislatures have extended protection to religiously motivated conduct by statute in a number of areas.

Although the Court no longer speaks directly in terms of a "belief–action" distinction under the free exercise clause, it in effect maintains that distinction by affording state interferences with religious belief very high protection, while permitting state interference with religiously motivated conduct so long as the state has proceeded according to a neutral, generally applicable statute and has not acted with animus towards the religiously motivated person.

DAVISON M. DOUGLAS

References and Further Reading

- Epps, Garrett, What We Talk About When We Talk About Free Exercise, Arizona State Law Journal 30 (1998): 563–602.
 Friedelbaum, Stanley H., Free Exercise in the States: Belief, Conduct, and Judicial Benchmarks, Albany Law Review 63 (2000): 1059–100.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Cantwell v. Connecticut*, 310 U.S. 296 (1940)
Employment Division v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872 (1990)
Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145 (1878)
Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398 (1963)
Torcaso v. Watkins, 367 U.S. 488 (1961)

See also Accommodation of Religion; Free Exercise Clause (I): History, Background, Framing; Jefferson Thomas; Jehovah's Witnesses and Religious Liberty; Mormons and Religious Liberty

BELLE TERRE v. BORAAS, 416 U.S. 1 (1974)

When a local government zones, it typically classifies land uses according to use type (residential, commercial, industrial, etc.), and then regulates uses within each classification according to height and density. Residential zones are generally designated as either single-family or multi-family. Zoning ordinances therefore must define the word family for purposes of regulating the density of residential zoning districts. The Village of Belle Terre, New York, limited all development within its jurisdiction to single-family dwellings, defining the word "family" to mean "one or more persons related by blood, adoption, or marriage, living and cooking together as a single housekeeping unit, exclusive of household servants." A homeowner in the village, who was cited for violating the ordinance when he rented his house to six unrelated college students, challenged the constitutionality of the ordinance, claiming that its definition of family violated constitutional rights of equal protection, privacy, association, and travel. In Belle Terre v. Boraas, the Supreme Court upheld the ordinance as a reasonable means of furthering a legitimate public purpose.

Justice Douglas, writing for the majority of the Court, noted the Court's long history of deference to legislative discretion in zoning decisions, citing to its landmark decision in Euclid v. Ambler Realty Co., which sustained the validity of zoning as a legitimate means of furthering the public's interest in protecting single-family uses from the threats to health and safety posed by higher-density uses. Expanding on its holding in Berman v. Parker, the Court said that "the police power is not confined to elimination of filth, stench, and unhealthy places"; it is also permissible for cities to "lay out zones where family values, youth values, and the blessings of quiet seclusion and clean air make the area a sanctuary for people." The Court rejected the argument of the petitioners that it should apply a heightened level of scrutiny because the ordinance infringed on fundamental constitutional rights of privacy and association. Because the Court found that the ordinance was not "aimed at transients," it concluded that no right of travel was implicated. It also found that no right of association was violated since "a 'family' may, so far as the ordinance is concerned, entertain whomever it likes." In answer to the claim that the ordinance intruded into the privacy rights of individuals by discriminating against unmarried couples, the Court found that because two unrelated persons could live together under the ordinance there was no such discrimination.

Justice Marshall dissented from the majority's opinion, believing that the ordinance did violate the plaintiff's fundamental rights of association and privacy. As such the majority's application of a rational basis test was inappropriate. Marshall argued that the ordinance could "withstand constitutional scrutiny only upon a clear showing that the burden imposed is necessary to protect a compelling and substantial governmental interest."

Although the Belle Terre Court was willing to sustain an ordinance regulating the number of unrelated persons who could constitute a "single family," two years later, in Moore v. City of East Cleveland, it was unwilling to allow local authorities to regulate the number of related persons who could live together in a single-family zone. In the latter case, the Court applied strict scrutiny because the “special sanctity of the family” was at stake.

SUSAN E. LOOPER-FRIEDMAN

References and Further Reading

Ginzburg, Rebecca M., Altering ‘Family’: Another Look at the Supreme Court’s Narrow Protection of Families in Belle Terre, Boston University Law Review 83 (2003):2:875–96.
 Juergensmeyer, Julian Conrad, and Thomas E. Roberts. Land Use Planning and Development Regulation Law. St. Paul, MN: Thomson West, 2003.
 Mandelker, Daniel R. Land Use Law. 5th ed. Newark, NJ: LexisNexis Publishing, 2003.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Berman v. Parker, 348 U.S. 26 (1954)
Euclid v. Ambler Realty Co., 272 U.S. 365 (1926)
Moore v. City of East Cleveland, 431 U.S. 494 (1977)

See also Family unity for Noncitizens; Privacy

BELLIS v. UNITED STATES, 417 U.S. 85 (1974)

Isadore Bellis was a partner in a small law firm who received a grand jury subpoena for the financial records of the partnership and sought to resist producing them by asserting his Fifth Amendment self-incrimination privilege. While a custodian of records for a large business cannot assert the privilege after Hale v. Henkel, Bellis argued that the law partnership was not an organization separate from its individual partners, and, therefore, the production of the documents was the same as if he were subpoenaed personally.

The Supreme Court held that while the owner of a sole proprietorship can assert the Fifth Amendment in response to a subpoena for records of the business, a custodian of records for a collective entity who holds the documents in a representative capacity cannot assert the self-incrimination privilege. The Court applied its analysis in United States v. White that a collective entity is an organization that exists separately from its individual members, and must be relatively well-organized and structured and not merely a loose, informal association of individuals. The law firm had three partners and six other employees, and its records were those of the entire business and not merely of Bellis’s activity alone.

The Court held that “[w]hile small, the partnership here did have an established institutional identity independent of its individual partners.” The analysis in Bellis means that even small businesses, so long as they are not sole proprietorships, cannot refuse to produce records in response to a grand jury subpoena.

PETER J. HENNING

References and Further Reading

LaFave, Wayne R., Jerold H. Israel, and Nancy J. King. Criminal Procedure. Vol. 3. 2nd ed. St. Paul, MN: Thomson West, 1999.
 Mosteller, Robert P., Simplifying Subpoena Law: Taking the Fifth Amendment Seriously, Virginia Law Review 73 (1987): 1:1–110.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Hale v. Henkel, 201 U.S. 43 (1906)
United States v. White, 322 U.S. 694 (1944)

See also Grand Jury Investigation and Indictment; Hale v. Henkel, 201 U.S. 370 (1906); Self-Incrimination (V): Historical Background

BELLOTTI v. BAIRD, 443 U.S. 622 (1979)

As soon as the ink was dry on the Supreme Court’s opinion in Roe v. Wade, many state legislatures passed laws to limit a woman’s ability to get an abortion, or to at least place hurdles in her way. Some of these laws required that a woman seeking an abortion needed the consent of her husband, or, in the case of an unmarried minor, one or both parents.

These statutes were based on the Court’s statement in Roe that states could impose “reasonable” regulation of the performance of abortions, given the state’s “important and legitimate interest in preserving and protecting the health of the pregnant woman.”

One of the first Supreme Court decisions involving this type of post-Roe legislation was Planned Parenthood of Central Missouri v. Danforth, in which the Court struck down a Missouri statute that required for a woman to get an abortion during the first 12 weeks of pregnancy she needed the consent of her spouse, or, in the case of an unmarried minor, the consent of her parents. The Court said that since Roe v. Wade prevented the state from interfering with the woman’s right to obtain an abortion in the first 12 weeks, a state could not grant such a veto to a spouse or a parent.

A Massachusetts post-Roe statute provided that an unmarried pregnant minor who wanted an abortion was required to get her parents’ consent. The statute provided that a minor who was unable to get that consent, or unwilling to seek that consent, could seek a court order allowing the abortion. A judge could grant permission for an abortion “for good cause shown,” despite the absence of parental consent. The Court said that the minor’s ability to get judicial consent was an important constitutional protection of the minor’s rights. However, the Court struck down the requirement that the minor first seek parental consent as an undue burden on her rights.

The Court then distinguished between two classes of minors—those mature enough to make an informed and reasonable decision to have an abortion, and those not so mature. (The Court did not explain how to distinguish between the two.) In the case of a “mature” minor, the Court said that she needed neither her parents’ consent nor that of a judge—such a minor is entitled to the full protection of Roe v. Wade.

Minors not mature enough to make informed decisions would be subject to a different set of proceedings. If such a minor persuaded a judge that the abortion was in her best interest, the judge could grant permission without any parental involvement. If the judge is not persuaded that an abortion is in the minor’s best interest, the Court said the judge could deny consent or could require consultation with the parents before making a decision.

Since the Court’s decision in Bellotti v. Baird did not completely foreclose parental involvement, the door was left open for further legislative efforts to limit abortions of unmarried minors.

ELI C. BORTMAN

Cases and Statutes Cited

Planned Parenthood of Central Missouri v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52 (1976)

Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)

See also Abortion; Planned Parenthood of Missouri v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52 (1976); Reproductive Freedom; Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)

BENTON v. MARYLAND, 395 U.S. 784 (1969)

The double jeopardy clause of the Fifth Amendment provides that no person shall “be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb.” It provides protection against a second prosecution for the same offense following either an acquittal or conviction, and protects against multiple punishments for the same offense. In Benton v. Maryland (1969), the Supreme Court held that the double jeopardy clause is incorporated into the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and thereby made applicable to the states.

Prior to the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment, the Supreme Court held that the specific guarantees of the Bill of Rights, the first eight amendments to the Constitution, applied only to the federal government (Barron v. Mayor of City of Baltimore [1833]). Thus, at this time, the Bill of Rights was not binding on state and local government. After the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment in 1868, the question arose whether the Fourteenth Amendment incorporated any or all of the Bill of Rights. The Supreme Court has followed a process of selective incorporation pursuant to which it has determined on a case-by-case basis whether the particular right should be incorporated.

The most well-known test used to determine which rights are incorporated was articulated by Justice Cardozo in Palko v. Connecticut (1937). Under Palko, incorporation depends on whether the particular right is “of the very essence of a scheme of ordered liberty,” or is “a principle or justice so rooted in the traditions and conscience of our people as to be ranked as fundamental.”

The Court framed the specific issue in Palko: Did the state court’s denial of double jeopardy protection “violate those ‘fundamental principles of liberty and justice which lie at the base of all our civil and political institutions?’” The Court held that “[t]he answer surely must be ‘no.’”

Three decades later, the Court in Benton v. Maryland reached the opposite result and overruled Palko v. Connecticut. By the time Benton was decided, the Court’s approach to the incorporation issue had changed. Under Palko the Court made a record-specific evaluation in order to determine whether deprivation of the right in issue violated the defendant’s right to due process. In later cases, however, the Court took a wholesale approach and inquired whether the right at issue should be incorporated.

The Court in Benton found that the Fifth Amendment protection against double jeopardy is of “the very essence of a scheme of ordered liberty,” a “principle of justice so rooted in the traditions and conscience of our people as to be ranked as fundamental.” In reaching this conclusion, the Court relied upon (1) the historical importance of the double jeopardy protection, as “[i]ts origins can be traced to Greek and Roman times” and was “established in the common law of England long before this Nation’s independence”; (2) state practices: “every State incorporates some form of the prohibition [against double jeopardy] in its constitution or common law”; and

(3) the practical importance of the right, namely, its protection against the “embarrassment, expense and ordeal” and being compelled “to live in a continuing state of anxiety and insecurity” from multiple prosecutions for the same offense.

So, as a result of the decision in Benton v. Maryland, the states, like the federal government, must grant individuals protection against double jeopardy.

MARTIN A. SCHWARTZ

References and Further Reading

Chemerinsky, Erwin. Constitutional Law: Principles and Policies. 2nd ed. New York: Aspen Law and Business, 2002.

Rotunda, Ronald D., and John E. Nowak. Treatise on Constitutional Law: Substance and Procedure. 5 vols. 3rd ed. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 1999.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Barron v. Mayor of City of Baltimore, 32 U.S. 243 (1933)

Benton v. Maryland, 395 U.S. 784 (1969)

Palko v. Connecticut, 302 U.S. 319 (1937)

See also Double Jeopardy (V): Early History, Background, Framing; Incorporation Doctrine

BERGER v. NEW YORK, 388 U.S. 41 (1967)

Berger v. New York addressed questions pertaining to the Fourth Amendment. This decision overruled the precedent set by Olmstead v. United States. This precedent established in 1928 held that a wiretap was not included in the protections of the Fourth Amendment because there was no seizure of a tangible object. Berger addressed this question many decades later when wiretapping was common and new technologies were being introduced.

The petitioner, Ralph Berger, was convicted of conspiracy to bribe the chairman of the New York State Liquor Authority in attempts to obtain a liquor license for a controversial arena. The charges were based on a conversation overheard on a series of telephone wiretaps placed by the District Attorney of New York County. New York State law allowed wiretaps to be placed to obtain evidence if there were reasonable grounds for suspecting evidence of a crime could be obtained. The order to place a wiretap had to specify the person whose telephone conversations were being tapped and the phone number where the wiretap was to be placed. The order would be valid for two months. Berger appealed the decision of the New York Court to the Supreme Court based on the protections of the Fourth Amendment.

BERKEMER v. MCCARTY, 468 U.S. 420 (1984)

The Supreme Court found the New York statute to be too broad and reversed the ruling against Berger. The Court held that authorities must have “probable cause” to obtain evidence of this nature. Authorities would have to specify the crime, place to be searched, and the conversations that needed to be seized. This decision did not seek to end electronic surveillance since it was deemed an acceptable investigation method; rather it sought to apply more supervision to this type of surveillance. After this ruling, conversations were granted the full legal protections of the Fourth Amendment.

CAROL WALKER

References and Further Reading

Pollack, Harriet, and Alexander Smith. Civil Liberties and Civil Rights in the United States. St. Paul, MN: West, 1978.

Powe, Lucas. The Warren Court and American Politics. London: Belknap, 2000.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438 (1928)

See also Electronic Surveillance, Technological Monitoring, and Dog Sniffs; Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347 (1967); Search (General Definition); Wiretapping Laws

BERKEMER v. MCCARTY, 468 U.S. 420 (1984)

An individual is in custody, for purposes of Miranda v. Arizona, when a reasonable person in the suspect’s position would have believed himself in custody. In Berkemer v. McCarty, the Supreme Court held that during a routine traffic stop a motorist is not in custody for purposes of Miranda. In Berkemer, a police officer stopped a motorist he observed swerving between lanes on a highway. The officer asked the motorist if he was intoxicated, and the motorist responded that he had consumed two beers and had smoked some marijuana. The police officer then administered a field sobriety test, and when the motorist failed the test the officer arrested him. At the police station, the officer again asked the motorist if he had consumed any alcohol or drugs and the motorist again answered in the affirmative. The officer never administered the Miranda warnings to the motorist. The trial court admitted both of the motorist’s admissions of consuming alcohol and drugs.

As a consequence of the Supreme Court’s holding in Berkemer, police officers do not need to administer the Miranda warnings during routine traffic stops before asking motorists questions. Thus, although the officer failed to provide the warnings, the Court nevertheless held that the trial court properly admitted the incriminating statements the motorist made because the interrogation was not custodial. Routine traffic stops, which are ordinarily brief and occur in the public view, do not create the police-dominated, coercive environment critical to triggering of the Miranda protections.

CANDICE R. VOTICKY

Cases and Statutes Cited

Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)

See also Arrest; Coerced Confessions/Police Interrogations; Miranda Warning; Seizures; Stop and Frisk

BETHEL SCHOOL DISTRICT v. FRASER, 478 U.S. 675 (1986)

Does the First Amendment prevent a school district from disciplining a high school student for giving a lewd speech at a school assembly?

On April 26, 1983, Matthew N. Fraser, a high school student, delivered a speech nominating a fellow student for student elective office. In attendance were about 600 high school students, some as young as fourteen years of age, and faculty. During the speech, Fraser referred to his classmate “in terms of an elaborate, graphic, and explicit sexual metaphor” according to the Court. Fraser was given a three-day suspension, and he was removed from the list of candidates to give the commencement speech. Prior to delivering the speech, Fraser had discussed the content of the speech with two of his teachers who informed him that it was “inappropriate and that he probably should not deliver it.” Both teachers also told Fraser that the delivery of the speech might have “severe consequences.”

The Court distinguished its earlier ruling in Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School Dist. as the lewd speech in this case was disruptive, whereas the students’ actions in Tinker were “nondisruptive” and “passive.” The Court further noted the marked distinction between the political “message” of the armbands in Tinker and the sexual content of Fraser’s speech. The Court was careful and deliberate in distinguishing the landmark Tinker ruling and re-acknowledged the Tinker Court’s famous adage that “students do not ‘shed their constitutional rights to freedom of speech or expression at the schoolhouse gate.’” The Court re-affirmed the somewhat unique role of public schools within the larger constitutional framework and the burden placed on public schools to not only provide substantive education but also to inculcate students with the “fundamental values necessary to the maintenance of a democratic political system.”

The Court also reaffirmed its holding in New Jersey v. T.L.O. that the “constitutional rights in public schools are not automatically coextensive with the rights of adults in other settings.”

The Court held that the school district had not violated the First Amendment and had acted “entirely within its permissible authority” in punishing him under school disciplinary rules for his lewd and indecent speech.

Justices Brennan and Blackmun concurred with the majority opinion written by Chief Justice Burger. Justice Marshall dissented from the majority opinion in narrow fashion, asserting specifically that the school district had failed to demonstrate that Fraser’s remarks were actually disruptive while agreeing in principle with Justice Brennan’s concurrence.

Justice Stevens’s dissent focused not on whether the school could govern the type of speech at issue in this case generally but more specifically on whether Fraser was given fair notice of the rule at issue and the consequences of his actions. Stevens’s dissent addressed not the content of the speech but also its context: “It seems fairly obvious that respondent’s speech would be inappropriate in certain classroom and formal social settings. On the other hand, in a locker room or perhaps in a school corridor the metaphor in the speech might be regarded as rather routine comment. If this be true, and if respondent’s audience consisted almost entirely of young people with whom he conversed on a daily basis, can we—at this distance—confidently assert that he must have known that the school administration would punish him for delivering it?”

Fraser is an important case that provides some boundaries to the general notion set forth in Tinker that “students do not ‘shed their constitutional rights to freedom of speech or expression at the schoolhouse gate.’” These boundaries take the form of the Court’s attempt to balance students’ right to free speech and expression with the vital need for discipline in the public school environment.

MARC M. HARROLD

References and Further Reading

Hudson, David L., and John E. Ferguson, The Courts’ Inconsistent Treatment of Bethel v. Fraser and the Curtailment of Student Rights, John Marshall Law Review 36 (Fall 2002): 181.

Slaff, Sara, Silencing Student Speech: Bethel School District No. 403 v. Fraser, Note, American University Law Review 37 (Fall 1987): 203.

Cases and Statutes Cited

New Jersey v. T.L.O., 469 U.S. 325 (1985)
Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School Dist., 393 U.S. 503 (1969)

BETTS v. BRADY, 316 U.S. 455 (1942)

The Sixth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution provides, among other things, that “in all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.” The scope and nature of that right have been defined in a series of cases decided by the U.S. Supreme Court.

In Betts v. Brady, 316 U.S. 455 (1942), the Supreme Court was asked to decide whether the Sixth Amendment right to counsel, which applies only to the federal courts, is a “fundamental right.” If the right were found to be fundamental, then it would be applicable to the states under the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. That clause prohibits the states from depriving their citizens of life, liberty, or property “without Due Process of law.” The Court held that the right to counsel was not a fundamental right, and therefore did not have to be honored by the state courts. In Betts, the defendant had been charged with robbery. Because he could not afford to pay for a lawyer he asked the court to appoint a lawyer for him. The judge refused, because in that county lawyers were only appointed at state expense for defendants charged with murder or rape. The defendant pled not guilty and chose to be tried by a judge alone, without a jury. He called some witnesses in his own defense to assert an alibi, and he cross-examined the state’s witnesses. The judge found him guilty and sentenced him to eight years in prison.

The defendant brought a federal habeas corpus petition, which is the way a defendant convicted in state court can have the federal courts review that conviction under the federal Constitution. In his petition, the defendant argued that he had been deprived of federal due process of law by the court’s refusal to appoint a lawyer for him, but the petition was denied. On appeal to the Supreme Court, the Court upheld the decisions of the lower courts. The Court traced the history of the right to counsel in the constitutions of the original thirteen colonies and found great diversity in the treatment of the right to counsel. It found that the right had not been treated as a fundamental one that would have to be observed by the state courts but rather was provided to allow a defendant to appear by counsel instead of by himself. That is, the Court believed that the Sixth Amendment did not require a state ever to appoint an attorney at state expense. The Court also examined colonial statutes and found great diversity in treatment of the right. Finally, it examined the constitutions currently in force in the states and found that the issue was largely dealt with by statute and not as a constitutional issue. Thus, based on history and prevalence, the Court held that the refusal to appoint counsel for an indigent charged with a felony did not violate the “fundamental fairness” required by the due process clause.

Moreover, the Court held, under the facts of the case, the court’s refusal to give the defendant a lawyer did not deprive him of due process since he did a good enough job on his own. Betts waived a trial by jury, put forth an alibi defense, and cross-examined the state’s witnesses. The Court held that under the facts and circumstances of the case, the absence of a lawyer was not “so offensive to the common and fundamental ideas of fairness.”

Justice Black, joined by Justices Douglas and Murphy, dissented. The dissenters would have held that the right to counsel is fundamental, that is, that the practice of trying a defendant charged with a serious crime without counsel “cannot be reconciled with common and fundamental ideas of fairness and right.” The dissenters pointed to the fact that at that point in time thirty-five states had some “clear legal requirement or an established practice” that indigent defendants in serious noncapital cases be provided with lawyers when requested.

LISSA GRIFFIN

BIBLE IN AMERICAN LAW

To speak with precision of the Bible’s influence on American civil liberties is impossible because of its pervasive general presence in American culture during important formative periods of its history and jurisprudence. For centuries in Western civilization and in colonial America, the Bible was considered an integral part of the law, and therefore its foundational influence was systemic, organic, and often overt.

As law and society in the American Republic increasingly drew away from its biblical roots in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, the authority behind biblical rules and the values expressed in biblical precepts came to figure less in technical legal expressions concerning civil liberties and judicial procedures. Many biblical concepts, concerning law, ethics, human nature, civil liberties, judicial procedures, government, and society, however, continued to provide significant ingredients in the American images of justice, mercy, rights, and duties. Although clearly present, its influence on statutes, judicial opinions, or the common law in general is not always possible to document explicitly.

Sometimes the Bible can be and has been cited both for and against the same legal proposition, and postmodern culture is often in tension with biblical rubrics. While biblical provisions do not, and in many cases should not, control American law, neither can nor should they be eliminated from the realities of American law, either as a part of the common law in general or with respect to civil liberties in specific. American perceptions of civil liberties and human rights are rooted not only in the Enlightenment, but also in Greek and Roman antiquity and in the Bible.

Colonial Laws and Liberties

The Bible had extensive and direct influence on law in America during the colonial period, especially in the North. Without any doubt, the ideal notion of civic order in Puritan New England thoroughly embraced divine words and intentions as revealed in the law of Moses. The Laws and Liberties of Massachusetts, an early Puritan document warned, "The more any law smells of man, the more unprofitable."

Calvinism held that the judicial language in the law of Moses was binding on all people and should be incorporated into the laws of the land. Accordingly, the list of fifteen crimes punishable by death within the jurisdiction of Massachusetts (printed in 1641) was collected and crafted from the texts of the Bible and cited chapter and verse following each law. These provisions against idolatry, witchcraft, blasphemy, manslaughter, sexual offenses, kidnapping, perjury in capital cases, and subversion, offered no protections for religious liberty, freedom of speech, or rights of the accused.

Laws enacted in Massachusetts (1647), Rhode Island (1647), New Haven (1656), Pennsylvania (1681), and elsewhere selectively built upon, modified, or adapted several biblical provisions, while also adopting various regulations not prescribed by the Bible. For example, in these laws, a twofold punitive damage penalty was exacted in the case of theft of an animal (compare Exod. 22:4); when the thief could not make restitution, whipping of no more than forty lashes resulted (as in Deut. 25:3). Two or three witnesses were required in capital cases (Deut. 19:15). Debt servitude in America was limited to seven years (compare Deut. 15:1). Examples of non-biblical "common liberties" afforded in Massachusetts (1641) included the rights of speaking in public meetings, fishing and fowling, water passage, and removing oneself and family from the jurisdiction.

Biblically motivated legal precepts and patterns had lasting influences on American jurisprudence in several ways. Religious and political institutions were seen as hand-in-hand partners, serving separate roles but working together to improve society. Lawmakers and judges cited explicit authority in support of their rulings. Biblical law was remarkable in that it expressly limited the powers of the king (see Deut. 17:14–20), a view of limited government that deeply influenced the development of constitutional law in America. As in biblical law, American law restricted the reach of governmental decisions, privileged the decisions of conscience, and guarded the basic values of individual choice. Codification, publication, and public education became parts of the fabric of committing the populace to the rule of law (compare Deut. 31:11), with Judges 21:25 being quoted in 1969 in Barnett v. State for the civic rule that "no individual may do simply what he will." Laws came to be seen as principles, subject to wise adaptation, paraphrase, and restatement, while the legal system still maintained the confidence that an undergirding of law itself existed and unified the nation. In addition, the biblical concept of covenant influenced the early American concepts of compact and the commonwealth, uniting God, the people, and a ruler, and this union formed the original theoretical basis of American constitutionalism.

Freedom and the American Republic

In the eighteenth century, American law began to regard and protect civil liberties and individual rights more widely. New England ministers frequently quoted Micah 4:4, "every man under his vine," in support of the right to own private property. While the Massachusetts law in 1647 had banned Jesuits from its territory and laws against Sabbath violations and heresies were common, freedom of religion soon gathered strength. The first chapter of the laws enacted in Pennsylvania in 1705, for example, was headed, "The Law concerning Liberty of Conscience." It provided that no persons, so long as they professed faith in the Trinity and acknowledged the divine inspiration of the Bible, "shall in any case be molested or prejudiced for his or her conscientious persuasion, nor shall he or she be at any time compelled to frequent or maintain any religious worship, place or ministry whatsoever, contrary to his or her mind, but shall freely and fully enjoy his or her Christian liberty in all respects, without molestation or interruption.”

Americans often spoke of themselves in biblical images, as a New Israel having been delivered from the bondage of European kingship much as Israel had been delivered by Moses from slavery under the pharaohs of Egypt. Thomas Jefferson proposed a seal for the United States showing the Israelites being led by a pillar of fire, with the words “Liberty under God’s law—Man’s Inalienable Birthright of Freedom.” An oft-cited passage used polemically in behalf of freedom was “call no man your father” (Matt. 23:9). Commissioned in 1751, the Liberty Bell bore the inscription, “And proclaim liberty throughout the land unto all the inhabitants thereof,” a text from Leviticus 25:10. Flames of resistance against the Stamp Act were fanned by Galatians 5:12–13, “ye have been called unto liberty.” In this spirit, Andrew Jackson called the Bible “the rock on which our Republic rests.”

During the early nineteenth century, no law book was more influential in American law than was William Blackstone’s often-reprinted Commentaries. Although offering primarily a re-statement of English common law, Blackstone drew on biblical fundamentals. For example, his justifications of the three absolute rights of personal security, liberty, and private property were based on Genesis accounts regarding Abraham, Abimelech, Isaac, and Lot.

During this era, rights were not equated with permissiveness. To the founding generation, as James Hutson has explained in Forgotten Features of the Founding, a right was understood in its fullest sense as a “power inherent in and owned by an individual to act in a way consistent with Christian morality.” Thus, John Adams rejected Rousseau’s line that Americans had given birth to the “science of rights,” explaining that they had simply found their rights “in their religion.”

Many biblical precepts were influential in shaping the American Republic, inspiring much of its political theory and social values. For example, several biblical passages were cited in support of the separation of church and state (“render to Caesar the things that are Caesar’s,” Mark 12:17). Originally, however, the separation between church and state was not as rigidly understood as it has recently become. Recent documentary research has led some to conclude that Jefferson’s “wall of separation” would better be described as a “swiss cheese.” At least, it should be perceived as a wall with doors and windows. This openness itself reflects various models of church–state independence and interdependence found in the Bible itself.

Because controversy existed over possible interpretations advanced by various Bible-believing churches and individuals, the Bible itself came to serve less and less in settling issues involving the public order, and legislation made little, if any, direct reference to the Bible. Formal disestablishment removed the religiously motivated Blue Laws, but court opinions continued to draw on the Bible as a source of authority. This had its upside as well as a downside, particular in the case of the debates over slavery, in which both sides invoked biblical authority in support of their views.

Twentieth Century

Well into the twentieth century, the Bible was used as a common source of legal language. In the 1920s, it went almost without saying that allusions to the Bible by legal practitioners were more frequent than to any other book outside of professional law treatises and previous case decisions. In 1943, H.B. Clark reported that “many provisions of biblical law are still seen in American statutes and court decisions.”

After World War II, the concept of a legal right underwent extensive and sudden transformation. A right came to be seen as “a raw power to gratify a sweeping range of appetites in the name of vindicating individual equality and autonomy,” as Hutson has described. The Bible became an influential tool in the hands of some rights advocates. In the civil rights movement in the 1960s, for example, the speeches of Martin Luther King Jr. often invoked the Bible, and sit-ins cited Exodus 1:15–22 in praise of the Egyptian midwives who disobeyed Pharaoh to save Hebrew male children.

Plentiful references to the Bible appear in judicial opinions down to the 1990s. The extensive study by Michael Medina located 150 such references in cases before 1970, 81 in the 1970s, and 115 in the 1980s. A presidential proclamation in 1983 announcing the year of the Bible extolled its role in inspiring concepts of civil government contained in the Declaration of Independence and U.S. Constitution. While it has been claimed that the Bible is the most influential book in American culture, Shakespeare is a close contender, judging by the times quoted in judicial opinions.

The Bible has been used for all kinds of judicial purposes. It has shaped substantive decisions. In Lopez v. United States, Chief Justice Warren took a broad meaning of the term “search” based on biblical meanings of this word. The Bible also influences interpretation, being quoted, for example, regarding the spirit and the letter of the law (2 Cor. 3:6). This rubric has had a vibrant life in the judicial rhetoric of American judges. The Bible also provides a wealth of proverbial wisdom and common sense. In cases involving conflicts of interest, judges have spoken against serving “two masters” (Matt. 6:24); see, for example, United States v. Mississippi Valley Generating Co. (1961) and Brickner v. Normandy Osteopathic Hospital (1988). American laws recognize the value of Good Samaritans.

Some parts of the Bible are quoted much more than others. Because the Bible deals with such a wide array of human concerns, it speaks to many legal issues. Even though it was not written to be read as a legal textbook or handbook, it has influenced legal opinions concerning many areas of civil liberty.

Judicial and Criminal Rights

All legal systems begin with certain rules, values, expectations, and entitlements regarding access to and treatment from the courts. By providing memorable narratives about several judicial trials, such as the proceedings involving Naboth (1 Kings 21), Boaz (Ruth 4), Jeremiah (Jeremiah 26), Susanna (Apocrypha, Daniel 13), Jesus (in the four Gospels), and Paul (Acts 21–27), the Bible shaped American social and legal expectations concerning due process, witnesses, and fairness.

The rules found in Exodus 23:1–3 and 6–9 have been styled by scholars as a decalogue for the administration of justice. These provisions require all participants in the legal process to be honest, to avoid collusion, to be impervious to social pressure, to be impartial towards the rich and the poor alike, to shun perjury, to execute none that are innocent, to take no bribes or gifts, and not to oppress a resident alien. Similar rules are found today in American codes of judicial and legal ethics. American courts, for example, Ex parte Kurth, have cited Deuteronomy 16:19 in support of judicial impartiality, not perverting justice nor showing favoritism.

The Bill of Rights guarantees many rights to parties accused of crimes. In some cases, these principles stem from the Bible.

The right against self-incrimination, now found in the Fifth Amendment, grew out of Roman, Canon, and Jewish law, but William Tyndale can be credited for launching its adoption into English law. His English translation of the Bible (1525) and exposition on “swear not” in Matthew 5–7 (1530) boldly asserted that scripture rejects the idea of compelling a person to bear witness against himself or herself. Following these precepts, the courageous judicial stand of John Lilbourne during the English Revolution in the early 1650s resulted in the elimination of self-incriminating oaths in the Star Chamber. The case of the adulteress in John 8 was also influential in showing that Jesus did not require her to testify for or against herself. From such developments, the right against self-incrimination found its way into the American Constitution.

In recent times, American decisions, such as Coy v. Iowa, have cited Paul’s assertion of rights under Roman law (Acts 25:16) in support of the civil right of due process, to confront one’s accusers and to answer charges with a personal defense. As legal precedent for the right to impeach accusing witnesses by separate cross-examination, Daniel’s detection of false witnesses (Apocrypha, Daniel 13) has been judicially cited, as in Virgin Islands v. Edinborough (1980).

The presumption of innocence until proven guilty does not prevail in all legal systems. C.S. Lewis has argued that this is a distinctively Christian attitude attributable to the concept of grace found in the New Testament. The necessity of affording a full and fair defense is found in Jonah 1:5–10 and Job 31:35 (“Oh that one would hear me!”), and the rule against double jeopardy has been supported by Nahum 1:9 (“affliction shall not rise up the second time”). In California v. Hodari D. and other cases, Proverbs 28:1 has been used in establishing evidentiary inferences from fleeing a crime scene; People v. Simmons draws on the silence of Jesus before his accusers.

The right against cruel and unusual punishment is consonant with biblical scruples against vengeance (Rom. 12:19, cited in People v. Flynn). At the same time, the Bible is cited as authority for the legitimacy of the death penalty, especially in cases of premeditated, hateful homicide (Gen. 9:6, Exod. 21:12, Num. 35:16), although these usages are not without their conceptual difficulties and complexities, as Samuel Levine and also John Blume and Sheri Lynn Johnson have argued.

Civil Liberties

The Bible speaks powerfully of freedom, and thus it has served as a potent springboard for civil libertarianism. At the same time, this appropriation has its limitations, for freedom in the Hebrew Bible mainly means freedom from bondage, not freedom to act independently; in the New Testament freedom equates with Christ, the way that makes one free. Edward Gaffney’s exposition of The Interaction of Biblical Religion and American Constitutional Law rightly states: “Although concerned intensely with persons, the Bible does not view them as isolated atoms, but as interrelated, socially connected parts of a whole, or as members of a community.” Accordingly, freedoms in the Bible are never ends in themselves.

Freedom of speech in the Bible is not absolute, as the trial of the blasphemer in Leviticus 24 makes painfully clear. However, when Peter and John refused to be silenced by the Jerusalem Sanhedrin’s charge of blasphemy ordering them to desist from speaking of or teaching in the name of Jesus (Acts 4:17), their stand became a model of free speech, echoing the bold outspokenness of the Hebrew prophets in general.

Freedom of religion is constrained in the Bible by prohibitions against idol worship. Nevertheless, the Bible grants every person freedom to choose which god to serve (Josh. 24:15). The biblical loyalty that man owes to God is absolute; political loyalties are therefore secondary and separate. This rule is seen in the courageous exercise of religious freedom by Esther and Daniel, whose examples also served as critiques of the dominance of foreign rulers.

Jesus’ dictum about Caesar came to be used as an axiom of separation, but many Christian nations, especially in the Middle Ages, did not read Jesus’ dictum that way. To the contrary, they saw in Isaiah 49:23 a mandate for kings and queens to be “nursing fathers and nursing mothers” to the church. Although wrongly interpreted by European monarchs from the time of John Calvin until the French Revolution, this scripture was a powerful justification for state churches and official persecution of those of other faiths.

Freedom of association is tacitly recognized in the popular assemblies that were mandated under biblical law. The New Testament presupposes the right of “two or three” to meet together for religious purposes (Matt. 18:20). Freedom of travel arises in conjunction with the Christian imperative to “go forth to every part of the world” (Mark 16:15), as exemplified by the missionary travels of Paul. Regarding the bearing of arms, Jesus warned that those who live by the sword will die by the sword, but his own disciples were armed with weapons when he was arrested on the Mount of Olives.

No issue of civil rights has been more important in American history than the question of slavery. That issue divided the nation; it also divided churches, such as the Baptists and Presbyterians. The slavery issue split the Baptists into two Conventions. Both sides grounded their views on sola scriptura. Although slavery in biblical times had nothing to do with race in a modern sense, biblical provisions supported various forms of slavery or servitude (Exod. 21:1–6, Lev. 25:39–55, Deut. 15:1–6, Eph. 6:5–9), economic institutions common throughout antiquity. The case of Pirate v. Dalby cited Leviticus and Deuteronomy to justify slavery during Pennsylvania’s period of gradual abolition. The Virginia case of Commonwealth v. Turner in 1827 looked to passages in Exodus 21 for guidance concerning the beating of a slave by his owner. By the 1830s, the fallacious so-called curse of Noah (Gen. 9:20–27) was used as a stock weapon by those advocating slavery; at the same time, the abolitionists drew support from biblical injunctions regarding love, justice, freedom, and release from bondage.

With various results in cases involving resident aliens, courts have referred to such passages as Leviticus 24:22, “you shall apply the same law to the alien as you do for one of your own country.” See Memorial Hospital (1974); Rollins (1979); and Bhandari (1987).

Women and children found themselves in subordinate roles in the ancient world, and thus the Bible may be cited, on the one hand, in opposition to women’s equal rights. On the other hand, courts have noted that the Bible also presents strong instances of women exercising rights in buying property (Prov. 31:16), in serving prominently in the military (Deborah, used in Hill v. Berkman), and in other contexts.

Family and Private Law

Biblical law extensively regulated family rights and duties in ways that supported the prevailing norms of society in biblical times. Marriage, chastity, and children were the principal areas of concern.

Marriage was complex, involving negotiation of prenuptial agreements, dowry rights, formal engagement, solemnization, and celebrations. Marriages outside the clan were at times prohibited, but marriages and sexual relations with too close of kin were also outlawed (Lev. 18:6–8). Analogously, some American courts have upheld bans on first-cousin marriages. Polygamy was allowed in Israel (Deut. 21:15), but a New Testament bishop was to have one wife (1 Tim. 3:2). Language regarding rights within marriage in American law has stemmed from the Bible concerning the husband’s role as head of the family (Eph. 5:23), the right to recover consortium damages (Matt. 19:5), and spousal immunity (Gen. 2:24). The unity of person behind the concept of survivorship stems from Gen. 2:14 (see Freeman v. Belfer). Various statements in the Bible on divorce (Deut. 24:1, Matt. 5:32, 19:6, Luke 16:18) have been cited with legal influence in the past, such as Wolfe v. Wolfe (1976).

Biblical laws punishing adultery (Exod. 20:14, Deut. 22:22), incest, sodomy (Rom. 1:26–27, 1 Cor. 6:9), bestiality (Lev. 18:23), and prostitution (Deut. 23:17) have influenced American law over the years, as Patrick O’Neil demonstrates. Words such as “abominable” and “detestable crimes against nature,” however, have been held to be unconstitutionally vague, as stated in Stone v. Wainright (1973).

The Bible grants parents rights and responsibilities over their children. American law has been heavily influenced in regard to parental education of their children (Deut. 6:7), discipline (Prov. 23:13), and child labor (a father’s rights over fruits of his son’s labor have been upheld, citing Gen. 12:37). At the same time, biblical law made it a capital offense for a son to strike or curse a parent (Exod. 21:15, 17), but parents lacked the power to impose such a punishment (Deut. 21:19).

The Bible protects private property from theft, but in biblical times no property concept of fee simple absolute existed, for the land belonged to God with human owners as life tenants. This concept retains vitality in the environmental duties of human stewardship over the Earth. Hebrew law prohibits usury charged to another Hebrew (Exod. 22:25), but the New Testament seems to encourage making as much money as possible, as in the parables of the talents and of the wise steward. Klein v. Commonwealth cited the Matthew 20:1–16 on the fairness of agreed wages.

Concepts of redemption of property in foreclosure (Lev. 25:25) and forfeiture stem from the Bible. In United States v. Bajakajian, the Supreme Court traced the “guilty property” theory behind in rem forfeiture to Exodus 21:28, “which describes property being sacrificed to God as a means of atoning for an offense.” The seven-year rule for repeat bankruptcies derives from the biblical law of sabbatical release.

Reading the Bible for legal substance, however, is difficult. The Bible is not about law; it is about God. The Bible is not by people from the modern world; it must be read in historical contexts. Translating ordinary biblical passages into modern languages is hard enough; translating technical legal terms is almost impossible. Often, biblical rubrics can be cited on either side of a modern legal issue. Nevertheless, the Bible speaks profoundly on topics related to law, liberty, human nature, social predicaments, and civic obligations. It offers paradigms and precepts that have deeply influenced the development of civil rights and duties in the American experience.

JOHN W. WELCH

References and Further Reading

- Blume, John H., and Sheri Lynn Johnson. “Don’t Take His Eye, Don’t Take His Tooth, and Don’t Cast the First Stone: Limiting Religious Arguments in Capital Cases.” William & Mary Bill of Rights Journal 9 (December 2000): 61.
- Botein, Stephen. Early American Law and Society. New York: Knopf, 1982.
- Clark, H.B. Biblical Law. Portland, OR: Binfords and Mort, 1943.
- Falk, Ze’ev W. Hebrew Law in Biblical Times. 2nd ed. Provo, Utah: Brigham Young University Press, 2001.
- Gaffney, Edward McGlynn, Jr. “The Interaction of Biblical Religion and American Constitutional Law.” In The Bible in American Law, Politics, and Political Rhetoric, edited by James Turner Johnson, 81–105. Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985.
- Harrelson, Walter. The Ten Commandments and Human Rights. Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980.
- Hutson, James. Forgotten Features of the Founding: The Recovery of Religious Themes in the Early American Republic. Lanham, MD: Lexington Books, 2003.
- Katsh, Abraham I. The Biblical Heritage of American Democracy. New York: Ktav Publishing House, 1977.
- Levine, Samuel J., Capital Punishment in Jewish Law and Its Application to the American Legal System: A Conceptual Overview, St. Mary’s Law Journal 29 (1998): 1037.
- Medina, J. Michael, The Bible Annotated: Use of the Bible in Reported American Decisions, Northern Illinois University Law Review 12 (1991): 1:87–254.
- Meislin, Bernard, The Role of the Ten Commandments in American Judicial Decisions, Jewish Law Association Studies 3 (1988): 187–209.
- O’Neil, Patrick M. “Bible in American Constitutionalism,” and “Bible in American Law.” In Religion and American Law: An Encyclopedia, edited by Paul Finkelman, 29–34. New York: Garland, 2000.
- Otto, Eckart. “Human Rights: The Influence of the Hebrew Bible.” Journal of Northwest Semitic Languages 25, no. 1 (1999): 1–20.
- Rogerson, John W., Margaret Davies, and M. Daniel Carroll R., eds. The Bible in Ethics. Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995.
- Welch, John W., Biblical Law in America, Brigham Young University Law Review 2002, no. 3 (2002): 611–42.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Barnett v. State*, 8 Md. App. 35; 257 A. 2d 466 (1969)
- Bhandari v. First Nat’l Bank of Commerce*, 829 F.2d 1343 (5th Cir. 1987)
- Brickner v. Normandy Osetopathic Hospital, Inc.*, 746 S.W.2d 108 (Mo. App. 1988)
- California v. Hodari D.*, 499 U.S. 621 (1991)
- Commonwealth v. Turner* (Va. 1827)
- Coy v. Iowa*, 478 U.S. 1012 (1988)
- Ex parte Kurth*, 28 F.Supp. 258, 264 (S.D. Cal. 1939)
- Freeman v. Belfer*, 173 N.C. 581; 92 S.E. 486 (1917)
- Hill v. Berkman*, 635 F.Supp. 1228, 1238–39 (E.D.N.Y. 1986)
- Klein v. Commonwealth, State Employee’s Retirement System*, 521 Pa. 330; 555 A.2d 1216 (1989)
- Lopez v. United States*, 373 U.S. 427, 459 (1963)

Memorial Hospital v. Maricopa County, 415 U.S. 250, 261 (1974)
People v. Flynn, 223 N.Y.S.2d 441, 445 (1962)
People v. Simmons, 28 Cal. 2d 699; 172 P.2d 18 (1946)
Pirate v. Dalby (Pa. 1786)
Rollins v. Proctor & Schwartz, 478 F.Supp. 1137 (D.S.C. 1979)
Stone v. Wainwright, 478 F.2d 390 (5th Cir. 1973)
United States v. Bajakajian, 524 U.S. 321 (1998)
United States v. Mississippi Valley Generating Co., 364 U.S. 520, 549 (1961)
Virgin Islands v. Edinborough, 625 F.2d 472, 473 n. 3 (3rd Cir. 1980)
Wolfe v. Wolfe, 46 Ohio St. 2d 399, 350 N.E.2d 413 (1976)

BIBLE READING IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS, HISTORY OF BEFORE AND AFTER ABINGTON SCHOOL DISTRICT v. SCHEMPP

In the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries in America, there was homogeneity among Americans in that the majority were Protestant Christians, albeit of varied denominations. Due to the variety of denominations that existed, and due to the history of religious oppression that led many to come to America, it was generally accepted that the State could not establish one denomination as a state church. Rather, all denominations should be allowed to worship as they chose. However, due to the religious homogeneity among the majority of Americans, there existed a widely held belief that America was a Christian nation and the precepts of Protestant Christianity, as taught by the Bible, were the basis of good citizenship and good government. Thus, there should be a separation of church and state, but a separation of religion (read Protestant Christianity) and state was neither necessary nor desirable.

Given the above belief and the belief that society had an obligation to inculcate its young with proper moral precepts and to teach them to be good citizens, it made sense that they be exposed to Christian precepts in school. As a result, prior to Abington School District v. Schempp, it was generally believed that the Bible could and should be read in public schools, as long as the passages were read without any comment or discussion. Thus, in the period before Schempp, there was a widespread practice of Bible reading in the public schools. Specifically, in most instances several passages of the Bible were read by the teachers to their students or, in modern times, over the public address system by a teacher or student. In fact, in 1950 the reading of the Bible was required by thirteen states and permitted in twenty-five other states. Further, in a survey conducted in 1968, 48 percent of the respondent teachers teaching before 1962 reported that Bible selections were read in their classrooms on a daily to less than weekly basis.

The Bible that was often used for Bible reading was the King James version of the Bible, a version used by many Protestants of varying denominations, but not by Catholics, Jews, or others of different religious faiths. The reason that the Bible passages were to be read without comment was to avoid the teaching of any particular religion. It was believed that the reading of the Bible imparted general moral precepts rather than the precepts of any particular religion.

In the last three quarters of the nineteenth century and the first half of the twentieth, there raged an episodic conflict between Catholics and Protestants in many areas, including the teaching of Protestant precepts in public schools. Nevertheless, the courts, with few exceptions, upheld the reading of the Bible in the schools if the Bible was read without comment or note and if pupils who desired to avoid the reading could do so. Most held that the reading was constitutional because it was not a teaching of sectarian tenets and doctrines. Although the court holdings appear to be somewhat contradictory, they can be understood if one remembers the mindset prevailing at the time. As one commentator explains, "The Protestant position that emerged by the mid-nineteenth century was that Protestants could participate in politics and teach their religion in the schools, but that Catholics could not The key step in the Protestant argument was this: Protestants tended to assume that, whereas Catholics acted as part of a church, Protestants acted in diverse sects as individuals Thus, Catholic instruction or political action violated separation [of church and state], because it was the work of an authoritarian church, but Protestant instruction and political action did not violate separation, because it was the work of free individuals."

A few courts disagreed with this generally held view and found Bible reading in public schools to violate either the federal or a state constitution. For example, the Wisconsin Supreme Court found that the reading of the Bible, without comment, at certain times in public schools, violated the Wisconsin Constitution because such was sectarian instruction. It was sectarian instruction because each sect, with few exceptions, bases its peculiar doctrines upon some portion of the Bible, the reading of which tends to inculcate those doctrines (State ex rel. Weiss v. District Board of School Dist. No. 8 of City of Edgerton, 44 N.W. 967 [Wis. 1890]).

In the mid-twentieth century, the acceptance of the intertwining of religion and the state began to come undone. In 1947, the Supreme Court handed down the significant establishment clause decision of Eversen v. Board of Education. In that case, the Supreme Court purported to endorse a strict doctrine of separation of church and state when it stated that “[n] either a state nor the Federal Government can set up a church. Neither can pass laws which aid one religion, aid all religions, or prefer one religion over another Neither a state nor the Federal government can, openly or secretly, participate in the affairs of any religious organizations or groups and vice versa. In the words of Jefferson, the clause against establishment of religion by law was intended to erect ‘a wall of separation between church and State.’” Ironically, although all of the justices concurred in the above statement, five members of the Court went on to hold that New Jersey’s program of providing transportation services for non-public school children did not violate the establishment clause.

In 1963, in the Abington School District v. Schempp case, the Supreme Court was faced with the question of whether Bible reading in the public schools, as it was currently practiced, violated the establishment clause. The Court found that it did. The Schempp case involved two separate cases. The first case came from Pennsylvania where a 1959 statute required the reading of ten Bible verses, without comment, at the opening of each public school, on each school day. At the written request of a parent or guardian, however, a child could be excused from such reading. The Schempps were members of the Unitarian Church in Germantown, Pennsylvania, and two of their children attended Abington High School where such Bible reading took place. Although the school only provided copies of the King James Bible, the student doing the reading could choose any passages he liked. Thus, readings had been done from the King James, the Douay (Catholic version), and the Revised Standard versions of the Bible as well as the Jewish Holy Scriptures. In spite of the inclusiveness of the Bible readings, the Schempps brought suit to enjoin enforcement of the statute because specific religious doctrines, gleaned by a literal reading of the Bible, were contrary to their religious beliefs. Further, although the children could be excused from the reading, their father did not do this because he believed that doing so would adversely affect the relationship between the children and their classmates and teachers.

The second case in Schempp came to the Supreme Court from Maryland where the City of Baltimore had adopted a rule providing for the reading, without comment, of a chapter in the Holy Bible and/or a recitation of the Lord’s Prayer in the Baltimore schools. The Bible used was the King James version. The Murrys, a mother and son, were atheists who sought to have the rule rescinded because it was a threat to their religious beliefs in that it placed a premium on belief as opposed to nonbelief. Further, they felt that the Baltimore rule as practiced indicated a belief that God was the source of all moral and spiritual values, and thus such values were religious values. Such a belief rendered Petitioners’ beliefs suspect and promoted doubt as to Petitioners’ morality and good citizenship.

The Supreme Court struck down both the Pennsylvania statute and the Baltimore rule as violating the establishment clause. In doing so it recognized that religion was closely identified with American history and government; however, it contended that religious freedom was likewise embedded in American life. It went on to reaffirm its holding in Everson v. Board of Education, that the object of the First Amendment’s establishment clause was “to create a complete and permanent separation of the spheres of religious activity and civil authority by comprehensively forbidding every form of public aid or support for religion” (Everson, 330 U.S., at 31–32). However, the establishment clause, together with the free exercise clause, mandated that a state be neutral in its relations with religious believers and nonbelievers. Thus, a state can neither favor nor disfavor religions. In the instant case, the Court found that the Bible readings were a religious ceremony. Thus, the exercises and the law requiring them violated the establishment clause. The readings were a religious ceremony because, even if the purpose of the exercise was to promote moral values, the tool used was the Bible and the Bible is an instrument of religion.

After Schempp was handed down, the schools in large part abided by the Court’s decision. In a survey conducted in 1968 it was found that, with the exception of the South, the practice of Bible reading and prayer in public elementary schools had largely disappeared by the academic year 1964–65. Thus, a fairly entrenched practice gave way with surprising swiftness.

Like the schools, the lower courts followed the dictates of the Supreme Court and invalidated any reading of the Bible to the student body at the behest of the school or school district. Many schools, students, and parents, however, wanted the children to have some religious instruction and/or exposure to the Bible. The question then became how could children learn about the Bible without running afoul of the establishment clause. In some jurisdictions the schools allowed Bible study classes to be conducted on school grounds as part of the school curriculum. Such classes were found to be unconstitutional if they taught the Bible as religious truth. However, a Bible study class was permissible under the establishment clause if the course was secular in nature, intent, and purpose, and the effect of the course was neither to advance nor inhibit religion. Generally, a Bible study course was found to be secular if the Bible was studied from a literary and historical viewpoint, with no claims made as to its truth or falsity.

In addition to Bible study classes, some students formed voluntary Bible study clubs. In the wake of Schempp, the lower courts often held that such clubs could not meet on school grounds because the establishment clause required religious speech to be barred from governmental forums. However, in recent times there has been a shift away from strict separation of religion and government and a move toward accommodation of private religious activities and expression.

With regard to voluntary Bible clubs, this shift culminated in the federal Equal Access Act (EAA) enacted by Congress in 1984. Under the EAA a public secondary school that receives federal financial assistance may not deny equal access to its facilities to any students who wish to conduct a meeting within its forum on the basis of religious, political, philosophical, or other content of the speech at such meetings. This equal access requirement applies only if the school allows one or more non-curriculum-related student groups to meet on school premises during noninstructional time. Thus, the school could bar all student groups from meeting; however, if it provides an opportunity for one, it must provide an opportunity for all.

In 1990, the Supreme Court upheld the EAA in the case of Board of Education v. Mergens. Then, in 2001, in the case of Good News Club v. Milford Central School, the Court provided for equal access in elementary schools by finding that the school's authorization for a Christian children's club to meet after hours on elementary school premises did not violate the establishment clause. Thus, Bible reading can take place in public schools in the context of student-sponsored Bible clubs. However, school-sponsored clubs are prohibited.

In the future, it is likely that the Court will continue to accommodate student-initiated religious activities and speech to the extent that there is no hint of school sponsorship of such activities or speech.

JANET W. STEVERSON

References and Further Reading

- Collier, James M., and John J. George. "Education and the Supreme Court." The Journal of Higher Education 21, no. 2 (1950): 77–83.
- Donovan, Matthew D., Notes: Religion, Neutrality, and the Public School Curriculum: Equal Treatment or Separation. Catholic Lawyer 43 (Spring 2004): 187–223.
- Laycock, Douglas, The Many Meanings of Separation. University of Chicago Law Review 70 (Fall 2003): 1667–701.

McCarthy, Martha, Religion and Education: Whither the Establishment Clause. Indiana Law Journal 75 (2000): 123–66.

Valk, Rebecca A. "Note: Good News Club v. Milford Central School—A Critical Analysis of the Establishment Clause as Applied to Public Education." St. John's Journal of Legal Commentary 17 (Winter/Spring 2003): 347–98.

Way, H. Frank. "Survey Research on Judicial Decisions: The Prayer and Bible Reading Cases." Western Political Quarterly 21, no. 2 (1968): 189–205.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Abington School District v. Schempp*, 374 U.S. 203 (1963)
- Board of Education v. Mergens*, 496 U.S. 226 (1990)
- Equal Access Act, 20 U.S.C.A. §4071 (a)
- Everson v. Board of Education*, 330 U.S. 1 (1947)
- Good News Club v. Milford Central School*, 533 U.S. 98 (2001)
- State ex rel. Weiss v. District Board of School Dist. No. 8 of City of Edgerton*, 44 N.W. 967 (Wis. 1890)

BIDDLE, FRANCIS BEVERLEY (1886–1968)

Francis Biddle, the scion of a family that emigrated to America in the early seventeenth century, attended private schools, including Harvard College, from which he graduated cum laude, and the Harvard Law School, where he received an LL.B. in 1911. He then served one year as a secretary to Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr. Holmes, a fellow patrician, influenced Biddle greatly, and he claimed in his memoirs that Holmes had not only reinforced his latent sense of noblesse oblige but also turned him into a liberal. He would later write both a biography of the justice as well as a book on his legal philosophy.

In 1912, he joined the family law firm in Philadelphia, but a few years later he struck out on his own and established a new firm. A successful Philadelphia lawyer, Biddle's clients included both the Pennsylvania Railroad and labor unions, and in 1927 he published a novel, Llanfear Pattern, which was highly critical of Philadelphia's inbred elite society.

Nominally a Republican, he became increasingly disillusioned with the party in the 1920s. He recalled that he had seen "the dark and dismal conditions under which the miners lived, and the brutality that was dealt them if they tried to improve things." Opposed to Herbert Hoover's handling of labor issues, Biddle campaigned against him and worked for the election of Franklin Roosevelt in 1932. Roosevelt awarded him with several appointments in New Deal programs, and Biddle chaired the special commission that cleared the Tennessee Valley Authority of charges of corruption. In 1939, Roosevelt nominated him to the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit. Within a short time Biddle grew bored with the job, and in 1940 resigned from the bench to become solicitor general. He won all fifteen cases he argued in the Supreme Court defending New Deal measures.

In 1941, Roosevelt named Robert H. Jackson to the Supreme Court and appointed Biddle to take his place as attorney general. He served in that office for four years, during which he oversaw the administration's handling of civil liberties issues during World War II.

For the most part, Biddle received good marks from civil libertarians. The Roosevelt administration, unlike that of Wilson in World War I, did not launch a wholesale attack on aliens or radicals, and did not try to either suppress radical speech or criticism of the Roosevelt administration. Moreover, Biddle took advantage of a ruling in which the Supreme Court held that federal antisubversion laws preempted state measures, and thus prevented the "little Red scares" of the 1920s.

The great failing in Biddle's administration, one that he later acknowledged, was his reluctant implementation and defense of the internment of Japanese Americans. Not until after Biddle's death in 1968 did evidence come out that middle-ranking officials in both the War Department and the Solicitor General's Office knew that the Japanese Americans posed no threat to American security, and that no proof of any sort had ever been found that they were involved in either espionage or sabotage. They deliberately withheld this information not only from the Supreme Court but from Biddle as well. A dedicated civil libertarian, it is highly unlikely that Biddle would have given his assent to the program had he been in possession of the facts.

Biddle also prosecuted several cases under the Alien Registration Act, but he refused to use it for witch-hunting of radicals, as its sponsors had hoped. While tens of thousands of German and Italian aliens were registered shortly after the United States entered the war, the Justice Department made sure that the process was carried out in such a way as to maintain the dignity of the aliens.

One should note that Biddle also knew, thanks to the work that the Federal Bureau of Investigation had done in the 1930s, just which aliens did support fascist ideology, but thanks to the FBI, practically none of them proved able to do damage to the American war effort.

With the death of Franklin Roosevelt in April 1945, Biddle's days in the Justice Department were limited, and at Harry Truman's request he resigned in June. Truman, however, then named Biddle as one of the American judges on the international tribunal that tried former Nazi leaders for "crimes against humanity." Although there has been some criticism of the Nuremberg trials as ex post facto proceedings, at the time most people believed that it was right to try to impose a rule of law on wartime atrocities. Certainly the trials provided not only a means to expose the full extent of Nazi actions, but were far better than the older method of taking the losers out into the prison yard and shooting them. At the close of the trials, Biddle recommended to Truman that provocation of aggressive wars should, in the future, be declared a crime under international law.

Truman then tried to name Biddle as the U.S. representative to United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), but the Republican-controlled Senate blocked the appointment because Biddle was considered too liberal. Rather than go through a bruising confirmation fight, which he would surely have lost, Biddle asked Truman to remove his name.

Although he never again held appointed office, Biddle remained active in politics, and chaired the liberal interest group, Americans for Democratic Action, from 1950 through 1953. During those years he was an active foe of Senator Joseph McCarthy of Wisconsin, and repeatedly denounced McCarthy and the House Committee on Un-American Activities for their witch-hunting tactics, smear campaigns, and efforts to censor school textbooks. His most cogent case against McCarthyism is in his 1951 book, The Fear of Freedom.

MELVIN I. UROFSKY

References and Further Reading

- Biddle, Francis. In Brief Authority. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1962.
Murphy, Paul L. The Constitution in Crisis Times, 1918–1969. New York: Harper & Row, 1972.

BILL OF ATTAINDER

A bill of attainder imposes punishment on specific individuals or members of a group through an act taken by the legislature rather than a judicial trial. The U.S. Constitution prohibits bills of attainder enacted by both Congress (Art. I § 9, clause 3) and by the states (Art. I § 10). These legislative statements of guilt were used by the British parliament to punish subversive acts such as treason by sentencing alleged traitors to death. The founders believed that these acts were abused in England, as later described by Thomas Jefferson as "instruments of vengeance by a successful over a defeated party." In framing the Constitution, the founders put their faith instead in the trial by jury in order to protect the rights of the accused against the power of the state. Bills of attainder relate closely to the heralded principle of separation of powers in the Constitution, where it is the power of the legislative branch to enact laws of general applicability, while the judiciary is to independently decide how that law should be applied in a given set of factual circumstances. During the American Revolution, the legislatures of numerous states enacted bills of attainder or bills of pains and penalties (effectively the same, but with a lower level of punishment) against persons disloyal to the Revolution. Bills of attainder were therefore prohibited in order to ensure fairness in the process of adjudicating disputes via the judicial branch, essentially safeguarding against their tyrannical use in the future as had occurred in England. The founders believed that trial by jury, not legislature, would better protect civil liberties from the whims, whether well founded or not, of the democratically elected majority.

JAMES F. VAN ORDEN

BILLS OF RIGHTS IN EARLY STATE CONSTITUTIONS

State constitution making began during the Revolution. By 1787, when delegates from twelve of the original thirteen states (Rhode Island never sent any delegates) met in Philadelphia to write the national constitution, eleven of the first thirteen states had written constitutions. What would become the fourteenth state, Vermont, had also produced a written constitution. Only Rhode Island and Connecticut failed to adopt a new constitution during or immediately after the Revolution. A number of states wrote more than one constitution in this period, refining and revising their constitutional structure. All of the constitutions dealt with the important aspects of government, such as the powers of the legislative and executive branches, the allocation of representatives, and who could vote.

Liberty, of course, had been at the center of the American Revolution. For example, the New York legislature asserted in its “Address of the Convention of the Representatives of the State of New York to Their Constituents,” in 1776, that “[w]e do not fight for a few acres of land,” but rather, New Yorkers and all Americans fought “for freedom—for the freedom and happiness of millions yet unborn.” Similarly, Jefferson would assert in the Declaration of Independence that Americans were fighting to secure the “unalienable Rights” of “Life, Liberty, and the Pursuit of Happiness.” Surprisingly, however, only five of the original states to write constitutions—Virginia, Pennsylvania, Maryland, North Carolina, and Massachusetts—actually included a bill of rights or declaration of rights in their fundamental law. On September 11, 1776, Delaware adopted a “Declaration of Rights,” but this was not formally part of the state’s constitution, which was adopted ten days later, on September 21. The last article of the Delaware constitution of 1776 made a reference to “the declaration of rights and fundamental rules for this State, agreed to by this convention,” but the constitution did not actually contain the declaration, and it was only sometimes printed and distributed with the constitution. What would become the fourteenth state, Vermont, also had a bill of rights in its first constitution. Some of the other states did, however, offer some formal assertion of fundamental liberties. Connecticut, for example, which did not adopt a constitution (but instead simply amended its colonial charter to remove references to England and the king), passed a declaration of rights in 1784, just after the Revolution. A number of states wrote more than one constitution in this period, in the process reconsidering and refining the notion of fundamental rights.

New Hampshire, for example, did not have a declaration of rights in its constitution of 1776, but did have one in its second constitution, adopted in 1784. Georgia, on the other hand, adopted three constitutions (1777, 1789, and 1798) in this period, none of which had a bill of rights, although the constitutions did protect some civil liberties.

Most of the new state constitutions written during or after the Revolution reflected historic claims of the “rights” of Englishmen. The new states added to these rights new protections of liberty based on the events leading up the Revolution and the circumstances of the new American nation.

Religion in the State Bills of Rights

Almost every American state constitution had some provisions that dealt with religion. These provisions, either in the main body of the document or in a separate declaration of rights, are perhaps the most important differences between the rights of Englishmen and Americans. Most states provided for some form of “free exercise.” New Jersey’s clause in its 1776 Constitution was typical in its detail and thrust:

That no person shall ever, within this Colony, be deprived of the inestimable privilege of worshipping Almighty God in a manner agreeable to the dictates of his own conscience; nor, under any pretence whatever, be compelled to attend any place of worship, contrary to his own faith and judgment; nor shall any person, within this Colony, ever be obliged to pay tithes, taxes or any other rates, for the purpose of building or repairing any other church or churches, place or places of worship, or for the maintenance of any minister or ministry, contrary to what he believes to be right, or has deliberately or voluntarily engaged himself to perform.

However, the new states, including New Jersey, were ambivalent about how much political freedom members of dissenting churches should have. The first American state constitutions rejected the strict establishment of England, but at the same time the constitutions did not create and protect the religious freedom the way the U.S. Constitution and Bill of Rights would.

In England at this time an established church had special privileges and the support of the national government. The king was also the head of the church, and bishops and archbishops—princes of the Church—sat in the House of Lords. There was also a religious test for officeholding, which barred Jews, Deists, and Roman Catholics from holding office. At best England could be described as having a regime of grudging toleration for people who were not members of the Church of England. The U.S. Constitution of 1787 prohibited religious tests for officeholding, and by using the term “oath or affirmation,” rather “swear an oath,” opened officeholding to people of all faiths or no faith at all. The First Amendment, added to the Constitution in 1791, prohibited any establishment of religion at the national level and also guaranteed the free exercise of rights of all religions.

In this sense, the new state constitutions fell in between these two regimes, with some states being closer to the British model and some closer to what would become the American model under the Constitution and the Bill of Rights. Except for Virginia and New York, all of the first fourteen states had some form of religious test for officeholding, which was similar to what existed in England. These tests varied. Massachusetts specifically required that the governor “declare himself to be of the Christian religion,” and all persons holding offices in the legislative or executive branch were required to “declare that I believe the Christian religion, and have a firm persuasion of its truth.” Until 1792, Delaware required that all officeholders “profess faith in God the Father, and in Jesus Christ His only Son, and in the Holy Ghost,” and that they “acknowledge” the “divine inspiration” of the Old and New Testaments. New Hampshire’s constitution of 1784 required that all officeholders “shall be of the Protestant religion”—a provision that remained in place until 1877. New Jersey, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia also required officeholders to be Protestants. South Carolina, which had begun as a colony with religious freedom for all people, provided in its 1778 Constitution that “[t]he Christian Protestant religion shall be deemed, and is hereby constituted and declared to be, the established religion of this State.” Until 1826, Maryland required that all officeholders be Christians. In 1867, Maryland required that all officeholders have a “belief in the existence of God.” Until 1790, Pennsylvania required that officeholders believe in the divine inspiration of the Old and New Testament. In 1792, Delaware adopted such a provision. While requiring officeholders to be religious, some states did not want them to be too religious. Thus, Georgia, New York, North Carolina, and Tennessee all banned members of the clergy from holding public office.

Overall, the early state bills of rights show that at the time of the Revolution, the states had not fully clarified what they meant by religious freedom. For example, Section 2 of the Delaware Declaration of Rights of 1776 provided the following:

That all men have a natural and unalienable right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own consciences and understandings; and that no man ought or of right can be compelled to attend any religious worship or maintain any ministry contrary to or against his own free will and consent, and that no authority can or ought to be vested in, or assumed by any power whatever that shall in any case interfere with, or in any manner controul the right of conscience in the free exercise of religious worship.

This was surely a powerful statement supporting free exercise and to some extent hostile to establishment. However, Section 3 of the same document declared “[t]hat all persons professing the Christian religion ought forever to enjoy equal rights and privileges in this state, unless, under colour of religion, any man disturb the peace, the happiness or safety of society.” On top of this, as noted above, the constitution adopted a few weeks later required that all officeholders take an oath stating, “I . . . do profess faith in God the Father, and in Jesus Christ His only Son, and in the Holy Ghost, one God, blessed for evermore; and I do acknowledge the holy scriptures of the Old and New Testament to be given by divine inspiration.” Someone living in Delaware in 1777 might legitimately wonder if Unitarians or Jews were in fact full citizens of the state and entitled to freedom of worship.

Conflicting clauses like those in the Delaware Constitution (or the Protestant establishment) helped lead the framers of the U.S. Constitution to ban all religious tests for officeholding, and in the Bill of Rights to emphatically protect the “free exercise” of religion while guaranteeing that the United States could never establish any religion.

The “Palladium of Liberty”

Revolutionary-era Americans often referred to freedom of the press as the “palladium” of liberty. They understood a press that could criticize the government would be a “bulwark” (another one of their favorite terms) in preventing tyranny. Not surprisingly, most of the early state constitutions protected the press. Virginia’s constitution represented the sometimes overblown language of the period: “That the freedom of the press is one of the great bulwarks of liberty, and can never be restrained but by despotic governments.” Pennsylvania’s language in its 1776 Constitution was more modern and more restrained: “That the people have a right to freedom of speech, and of writing, and publishing their sentiments; therefore the freedom of the press ought not to be restrained.” Maryland’s Constitution of 1776 was more direct: “[T]he liberty of the press ought to be inviolably preserved.” Delaware’s 1776 Declaration of Rights used the exact same language as Maryland. Significantly, none of these documents contained the kind of absolute prohibition on regulating a free press found in the U.S. Bill of Rights that Congress “shall make no law” Equally important, neither of these bills of rights phrased the language of a “free press” in terms that we would understand as banning a suppression of the press. The Virginia Bill of Rights, for example, says that only “despotic governments” restrain the press. The implication of this is that Virginia would be acting despotically if it did so. But, presumably the state might choose to act despotically under some circumstances. Similarly the “ought” in the Pennsylvania and Maryland documents suggests that the state “could” restrain the press, but simply should not do so. In its second constitution, adopted in 1778, South Carolina moved closer to a more affirmative protection, declaring “[t]hat the liberty of the press be inviolably preserved.” Georgia’s 1777 Constitution provided the most emphatic protection of the press: “[f]reedom of the press and trial by jury to remain inviolate forever.” Oddly, Pennsylvania was the only state to protect freedom of speech at this time, although Maryland provided for freedom of speech for members of the state legislature, providing that “that freedom of speech and debates, or proceedings in the Legislature, ought not to be impeached in any other court or judicature.” Only Pennsylvania, North Carolina, Massachusetts, and New Hampshire protected the right of assembly. A few states—New York and New Jersey, for example—did not protect freedom of the press, speech, or assembly.

One important theme in these state constitutions is the connection between liberty and the press. Without the press, the early constitution makers believed that their governments would be at risk. In an age when governments worry about a free press challenging the policies of an administration, the language of the Massachusetts Bill of Rights is particularly relevant. Written in the middle of the Revolution, the Massachusetts Bill asserted that “[t]he liberty of the press is essential to the security of freedom in a State; it ought not, therefore, to be restrained in this commonwealth.” The founding generation, it seems, understood that a free press was vital to national security, because in the end, republican values and an informed citizenry was the key to a secure society.

Jury Trials and Due Process

Most of the new state constitutions had a clause protecting the rights of accused, providing for due process of law, and for preventing the adoption of arbitrary laws, such as writs of attainder or ex post facto laws. New York’s first constitution declared the following:

And this convention doth further ordain, determine, and declare, in the name and by the authority of the good people of this State, that trial by jury, in all cases in which it hath heretofore been used in the colony of New York, shall be established and remain inviolate forever. And that no acts of attainder shall be passed by the legislature of this State for crimes, other than those committed before the termination of the present war; and that such acts shall not work a corruption of blood. And further, that the legislature of this State shall, at no time hereafter, institute any new court or courts, but such as shall proceed according to the course of the common law.

New Jersey emphatically declared “that the inestimable right of trial by jury shall remain confirmed as a part of the law of this Colony, without repeal, forever.” The framers in New Jersey were not yet certain if their jurisdiction was a “colony” or a state, but they understood that they wanted to be certain they would always have a trial by jury. New Jersey did not have any other protections for criminal justice or due process. South Carolina’s 1776 Constitution provided for jury trials in civil suits, if either party asked for one, but not in criminal cases.

Delaware, on the other hand, provided elaborate protections for jury trials and accused criminals. Much of the language from that document would appear, almost word for word, in the Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, and Eighth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution. Delaware’s 1776 Declaration of Rights prohibited “retrospective law” (what the U.S. Constitution would call ex post facto laws); and required civil trials “speedily without delay, according to the law of the land,” with juries to determine the facts in all civil and criminal cases. The Delaware framers considered “that trial by jury of facts where they arise is one of the greatest securities of the lives, liberties and estates of the people.” In addition, Delaware’s Constitution required a “speedy trial by an impartial jury” in all criminal cases, with the accused having a right to confront his accusers, subpoena witnesses, and “not be compelled to give evidence against himself.” The document prohibited “excessive bail,” “excessive fines,” and “cruel or unusual punishments.” The section on searches and seizures was particularly detailed: “That all warrants without oath to search suspected places, or to seize any person or his property, are grievous and oppressive; and all general warrants to search suspected places, or to apprehend all persons suspected, without naming or describing the place or any person in special, are illegal and ought not to be granted.”

Virginia, Pennsylvania, and Maryland had similar protections of due process, often with the same language. Given the close proximity of these three states, it is not surprising that they borrowed and learned from each other in writing constitutions that protected civil liberties. Virginia’s jury provision mandated that juries have twelve members and that verdicts be unanimous. Massachusetts went further than most states in its emphatic language and in its guarantees, including the right to an attorney. Thus, in 1780 the Bay State’s constitution provided that:

No subject shall be held to answer for any crimes or no offence until the same if fully and plainly, substantially and formally, described to him; or be compelled to accuse, or furnish evidence against himself; and every subject shall have a right to produce all proofs that may be favorable to him; to meet the witnesses against him face to face, and to be fully heard in his defence by himself, or his counsel at his election. And no subject shall be arrested, imprisoned, despoiled, or deprived of his property, immunities, or privileges, put out of the protection of the law, exiled or deprived of his life, liberty, or estate, but by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land.

Fundamental Liberty

In general, the newly independent states had a sharper sense of the need to be protected from arbitrary government than they did for protecting the rights of freedom of speech, press, or religion. Yet, with one exception, nowhere in the world were civil liberties more protected than under the new constitutions of the American states. That one exception had to do with the most fundamental civil liberty of all: the right to personal autonomy as a free person.

On the eve of the Revolution, slavery was legal in all of the thirteen colonies. In explaining to the world why they were revolting, the Americans asserted “[t]hat all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.” Yet, the man who wrote these words, Thomas Jefferson, owned about 175 slaves at the time. Many of the other signers of the Declaration were slave owners as well. Not surprisingly, there was a great conflict in the new nation between the assertions of equality and the struggle for liberty and the fact that so many leaders of the Revolution were slave owners. Not a few Englishmen and many Americans read the Declaration and wondered, as did Samuel Johnson, “How is it that we hear the loudest yelps for liberty among the drivers of negroes?” This question bothered some early constitution makers. But only three of the new states confronted the issue of slavery in their first constitutions.

Virginians borrowed some of Jefferson’s language when writing their constitution. Thus, Section 1 of the Virginia Declaration of Rights began with the words, “That all men are by nature equally free and independent, and have certain inherent rights.” The section ended with more language that mirrored Jefferson’s Declaration, asserting that free people “cannot, by any compact, deprive or divest their posterity, namely, the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the means of acquiring and possessing property, and pursuing and obtaining happiness and safety.” Had Virginia only used this language, the state’s framers would have been attacking slavery directly. But, the Virginia framers were cautious and careful, and between these two clauses they inserted language designed to exclude slaves. Thus, the entire provision of Section 1 read:

That all men are by nature equally free and independent, and have certain inherent rights, of which, when they enter into a state of society, they cannot, by any compact, deprive or divest their posterity, namely, the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the means of acquiring and possessing property, and pursuing and obtaining happiness and safety.

The phrase “when they enter into a state of society” was understood to limit the language of the document to free people. Slaves had not entered into “a state of society” but rather were property owned by people in society.

Four years later, Massachusetts began its Declaration of Rights with similar language, which did not have a proviso excluding those not “in a state of society.” Article I of the Massachusetts Constitution of 1780 declared:

All men are born free and equal, and have certain natural, essential, and unalienable rights; among which may be reckoned the right of enjoying and defending their lives and liberties; that of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property; in fine, that of seeking and obtaining their safety and happiness.

In 1781, Massachusetts courts would use this provision to declare slaves to be free, and by 1783 slavery would cease to exist in the state. In 1783, New Hampshire adopted a constitution which declared that “all men are born equal and independent,” with natural rights, “among which are enjoying and defending life and liberty.” This clause would be interpreted within the state to end slavery.

The remaining states did not end slavery by constitutional provision, and of course, in the southern states slavery would exist until the Civil War; the Emancipation Proclamation, and the Thirteenth Amendment ended slavery. In the North, slavery would end through gradual emancipation over a number of years. Civil liberties for blacks in the North would be slow to arrive. They would not arrive for most southern blacks until after 1865.

Despite the failure to extend civil liberty—and fundamental freedom—to all Americans, the first state constitutions were generally sensitive to individual rights, although not to the extent that the U.S. Bill of Rights would be. These first state constitutions, however, set the stage for the more expansive protection of civil liberties that James Madison would propose to Congress in 1789 and the states would ratify in 1791.

PAUL FINKELMAN

References and Further Reading

- Adams, Willi Paul. The First American Constitutions: Republican Ideology and the Making of States Constitutions in the Revolutionary Era. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1980.
- Conley, Patrick T., and John P. Kaminski, eds. The Bill of Rights and the States: The Colonial and Revolutionary Origins of American Liberties. Madison, WI: Madison House, 1992.
- Rutland, Robert A. The Birth of the Bill of Rights, 1776–1791. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1955.
- Wood, Gordon. The Creation of the American Republic, 1776–1787. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1969.

BILL OF RIGHTS: ADOPTION OF

The Constitution of 1787 did not contain a bill of rights, although it did have some protections for some civil liberties. The original Constitution prohibited ex post facto laws and bills of attainder, preserved the right of a jury trial in criminal cases, and banned religious tests for officeholding. The document gave life tenure to judges, which insulated them from being removed for decisions that displeased the president or other officeholders. The document provided for free speech for members of Congress but otherwise did not protect rights of expression, such as freedom of speech, press, assembly, or petition.

The lack of a bill of rights was not an oversight. On August 20, 1787, Charles Pinckney of South Carolina “submitted sundry propositions” to the Convention that were sent to the Committee on Detail. While some of Pinckney’s propositions ultimately were included in the body of the Constitution, the committee ignored his proposals for a guarantee of freedom of the press and for a protection against quartering troops in private homes. On September 12, the Convention rejected Massachusetts delegate Elbridge Gerry’s proposal that the right to a jury in civil cases be guaranteed by the Constitution. Virginia’s George Mason then suggested that the entire Constitution be “prefaced with a Bill of Rights.” He thought that “with the aid of the State declarations, a bill might be prepared in a few hours.” Roger Sherman of Connecticut argued that this was unnecessary because the Constitution did not repeal the state bills of rights. Mason replied that federal laws would be “paramount to State Bills of Rights.” This argument, however correct, had little effect on the Convention, which defeated Mason’s motion with all states voting no.

The next day Gerry failed to get the Convention to guarantee juries for civil trials. Pinckney then joined Gerry in proposing that the Constitution have a provision that “the liberty of the Press should be inviolably observed.” Roger Sherman again argued against specific protections for liberty on the ground that under a government of limited powers they were unnecessary because “[t]he power of Congress does not extend to the Press.” By a vote of five states for and six against, the Convention then defeated the motion to protect “the liberty of the Press.”

On Saturday, September 15, 1787, the penultimate day of the Convention, George Mason expressed his reservations about the Constitution, noting, “There is no Declaration of Rights, and the laws of the general government being paramount to the laws and Constitution of the several States, the Declaration of Rights in the separate States are no security.”

Mason complained that under this Constitution, “the people” were not “secured even the enjoyment of the benefit of the common law.”

Mason feared that the Senate and the president would combine “to accomplish what usurpations they pleased upon the rights and liberties of the people,” while the federal judiciary would “absorb and destroy the judiciaries of the several States.” He thought the expansive powers of Congress threatened the “security” of “the people for their rights.” Without a bill of rights, all this was possible. He complained, “There is no declaration of any kind, for preserving the liberty of the press, or the trial by jury in civil causes; nor against the danger of standing armies in time of peace.” For these reasons, Mason refused to put his signature to the new Constitution.

Another Virginian, Edmund Randolph, also refused to sign. He proposed a second Convention to consider amendments, including a bill of rights. Elbridge Gerry listed a number of problems with the Constitution, including the dangers posed by the aristocratic nature of the Senate and the centralizing tendencies of the commerce power. But, he could “get over all these” defects “if the rights of the Citizens were not rendered insecure” by the virtually unlimited power of Congress under the necessary and proper clause and the lack of a guarantee of jury trials in civil cases.

Throughout the next nine months, as the states debated the new constitution, the opponents of ratification—known as the Anti-Federalists—railed against the lack of a bill of rights in the new constitution. Many Anti-Federalists, such as Patrick Henry and Richard Henry Lee, used the bill of rights as a stalking horse for their desire to detail the entire constitution. They wanted a second convention to rewrite the entire document. Other Anti-Federalists were more sincere in their opposition. James Madison called them “honest anti-federalists,” because they were not opposed to a new stronger government, but only feared that such a government would become tyrannical without a bill of rights.

Madison and other Federalists scoffed at such fears. They opposed the addition of a bill of rights, asserting that it was (1) unnecessary, (2) redundant, (3) useless, (4) actually dangerous to the liberties of the people, (5) that its presence would violate the principles of republican government embodied in the Constitution, or some combination of these.

They argued that the Constitution created a government of limited powers and thus Congress could not do anything that it was not specifically empowered to do. Personal liberty, they argued, would be protected by the states. Congress could not create a national religion or suppress freedom of the press, they argued, because it lacked the power to do so. Thus, in the Convention, Pennsylvania’s James Wilson asserted that one purpose of the states was “to preserve the rights of individuals.” Oliver Ellsworth of Connecticut explained that he looked to the state governments “for the preservation of his rights.” Roger Sherman argued that “the State Declarations of Rights are not repealed by this Constitution; and being in force are sufficient.” He believed that the national legislature might “be safely trusted” not to interfere with the liberties of the people.

Federalists also argued that the main body of the Constitution already had some protections of liberty, such as bans on ex post facto laws or religious tests for officeholding. Thus, combined with the notion of a limited government, a bill of rights was redundant. But, Madison also argued that a Bill of Rights was useless. In a letter to Thomas Jefferson (who was in France at the time), Madison explained that there was no bill of rights because “experience proves the inefficacy of a bill of rights on those occasions when its controul is most needed. Repeated violations of these parchment barriers have been committed by overbearing majorities in every state.” He noted that in Virginia he had “seen the bill of rights violated in every instance where it has been opposed to a popular current.” He warned that “restrictions however strongly marked on paper will never be regarded when opposed to the decided sense of the public; and after repeated violations in extraordinary cases, they will lose even their ordinary efficacy.” No bill of rights was better, in Madison’s mind, than one that might be ignored.

Federalists also feared that a bill of rights would be dangerous to the liberties of the people because any rights not protected would be given up. James Wilson asked who would “be bold enough to undertake to enumerate all the rights of the people?” He thought no one could, but warned that “if the enumeration is not complete, everything not expressly mentioned will be presumed to be purposely omitted.” Thus, he believed a bill of rights “not only unnecessary, but improper.” Alexander Hamilton made a similar point when arguing that a bill of rights was “not only unnecessary in the proposed Constitution, but would even be dangerous. They would contain various exceptions to powers not granted; and, on this very account, would afford a colorable pretext to claim more than were granted.”

Finally, some Federalists argued that under a republican government a bill of rights was unnecessary. Oliver Ellsworth, a future chief justice of the United States, argued that a bill of rights was something that the people wrested from the king; thus, in America a bill of rights was “insignificant since government is considered as originating from the people, and all the power government now has is a grant from the people." Similarly, James Wilson argued that "it would have been superfluous and absurd, to have stipulated with a federal body of our own creation, that we should enjoy those privileges, of which we are not divested." North Carolina's James Iredell maintained that in England a bill of rights was necessary because of the Crown's "usurpations" of the people's liberties. But, under the new Constitution, the people delegated power to the national government, and thus such usurpations by the national government were impossible.

The Federalists won the debate over the Constitution, and by July eleven states had ratified the document. However, five states recommended that the new government amend the new Constitution in various ways, including adding protections for civil liberties. During the ratification struggle in Virginia, James Madison argued that a bill of rights was unnecessary and sincerely believed that most of the leading Anti-Federalists were not truly interested in a bill of rights, but rather simply wanted to derail the Constitution. At the Virginia convention, he was willing to compromise by supporting the idea that the convention could recommend amendments, but only after the convention had ratified the Constitution. Madison still did not believe a bill of rights was needed, but he did believe that some amendment protecting civil liberties, if carefully framed, might not harm the Constitution. He also realized that some Virginians—especially the Baptists who were a significant force in his part of the state—supported the new form of government but nevertheless sincerely wanted a bill of rights as well.

After ratification, when campaigning for a seat in the First Congress, Madison once again considered the issue of a bill of rights. Madison discussed this in a letter to Rev. George Eve, an influential Baptist leader in his district. Madison freely admitted his disagreement with Eve in that he did not see in the Constitution "those serious dangers which have alarmed many respectable Citizens" including Eve. Thus, he told Eve that until the Constitution was ratified, he had been unwilling to support any calls for amendments, because he believed they were "calculated to throw the States into dangerous contentions, and to furnish the secret enemies of the Union with an opportunity of promoting its dissolution." However, with the Constitution ratified he was willing to support "amendments, if pursued with a proper moderation and in a proper mode" because under such circumstances they would "be not only safe, but may well serve the double purpose of satisfying the minds of well meaning opponents, and of providing additional guards in favour of liberty."

Madison told Eve that "[u]nder this change of circumstances, it is my sincere opinion that the Constitution ought to be revised, and that the first Congress meeting under it, ought to prepare and recommend to the States . . . provisions for all essential rights, particularly the rights of Conscience in the fullest latitude, the freedom of the press, trials by jury, security against general warrants, &c."

After his letter to Eve, Madison publicly declared that he would work for amendments if elected to Congress. This public support for amendments swayed the Baptists and helped secure Madison's election to Congress. Once in Congress, Madison urged the House to support a bill of rights. He still did not think one was necessary, but he told the House he was "bound in honor and in duty" to bring the amendments forward. His plan was to "advocate them until they shall be finally adopted or rejected by a constitutional majority of this House."

The Federalist leaders of the House did not want to be bothered with amendments, as they were busy creating a national government. But Madison argued that postponement would play into the hands of those extreme Anti-Federalists who had predicted that the new national government would create a tyranny. He argued that "if we continue to postpone from time to time, and refuse to let the subject come into view, it may well occasion suspicions, which, though not well founded, may tend to inflame or prejudice the public mind against our decisions." Madison feared that the "very respectable number of our constituents" who had asked for amendments might conclude that Congress was "not sincere in our desire to incorporate such amendments in the constitution as will secure those rights, which they consider as not sufficiently guarded." Although about to propose amendments, Madison was still not advocating them for their substance. Rather, he argued he had a moral obligation to present them and that it would be politically expedient for Congress to accept them. When Connecticut's Roger Sherman proposed delaying any discussion of amendments, Madison argued that it was important to consider amendments to prove to the Anti-Federalists that the supporters of the Constitution were also "sincerely devoted to liberty and a Republican Government" and not attempting to "lay the foundation of an aristocracy or despotism." He reminded the House of those who had "apprehensions" that the new government wished to "deprive them of the liberty for which they valiantly fought and honorably bled." He believed that many who had opposed the Constitution were now ready "to join their support to the cause of Federalism, if they were satisfied on this one point." Furthermore, he reminded the House that North Carolina and Rhode Island had not yet ratified the Constitution, but that amendments might lure them into the union.

In proposing the amendments, Madison showed little passion. He told the House that he had “never considered” a bill of rights “so essential to the federal constitution” that it would have been allowed to impede ratification. But, with the Constitution ratified, Madison was willing to concede “that in a certain form and to a certain extent, such a provision was neither improper nor altogether useless.” The amendments he proposed were unlikely to displease the hard-line Anti-Federalists, and in fact they did not. He proposed only amendments that were universally accepted, such as a protection of freedom of speech and freedom of worship. He noted that they were “limited to points which are important in the eyes of many and can be objectionable in those of none.” Proudly he noted that “the structure & stamina of the Govt. are as little touched as possible.”

Madison initially proposed that the amendments refer to specific provisions in the Constitution. So, for example, limitations on establishing religion or infringing on a free press would be inserted in Article I, Section 9 of the Constitution, which set out limits on congressional power. Fortunately, Roger Sherman prevailed upon Madison to reorganize his proposals as a series of numbered amendments that resembled the state bills of rights. This was a significant change, because it made the amendments into a coherent document as a “bill of rights.”

Congress debated Madison’s proposed amendments for much of the summer. Most of Madison’s speeches were along the lines of his opening remarks. He wanted the amendments to eliminate the discord between those who feared the Constitution and those who supported it. But on one issue Madison became somewhat passionate. His proposed amendments had not only limited the federal government. He also proposed limits on the state governments. Two brief speeches showed that Madison remained more committed to limiting the powers of the states than to limiting the power of the national government. Thus, he passionately supported a proposal that would have prohibited the states from infringing “the equal right of conscience . . . freedom of speech or the press, . . . [and] the right of trial by jury in criminal cases.” Madison thought this was “the most valuable amendment in the whole list.” Although the House approved this clause, the Senate did not, and thus these rights would not become applicable to the states until after the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment and its modern development, starting with Gitlow v. New York (1925). Similarly, Madison strongly opposed adding the word “expressly” to what became the Tenth Amendment. Madison thought that this would give the states too much power.

On September 24, 1789, the House and Senate agreed on twelve amendments to the Constitution. They were then sent to the states for ratification. The first two dealt with the size of the House and congressional salaries. Neither was ratified at the time. The amendment on salaries would have prevented Congress from raising its salary during any current term. Over the years, a number of states ratified this amendment, and in 1992, over two centuries after it was proposed, three-fourths of the states had ratified it and it was added to the Constitution as the Twenty-Seventh Amendment.

Nine states quickly ratified amendments three through twelve. Two states, Georgia and Connecticut, rejected the amendments, accepting the Federalist argument that they were unnecessary. Massachusetts apparently ratified the amendments, but never sent the ratification on to Congress. Before the amendments could be added to the Constitution, however, Vermont was admitted to the Union. Thus, with fourteen states, the amendments needed eleven ratifications. Vermont quickly ratified the amendments, but Virginia held out. The Anti-Federalists in the state, led by Patrick Henry, did not want the Bill of Rights ratified because they were holding out for a second convention, which would undo the Constitution and create a weaker national government. Henry understood that once a bill of rights was ratified, most opposition to the Constitution would disappear. On this point he was correct. On December 15, 1791, Virginia finally ratified the Bill of Rights. With this ratification, Anti-Federalism disappeared along with most opposition to the Constitution. Henry would in fact soon join the emerging Federalist Party and support the stronger national government. Madison would be remembered as the father of the Bill of Rights, albeit a clearly reluctant one. He never thought the nation needed a bill of rights, but in the end the document proved to be his greatest legacy and his most important contribution to American history.

PAUL FINKELMAN

References and Further Reading

- Amar, Akhil. The Bill of Rights: Creation and Reconstruction. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1998.
- Cogan, Neil H. The Complete Bill of Rights: The Drafts, Debates, Sources, and Origins. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.
- Finkelman, Paul, James Madison and the Bill of Rights: A Reluctant Paternity, Supreme Court Review 1990 (1991): 301–47.

Rutland, Robert A. The Birth of the Bill of Rights, 1776–1791. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1955.

Veit, Helen E., Kenneth R. Bowling, and Charlene Bangs Bickford. Creating the Bill of Rights: The Documentary Record of the First Federal Congress. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1991.

BILL OF RIGHTS: STRUCTURE

The structure of the American Bill of Rights reflects its eighteenth-century origins. The framers of the Constitution did not include a bill of rights because they honestly believed that one was unnecessary. They understood that they were creating a government of limited powers. As Gen. Charles Cotesworth Pinckney told the South Carolina legislature after the Convention, “[I]t is admitted, on all hands, that the general government has no powers but what are expressly granted by the Constitution, and that all rights not expressed were reserved by the several states.” Thus, framers like James Madison, James Wilson, and Roger Sherman argued that there was no need to prohibit the government from infringing on civil liberties because the government had no power to do so.

Tied to this structural argument was the belief that fundamental liberties, such as those in a bill of rights, had to be taken from a king or monarch. The founders took their lessons from English history. The barons at Runnymede surrounded King John I and forced him to sign the Magna Carta. In the seventeenth century, Parliament struggled with the king to gain the English Bill of Rights and other laws that protected basic liberties. The framers reasoned that Parliament or “the people” had to force the king to give them these liberties and rights. Along these lines, the framers argued that in a republic this was unnecessary because the people already had these rights and liberties. Because the government was representative, the people could never lose these rights because the government represented the people.

Anti-Federalists and even some supporters of the new Constitution did not accept these arguments. They argued that a democratically elected legislature could still take away rights from the people. They also feared that the new central government might fail to represent the interests of “the people” because the legislature was so distant from the people it represented and the terms were so long that members of the House and Senate would become estranged from their constituents. Combined with a president from far away who served for four years, the Anti-Federalists feared the new government would trample on the liberties of the people. Some Anti-Federalists feared that the president would become a king or a dictator. Thus, they demanded a bill of rights to protect their liberties.

The Bill of Rights reflected the concerns of both the Federalists and the Anti-Federalists. For the most part, the Bill of Rights did not grant liberties to the people but rather placed limitations on what the government could do. These amendments thus created “negative rights.” Another aspect of the bill of rights was its use of general language, rather than specific details.

The First Amendment illustrates this. The amendment does not give the people the right to worship as they wish, or to speak as they wish. Rather, the amendment says that “Congress shall make no law . . . prohibiting the free exercise” of religion or “abridging the freedom of speech, press, or the right of the people to peaceably assemble and to petition the government for a redress of grievances.” The amendment assumes that the people have these rights. There is no need for a toleration act in America, as there was in England. The king could in theory grant toleration to the people to worship as they wished, because the king, as the sovereign, had the right to set the religious standard for the nation. But under the American republic the people retained this right. Thus, the people did not need the permission of the government to speak or pray as they wish because the people were the sovereign, and so they had this right. Thus, under the Bill of Rights, the government was prohibited from taking these rights away from the people. Similarly, with this language the people could make no claim on Congress to facilitate these rights. Thus, for example, while Congress cannot pass laws “abridging the freedom [of] . . . the press,” Congress has no obligation to provide every citizen with his or her printing press.

The only clause in the First Amendment that does not presume that the people have rights is the establishment clause. Congress could conceivably have passed a law establishing a national religion. Madison and other framers denied that Congress had the power to do this—it was not an enumerated power. But, Madison also did not have any problem adding this extra level of protection against congressional action.

Most of the rest of the Bill of Rights was also phrased in negative terms, rather than the granting of positive rights. Thus, the Second Amendment presumed that the people of the states would be able to have organized militias, as the states already had. Thus, the amendment simply said that Congress could not disband the state militias. But the Federalists who controlled Congress were not willing to go beyond the simple statement that “a well regulated militia” was “necessary to the security of a free State.” Madison and his colleagues ignored Anti-Federalists from Pennsylvania who demanded elaborate amendments setting out positive rights in great detail. This group of Pennsylvanians, who had been in the distinct minority at the state’s ratifying convention, wanted amendments declaring “that the people have a right to bear arms for the defense of themselves and their own state, or the United States, or for the purpose of killing game” and that “the inhabitants of the several states shall have liberty to fowl and hunt in seasonable times, on the lands they hold, and on all other lands in the United States not enclosed, and in like manner to fish in all navigable waters, and others not private property, without being restrained therein by any laws to be passed by the legislature of the United States.” Such provisions were too specific, and did not fit with the general pattern of using the Bill of Rights to place limits on Congress.

The “negative rights” or limitations on Congress in some ways provide for more universal protection of civil liberties than positive rights language might have accomplished. The Third Amendment assumed that soldiers could never be quartered in private homes except under narrowly defined circumstances created by positive law. Similarly, the Fourth Amendment “assumes” that there is a right to be secure against unreasonable searches, and so the amendment denies the government the right to conduct a search except under certain circumstances. In the same way, the Fifth Amendment declares that no one can be tried without a grand jury indictment. This limitation goes to the government action, and requires no act of enforcement by the person under investigation. Similarly, the right against self-incrimination is presumed and cannot be taken away, rather than given in the Fifth Amendment. The same is true with the Eighth Amendment’s ban on cruel and unusual punishment. People are not protected from torture; rather the government simply may not use torture. A curious exception to idea of general rights is the Seventh Amendment, which provides for jury trials in civil cases where the amount at issue exceeds twenty dollars. In the modern world, this limitation is absurdly outdated.

The Sixth and Seventh Amendments contain a series of positive rights, perhaps because these rights—to a jury trial or to legal counsel—were not seen as fundamentally inherent to a nature of free political society. The rights to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury with subpoena power, confrontation of witnesses, and an attorney are new positive rights that were not secure in English law and not fundamental to a republican society. The right to counsel was truly an innovation—something never before secured by law.

The Ninth Amendment was the most creative of all the amendments, and goes directly to the heart of the way that the framers saw positive and negative rights. Many Federalists opposed a bill of rights because they thought that it was impossible to write one. They doubted the ability of anyone to list all the rights of the people and any rights left out would be lost. This argument assumed that a complete enumeration of all rights would be impossible. Thus, in defending the Constitution in the Pennsylvania ratifying convention, James Wilson asked who would “be bold enough to undertake to enumerate all the rights of the people?” He thought no one could, but warned that “if the enumeration is not complete, everything not expressly mentioned will be presumed to be purposely omitted.” He later argued that members of the Convention considered a bill of rights “not only unnecessary, but improper.” Alexander Hamilton made a similar point, arguing that a bill of rights was “not only unnecessary in the proposed Constitution, but would even be dangerous. [It] would contain various exceptions to powers not granted; and, on this very account, would afford a colorable pretext to claim more than were granted.” Madison agreed with this analysis. He told Jefferson that if a bill of rights were added to the Constitution, it had to “be so framed as not to imply powers not meant to be included in the enumeration.”

During the debates over the Constitution, Oliver Ellsworth, who would later become chief justice of the United States, made a similar point. He noted with frustration the persistent Anti-Federalist complaint that “[t]here is no declaration of any kind to preserve the liberty of the press, etc.” He answered, “Nor is liberty of conscience, or of matrimony, or of burial of the dead; it is enough that Congress have no power to prohibit either, and can have no temptation. This objection is answered in that the states have all the power originally, and Congress have only what the states grant them.” In part, Ellsworth reaffirmed the impossibility of listing all the rights of the people in a bill of rights. Madison responded to this problem with the Ninth Amendment, which provides that “[t]he enumeration in [the] Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.” Since the amendments listed few positive rights, Madison wanted to be sure that no one believed the government could take basic rights from the people. Thus, the Ninth Amendment preserved those rights that were either too obvious to name—such as the right “of matrimony, or of burial of the dead,” and also those rights that the framers might not even have thought of. In the modern era, this amendment has helped create a right of privacy that protects reproductive rights and other kinds of personal privacy.

The Bill of Rights is a creation of the eighteenth century, written by politicians who were both pragmatists and skeptical of the power of government. Thus, it lacks large promises—such as the right to a job, housing, food, medical care, or education—which are found in some modern bills of rights. The Bill of Rights in fact makes few promises—such as that persons arrested will have fair trials, due process, and the right to an attorney. Rather, for the most part, the Bill of Rights simply limits government power so that individuals can exercise rights they presumably have always had—such as the right to speak, write, or worship as they wish, to be secure from intrusion in their homes, and to be free from being forced to incriminate themselves or face torture from their own government. While the government sometimes tried to trample their rights, most Americans, most of the time, have been able to exercise their rights without intrusion from the government. Moreover, because the rights come from what the government cannot do, for the most part Americans have been able to exercise them without having to depend on Congress or the president to vindicate their rights. Similarly, by placing a limitation on what the government can do, the Bill of Rights provided a legal claim to be taken into the courts to resist government misbehavior. Ironically, in this way the Bill of Rights has functioned to force citizens to challenge their own government, but in doing so they did not approach rights as supplicants. They did not have to ask the president or Congress for their rights, as English citizens had to ask the king for rights. Rather, they could go to the courts and demand that the national government not take away from them what they already possess, and use the explicit limitations in the Bill of Rights or the more general all-purpose limitation in the Ninth Amendment to vindicate their rights.

PAUL FINKELMAN

References and Further Reading

- Amar, Akhil. The Bill of Rights: Creation and Reconstruction. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1998.
- Finkelman, Paul, James Madison and the Bill of Rights: A Reluctant Paternity, Supreme Court Review 1990 (1991): 301–47.
- , The Ten Amendments as a Declaration of Rights, Southern Illinois University Law Review 16 (1992): 351–96.
- Rutland, Robert A. The Birth of the Bill of Rights, 1776–1791. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1955.
- Veit, Helen E., Kenneth R. Bowling, and Charlene Bangs Bickford. Creating the Bill of Rights: The Documentary Record of the First Federal Congress. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1991.

BINGHAM, JOHN ARMOR (1815–1900)

John Armor Bingham, an Ohio lawyer, was a prominent figure in American politics and government in the latter half of the nineteenth century. He participated in many of the key events surrounding and shortly after the Civil War. Most significantly, Bingham played a pivotal role in drafting the Fourteenth Amendment. Dissenting in Adamson v. California (1947), Justice Hugo Black referred to Bingham as “the Madison of the first section of the Fourteenth Amendment.” Bingham’s views on the Fourteenth Amendment, particularly as those views pertain to whether it “incorporates” the first eight amendments of the U.S. Constitution against the states, continue to be debated.

John Bingham was born on January 21, 1815, in Mercer County, Pennsylvania. His parents were Hugh Bingham and Ester Bailey Bingham. Not much is known about his mother, who died when John was twelve. After his mother died in 1827, John relocated to Cadiz, Ohio, where he lived with his uncle, Thomas Bingham, off and on for four years. At fourteen, Bingham attended Mercer Academy, then Franklin College in New Athens, Ohio, for two years. While at Franklin College, Bingham became friends with Titus Basfield. Basfield was a former slave who became the first black person to earn a degree from an Ohio college. He and Bingham corresponded for over a quarter-century following their acquaintance at Franklin. After college, Bingham read law in Pennsylvania, the typical preparation for aspiring attorneys at the time. He studied with John J. Pearson and William Stewart, two prominent Mercer, Pennsylvania, lawyers. Bingham was admitted to practice on March 25, 1840. He returned to Cadiz that same year and four years later married his cousin Amanda Bingham (his uncle Thomas’s daughter), with whom he had three children.

Abolitionist views run like a crimson thread throughout John Bingham’s early life. Perhaps the most compelling indication of the influences shaping his assessment of slavery is a passing reference to his mother that he made in 1862. Calling “chattel slavery . . . an ‘infernal atrocity,’” Bingham added, “I thank God that I learned to lisp it at my mother’s knee.” Both Hugh and Thomas Bingham were active in abolitionist political circles. Pennsylvania Governor Joseph R. Ritner, patron of John Bingham’s politically active father, was an outspoken abolitionist who was described as a person “[who] appoint[ed] to high and responsible stations . . . individuals notorious for their zeal in the cause of abolition.” Bingham’s uncle (eventually his father-in-law), Thomas, was an associate judge of the Harrison County Court of Common Pleas. Bingham's father and his uncle were antislavery Whigs. In time, both became "free soilers" opposing the extension of slavery to territories of the United States. Among John Bingham's childhood friends was Matthew Simpson. Simpson became a very influential bishop in the Methodist Episcopal Church in America. An advisor to President Abraham Lincoln and a close friend to Lincoln and General Ulysses S. Grant, Bishop Simpson was among those who urged Lincoln to issue the Emancipation Proclamation while the President was reluctant to do so. Simpson delivered the oration at two of President Lincoln's funerals, at the White House, and in Springfield, Illinois. Franklin College, John Bingham's alma mater, was characterized as "the fountain-head of the abolition sentiment of eastern Ohio."

Bingham's career trajectory was shaped by the antislavery convictions he developed growing up in eastern Ohio and western Pennsylvania as well as by the divisions that exploded in the Civil War. The year 1856 was a tumultuous one in American history. Foreshadowing the Civil War, the border conflict known as "Bleeding Kansas" raged with cruel atrocities on both sides. Murderous hatred stalked the halls of the Capitol, where South Carolina Congressman Preston Brooks almost beat Massachusetts Senator Charles Sumner to death with a cane after Sumner delivered a speech excoriating supporters of the pro-slavery faction in Kansas. Amid this disorder, together with his professional mentors, John J. Pearson and William Stewart, John Bingham joined the new Republican Party. Founded in 1854 in Ripon, Wisconsin, the Republican Party unsuccessfully ran John C. Fremont for president in 1856 on the slogan, "Free soil, free labor, free men." Two years previously, Republican Bingham was first elected to the U.S. House of Representatives as a member of the Thirty-fourth Congress. He served four terms until March 1863. Bingham's views during this period are illustrated by his observation on the July 21, 1861, Union defeat at the First Battle of Bull Run (Manassas): "[W]e need these reverses to bring our people up to the peril of not abolishing slavery."

Defeated in his bid for a fifth term in 1864, Bingham was appointed a major in the Union Army by President Lincoln, serving as judge advocate. Lincoln's assassination on April 15, 1865, thrust Bingham into the national spotlight. With Joseph Holt, Army judge advocate general, and Henry L. Burnett, another assistant judge advocate, Bingham argued the government's case against the eight conspirators before a nine-man military commission. Bingham culminated his extensive summation by saying, "What these conspirators did in the execution of this conspiracy by the hand of one of their co-conspirators [John Wilkes Booth] they did themselves; his act, done in the prosecution of the common design, was the act of all the parties to the treasonable combination, because done in execution and furtherance of their guilty and treasonable agreement."

Bingham was again elected to Congress in 1865. Two events dominated his second term of service: the impeachment of President Andrew Johnson and drafting of the Fourteenth Amendment. The role that Bingham played in both was defined by his participation in a group of American political figures known as Radical Republicans. These prominent members of Congress and of President Lincoln's Cabinet clashed often with Lincoln's successor, Andrew Johnson. Their fundamental difference with President Johnson revolved around the pace and direction of post-Civil War Reconstruction. For the Radical Republicans, "reconstructing" the defeated southern states required basically altering the social and political landscape of the former Confederacy in ways designed to protect the rights of former slaves—alterations they saw as the precondition for readmitting these states in rebellion to the Union. Johnson took a much more conciliatory and accommodating view. Amid a series of vitriolic clashes over three pieces of Reconstruction legislation, during which Johnson also vetoed the Civil Rights Act of 1866, he fired Radical Republican Edwin M. Stanton as secretary of war, in violation of the 1867 Tenure of Office Act. In response, the House of Representatives impeached Johnson. Bingham chaired the House Committee that argued, unsuccessfully, the articles of impeachment before the Senate.

While Radical Republicans and President Johnson locked horns over congressional Reconstruction, a Joint Committee on Reconstruction was at work on a constitutional amendment. Bingham opposed the 1866 Civil Rights Bill because he wanted the federal Bill of Rights "enforced everywhere," and he believed that this goal could be accomplished only by a constitutional amendment. As a Joint Committee member, he drafted (some say collaborating with Pennsylvania Representative Thaddeus Stevens) the first of the amendment's five sections. Section 1 reads: "All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

Writing in McCreary County, Kentucky v. American Civil Liberties Union of Kentucky (2005), Justice David Souter characterized the Fourteenth Amendment as “the most significant structural [constitutional] provision adopted since the original Framing.” Yale Law School professor Akhil Reed Amar offers this assessment of Bingham’s contribution: “It was Bingham’s generation that in effect added a closing parenthesis after the first eight . . . amendments, distinguishing these amendments from all others. As a result, Americans today can lay claim to a federal Bill of Rights set apart from everything else, and symbolically first even if textually middling.”

Apropos of Professor Amar’s appraisal, a central controversy in the Supreme Court’s interpretation of the Fourteenth Amendment involves whether its language applies all, some, or none of the first eight amendments (Bill of Rights) to the states. Under the doctrine of “selective incorporation,” it is settled law that most of the specific guarantees do apply to the states. Other scholars and judges, notably adherents to the notion of a “Constitution in Exile,” reject incorporation. While Bingham’s speeches during congressional debate of the Fourteenth Amendment have been used by both sides in this debate, the weight of scholarly opinion supports the view that Bingham embraced incorporation.

Bingham left Congress in 1873. That year President Ulysses S. Grant appointed him envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Japan, a post he occupied for twelve years. His appointment came at a crucial time in Japanese history, just after the Meiji restoration (1866–1869). Bingham died on March 19, 1900. He is buried in Cadiz, Ohio.

JAMES C. FOSTER

References and Further Reading

- Amar, Akhil Reed. “Hero Worship and the Bill of Rights.” The American Lawyer. December 1998, p. 66.
- Aynes, Richard L., The Continuing Importance of Congressman John A. Bingham and the Fourteenth Amendment, Akron Law Review 36 (2003): 4:589.
- , On Misreading John Bingham and the Fourteenth Amendment, Yale Law Journal 103 (October 1993): 57.
- Beauregard, Erving E. Bingham of the Hills: Politician and Diplomat Extraordinary. New York: Peter Lang, 1989.

BIRTH CONTROL

Birth control is the generic term to describe methods used to limit the number of children. These methods fall into two main categories: those that try to prevent conception, and those that terminate an embryo or fetus.

Humans seem to have utilized various forms of birth control since ancient times in almost all cultures. Common forms of birth control were non-vaginal intercourse, coitus interruptus (withdrawal of the penis from the vagina before the point of ejaculation), vaginal barriers or pessaries to prevent sperm from reaching the ova, and abortifacients (potions taken to induce a miscarriage in a pregnant woman).

The Catholic Church has been particularly vocal in its opposition to birth control, and cites the story of Onan and the command to be fruitful as basis for this opposition. Sexual intercourse is for procreation, and attempts to interfere in this process are viewed as contrary to God’s will. Despite such opposition, evidence shows that the various forms of birth control have been widely practiced throughout the Western world.

Traditional local practice of birth control continued in the early United States, and abortion was widely practiced and accepted. Even Catholics accepted abortion before “the quickening,” the point at which life was thought to begin (approximately forty days after conception). In the 1830s, an increased religiosity began to stigmatize abortion at any stage. This coincided with attempts by doctors to professionalize medicine by preventing unlicensed persons from performing medical procedures, most often abortions. This combination led the states to prohibit all abortion unless medically necessary to save the life of the mother. In 1873, Anthony Comstock persuaded Congress to pass laws defining all information about contraception as obscene and punishing anyone who disseminated such information.

Towards the end of the nineteenth century, concerns for the health risks associated with pregnancy led women’s rights groups to become more vocal in their demands for access to birth control. This led to a backlash with some, including President Theodore Roosevelt, calling the practice of birth control “race suicide.” The fear was that white Anglo-Saxon Protestant Americans would be outnumbered by immigrants because of their lower birth rates through practicing birth control. This tension found some resolution as many advocates of birth control also supported forcible eugenic sterilization of those deemed unfit to pass on their genes to the next generation.

One of the twentieth century’s most active campaigners for birth control was Margaret Sanger, the founder of the group Planned Parenthood. She led calls for new legislation at the state and local level and also pushed for change through the courts. In U.S. v. One Package of Japanese Pessaries (1936), it was ruled that information about contraception was not obscene per se and that doctors could discuss contraception with their patients without fear of prosecution. In Griswold v. Connecticut (1965), the U.S. Supreme Court found that the penumbras of the Fourteenth Amendment contained a right to privacy that protected married couples' use of contraceptive devices and struck down Connecticut's law prohibiting their usage. Sanger was involved in both cases. The Court later extended Griswold to cover unmarried couples in the case of Eisenstadt v. Baird (1972).

The 1960s also saw the development of the first contraceptive pill and later long-term implanted contraceptives. The contraceptive pill is credited as a leading factor in the sexual liberation experienced in the 1960s and was criticized for encouraging greater promiscuity and sexual immorality.

The awareness of the threat posed by human immunodeficiency virus/acquired immunity deficiency syndrome (HIV/AIDS) refocused the debates over birth control onto the prevention of sexually transmitted diseases. The 1980s and 1990s witnessed bitter divisions over what should be included in sex education in schools. Conservatives advocated the teaching of "abstinence only" as the only guaranteed protection against both pregnancy and infection. They resisted calls to include other methods of birth control in the curriculum for fears that greater awareness and understanding would lead to higher rates of teen sexual behavior. Others argued pragmatically that teens were likely to engage in this behavior anyway, and that other methods should be included to ensure that any sex was as safe as possible in terms of both avoiding pregnancy and preventing sexually transmitted diseases.

These debates took on an international dimension in 2001 when President George W. Bush began refusing funds for any United Nations sex education program that did not focus solely on abstinence, leading some to complain that the United States was putting its moral convictions ahead of concerns to deal with the HIV/AIDS crisis in Africa and Asia.

GAVIN J. REDDICK

References and Further Reading

- Garrow, David J. Liberty and Sexuality: The Right to Privacy and the Making of Roe v. Wade. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1998.
- Gordon, Linda. Woman's Body, Woman's Right: Birth Control in America. New York: Penguin Books, 1974.
- . The Moral Property of Women: A History of Birth Control Politics in America. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2002.
- Kennedy, David M. Birth Control in America: The Career of Margaret Sanger. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1970.
- Noonan, John T. Contraception: A History of Its Treatment by the Catholic Theologians and Canonists. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1986.
- Planned Parenthood. Home Page, <http://www.plannedparenthood.org>.

Reed, James. From Private Vice to Public Virtue. New York: Basic Books, 1978.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Eisenstadt v. Baird*, 405 U.S. 438 (1972)
- Griswold v. Connecticut*, 381 U.S. 479 (1965)
- U.S. v. One Package of Japanese Pessaries*, 86 F.2d 737 (1936)
- See also* Abortion Laws and the Establishment Clause; Abortion Protest Cases; Anti-Abortion Protest and Freedom of Speech; Bellotti v. Baird, 443 U.S. 622 (1979); Buck v. Bell, 274 U.S. 200 (1927); Search (General Definition); Family Values Movement; Obscenity; Reproductive Freedom; Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)

BIVENS v. SIX UNKNOWN NAMED AGENTS OF FEDERAL BUREAU OF NARCOTICS, 403 U.S. 388 (1971)

Bivens held, for the first time, that a federal court may hold individual government agents liable for money damages for violating a person's Fourth Amendment rights. The Supreme Court further established that the Constitution itself implies a "cause of action," that is, a right to sue, government agents responsible for conducting unreasonable searches and seizures.

Webster Bivens had committed no crime. Nevertheless, agents of the federal government ransacked his home, conducted a broad search, handcuffed him in front of his wife and children (whom they also threatened to arrest), and later strip-searched him—all without probable cause. This blatantly unconstitutional search seemed to have no redress: given that he was never prosecuted, exclusion of evidence found in the home was irrelevant. Bivens sued, seeking money damages, but the federal courts dismissed his claim, finding that there was no right to sue under the Fourth Amendment.

The Supreme Court reinstated his claim, holding that without an implicit right to sue, the Fourth Amendment would be reduced to mere words. Despite the lack of a remedy articulated by the text of the amendment, the Court nonetheless held that the Article III judicial power, as discussed in Marbury v. Madison, inherently includes the authority to fashion remedies (including money damages) for constitutional violations. Even though traditional state tort claims were available, the Court created a new cause of action under the Fourth Amendment, and ultimately permitted similar suits under other amendments as well.

Bivens litigation, however, is not without its difficulties. First, as a practical matter, juries are reluctant to find liability in Bivens actions because they perceive that the individual government agent, and not the government itself, will be made to pay. Second, subsequent Supreme Court decisions have made the Bivens waters far murkier. In Bush v. Lucas, Schweiker v. Chilicky, and United States v. Stanley, the Court severely restricted the analysis of whether the Constitution would imply a cause of action to particular constitutional violations. The basis for this retreat was the notion, originally detailed in Chief Justice Burger's Bivens dissent, that the Court must defer to the will of Congress, given the lawmaking nature of the "creation" of remedies. Thus, if Congress has not addressed a given class of grievances, or has done so without designating the remedy of money damages, the Court should recognize the doctrine of "separation of powers"—that the legislature should make law, and the courts should simply interpret it.

To counteract these problems, commentators have suggested that Congress should amend the Federal Torts Claim Act (FTCA) to waive immunity, thus permitting claimants to sue the government rather than the individual agent. Although Congress did create a statutory cause of action under the FTCA for such purposes, it intentionally excluded money damages. Thus, the Bivens problem still remains.

LOUIS N. SCHULZE, JR.

References and Further Reading

- Bandes, Susan, Reinventing Bivens: The Self-Executing Constitution, Southern California Law Review 68 (1995): 289.
- Grey, Betsy J., Preemption of Bivens Claims: How Clearly Must Congress Speak? Washington University Law Quarterly 70 (1992): 1087.
- Pillard, Cornelia T.L., Taking Fiction Seriously: The Strange Results of Public Officials' Individual Liability under Bivens, Georgetown Law Journal 88 (1999): 65.
- Thomas, Charles W., Resolving the Problem of Qualified Immunity for Private Defendants in § 1983 and Bivens Damage Suits, Louisiana Law Review 53 (1992): 449.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Amos v. United States*, 255 U.S. 313 (1921)
- Bell v. Hood*, 327 U.S. 678 (1946)
- Berger v. New York*, 388 U.S. 41 (1967)
- Byars v. United States*, 273 U.S. 28 (1927)
- Gambino v. United States*, 275 U.S. 310 (1927)
- J.I. Case Co. v. Borak*, 377 U.S. 426 (1964)
- Katz v. United States*, 389 U.S. 347 (1967)
- Marbury v. Madison*, 1 Cranch 137 (1803)
- Silverman v. United States*, 365 U.S. 505 (1961)
- Weeks v. United States*, 232 U.S. 383 (1914)

See also Exclusionary Rule; Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961); Search (General Definition); Search Warrants; Seizures

BLACKLEDGE v. PERRY, 417 U.S. 21 (1974)

Perry was tried and found guilty of the misdemeanor assault of a fellow inmate. When he exercised his statutory right to a new trial under North Carolina law, the prosecutor charged him with felony assault for the same conduct that had been previously charged as a less serious offense. Perry then pleaded guilty to the felony assault indictment.

Perry argued before the Supreme Court that the prosecutor's action was unconstitutional under the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The Court held that when defendants have a statutory right to a new trial, apprehension that prosecutors may retaliate by recharging with a higher offense, if they were to exercise this legal right, may impermissibly prevent defendants from ever availing themselves of a new trial. Such prosecutorial action in effect cuts off a defendant's access to the courts in violation of the due process clause. Moreover, a defendant does not have to prove that a prosecutor acted vindictively because it is the mere apprehension of retaliation that chills a defendant's assertion of the right to appeal.

Thus, absent circumstances where there is the impossibility of initially indicting on a more serious charge, prosecutors may not constitutionally bring a more serious charge against defendants who have sought new trials as of right. Perry therefore extended North Carolina v. Pearce, which held that, following a retrial, a defendant cannot receive a harsher sentence unless the trial judge sets out specific reasons.

REBECCA L. BARNHART

References and Further Reading

- Breathing New Life into Prosecutorial Misconduct Doctrine*, Harvard Law Review 114 (May 2001): 2074–97.
- Henning, Peter J., Prosecutorial Misconduct and Constitutional Remedies, Washington University Law Quarterly 77 (Fall 1999): 735–46.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- North Carolina v. Pearce*, 395 U.S. 711 (1969)

See also Due Process; North Carolina v. Pearce, 395 U.S. 711 (1969)

BLACKLISTING

Blacklisting is similar to blackballing. As the latter is associated with the placement of a black marble among the white ones in a bag, signifying that the applicant to a club has been denied membership by a single member, a blacklist is a powerful tool wielded by employers that denies the possibility of work to anyone whose name has been placed on a specific list. The injustice of a blacklist can be seen in its arbitrariness—just as in blackballing, where a single marble can decide one's fate, the blacklist may, over time, come to include names that no one remembers for sure how or why they got there. The Hollywood blacklist, for example, was designed to prevent left-wing film industry workers from finding employment in the American motion picture business. But because of mistaken identities, misspellings, rumor, and so forth, many individuals were not only blacklisted but effectively denied employment in spite of the fact that their names had been entered on the list through sheer inadvertence or oversight.

The Hollywood blacklist can also be seen as unfair since it targeted for reprisal as communists people whose political sympathies rarely strayed beyond that of California liberalism, and magazine subscriptions or house parties were notorious ways by which the politically naïve and socially harmless managed to get their names in a file that would follow them the rest of their lives. The canard that communists had taken over the film industry and turned the citadel of entertainment into a propaganda arm of the Soviet Union was genuinely hallucinatory in its misreading of the product that the American film industry was selling at home and abroad.

Finally, the detractors of Hollywood radicals and fellow travelers uniformly ignored the fact that without the Red Army in Europe, and the Soviet Union's "popular front" alliance with Western capitalists, Hitler's regime might never have been defeated. President Franklin Roosevelt recognized the Soviet Union as one of his first acts in office after winning the 1932 national election; that there were warm relations between Americans of all sorts and Russian communism, or its various American outposts during the 1930s and the war itself, should hardly come as a surprise nor be condemned. If even Winston Churchill could embrace Stalin, when the time was right, a Hollywood movie actor ought to be able to read a book by John Reed, or go to meetings where Reed's politics began to make increasing sense as the Great Depression deepened.

Blacklisting did not begin with the Hollywood studios. In Charles Dickens's novel Hard Times, his "honest-but-doomed working man," Stephen Blackpool, is blacklisted for rebellious comments that he makes to a factory owner, and his inability to find employment, crisscrossing Britain's brutal mid-nineteenth-century industrial landscape is virtually a death sentence. As labor researcher Mike Hughes documents, the rightwing Economic League operated a blacklist among British employers throughout most of the twentieth century, and was only brought to its knees by a House of Commons select committee investigation in 1990. The tale of blacklisting in American academia is a story that only a tiny handful of academics have come forward to tell. Historian Ellen Schrecker argues that, in fact, McCarthyism in the United States, whose tentacles reached well beyond the film industry and university campus, was a two-tiered process in which the success of the upper tier, led by criminal prosecutors and purveyors of rightwing political ideology, was only assured because it was founded upon a lower tier, the system of economic repression, that is, the blacklist.

Many of the same civil liberties that are at the heart of a democratic society and represent the soul of American constitutional law are the conventional victims of blacklisting—freedom of speech, association, and the press. Yet how does one campaign in the courts or march in the capital against as invisible and insidious an influence as that of a blacklist? The deprivation of civil liberties by blacklisting thus raises a special political problem and necessarily points toward hard philosophical questions about the parameters of liberty in liberal democracies. Many words have been written about the alleged superiority of negative over positive rights, the safeguards unique to negative constitutions, the essentially private and personal quality of liberty, and the transparent virtues of a government of laws and not men. The government that governs best, we are told, governs least. Lord Acton said, "Power corrupts. Absolute power corrupts absolutely." But the success of blacklisting as a political tool, the use of a discreet economic weapon for enforcing a grand public program, the destruction of civil liberties through a policy of intimidation, guilt by association, and economic strangulation—all outside the general purview of the law in liberal systems of rule—surely underscores not the strengths but the weaknesses of a politics that places economic processes, including decision making behind the blacklist, far from public regulation and the jurisdiction of the state.

Thus, a certain criticism of civil liberty itself is difficult to deflect. Civil liberty is to be enjoyed in private, but is that much more easily destroyed in private. Congress shall make no law . . . But what if it is corporations, and other private enterprises, that rule? The state cannot force the private media to report a story or print an article or open its pages to dissident points of view. And when governments close down newspapers or television stations, it is a sure sign of the defeat of civil liberty by totalitarian tactics. But where is the freedom of speech for the citizen who does not own a newspaper or have his or her own television news station? At one level, these realities reveal fault lines separating liberty from democracy. There is “a contradiction between the sovereignty of the people and universal suffrage on the one hand, placing the fate of the nation in the hands of everyone,” wrote historian Georges Lefebvre, “and the capitalist economy where the wage-earner sees his work, his wages and consequently his life in the hands of those who own the means of production.”

But surely the illustration of blacklisting reveals contradictions with the system of civil liberty itself. The very private liberty that protects the right to hire and fire, the right to employ or not, the right to maneuver behind the scenes, to plan in secret, to remain silent in the face of injustice, to decline courageous action, to act on one’s own prejudice without explanation, the power of joint economic activity by owners of private property—everything that makes the blacklist work is itself a right and is protected by civil liberty and by law. The house of civil liberty may not be about to fall, but it is all too easily portrayed as divided against itself.

ANTHONY CHASE

References and Further Reading

- Caute, David. The Left in Europe Since 1789. New York: World University Library, 1966.
 Hughes, Mike. Spies at Work. Bradford, UK: 1 in 12 Publications, 1994.
 Schrecker, Ellen. The Age of McCarthyism. Boston: St. Martin’s Press, 1994.

BLACKSTONE AND COMMON-LAW PROHIBITION ON PRIOR RESTRAINTS

In the fourth volume of his famous Commentaries on the Laws of England, published in 1769, William Blackstone argued that freedom of the press under the common law was limited to a prohibition on prior restraints. As Blackstone explained,

The liberty of the press is indeed essential to the nature of a free state: but this consists in laying no previous restraints upon publications, and not in freedom from censure for criminal matter when published. Every free-man has an undoubted right to lay what sentiments he pleases before the public: to forbid this, is to destroy the freedom of the press: but if he publishes what is improper, mischievous or illegal, he must take the consequences of his own temerity.

Blackstone’s formulation—which imposed an absolute bar on state censorship prior to publication, but permitted punishment after the fact—was widely influential in eighteenth- and nineteenth-century America. In the 1907 case of Patterson v. Colorado, the Supreme Court, citing Blackstone, held that freedom of the press under the First Amendment consisted solely of a prohibition on prior restraints. In 1919, however, the Court intimated in Schenck v. United States that freedom of the press extended more broadly, a holding confirmed in subsequent cases.

Blackstone’s denunciation of prior restraints has nonetheless remained a vital aspect of American law. In Near v. Minnesota (1931), the Supreme Court relied heavily on Blackstone and the prohibition on prior restraints to invalidate a Minnesota law providing for the abatement of certain newspapers as public nuisances.

CARLTON F. W. LARSON

References and Further Reading

- Blackstone, William. Commentaries on the Laws of England. Vol. 4. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1769.
 Friendly, Fred W. Minnesota Rag: The Dramatic Story of the Landmark Supreme Court Case that Gave New Meaning to Freedom of the Press. New York: Random House, 1981.
 Levy, Leonard. Emergence of a Free Press. New York: Oxford University Press, 1985.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Patterson v. Colorado*, 205 U.S. 454 (1907)
Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697 (1931)
Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919)

See also Freedom of Speech and Press: Nineteenth Century; Freedom of Speech and Press under the Constitution: Early History (1791–1917)

BLAINE AMENDMENT

The Blaine amendment was a proposed 1876 amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

Introduced by Congressman James G. Blaine in December 1875, the amendment sought to apply the First Amendment’s religion clauses directly to state actions, prohibit the disbursement of public funds for parochial education, and, as revised by the Senate, forbid the exclusion of the Bible from the nation’s public schools. Congress debated the measure during the heat of the 1876 summer presidential campaign, an election overshadowed by a resurgent Democratic Party and the inevitable demise of federally mandated southern reconstruction. Blaine's proposal passed a Democrat-controlled House of Representatives by an overwhelming margin, but fell four votes short in the Senate of being submitted to the states as the Sixteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

BLAINE AMENDMENT

The Blaine amendment stands apart in significance from the majority of failed constitutional amendments for three reasons. First, based on the proposal's express language applying the First Amendment's religion clauses to state actions, some observers have argued that the proposal, coming eight years after the passage of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution, indicates that members of Congress did not understand the due process or privileges and immunities clauses of that latter amendment to incorporate the rights contained in the Bill of Rights. Opponents of the Supreme Court's incorporation cases of the mid-twentieth century have used the Blaine amendment as one of their chief weapons. While there may be some merit to this argument, the Blaine amendment was much more expressive in its prohibition than the language of the First Amendment (and possibly differed from contemporary understandings of the establishment clause). In addition, during the debate on the measure, at least one senator referred to the Supreme Court's decision in the Slaughterhouse Cases (1873) rejecting the theory of incorporation under the Fourteenth Amendment as a providing a justification for the Blaine amendment. Consequently, legislators could have believed that the Blaine amendment was necessary to counteract the erroneous holding of Slaughterhouse.

The Blaine amendment is additionally significant as the apex of a mid-nineteenth-century controversy over the public funding of private religious schools. The "School Question" or "School Controversy," as it was popularly called, arose during the 1830s and 1840s following the creation of publicly funded "common" schools. A primary goal of the common schools was to teach republican values and integrate immigrant children into American culture. Increasingly, Catholic immigrants objected to the distinctly Protestant character of the nonsectarian curriculum of most common schools and, in turn, opted to establish Catholic parochial schools in the 1840s and 1850s. Catholic requests for pro rata shares of state school funds were regularly turned down by education officials who generally viewed parochial schools as a threat to the success of the common school movement.

After lying dormant during the Civil War and early Reconstruction years, the School Question rose to prominence as a campaign issue during the 1876 election. Some evidence suggests that Republican officials seized on the funding issue as a way of attracting anti-Catholic and anti-immigrant sentiment while seeking to align the Democratic Party with the Catholic Church. In September 1875, President Grant, hoping for a third term as president, proposed a constitutional amendment to prohibit the public funding of religious schools. James G. Blaine, also seeking the Republican presidential nomination, then introduced the amendment that bore his name:

No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; and no money raised by taxation in any State for the support of public schools, or derived from any public fund therefore, not any public lands devoted thereto, shall ever be under the control of any religious sect; nor shall any money so raised or lands so devoted be divided between religious sects or denominations.

The Democrat-controlled House of Representatives overwhelmingly passed Blaine's proposal after attaching a nonenforcement provision. The Republican-controlled Senate removed the nonenforcement provision, expanded the language to prohibit the expenditure of funds derived from any source, and added a provision to preserve the reading of the Bible in the public schools, which favored Protestant interests. During the Senate debates, Democrats charged that the amendment was motivated by anti-Catholicism and would expand federal control over local educational decisions. In the end, the Senate voted along party lines to reject the Blaine amendment. As a result of the episode, many observers have charged that the Blaine amendment was motivated primarily by anti-Catholic animus. While anti-Catholicism unquestionably fueled the controversy, the Blaine amendment episode also implicated larger issues about the federal role in public education and the future and religious character of public schooling.

The Blaine amendment is also significant for its legacy. Even though Congress failed to pass the Blaine amendment in 1876, several states subsequently adopted similar non-funding provisions in their state constitutions. In 1889, Congress expressly required the states of Montana, North and South Dakota, and Washington to adopt non-funding provisions in their respective constitutions as a condition for granting statehood. Approximately two-thirds of state constitutions now contain such provisions, usually found in sections governing expenditures for public education that prohibit appropriations for the support of sectarian or denominational schools. These state "Blaine amendments" have become important because state courts have occasionally interpreted these provisions more strictly than the interpretation given to the establishment clause by the U.S. Supreme Court. For example, in 1961 the Alaska Supreme Court interpreted its non-funding provision to prohibit public reimbursement of transportation costs for children to attend religious schools, even though the U.S. Supreme Court in 1947 had upheld the constitutionality of a similar program under the federal establishment clause.

More recently, the issue of whether a stricter interpretation of a state non-funding provision might violate the free exercise and equal protection clauses came before the U.S. Supreme Court in Locke v. Davey (2004). Two years earlier, the Supreme Court had ruled in Zelman v. Simmons-Harris that a program that allows publicly financed vouchers to be used for religious school tuition does not violate the federal establishment clause. Relying on interpretations of its own constitution, however, Washington State refused to allow a student to use a publicly financed voucher to attend a religious college. The student charged that the Washington rule was unnecessarily restrictive, and that the denial infringed on his rights to free exercise and equal protection of the law. In Locke, however, the Supreme Court affirmed the state's decision, holding that the First Amendment allowed for "play in the joints" between the establishment and free exercise clauses, and that Washington State was free to interpret its state constitutional provisions independently of interpretations of the federal establishment clause.

STEVEN K. GREEN

References and Further Reading

- DeForrest, Mark Edward, An Overview and Evaluation of State Blaine Amendments: Origins, Scope, and First Amendment Concerns, Harvard Journal of Law and Public Policy 26 (2003): 552–626.
- Garnett, Richard W., The Theology of the Blaine Amendments, First Amendment Law Review 2 (2003): 23–44.
- Gedicks, Frederick Mark, Reconstructing the Blaine Amendments, First Amendment Law Review 2 (2003): 85–106.
- Feldman, Noah, Nonsectarianism Reconsidered, Journal of Law and Politics 18 (2002): 65–117.
- Green, Steven K., The Blaine Amendment Reconsidered, American Journal of Legal History 36 (1992): 38–69.
- , 'Blaming Blaine': Understanding the Blaine Amendment and the 'No-Funding' Principle, First Amendment Law Review 2 (2003): 107–52.
- Hamburger, Philip, Separation of Church and State. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2002.
- McAfee, Ward M. Religion, Race, and Reconstruction: The Public School in the Politics of the 1870s. Albany: State University of New York, 1998.
- Stern, Mark D., Blaine Amendments, Anti-Catholicism, and Catholic Dogma, First Amendment Law Review 2 (2003): 153–78.

Viteritti, Joseph P., Blaine's Wake: School Choice, the First Amendment, and State Constitutional Law, Harvard Journal of Law and Public Policy 26 (1998): 657–718.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Locke v. Davey*, 124 S.Ct. 1307 (2004)
- Slaughterhouse Cases*, 83 U.S. 36 (1873)
- Zelman v. Simmons-Harris*, 536 U.S. 639 (2002)

See also State Aid to Religious Schools

BLOODY TENENT OF PERSECUTION FOR CAUSE OF CONSCIENCE, DISCUSSED IN A CONFERENCE BETWEEN TRUTH AND PEACE, THE

Roger Williams began his religious career as a Puritan minister, and when he arrived in Massachusetts in 1630 he was initially well received. But he quickly fell into disfavor with the local leaders because of his liberal views. He changed his religious affiliation from Puritan to Baptist, and in 1639 he became a Seeker, a person who adhered to no specific religious practices. It was as a Seeker that Williams wrote "The Bloody Tenent," while in England attempting to win back a charter for Rhode Island. The main theme of the tract, as it was of Williams's life, is that all individuals and religious bodies are entitled to religious liberty as a natural right, and that civil governments do not have the authority to enforce religious laws.

"The Bloody Tenent" is structured as a dialogue between "Truth" (representing the orthodox views of Puritans like John Cotton) and "Peace" (representing Williams's views), and the subject of their debate is whether secular laws should favor one religion over another, and whether these laws have any basis in the Bible. Williams argued that these laws were in fact contrary to biblical teachings, and utilized the parable in Matthew 21:33–46 about the tenants who killed the son of the landowner to lay claim to his property (hence the title).

Williams used numerous biblical parables to buttress his argument that the civil authority ought not to be used to enforce religious conformity. He noted that Jesus and his disciples did not enjoy the protection of civil authority, and when he sent the disciples into the countryside to preach, he instructed them to take no food or money, but to rely on God for their needs. In the same manner, the Church of Williams's day ought to rely on spiritual authority alone, not that of the Crown.

Altogether, the prose in the tract is quite dense, and not easily read. But the message it carried could not be mistaken, and made Williams the leading champion in his time for the idea of religious liberty for both individuals and sects.

THE BLOODY TENENT

MELVIN I. UROFSKY

References and Further Reading

Morgan, Edmund S. Roger Williams, the Church and the State. New York: Harcourt, Brace & World, 1967.

BLUE LAWS

See Sunday Closing Cases and Laws

BLUE WALL OF SILENCE

The blue wall of silence is an unwritten code that prohibits police officers from providing adverse information against fellow officers. In essence, the code states that “cops don’t tell on cops.”

Officers allegedly learn about the wall of silence in the police academy when instructors inform them that all officers are “blue” (referring to the color of their uniforms) and have to protect each other no matter what. “I’ll watch your back and you watch mine” is the understanding that police officers have among themselves. The problem with this philosophy is that a sense of loyalty develops that is based on relationships with other police officers rather than loyalty based on principles such as justice, fairness, and respect for human rights. Many police officers adopt this philosophy and turn a blind eye to fellow officers who engage in drug dealing, theft, assault and battery, murder, and other human rights violations.

The blue wall of silence makes it possible for police violence against citizens to be perpetuated with impunity. In one of the most egregious examples of this phenomenon, officers in the New York City Police Department failed to do or say anything to protect Abner Louima from a sadistic anal assault perpetrated by Officer Justin Volpe in a Brooklyn police station. When Volpe marched around his fellow officers waving a broken broomstick stained with Louima’s blood and feces, bragging that he had “taken a man down,” no police officer reported this outrageous conduct. Other egregious examples of how the blue wall of silence has operated include the cases of Rodney King (Los Angeles, Calif., 1992), Tyisha Miller (Riverside, Calif., 1998), and Amadou Diallo (New York City, 1999).

JUDITH A. M. SCULLY

References and Further Reading

Chin, Gabriel, and Scott Wells, The Blue Wall of Silence As Evidence of Bias and Motive to Lie: A New Approach to Police Perjury, University of Pittsburgh Law Review 59 (1998): 233.

Gallo, Gina. Armed and Dangerous: Memoirs of a Chicago Policewoman. New York: Forge, 2001.

Human Rights Watch. Shielded from Justice: Police Brutality and Accountability in the United States. Human Rights Watch Report, 1999. www.hrw.org/reports98/police/toc.htm.

Kappeler, Victor E., Richard Sluder, and Geoffrey P. Aplert. Forces of Deviance: Understanding the Dark Side of Policing. 2nd ed. Prospect Heights, IL.: Waveland Press, 1998.

Stamper, Norm. Breaking Rank: A Top Cop’s Expose of the Dark Side of American Policing. New York: Nation Books, 2005.

BOARD OF EDUCATION OF THE WESTSIDE COMMUNITY SCHOOLS v. MERGENS, 496 U.S. 226 (1990)

In Board of Education of the Westside Community Schools v. Mergens, a public school board denied students’ request to form a Christian club and meet after school on school premises. The school had created a limited open forum under the Equal Access Act (EAA) by permitting some non-curriculum-related student clubs, such as chess and stamp collecting, to meet during noninstructional time after school. The EAA, enacted by Congress in 1984, declared that once a school receiving federal financial assistance created a limited open forum, it could not discriminate against student-led clubs meeting during non-instructional time on school premises based on the “religious, political, philosophical, or other content of the speech at the meetings.” The Court found that the school board’s denying the Christian club the same opportunity to meet as other non-curriculum-related clubs amounted to discrimination based on the Christian club’s religious speech. The Court also upheld the constitutionality of the EAA against an establishment clause claim, finding that allowing a wide range of student clubs to meet, including the Christian club, had a secular purpose and that high school students were not likely to perceive that a religious club meeting on the same basis as other clubs constituted government sponsorship of religion.

The EAA protects the right of students to meet in clubs reflecting their own interests on the same basis as any other non-curriculum-related club. Although initially applied to religious clubs, the EAA applies as well to other student interest groups, such as gay/straight clubs.

RALPH D. MAWDSLEY

References and Further Reading

Equal Access Act, 20 U.S.C. §§ 4071–4074.
 Establishment Clause, U.S. Const. First Amendment.
 Mawdsley, Ralph, The Equal Access Act and Public Schools: What Are the Legal Issues Related to Recognizing Gay Student Groups? Brigham Young University Education & Law Journal (2001): 1–33.

BOARD OF EDUCATION v. ALLEN, 392 U.S. 236 (1968)

One of the most contentious church–state issues in the United States has been the question of the constitutionality of government aid to religious schools. In Board of Education v. Allen (1968), the U.S. Supreme Court considered the constitutionality of a New York statute requiring public school districts to purchase and loan secular textbooks free of charge to children enrolled in both parochial and public schools. The Court, in one of its early decisions interpreting the establishment clause in the context of government aid to religious schools, sustained the constitutionality of the statute.

In 1947, the Supreme Court launched the modern establishment clause era with its decision in Everson v. Board of Education in which the Court narrowly sustained the constitutionality of a New Jersey law that authorized reimbursement to parents for the transportation expenses their children incurred traveling to sectarian schools. Thereafter, the Court attempted to determine what type of governmental aid to children attending private religious schools violated the establishment clause. In Allen, a six-to-three decision with Justice Byron White writing for the majority, the Court, conceding that “the line between state neutrality to religion and state support of religion is not easy to locate,” relied on a test that it had articulated five years earlier in Abington Township School District v. Schempp (1963): “[W]hat are the purpose and primary effect of the enactment? If either is the advancement or inhibition of religion then the enactment exceeds the scope of legislative power as circumscribed by the Constitution.”

The Court in Allen concluded that because the textbooks in question were secular, loaning them to children attending parochial schools did not have a “primary effect” of advancing the religious mission of the school. In reaching this conclusion, the Court concluded that “religious schools pursue two goals, religious instruction and secular education.” The Court concluded that secular textbooks serve only the latter function, rejecting the plaintiffs’ arguments that “all teaching in a sectarian school is religious” and that “the processes of secular and religious training are so intertwined that secular textbooks furnished to students by the public are in fact instrumental in the teaching of religion.” The Court noted that there was no evidence in the record suggesting that the books in question had been used for religious instruction.

Justices Hugo Black, William Douglas, and Abe Fortas each dissented, distinguishing the bus fares at issue in Everson from the textbooks at issue in Allen. Black argued that textbooks in the hands of a sectarian school teacher would inevitably be used “to propagate the religious views of the favored sect.” Aware that states were considering other forms of aid to sectarian schools, Black worried that if the Court sustained the textbook loans, “on the argument used to support this law others could be upheld providing for state or federal government funds to buy property on which to erect the buildings themselves, [or] to pay the salaries of the religious school teachers.”

Although the Court sustained the textbook loan program, for the next several years it rejected various other forms of government aid to sectarian schools such as teacher salary supplements. In recent years, however, the Court has significantly liberalized its jurisprudence in this area by permitting greater government aid to religious schools.

DAVISON M. DOUGLAS

References and Further Reading

Freund, Paul, Comment: Public Aid to Parochial Schools, Harvard Law Review 82 (1969): 1680–92.
 Futterman, David, School Choice and the Religion Clauses: The Law and Politics of Public Aid to Private Parochial Schools, Georgetown Law Journal 81 (1993): 711–40.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Abington Township School District v. Schempp, 374 U.S. 203 (1963)

Everson v. Board of Education, 330 U.S. 1 (1947)

See also State Aid to Religious Schools

BOARD OF EDUCATION v. EARLS, 536 U.S. 822 (2002) (STUDENTS)

Drug testing of students by public school officials constitutes a search that must be reasonable under the Fourth Amendment. In Board of Education v. Earls, the Court addressed the lawfulness of warrantless, suspicionless drug testing of students.

A school district in Pottawatomie County, Oklahoma, implemented a policy that required all students who participated in competitive extracurricular activities to submit to drug testing. Students Lindsay Earls and Daniel James, with their parents, sued the school district, arguing that the drug testing policy violated the Fourth Amendment.

The Court commenced its analysis by observing that the usual requirements of a search warrant and probable cause are uniquely situated to criminal investigations and may not be suitable for determining the reasonableness of searches intended to prevent future harms. Instead, the reasonableness of administrative searches is determined by balancing the government's legitimate interests in the search against the intrusion on individual privacy interests.

The Court had previously held that students' expectations of privacy are reduced in light of schools' responsibility for their health, education, discipline, and safety. Examining the specific policy at issue, the Court characterized the intrusion upon student privacy interests as relatively minor. Students provided urine samples in a closed restroom stall, test results were confidential, and the only consequence of a failed test was to limit the student's participation in extracurricular activities. Results did not carry academic, criminal, or other disciplinary consequences.

In contrast, the Court deemed the district's interest in drug testing as substantial. Although the government did not demonstrate a pervasive drug problem in its district, it did present evidence that some students had possessed or used drugs. Additionally, the Court noted a nationwide drug "epidemic." Weighing the intrusion on privacy interests against the government's interest in preventing and detecting drug use by schoolchildren, the Court found the policy to be reasonable.

In doing so, the Court extended its earlier ruling in Vernonia School District v. Acton, which applied only to school athletes. In Vernonia, the Court emphasized the safety hazards of drug use in athletes, as well as the reduced expectations of privacy in a locker-room atmosphere. Nevertheless, the Court found that the absence of these facts did not tip the reasonableness balance against the broader policy challenged in Earls.

Just as Vernonia did not determine the constitutionality of drug testing nonathletes, Earls does not resolve the constitutionality of testing students who do not participate in extracurricular activities. In its fact-specific analysis, the majority noted that students who engaged in extracurricular activities voluntarily subjected themselves to some intrusions on their privacy, and that the only consequence of a failed test was to limit participation in extracurricular activities. One member of the majority, Justice Breyer, wrote a concurring opinion emphasizing that the policy did not apply to the entire school. Four justices dissented, reasoning that Vernonia was limited to athletes. Accordingly, it is possible that a majority of the Court might find unreasonable a drug testing policy that applied to all students.

ALAFAIR S. BURKE

References and Further Reading

- Smiley, Jennifer E., Comment. Rethinking the 'Special Needs' Doctrine: Suspicionless Drug Testing of High School Students and the Narrowing of Fourth Amendment Protections, Northwestern University Law Review 95 (2001): 811.
 Sundby, Scott E., Protecting the Citizen 'Whilst He Is Quiet': Suspicionless Searches, 'Special Needs' and General Warrants, Mississippi Law Journal 74 (2004): 501.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Vernonia School District v. Acton, 515 U.S. 646 (1995)

See also Administrative Searches and Seizures; Drug Testing; Probable Cause; Search (General Definition); Search Warrants

BOARD OF EDUCATION v. PICO, 457 U.S. 853 (1982)

In Board of Education v. Pico, the sharply divided Court held that the school board violated the students' First Amendment rights by removing from high school and junior high school libraries several books that the board found "anti-American, anti-Christian, anti-Sem[itic], and just plain filthy." The books were not obscene, but the board stated that "[i]t is our duty, our moral obligation, to protect the children in our schools from this moral danger as surely as from physical and medical dangers."

Justice William J. Brennan's plurality opinion (joined by Justices Thurgood Marshall and John Paul Stevens) concluded that removal of the library books implicated students' First Amendment right to "receive information and ideas." The plurality acknowledged that students' First Amendment rights must be construed "in light of the special characteristics of the school environment," but concluded that the school board denies these rights when it acts with intent to deny students access to ideas with which the board disagrees. The plurality stressed that the decision concerned only the board's authority to remove library books, which by their nature are optional rather than required reading; the decision did not concern acquisition of library books, or removal from the curriculum of required texts.

Justices Harry A. Blackmun and Byron R. White concurred. Justice Blackmun stated that "school officials may not remove books for the purpose of restricting access to the political ideas or social perspectives discussed in them, when that action is motivated simply by the officials' disapproval of the ideas involved" (emphasis in original). Justice White would have awaited a full trial before reaching the constitutional question.

To Chief Justice Warren E. Burger (joined by Justices William H. Rehnquist, Lewis F. Powell, Jr., and Sandra Day O'Connor), the case turned on "whether local schools are to be administered by elected school boards, or by federal judges and teenage pupils; and . . . whether the values of morality, good taste, and relevance to education are valid reasons for school board decisions concerning the contents of a school library." The chief justice wrote: "[A]s a matter of educational policy students should have wide access to information and ideas. But the people elect school boards, who in turn select administrators, who select the teachers, and these are the individuals best able to determine the substance of that policy" (emphasis in original).

Justice Powell accused the plurality of "reject[ing] a basic concept of public school education in our country: that the States and locally elected school boards should have the responsibility for determining the educational policy of the public schools." Pico, Justice Powell continued, allows "any junior high school student, by instituting a suit against a school board or teacher, [to] invite a judge to overrule an educational decision by the official body designated by the people to operate the schools."

Pico constrains the discretion of public school authorities to remove materials from school libraries. Some lower courts also cite Pico for a First Amendment right of students to receive information, although the right commanded only the three-justice plurality.

DOUGLAS E. ABRAMS

References and Further Reading

Chemerinsky, Erwin. Constitutional Law: Principles and Policies. 2nd ed. New York: Aspen, 2002.
Nowak, John E., and Ronald D. Rotunda. Constitutional Law. 7th ed. St. Paul, MN: Thomson West, 2004.

See also Children and the First Amendment

BOARD OF EDUCATION, KIRYAS JOEL SCHOOL DISTRICT v. GRUMET, 512 U.S. 687 (1994)

Kiryas Joel involved a striking fact situation: a public school district created to serve only the disabled children of an ultra-Orthodox Jewish sect. But in striking down the district under the establishment clause, the Supreme Court relied on a simple, bedrock principle: any government accommodation of religious practice must extend not only to a single sect, but to any sect engaged in a similar practice.

The Satmar Hasidim are an insular, traditionalist group who speak primarily Yiddish, permit no television or radio, wear distinctive hair and clothing, and educate their children in gender-segregated private schools permeated by religious teaching. They formed a village in upstate New York called Kiryas Joel, inhabited only by sect members. The village's disabled children, entitled to state and federal special-education assistance, at first received it in Satmar private schools, but had to switch to public schools after the Supreme Court signaled disapproval of private school aid in Aguilar v. Felton (1985; later overruled). The parents soon withdrew their children from public school, however, reporting that the children had been taunted by peers and traumatized by the secular atmosphere. The New York legislature then stepped in and created a special public school district tracking the lines of the village, allowing the Satmar children to receive aid in a sheltered setting, but prohibiting the district from teaching religion in its classes.

Notwithstanding the state's legitimate goal of accommodating a religious and cultural minority, the Supreme Court ruled that the creation of the district violated the establishment clause and its command of government neutrality toward varying religious views. Justice Souter's opinion for four justices, joined in part by Justice O'Connor, concluded that the Satmars had received a unique benefit, a separate school district, without any guarantee that it would be "provide[d] equally to other religious (and nonreligious) groups." The state could accommodate needs such as the Satmars', but only by a statute that did not single out one sect. Justice Scalia's dissent argued that New York had created comparable special districts before and had given no indication that it would fail to accommodate a similar group in the future.

The justices in the majority also objected to the drawing of political lines to encompass only members of one sect. Justice Souter's opinion argued that this created an improper "religious test" for membership in the district; Justice Kennedy concurred that "the Establishment Clause forbids the government to draw political boundaries on the basis of religious faith"; and Justices Stevens and Ginsburg argued even more broadly that the state cannot "affirmatively support[t] a religious sect's interest in segregating itself [from its] neighbors." These arguments raise interesting parallels with the Court's invalidation of race-based districting in decisions such as Shaw v. Reno. The arguments also touch on deep questions as to whether cultural and religious pluralism are better served by integrating and assimilating various groups or by allowing certain limited forms of “segregation” by groups, like the Satmar, that are internally non-pluralistic.

The legislature responded to the Court’s holding by passing general statutes allowing the creation of smaller school districts out of larger ones under certain criteria. Two such efforts were struck down by state courts in 1997 and 1999 on the grounds that their requirements were “gerrymandered” to benefit only the Satmar. But a fourth, broader statute was upheld in 2001.

THOMAS C. BERG

References and Further Reading

- Berg, Thomas C., Slouching Toward Secularism: A Comment on Kiryas Joel School District v. Grumet, Emory Law Journal 44 (1995): 433–99.
- Boyarin, Jonathan, Student Note: Circumscribing Constitutional Identities in Kiryas Joel, Yale Law Journal 106 (1997): 1537–70.
- Eisgruber, Christopher L., The Constitutional Value of Assimilation, Columbia Law Review 96 (1996): 87–103.
- Greene, Abner S., Kiryas Joel and Two Mistakes About Equality, Columbia Law Review 96 (1996): 1–86.
- Lewin, Tamar, “Controversy Over, Enclave Joins School Board Group,” New York Times, April 20, 2002.
- Lupu, Ira C., Uncovering the Village of Kiryas Joel, Columbia Law Review 96 (1996): 104–20.
- Rosen, Jeffrey, Kiryas Joel and Shaw v. Reno: A Text-Bound Interpretivist Approach, Cumberland Law Review 26 (1996): 387–406.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Aguilar v. Felton*, 473 U.S. 402 (1985)
- Grumet v. Cuomo*, 90 N.Y.2d 57, 681 N.E.2d 340 (1997)
- Grumet v. Pataki*, 93 N.Y.2d 677, 720 N.E.2d 66 (1999)
- Shaw v. Reno*, 509 U.S. 630 (1993)

BOB JONES UNIVERSITY v. UNITED STATES, 461 U.S. 574 (1983)

Federal law provides that “[c]orporations organized and operated exclusive for religious, charitable, or educational purposes” are entitled to tax-exempt status. But is a private school that discriminates on the basis of race entitled to federal tax-exempt status? In Bob Jones University v. United States, the Supreme Court concluded that racially discriminatory private school cannot receive federal tax exemptions, even if its discriminatory practices are grounded in religious belief.

Bob Jones University calls itself “the world’s most unusual university.” Although unaffiliated with any established church, the university is dedicated to the teaching and propagation of fundamentalist religious beliefs. In pursuit of these goals, the university dictates strict rules of conduct for its students. To enforce one such rule forbidding interracial dating and marriage, the university denies admission to applicants engaged in or known to advocate interracial dating and marriage.

The Bob Jones University controversy began in 1970, when the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) concluded that it would no longer grant tax-exempt status to schools that violate governmental policy outlawing federal funding of discriminatory institutions. After paying a portion of the federal taxes due, the university filed suit for a refund, contending that it was statutorily and constitutionally entitled to reinstatement of its tax exemption. In 1981, the Supreme Court agreed to hear Bob Jones University and a related case raising similar issues, Goldsboro Christian Schools, Inc. v. United States. At that time, Bob Jones University was perceived as a religious liberty lawsuit. Specifically, little attention was paid to whether or not the IRS could withhold tax breaks from segregationist academies and other racist schools; the focus of the litigation, instead, was whether First Amendment religious liberty protections would extend to a school whose discriminatory practices were tied to religious conviction.

In January 1982, however, the Reagan administration sought to moot Bob Jones University and Goldsboro. Noting that Congress never formally specified that tax-exempt organizations must conform to “public policy,” the administration claimed that it lacked authority to withhold tax exemptions from racist schools. The administration’s policy shift prompted a political backlash and the administration withdrew its request to have the Supreme Court declare the case moot. In May 1983, the Court, by a vote of eight to one, denied tax exemptions to the two schools. In an opinion written by Chief Justice Warren Burger, the Court held that a tax-exempt institution must confer some “public benefit” and that its purpose must not be at odds with the “common community conscience.” The Court further held that the IRS has broad authority to interpret the code and to issue rulings based on its interpretation.

The Court also considered the religious liberty claims of Bob Jones University and Goldsboro Christian Schools. Noting that the “[g]overnment has a fundamental overriding interest in eradicating racial discrimination in education,” the Court concluded that this governmental interest “substantially outweighs whatever burden denial of tax benefits” places on the exercise of religious belief. By holding that equality of treatment on the basis of race is the Constitution's most essential protection, and that the government's broad interest in racial discrimination in education was at issue, the Court had little difficulty in disposing of the religious liberty claims of Bob Jones University and Goldsboro Christian Schools.

In fact, the Court devoted less than three pages of its thirty-page opinion to the religious liberty issue. Furthermore, in ruling against the two schools, the Court made no effort to distinguish Bob Jones University's prohibition of interracial dating (among a student body that included both minorities and nonminorities) from Goldsboro Christian School's refusal to admit minority students. Apparently, the Reagan policy shift had transformed Bob Jones from a religious liberty lawsuit into a socially significant racial discrimination lawsuit. Against this backdrop, the Court may have thought it ill advised to distinguish the social policies of one school from the admissions policies of another, preferring, instead, to speak about the evils of racial discrimination.

The Court should not be faulted for its failure to give substantial attention to religious liberty concerns. Between nondiscrimination in education and religiously inspired discrimination, the Court's endorsement of nondiscriminatory objectives is hardly surprising. Indeed, the Court broke little, if any, doctrinal ground in Bob Jones University. Starting with its 1982 decision in United States v. Lee, the Court has refused to give special exceptions to religious organizations from generally applicable eligibility schemes. Bob Jones University's significance, in other words, is not tied to the case's precedential impact but to its explosive political setting.

References and Further Reading

Devins, Neal. "On Casebooks and Canons Or Why Bob Jones University Will Never Be Part of the Constitutional Law Canon." Constitutional Commentary 17, no. 2 (2000) 285–93.

Laycock, Douglas, Tax Exemptions for Racially Discriminatory Religious Schools, Texas Law Review 60 (1982): 1:259–77.

Case and Statutes Cited

Bob Jones University v. United States, 461 U.S. 574 (1983).
United States v. Lee, 455 U.S. 252 (1982)

CITY OF BOERNE v. FLORES, 521 U.S. 507 (1997)

The First Amendment provides that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." The right freely to engage in the rituals and observances of the religion of one's choice, without undue governmental interference, is one of the most cherished guarantees of the Bill of Rights. Exactly what criteria courts should apply to determine when this right has been violated has been the subject of sharp controversy over the years.

The Supreme Court required strict judicial scrutiny of this issue in a 1963 free exercise case, Sherbert v. Verner. There, the Court held that statutes which substantially burden the practice of religion will pass constitutional muster only if they are shown to be necessary to advance some compelling governmental interest. But in 1990, the Court relaxed that standard. In Employment Division v. Smith, a case upholding a ban on the use of peyote, the Court held that such a law does not offend the First Amendment if the burden it imposes on the free exercise of religion is merely an incidental effect of a generally applicable measure, and the law's objective is something other than interference with religious practice.

Congress responded to the public outcry over Smith by enacting, by a nearly unanimous vote, the Religious Freedom Restoration Act of 1993 (RFRA). RFRA expressly codified as federal law the previous standard of constitutional protection in free exercise cases, providing that "government shall not substantially burden a person's exercise of religion" unless the burden is justified by a compelling governmental interest, and does so by the least restrictive means available.

City of Boerne presented the first major test of RFRA. P.F. Flores, as archbishop of San Antonio, applied for a building permit to enlarge St. Peter Catholic Church, a small, aging structure in the city of Boerne, Texas. The permit was denied based on the city's recent designation of a historic preservation district that included St. Peter. The archbishop sued, alleging that the permit denial violated RFRA.

It is indisputable that the city's actions would not have violated the free exercise clause under the standard established by Employment Division v. Smith. Nothing in the city's creation of a historic preservation district, or the denial of a permit to enlarge a structure within that district, showed an intention to restrict the practice of any religion. The historic preservation regulations applied uniformly to all properties within the designated area, regardless of their use. Thus, the church's case depended on invoking the tougher protections set out in RFRA. The city's refusal to allow any enlargement of St. Peter could be said to substantially burden the parishioners' exercise of their religion, since the record indicated that forty to sixty people per week were unable to celebrate Sunday mass at the church because of its inadequate capacity. Moreover, the denial could not be justified by a compelling governmental interest in preventing the expansion of St. Peter, nor did it meet RFRA's requirement of narrow tailoring.

In its defense, the city argued that RFRA was unconstitutional because it exceeded Congress's authority. In a majority opinion written by Justice Kennedy, the Supreme Court agreed and struck down the law as beyond Congress's enforcement powers under the Fourteenth Amendment.

The federal government has only those powers specifically granted to it by the Constitution. In enacting RFRA, Congress relied on the provision of Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment: "The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article." Justice Kennedy acknowledged that Section 5 authorizes Congress to enact laws enforcing the constitutional right of free exercise of religion, which is deemed included within the Fourteenth Amendment's guarantee of due process of law. Such laws, however, must be remedial or preventive in nature, not substantive. In determining whether legislation is within Congress's Section 5 power, the Court will look for "congruence and proportionality" between the constitutional injury Congress seeks to redress, and the means adopted to prevent or remedy it.

In this case, the Court found that RFRA restricted the states' regulatory powers even more extensively than had the test set out by Smith, yet Congress had articulated no history of state discrimination against religion sufficient to justify such a response. Under the doctrine of separation of powers, only the Supreme Court itself may define the substantive restrictions imposed on the states by the Fourteenth Amendment. Legislation such as RFRA that effectively alters the Court's determination of the meaning of the free exercise clause, cannot be said to be enforcing the clause, and therefore exceeds the authority granted to Congress by Section 5.

This decision is significant for its express declaration that only the judicial branch has the authority to determine what constitutes a violation of the free exercise clause—and by extension, of all other constitutional provisions incorporated into the Fourteenth Amendment. It also set out a new standard for determining whether Congress has exceeded its enforcement powers under Section 5. The Court has applied City of Boerne's "congruence and proportionality" test in a variety of contexts since first enunciating it in 1997.

In response to this decision, Congress once again sought to extend heightened protection to religious liberties, this time via enactment of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000

(RLUIPA). Instead of broadly targeting all laws of general applicability that might burden the exercise of religion, RLUIPA targeted violations in two discrete contexts—land use controls and policies towards institutionalized persons. Like RFRA, the new law mandated strict judicial scrutiny in reviewing regulations that would substantially burden an individual's religious exercise in these contexts, but RLUIPA was buttressed with findings showing proportionality between the impact of such regulations and the need for close judicial review. Finally, congressional authority to enact RLUIPA was anchored in the Constitution's commerce and spending clauses, not the Fourteenth Amendment. Largely because of these efforts to avoid the constitutional problems identified in City of Boerne, the constitutionality of RLUIPA was upheld in Cutter v. Wilkinson.

R. S. RADFORD and NEAL DEVINS

References and Further Reading

- Cookson, Catharine. Regulating Religion: The Courts and the Free Exercise Clause. New York: Oxford, 2001.
- DeBusk, Thomas L., RFRA Came, RFRA Went; Where Does That Leave the First Amendment? A Case Comment on City of Boerne v. Flores, Regent University Law Review 10 (1998): 223.
- Mallamud, Jonathan, Religion, Federalism and Congressional Power: A Comment on City of Boerne v. Flores, Capital University Law Review 26 (1997): 45.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Cutter v. Wilkinson*, 125 S.Ct. 2113 (2005)
- Employment Division v. Smith*, 494 U.S. 872 (1990)
- Religious Freedom Restoration Act of 1993*, 42 U.S.C. § 2000bb et seq
- Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000*, 42 U.S.C. §§ 2000cc et seq
- Sherbert v. Verner*, 374 U.S. 398 (1963)

BOLGER v. YOUNGS DRUG PRODUCTS CORP., 463 U.S. 60 (1983)

Since the mid-1970s, it has been clear that commercial speech can be protected free speech under the First Amendment. However, it is typically accorded lesser protection than noncommercial speech. Thus, classifying a particular message as commercial or noncommercial is important. In Bolger, the Supreme Court developed principles relevant to such classification.

Youngs Drug Products Corporation ("Youngs") manufactured, sold, and distributed contraceptives. It publicized its products by various means, including unsolicited mass mailings to the public. The Postal Service notified Youngs that its mailings violated then existing federal statutes prohibiting the mailing of unsolicited advertisements for contraceptives. Youngs brought suit, challenging the constitutionality of the statute.

Applying its decision in Virginia State Board of Pharmacy, the Supreme Court held that most of the Youngs mailings were commercial speech because they were “speech which does no more than propose a commercial transaction.” However, some of the Youngs materials contained discussions of important public issues such as family planning and venereal disease and so presented a closer classification question.

The Bolger Court offered no bright line but discussed a number of considerations. The mere fact that the pamphlets were advertising did not compel the conclusion that they were commercial speech, nor did the fact that they referred to a specific product, nor did the fact that Youngs had an economic motivation. However, the combination of all of those facts strongly supported the commercial nature of the speech. The Court stated that advertising is not non-commercial speech simply because it “links a product to a current public debate.”

Despite characterizing Youngs’s advertising as commercial speech, the Court held that the statute was unconstitutional as applied. The Court applied the Central Hudson four-part analysis: (1) whether the speech concerns a lawful activity and is not misleading, (2) whether the government has a substantial interest, (3) whether the regulation directly advances that interest, and (4) whether the regulation is more extensive than necessary to serve that interest.

Under this analysis, Youngs’s advertising was protected. The Court noted that advertising for contraceptives entails “substantial individual and societal interests” and relates to activity that is protected from unwarranted governmental interference. Further, neither of the two interests asserted by the government justified sweeping prohibition of mailing unsolicited contraceptive advertising. First, the fact that some recipients may find the material offensive was insufficient, especially since the recipients could simply avert their eyes or dispose of the mailings. Second, aiding parents’ efforts to control the manner in which their children become informed about birth control is a substantial interest. However, the marginal benefit provided by the statute in that regard came at the cost of suppressing material entirely suitable for adults. Moreover, the statute denied parents truthful information bearing on their ability to discuss birth control and to make informed decisions about it.

JANET W. STEVERSON and STEVE R. JOHNSON

References and Further Reading

Chemerinsky, Erwin, and Catherine Fisk, What Is Commercial Speech: The Issue Not Decided in Nike v. Kasky, Case Western Reserve Law Review 54 (2004): 4:1143–60.
 Rotunda, Ronald D., and John E. Nowak. Treatise on Constitutional Law: Substance and Procedure. Vol. 4. 3rd ed. St. Paul, MN: West, 1999.
 Tribe, Laurence H. American Constitutional Law. 2d ed. Mineola, NY: Foundation, 1988.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Central Hudson Gas & Electric Corp. v. Public Service Commission of New York, 447 U.S. 557 (1980)
Virginia State Board of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, Inc., 425 U.S. 748 (1976)

See also Free Speech in Private Corporations; Central Hudson Gas & Electric Corp. v. Public Service Commission of New York, 447 U.S. 557 (1980); Commercial Speech; Virginia State Board of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, Inc., 425 U.S. 748 (1976)

BOND v. FLOYD, 385 U.S. 116 (1966)

Bond v. Floyd arose from the intersection of the struggle for civil rights and the protest movement against U.S. involvement in Vietnam, two political movements that had a dramatic impact on the United States in the 1960s. The U.S. Supreme Court faced the question whether the Georgia House of Representatives could deny a seat to the newly elected Julian Bond because of statements he made or endorsed against the Vietnam War and in support of young men who resisted the draft.

Bond, an African-American civil rights activist, came to run for the Georgia House seat because of the Supreme Court’s “one man, one vote” decision in Reynolds v. Sims. Following that decision, a three-judge federal district court panel ordered the reapportionment of the Georgia General Assembly. Bond had been a founding member of the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), and was SNCC’s director of communications, when he decided in 1965, at age twenty-five, to run for a House seat from his overwhelmingly African-American Atlanta district. He handily won in the June election and was to begin his one-year term in January 1966.

Much of SNCC’s leadership strongly opposed the Vietnam War and resented the military draft, which both sent African Americans into the military and to Vietnam in disproportionate numbers and threatened to deplete the ranks of SNCC’s active civil rights workers. Nonetheless, the organization hesitated to alienate the Johnson administration by officially opposing the war. Their hesitation finally evaporated after the murder of Samuel Younge, an SNCC worker and a Navy veteran, who was shot to death when he tried to use a “whites only” restroom.

In response to Younge’s death, SNCC’s executive committee released a statement that linked the civil rights struggle in the American South with the freedom struggles “of the colored people in . . . other countries.” The statement faulted the United States for being on the wrong side in many of those struggles, noting that: “The murder of Samuel Younge in Tuskegee, Alabama is not different from the murder of people in Vietnam In each case, the U.S. government bears a great part of the responsibility for those deaths.” The statement further suggested that young men should be able to choose to work in civil rights or other similar organizations as an alternative to the military draft. Finally, it expressed “sympathy” and “support” for those “who are unwilling to respond to a military draft which would compel them to contribute their lives to United States aggression in Viet Nam in the name of the ‘freedom’ we find so false in this country.”

Bond did not have a role in drafting the statement. However, when asked about it by a radio reporter, he endorsed it and expressed his opposition to all wars as a pacifist, but to the Vietnam War in particular. Members of the Georgia House of Representatives responded by challenging Bond’s right to be seated in the upcoming legislative session. Their petitions charged that Bond had violated the Selective Service laws, had given aid and comfort to the enemies of the United States and Georgia, and had brought discredit and disrespect to the House. They further contended that Bond’s endorsement of the SNCC statement showed that he could not sincerely take the oath of office prescribed by the Georgia Constitution, which essentially required him to swear that he would support the Georgia and U.S. constitutions and act to promote the interests of Georgia. When the House session was called to order, Bond was not allowed to take the oath of office. After a hearing, he was denied his seat.

Bond won election two more times only to be denied his House seat, before the Supreme Court decided his case. In a unanimous opinion written by Chief Justice Warren, the Court held that the Georgia House of Representatives must allow Bond to take his oath of office and assume his seat. The Court said that neither Bond’s nor SNCC’s statements were punishable under the Selective Service Act because they did not expressly advocate illegal behavior. In response to the state’s argument that it could bar Bond for lawful statements because it could hold its elected officials to a higher standard of loyalty than its citizens and could, therefore, prohibit House members from saying things that ordinary citizens would have a First Amendment right to say, the Court responded that the First Amendment “requires that legislators be given the widest latitude to express their views on issues of policy.”

Bond served twenty years in the Georgia General Assembly.

ROBERT N. STRASSFELD

References and Further Reading

- Carson, Clayborne. In Struggle: SNCC and the Black Awakening of the 1960s. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1981.
- Morgan, Charles, Jr. One Man, One Voice. New York: Holt, Rinehart, and Winston, 1979.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533 (1964)

See also Voting Rights (Compound)

BOOK BANNING AND BOOK REMOVALS

In Fahrenheit 451, Ray Bradbury wrote about a world in which the responsibility of fire fighters was to burn books rather than to extinguish fires. This radical reconceptualization of the fire fighter’s role was the product of a dystopia in which all books were considered dangerous contraband. Yet the act of burning books has not been left to the imaginary worlds of science fiction writers. In Nazi Germany, for example, citizens collected books that were deemed “un-German” and burned them in great pyres on public streets. Even at the start of the twenty-first century, many seemingly well-intentioned Americans continue to wage wars on books that they think are threatening to the social order, with some even resorting to book burning escapades of their own. However, many Americans consider the burning of books—even those they strongly abhor—to be an extremely repulsive act that is normally associated with brutal totalitarian states. As a result, those who want to reduce the public’s exposure to books they find dangerous have been inclined to use the less drastic—but perhaps equally effective—tactic of having the relevant books banished from public libraries and public school curriculums.

Judges have traditionally extended substantial deference to the decisions of school administrators regarding matters pertaining to the governance and general operation of public schools. This deference is most pronounced in matters regarding the school's curriculum and the books used in the teaching of that curriculum (see Epperson v. Arkansas [1968]). Paradoxically, this deference has in some instances resulted in outcomes that stymie the efforts of those who want to remove or ban books. For example, courts have uniformly rejected legal challenges against schools where litigants argue that books should be removed from a school's curriculum because they violate antidiscrimination laws by promoting religious/ethnic bigotry (Rosenberg v. Board of Education of the City of New York [1949]) and racist views (Monteiro v. Tempe Union High School District [1998]), or because they violate the First Amendment's establishment (Brown v. Woodland Joint Unified School District [1994]) and/or free exercise (Mozert v. Hawkins County Board of Education [1987]) clauses. In fact, the courts have recognized that students and teachers are entitled to significant First Amendment protection for the expressive acts in which they engage while on school grounds (Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Free School District [1969]), and that schools should not be allowed to cast a "pall of orthodoxy over the classroom" (Keyishian v. Board of Regents [1967]).

Nevertheless, those who want to restrict access to books in public schools have had significant success, particularly when they have been able to convince a school's administration that a book ought to be purged from the school's curriculum. Such a ban prevents the book from being used as an assigned student text in the school's curriculum, and it may—depending on its specificity—prevent teachers from discussing and presenting material from the book while teaching their classes. For example, in Virgil v. School Board of Columbia County, Florida (1989), the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals held that the school board had a reasonable basis to remove works by Aristophanes and Chaucer from its English curriculum after the Board concluded that the texts were too sexually explicit for high school students. The challenged regulation in Virgil allowed teachers and students to discuss the material during class discussions, and the texts were still available in the school library, but it is unclear whether any of these elements to the school's policy were required by the First Amendment. After all, the Virgil court relied on Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier (1989), a Supreme Court decision that provides school administrators with the broad authority to enact any school curriculum regulations that are "reasonably related to legitimate pedagogical concerns."

First Amendment-based lawsuits against school administrators are also triggered when administrators take steps to either remove or reduce student access to particular books in school libraries. For instance, administrators might decide not to purchase certain books as part of the library's periodic efforts to gain new acquisitions. Alternatively, school officials might design policies that limit student access to currently stocked books by placing them in restricted areas of the library and by requiring parental concession before a student can gain access to the books. And, of course, administrators may decide that certain books need to be discarded entirely from the library's collection. Regardless of which method school administrators choose to employ, lower federal and state courts have been guided by the Supreme Court's conclusion in Board of Education v. Pico (1982) that school libraries fall outside of the school's curriculum and, consequently, that judges should provide less deference to school administrators when litigants challenge the constitutionality of library policies as opposed to curriculum policies. However, because no opinion in Pico garnered majority support, lower courts have emphasized that it does not constitute a binding legal precedent, but instead constitutes an important factor that judges should consider when they address school board policies that limit access to certain books in school libraries (see Campbell v. Tammany Parish School Board [1995]).

In Pico, the plurality opinion conceptualized public school libraries as environments in which students and teachers should be allowed to freely and voluntarily examine a wide array of views on those topics that they are studying—a process that is often necessary for the acquisition of human knowledge. In addition, the plurality opinion explained that students and teachers have First Amendment rights to receive information, and that administrators should not be allowed to manipulate the stock of available library materials in an attempt to promote a particular political, social, economic, or religious orthodoxy. Administrators in public schools can shape their school library's holdings, particularly when making new purchases, by considering the intellectual merit of a book, whether a book is appropriate for students of a particular age, and whether a book complements the school's curriculum. However, books currently housed in a school's library that are acceptable on these dimensions cannot be removed or restricted because administrators find them threatening to their—or the community's—ideological predispositions.

The Pico plurality opinion also explained that school administrators face a greater chance of running afoul of the First Amendment when they remove a book already on their school library's shelves than when they choose not to purchase a book to add to the library's existing collection. When purchasing new acquisitions for school libraries, administrators must strive to maximize, on what are normally quite limited budgets, the quality of library resources that can be provided to students and teachers. This budgetary rationale, however, is usually not available when the school attempts to remove books already sitting on its library's shelves. Since books are expensive and libraries generally prefer to have more rather than fewer titles, removing books from a library's existing stock is an inherently suspicious activity—especially when that activity prompts a lawsuit. To be sure, books can be removed from libraries for entirely legitimate reasons (for instance, they are tattered, out of date, or because room must be made for incoming new titles), but courts have nevertheless been inclined to view legal challenges to school library book removals and restrictions as more credible than challenges to administrative decisions to purchase some books but not others.

Thus, school administrators have lost most cases involving challenges to the removal or restriction of access to books in school libraries. For instance, the Pico Court held that the school board could not remove nine books from school libraries simply because they were considered “‘anti-American, anti-Christian, anti-Sem[i]tic, and just plain filthy.’” Similarly, a federal district court overturned a school board decision that required students to gain parental consent before gaining access to books in the Harry Potter series that were located in the school library (Counts v. Cedarville School District [2003]). That court rejected the school board's argument that exposure to the Harry Potter books would be likely to increase student “disobedience and disrespect for authority,” or that the school had an interest in preventing students from reading about “witchcraft” and “the occult.” Indeed, the court considered the latter rationale indicative of the fact that school administrators were attempting to promote only traditional religious values, and thus acting in clear violation of First Amendment doctrine prohibiting viewpoint-based regulations of expression. The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals reached the same conclusion in overturning a local school board's decision to remove a book entitled Voodoo & Hoodoo from all school libraries in the district (Campbell v. Tammany Parish School Board [1995]).

Government administrators of nonschool public libraries who have taken steps to remove or restrict access to books have frequently encountered frosty judicial receptions when their acts are challenged in court. Unlike school libraries, the policies of local and state public libraries are not entitled to any heightened judicial deference and, therefore, those officials who manage them must hew very close to traditional First Amendment free speech doctrine. For example, a federal district court declared unconstitutional the Wichita Falls Public Library's decision to remove Heather Has Two Mommies and Daddy's Roommate—books that experts had deemed suitable for small children—from the children's section of the library and have them placed in the adult section (Sund v. City of Wichita Falls, Texas [2000]). Thus, nonschool public libraries are even more tightly constrained by the First Amendment than are their public school counterparts, for the efforts of library officials to remove or restrict access to books have been closely scrutinized and are rarely tolerated by the courts.

MARK KEMPER

References and Further Reading

American Library Association. Home Page. <http://www.ala.org>.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Board of Education, Island Trees Union School District No. 26 v. Pico*, 457 U.S. 853 (1982)
- Brown v. Woodland Joint Unified School District*, 27 F.3d 1373 (9th Cir. 1994)
- Campbell v. Tammany Parish School Board*, 64 F.3d 184 (5th Cir. 1995)
- Counts v. Cedarville School District*, 295 F.Supp.2d 996 (W.D. Ark. 2003)
- Epperson v. Arkansas*, 393 U.S. 97 (1968)
- Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier*, 484 U.S. 260 (1988)
- Keyishian v. Board of Regents*, 385 U.S. 589 (1967)
- Monteiro v. Tempe Union High School District*, 158 F.3d 1022 (9th Cir. 1998)
- Mozert v. Hawkings County Board of Education*, 827 F.2d 1058 (6th Cir. 1987)
- Rosenberg v. Board of Education of the City of New York*, 92 N.Y.S.2d 344 (1949)
- Sund v. City of Wichita Falls, Texas*, 121 F.Supp. 2d 530 (Fed. Dist., 2000)
- Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Free School District*, 393 U.S. 503 (1969)
- Virgil v. School Board of Columbia County, Florida*, 862 F.2d 1517 (11th Cir. 1989)

BORDENKIRCHER v. HAYES, 434 U.S. 357 (1978)

When we think of adjudicating guilt, we think of trials—witnesses questioned, lawyers locked in forensic combat, juries attentive to the subtleties of the case in preparation for their deliberations, and the verdict that will ultimately puncture the tension in the courtroom. The reality is that upwards of 95 percent of felony convictions are secured by the accused's own admission of guilt. These admissions of guilt in open court are the consequence of the controversial but longstanding practice of plea bargaining. The idea is simple: a criminal defendant admits guilt and thus foregoes a formal trial in exchange for sentencing leniency. Whereas the defendant benefits by the lighter punishment, society benefits by reducing the time and expense in adjudicating guilt. But are there limits to the pressure that the prosecution may apply to a defendant to induce a guilty plea?

Bordenkircher v. Hayes addresses that issue. The prosecutor offered to recommend a sentence of five years imprisonment in exchange for defendant Hayes's guilty plea to an indictment charging forgery. The prosecutor warned that he would secure another indictment if Hayes refused the plea offer, an indictment that would charge Hayes with being an "habitual offender," thus ramping up Hayes's sentencing exposure to life imprisonment. The prosecutor's motives were transparent and beyond dispute: he threatened Hayes with life imprisonment to induce him to forego his constitutional right to a jury trial. Hayes refused to plead guilty, and the prosecutor followed through on his threat, charging Hayes under the Kentucky Habitual Criminal Act. When Hayes was convicted, the judge sentenced Hayes to life imprisonment, as required by the habitual offender statute.

The Supreme Court found nothing improper with a prosecutor threatening to send a defendant to prison for life if that defendant refuses to accept a plea bargain of five years' imprisonment. The Court rooted its conclusion in the fact that plea bargaining is a form of bartering for rights, and prosecutors may legitimately drive hard bargains with the sole motive "to persuade the defendant to forgo his right to plead not guilty." That no one—not even the prosecutor himself—believed life imprisonment was the appropriate sentence for Paul Lewis Hayes was thus irrelevant to the issue of the prosecutor's ratcheting up the charges in reaction to Hayes's refusal to plead guilty. Bordenkircher marks the triumph of plea bargaining in our system of criminal justice.

DAN R. WILLIAMS

References and Further Reading

- Fisher, George, Plea Bargaining's Triumph, Yale Law Journal 109 (2000): 857.
 Schulhofer, Stephen J., Is Plea Bargaining Inevitable? Harvard Law Review 97 (1984): 1037.

See also Guilty Plea; Due Process; Plea Bargaining

BORK, ROBERT HERON (1927–)

Noted jurist, author, and scholar, Robert Heron Bork was born in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. He received a B.A. from the University of Chicago in 1948 and a J.D. in 1953. From 1954 to 1962, he worked in private practice before moving on to a professorship at Yale Law School. He served as solicitor general of the United States from 1972 to 1977 and as acting attorney general of the United States in 1973–1974. During his tenure as attorney general he became a part of the history of the Watergate scandal when he followed President's Nixon's order to fire special prosecutor Archibald Cox. Attorney General Elliot Richardson and his assistant, William Ruckelshaus, were first ordered to fire Cox, but refused to do so and resigned. Bork wished to resign as well, but Richardson and Ruckelshaus asked that he remain in order to ensure that the Justice Department continued to operate.

In 1977, Bork returned to teaching at Yale Law School. In 1982, President Ronald Reagan appointed Bork to the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit where he established a reputation as a conservative jurist. In 1987, with the announcement of Justice Lewis Powell's retirement, President Reagan nominated Bork for the U.S. Supreme Court.

The nomination sparked a major debate because of Bork's controversial views on issues such as judicial activism, civil rights, and civil liberties. Bork advocates a strict constructionist reading of the Constitution, argues that jurists should be guided by the original intent of the founders when applying provisions of the Constitution, and maintains that judges should not legislate from the bench. This has led him to take issue with the U.S. Supreme Court and some of its decisions. For example, Bork takes aim at Griswold v. Connecticut (1964), a landmark case that formally established a constitutional right to privacy. Bork contends that Justice Douglas created an overall right to privacy that does not exist in the Constitution. He asserts that the judiciary erroneously utilizes the Fourteenth Amendment to create new constitutional rights. Additionally, Bork supports a more limited reading of First Amendment rights and privileges.

Bork's nomination hearings before the Senate Judiciary Committee began on September 15, 1987, and lasted twelve days. In addition to the lengthy questioning of Bork by the Committee, numerous supporters and opponents testified as well. In addition, the American Bar Association gave Bork its highest rating. However, in the end, the vote from the Judiciary Committee was nine to five against Bork. All of the Democrats voted against him, as well as one Republican, Arlen Specter. Bork's nomination was defeated in the Senate at large, mainly on party lines, by a vote of fifty-eight to forty-two. The defeat was significant because it marked a change in what was viewed as the advice and consent role of the U.S. Senate. Previously, nominees could expect to be confirmed regardless of political affiliation, as long as they were experienced and qualified.

Two months after his nomination was defeated, Bork resigned from the Court of Appeals to write and lecture at the American Enterprise Institute, where he is currently a senior fellow. He continues to research, publish, and speak on issues such as constitutional and anti-trust law, as well as American culture.

MARY K. MANKUS

References and Further Reading

- Bork, Robert H. The Tempting of America: The Political Seduction of the Law. New York: Free Press, 1990.
- , The Constitution, Original Intent, and Economic Rights, San Diego Law Review 23 (1986): 823–32.
- Bronner, Ethan. Battle for Justice: How the Bork Nomination Shook America. New York: W.W. Norton & Company, 1989.
- McGuigan, Patrick B., and David M. Weyrich. Ninth Justice: The Fight for Bork. Washington, DC: Free Congress Research and Education Foundation, 1990.

See also Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965)

BOSTON MASSACRE TRIAL (1770)

Troops had been stationed in Boston and other cities in the colonies as a result of growing resistance by the colonists against imperial laws, especially the hated Townshend Acts. Ironically, on the same day as the Acts were repealed, March 5, 1770, a fight erupted with fatal consequences. Citizens constantly harassed the troops, and during a demonstration, a squad of British soldiers led by Captain Thomas Preston was struck by missiles thrown by the colonists. The soldiers fired into the crowd and killed five men, including an African American, Crispus Attucks, who was leading the group. Only the withdrawal of troops from Boston prevented a major riot.

The eight soldiers and their commanding officer were tried for murder and were defended by John Adams, later the second president of the United States. Adams was a leader of the popular resistance to the British government, but he did not condone violence or mob action. When Adams was asked to defend the British soldiers who were charged with murder as a result of this clash, he promptly accepted. With the help of two other lawyers, he won acquittal for all but two of the men. Those two were declared guilty of manslaughter and, after claiming benefit of clergy, were branded on the thumb.

Despite the high tensions of the period, most patriots applauded the trial as evidence that the colonists remained wedded to the rule of law, and that the right of trial by jury should not be abandoned.

MELVIN I. UROFSKY

References and Further Reading

- Zobel, Hiller B. The Boston Massacre. New York: Norton, 1970.

BOWEN v. AMERICAN HOSPITAL ASSOCIATION, 476 U.S. 610 (1986)

Important rights and policies can be in tension when a governmental agency seeks to act on a child's behalf and parental consent has not been obtained. The conflict is heightened when the agency is part of the federal government and is attempting to regulate in an area traditionally under the control of the states. In Bowen v. American Hospital Assn., the Supreme Court reined in such an attempt because it exceeded the authority conferred upon the agency by Congress.

Under Section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, "[n]o otherwise qualified handicapped individual . . . shall, solely by reason of his handicap, be excluded from participation in, be denied the benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination under any program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance." In 1984, the Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) promulgated regulations under the act. In relevant part, the regulations established "[p]rocedures relating to health care for handicapped infants." Those procedures required the posting of informational notices, authorized expedited access to records and expedited compliance actions, and directed state child protective services agencies to "prevent instances of unlawful medical neglect of handicapped children."

Various plaintiffs, including the American Hospital Association and the American Medical Association, challenged the regulations. The lower courts held for the plaintiffs. The Supreme Court affirmed via a plurality opinion.

The plurality found that the need seen by HHS for federal monitoring of hospitals' treatment decisions rested wholly on situations in which parents refused their consent to treatment. Yet, the Court stated, a hospital's withholding treatment from a handicapped infant when the parents did not consent to treatment could not violate Section 504 of the act since—absent such consent—the infant neither is "otherwise qualified" nor has been denied care "solely by reason of his handicap."

The plurality also concluded that the regulations improperly commandeered state employees and resources. Although HHS could require state agencies to document their own compliance with Section 504, nothing in the act authorized HHS to compel state agencies to monitor and enforce compliance by other recipients (that is, the hospitals) of federal funds. The Supreme Court subsequently developed the “commandeering” principle in the New York and Printz cases.

Bowen offered important observations about the factual basis required for agency rules and about the degree of deference courts will accord to agency positions. “It is an axiom of administrative law that an agency’s explanation of the basis for its decision must include a rational connection between the facts found and the choice made Agency deference has not come so far that we will uphold regulations whenever it is possible to conceive a basis for administrative action.” This is particularly so when the federal agency seeks to superintend decisions “traditionally entrusted to state governance.”

STEVE R. JOHNSON

References and Further Reading

“Annotation: Who is recipient of, and what constitutes program receiving, federal financial assistance for purposes of §504 of the Rehabilitation Act (29 U.S.C.A. §794), which prohibits any program or activity receiving financial assistance from discriminating on basis of disability.” 160 American Law Reports Federal 297.

Cases and Statutes Cited

New York v. United States, 505 U.S. 144 (1992)
Printz v. United States, 521 U.S. 898 (1997)

BOWEN v. KENDRICK, 487 U.S. 589 (1988)

In Bowen v. Kendrick, the Court upheld the Adolescent Family Life Act (AFLA) against an establishment clause challenge. The act allowed federal grants to go to agencies that provide services related to teen sexuality and pregnancy. Both public and private agencies (including private religious organizations) were eligible for grants under the act. The act was challenged on its face, that is, it was challenged as being unconstitutional by itself, rather than as applied to various agencies. Chief Justice Rehnquist wrote the majority opinion.

The Court ostensibly applied the Lemon test. The Lemon test requires that a law have a secular purpose, a primary effect that neither advances nor inhibits religion, and that the law not excessively entangle government and religion. Yet the Court held that even though the act in some ways paralleled the views and practices of certain religions, the purpose of the act was not to promote religion, but rather to address the problems caused by teen pregnancy and sexual behavior. The Court held that the primary effect of the act did not advance religion, because the grants were available to a wide range of agencies and organizations. It was reasonable for Congress to include religious organizations in the act because such organizations can have an influence on values and family structure, and many of the religious organizations that would receive funds under the program were not “pervasively sectarian.” Thus, the Court held that religion would only benefit incidentally and remotely from the act. Moreover, the Court held that the monitoring required under the act did not lead to excessive entanglement between government and religion. The Court did remand the case for a determination of whether the act violated the establishment clause as applied. This would require individual plaintiffs to challenge the program as applied to them, and thus the act could only be challenged through a patchwork of cases rather than on its face as the plaintiffs had attempted in Bowen.

Bowen is one of a series of cases that used the facial neutrality of a program—that is, the fact that aid was available to a wide range of providers, both religious and secular—to uphold the program despite effects that would seem to violate the Lemon test as applied in earlier decisions. The reasoning applied in this line of cases was expanded in Zelman v. Simmons-Harris (2002), a case that upheld a voucher program where the program was open to both religious and secular schools. Bowen might also serve as precedent for upholding “charitable choice” programs, and charitable choice proponents cite Bowen to support their arguments that such programs are constitutional. Bowen’s formalistic approach, and its language suggesting that it was reasonable for Congress to include religious organizations in AFLA since such organizations can have an influence on values and family structure, have been used by charitable choice advocates to argue that religious charities (which have an influence on helping the needy) should be allowed to receive government funding along with other charitable organizations. Yet, Bowen can be criticized for its formalistic reasoning and the resulting failure to seriously consider the effects of the program in question under the Lemon test.

FRANK S. RAVITCH

Cases and Statutes Cited

Bowen v. Kendrick, 487 U.S. 589 (1988)
Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602 (1971)
Zelman v. Simmons-Harris, 536 U.S. 639 (2002)
Adolescent Family Life Act, 42 U.S.C. §§300z et. seq

BOWEN v. ROY, 476 U.S. 693 (1986)

Pursuant to federal regulations requiring social security numbers for all dependent children, Pennsylvania authorities had stopped Aid to Dependent Families and Children benefits to Stephen Roy and Karen Miller and were also taking steps to reduce food stamps. Other than failing to provide a Social Security number for their child, Little Bird of the Snow, Roy and Miller had met all other requirements. Roy based his refusal to provide a number on his Native American belief that doing so would “rob the spirit” of his daughter and prevent her from attaining greater spiritual power.” On the last day of the trial, however, it was shown that Roy had earlier obtained a Social Security number. In the face of this, Roy then claimed that since the number had not been “used,” there had been no damage to her spirit.

The District Court, despite this last-minute revelation, found for Roy, holding “that the public ‘interest in maintaining an efficient and fraud resistant system can be met without requiring use of a social security number’” It enjoined government from both using the existing Social Security number and denying any appropriate governmental benefits.

The Supreme Court, in an opinion by Chief Justice Warren Burger, reversed. Burger, who in Wisconsin v. Yoder, had surprised free exercise advocates by appearing to continue in the Warren Court’s tradition by following Sherbert v. Verner, saw Roy’s claim as involving something quite different, an effort by a free exercise claimant to dictate to government how government should conduct its own affairs. No justice explicitly disagreed with Burger on this point. Burger’s refusal, however, to apply either “the least restrictive means of achieving some compelling state interest” (test of Thomas v. Review Board), or the test of being “essential to accomplish an overriding governmental interest” (United State v. Lee), led Justice Sandra Day O’Connor to issue a partial dissent, joined by Justices William Brennan and Thurgood Marshall. Justice Harry Blackmun, although not joining O’Connor’s opinion—Blackmun and Justice John Paul Stevens concluded that the existing Social Security number mooted the case—agreed with O’Connor that Burger should have applied either the Lee or Thomas standards of review to the present case.

Burger, for his part, argued that when the government’s burden on religion was indirect and incidental as in this situation, “The Government meets its burden when it demonstrates that a challenged requirement for government benefits, neutral and uniform in its application, is a reasonable means of promoting a legitimate public interest.” If accommodations to such neutral regulations are to be made, Burger continued, that was the responsibility of the legislature. An effort to waive the Social Security number requirement was mounted in 1999, but was unsuccessful.

Four years after Roy, a different Court—Antonin Scalia replacing Burger and Anthony Kennedy succeeding Justice Lewis Powell—adopted a free exercise standard in Employment Division v. Smith that clearly owed much to Burger’s opinion.

FRANCIS GRAHAM LEE

References and Further Reading

Cole, Jamie Alan, A New Category of Free Exercise Claims: Protection for Individuals Objecting to Government Actions that Impede Their Religion, University of Pennsylvania Law Review 135 (1987): 1557–90.
Fisher, Louis. “Statutory Exemptions for Religious Freedom.” Journal of Church and State 44 (2002): 291–316.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872 (1990)
Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398 (1963)
Thomas v. Review Board of Indiana Employment Security Division, 450 U.S. 707 (1981)
United States v. Lee, 455 U.S. 252 (1982)
Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205 (1972)

BOWERS v. HARDWICK, 478 U.S. 186 (1986)

When a police officer came to serve an arrest warrant upon Michael Hardwick for a citation that Hardwick had already paid, the officer found Hardwick in his bedroom engaged in consensual oral sex with another man. Hardwick was arrested and jailed for violating Georgia’s sodomy law, which criminalized oral and anal sex. The American Civil Liberties Union offered to represent Hardwick and challenge the constitutionality of the sodomy law in his criminal trial. But because the Fulton County district attorney opted not to seek a jury indictment against Hardwick, the ACLU instead filed suit in federal court against Georgia Attorney General Michael Bowers. Hardwick and an anonymous married couple John and Mary Doe sought a declaration that Georgia’s sodomy law unconstitutionally violated their right to privacy, which the Supreme Court had recognized in cases such as Griswold v. Connecticut (1965). The trial court summarily dismissed the suit, but the intermediate federal appellate court reversed, rejecting the participation of the Does but agreeing with Hardwick that Georgia's sodomy law deprived him of liberty without due process of law in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

The U.S. Supreme Court reversed, upholding Georgia's sodomy law five to four. Justices Lewis Powell, William H. Rehnquist, Sandra Day O'Connor, and Chief Justice Burger joined Justice Byron White's majority opinion. The Court commenced by framing the issue narrowly. Rather than ask whether the law violated Hardwick's fundamental right to privacy, the Court posed the threshold question as whether the Constitution "confers a fundamental right upon homosexuals to engage in sodomy," or, elsewhere, as whether under the Constitution there is "a fundamental right to engage in homosexual sodomy."

Having so narrowly framed the issue, the Court then narrowly construed its precedents. The majority refused to treat them as reflecting some abstract principle, such as the existence of a sphere of personal autonomy presumptively protected against government interference. Instead, the Court described them at a lower level of abstraction, interpreting them only as cases about discrete subjects: the opinion described the relevant cases "as dealing with child rearing and education; with family relationships; with procreation; with marriage; with contraception; and with abortion" (citations omitted). The contraception and abortion decisions might have been seen as protecting a right to engage in non-procreative sexual activity, which would then include the right to engage in oral or anal sex. The Court instead characterized them as involving only a "right to decide whether or not to beget or bear a child." The opinion contemptuously dismissed the arguments of Harvard law professor Laurence Tribe, who had joined Hardwick's counsel, as "at best, facetious." Finally, after deciding for the foregoing reasons that Georgia's law implicated no fundamental right, the Court subjected the statute to rational basis review, the form of scrutiny most deferential to legislatures, and concluded that a presumed judgment by the people of Georgia that "homosexual sodomy" was immoral was an adequate justification for its sodomy law.

Chief Justice Burger authored a concurring opinion that emphasized the long history of criminalization of sodomy as "firmly rooted in Judaeo-Christian moral and ethical standards," even going so far as to quote Blackstone's Commentaries assessment that sodomy was "an offense of 'deeper malignity' than rape." Justice Powell, who later publicly stated that he thought he was probably mistaken in voting to uphold the constitutionality of Georgia's sodomy law, also wrote a concurring opinion, in which he suggested that since Hardwick had not been prosecuted, he could not raise a viable Eighth Amendment claim of cruel and unusual punishment, but that "a prison sentence for such conduct—certainly a sentence of long duration—would create a serious Eighth Amendment issue."

Justice Harry Blackmun wrote a dissenting opinion joined by Justices William Brennan, Thurgood Marshall, and John Paul Stevens. They criticized the majority for distorting the issue by its "almost obsessive focus on homosexual activity" when Georgia's ban on oral and anal sex was gender-neutral. Insisting that the Court should interpret constitutional rights with respect to their underlying purposes, the dissenters suggested that its precedents protected privacy rights "because they form so central a part of an individual's life." "[W]hat the Court really has refused to recognize is the fundamental interest all individuals have in controlling the nature of their intimate associations with others," they wrote. The dissenters argued that Georgia's law impinged upon Hardwick's "decisional privacy," or autonomy with respect to "certain decisions that are properly for the individual to make," as well as upon his "spatial privacy," for in their view, "the right of an individual to conduct intimate relationships in the intimacy of his or her own home seems . . . to be the heart of the Constitution's protection of privacy."

Justice Stevens also wrote a dissenting opinion, which was joined by Justices Brennan and Marshall. Like the Blackmun dissent, which also analogized Georgia's sodomy law to the antisecregation law invalidated in Loving v. Virginia (1967), the Stevens dissent read Loving as establishing that "the fact that the governing majority in a State has traditionally viewed a particular practice as immoral is not a sufficient reason for upholding a law prohibiting the practice." Invoking "our tradition of respect for the dignity of individual choice in matters of conscience," Stevens interpreted the Court's privacy decisions in cases such as Griswold and Eisenstadt v. Baird as dictating that married or unmarried different-sex couples enjoy "the right to engage in nonreproductive, sexual conduct that others may consider offensive or immoral." But because lesbian, gay, and bisexual persons have the same liberty interests as heterosexually identified people, Stevens concluded that the equal protection clause also prohibited the state from punishing same-sex sodomy. The vast majority of scholarly commentary on Bowers v. Hardwick holds that the dissenters had the better of the arguments.

Nevertheless, the precedent of Bowers v. Hardwick was used by lower courts to justify all manner of discrimination against lesbian, gay, and bisexual persons. If it is constitutional to criminalize “the conduct that defines the class,” courts said, then so is subjecting same-sex couples to greater criminal punishments for engaging in sex with a minor, excluding openly lesbian/gay people from military service, and so on. For seventeen years, Bowers remained part of the law of the land. Finally, though, Bowers was overruled in 2003 by Lawrence v. Texas, which declared Bowers to be “wrong the day it was decided.”

DAVID B. CRUZ

References and Further Reading

Thomas, Kendall, Beyond the Privacy Principle, Columbia Law Review 92 (1992): 1432.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965)
Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438 (1972)
Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. (1967)
Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 588 (2003)

See also Privacy; Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965); Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 588 (2003)

BOY SCOUTS

See Boy Scouts of America v. Dale, 530 U.S. 640 (2000)

BOY SCOUTS OF AMERICA v. DALE, 530 U.S. 640 (2000)

The First Amendment right to free speech includes a right to associate for expressive purposes. Groups that come together to express a message cannot be compelled to include people whose presence would compromise that message. This right to expressive association can conflict with antidiscrimination laws. The task of courts in such cases is to determine whether the association has an expressive purpose, and whether forced inclusion of a particular member would undermine that purpose. Boy Scouts of America v. Dale presented both questions.

James Dale became a Cub Scout at the age of eight and a Boy Scout at eleven, eventually attaining the prestigious rank of Eagle Scout. In 1989, he applied for adult membership and became an assistant scoutmaster. Around the same time, after entering college, Dale first acknowledged to himself and others that he was gay.

In 1990, having apparently learned Dale’s sexual orientation from a newspaper article, the Scouts revoked his membership on the grounds that the Boy Scouts “specifically forbid membership to homosexuals.” In 1992, Dale filed a complaint in New Jersey state court, claiming that his expulsion violated a New Jersey statute forbidding discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation (among other traits) in any place of public accommodation. The Scouts argued that the application of this law violated their federal constitutional right to expressive association.

In the state courts, Dale ultimately prevailed. The New Jersey Supreme Court agreed that the Scouts expressed a belief in moral values and used its activities “to encourage the moral development of its members,” but found itself unpersuaded that the Scouts expressed a message condemning homosexuality. Thus, it concluded, requiring the Scouts to accept Dale did not affect the Scouts’ “ability to carry out their various purposes.”

The Supreme Court reversed. It announced that courts in expressive association cases “must give deference to an association’s assertions regarding the nature of its expression” and also to its “view of what would impair its expression.” Applying the appropriate deference, the Court found that the Scouts did “teach that homosexual conduct is not morally straight” and that accepting Dale as a member would force the Scouts to send the message “that the Boy Scouts accepts homosexual conduct as a legitimate form of behavior.”

The Court went on to consider whether New Jersey’s interest in opposing discrimination was weighty enough to justify such an infringement on the Scouts’ right to expressive association, but for practical purposes, found that the infringement was enough. The Court has never allowed an antidiscrimination law to overcome the right to expressive association if its application would seriously burden the right. Dale is thus doctrinally consistent both with cases that strike the down the application of antidiscrimination laws, such as Hurley v. Irish-American Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Group of Boston, and with those that allow it, such as Roberts v. United States Jaycees and Runyon v. McCrary. Dale’s significance lies in its announced deference to the association’s assertions, which may be a departure from Roberts and Runyon.

KERMIT ROOSEVELT, III

References and Further Reading

Bernstein, David E., Antidiscrimination Laws and the First Amendment, Missouri Law Review 66 (2001): 83.

Koppelman, Andrew, Signs of the Times: Boy Scouts of America v. Dale and the Changing Meaning of Nondiscrimination, Cardozo Law Review 23 (2002): 1819.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Hurley v. Irish-American Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Group of Boston, 515 U.S. 557 (1995)

Roberts v. United States Jaycees, 468 U.S. 609 (1984)

Runyon v. McCrary, 427 U.S. 160 (1976)

See also Antidiscrimination Laws; Freedom of Association; Gay and Lesbian Rights; Hurley v. Irish-American Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Group of Boston, 515 U.S. 557 (1995); Roberts v. United States Jaycees, 468 U.S. 609 (1984)

BOYD v. UNITED STATES, 116 U.S. 616 (1886)

An agent of the customs department, referred to as a collector, seized thirty-five cases of plate glass in pursuance of customs law. The importer was accused of attempting to defraud the federal government of the revenues and duties normally imposed upon the goods. During the trial that followed, the government sought to obtain records of similar prior importations, specifically the receipt by the importer of twenty-nine cases of similar plate glass. A court ordered the importer to produce the invoice in question in court for governmental inspection. The production of the invoice was governed by an 1874 law (18 St. 186) that allowed the government to inspect, but not take possession of, documents of the sort requested. The 1874 legislation was enacted to revise similar past statutes (12 St. 737 and 14 St. 547), which were constitutionally objectionable; the legislation skirted constitutional questions by allowing judges to compel the production of documents without physical search or seizure. A party who refused to produce requested documents was considered guilty of the offenses that the documents may have proved.

The defense produced the requested invoice under heavy protest of Fourth and Fifth Amendment violations; they again protested during the trial when the government offered the invoice into evidence. After the trial, Boyd and unnamed companion claimants sued the government on the grounds that the statute which compelled the production of documents from the claimants was unconstitutional. They claimed that the mandatory production of documents before the court under risk of penalty constituted an illegal search. Although no government agent searched or seized evidence, the production order was a functional equivalent of such a search. Further, assuming the guilt of a party who refused to produce requested documents before the court violated the Fifth Amendment's provision prohibiting self-incrimination.

In a lengthy legislative history reaching back to eighteenth-century British jurisprudence, Justice Bradley agrees with Boyd. He finds a strong connection between the Fourth and Fifth Amendments, writing that "they throw great light upon each other. For the 'unreasonable searches and seizures' condemned in the Fourth Amendment are almost always made for the purpose of compelling a man to give evidence against himself, which in criminal cases is condemned in the Fifth Amendment." Justice Bradley acknowledges that this breach of rights is not the most egregious example, but proposes that the Court operate under the principle of obsta principiis (resist the beginning) and decide this case with an eye toward more obnoxious encroachments. He writes "though the proceeding in question is divested of many of the aggravating incidents of actual search and seizure . . . it contains their substance and essence."

Boyd defines a strong relationship between the Fourth and Fifth Amendments that continues to guide the Court's deliberations in similar matters. However, the case's holding was overturned, in part, by Warden, Md. Penitentiary v. Hayden, which recognizes the limitations of the Boyd decision, most notably the production of evidence that does not serve to self-incriminate.

JOHN GREGORY PALMER

References and Further Reading

Stephens, Otis, Richard Glenn, and Donald Stephenson, eds. Unreasonable Searches and Seizures: Rights and Liberties under the Law (America's Freedoms). Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2005.

Cases and Statutes Cited

United States of America v. E.A.B., 1–35, Thirty-five Cases of Plate Glass

Act to amend the customs revenue laws, etc., Act of June 22, 1874, 18 St. 186

An act to regulate the disposition of the proceeds of fines, penalties, and forfeitures incurred under the laws relating to the custom, and for other purposes, Act of March 2, 1867, 14 St. 547

An act to prevent and punish frauds upon the revenue, Act of March 3, 1863, 12 St. 737

Warden, Md. Penitentiary v. Hayden, 387 U.S. 294 (1967)

See also Search (General Definition); Search Warrants; Seizures; Warden v. Hayden, 387 U.S. 294 (1967)

BOYKIN v. ALABAMA, 395 U.S. 238, 242 (1969)

The central issue in the Boykin case was the responsibility of a criminal court to safeguard the rights of the accused. Edward Boykin, a twenty-seven-year-old African-American man, was sentenced to death by an Alabama judge in 1966 after pleading guilty to five counts of armed robbery, at the time punishable by execution according to state law. In his automatic appeal to the Alabama Supreme Court, Boykin's attorneys argued that a death sentence for armed robbery constituted cruel and unusual punishment. The Court rejected the appeal but expressed doubts as to whether the trial judge had acted properly in accepting the defendant's guilty plea without questioning him or requiring him to address the court.

Boykin then appealed his case to the U.S. Supreme Court, which in June 1969 ruled by seven-to-two majority that the judge erred in allowing the guilty plea without requiring Boykin to confirm it himself, stating that the standards for evaluating whether a defendant knowingly and voluntarily enters a guilty plea should at least equal the standards for determining a defendant's mental competence to stand trial. Writing for the majority, Justice William O. Douglas opined that in order to meet these standards, the trial record must clearly show that the defendant personally waived his or her constitutional rights. The Boykin decision thus joined the Miranda and Gideon decisions in expanding and clarifying the responsibility of courts to ensure the rights of criminal defendants, thereby reinforcing constitutional guarantees of due process, trial by jury, and protection from self-incrimination.

MICHAEL H. BURCHETT

References and Further Reading

- Horn, Maurita Elaine, Confessional Stipulations: Protecting Waiver of Constitutional Rights, University of Chicago Law Review 61 (Winter 1994): 1:225–51.
- Kersch, Kenneth I. Constructing Civil Liberties: Discontinuities in the Development of American Constitutional Law. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2004.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Gideon v. Wainwright*, 372 U.S. 335 (1963)
- Miranda v. Arizona*, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)

See also Capital Punishment and Right of Appeal; Capital Punishment: Proportionality; Guilty Plea; Jury Trial Right; Miranda Warning; Plea Bargaining; Race and Criminal Justice; Self-Incrimination: Miranda and Evolution

BRADFIELD v. ROBERTS, 175 U.S. 291 (1899)

Bradfield v. Roberts is the first of only two Supreme Court cases that have addressed whether government funding of faith-based human services programs is constitutional. In Bradfield, a taxpayer sued the federal government challenging a congressional appropriation that funded the construction of a hospital in the District of Columbia that was owned and operated by the Sisters of Charity, a monastic order of the Catholic Church. Pursuant to the appropriation, city officials from the District of Columbia and the hospital directors entered into an agreement providing that the hospital would care for indigent city patients in exchange for construction of the hospital and continued payments for patient care. The taxpayer alleged that the appropriation violated the establishment clause of the First Amendment, which states that “Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion.” In other words, the taxpayer asserted that the arrangement violated the separation between church and state.

The Court upheld the appropriation and ruled against the taxpayer. Writing for the Court, Justice Peckham reasoned that the hospital was incorporated as a secular institution. According to the Court, it was thus irrelevant that the Roman Catholic Church might influence the management of the hospital. Such influence could not “alter the legal character of the corporation” as defined in its charter. Rather, the hospital was an “ordinary private corporation” whose secular duties and rights were set forth in the legal documents of incorporation. Moreover, there was no allegation that the hospital discriminated on the basis of religion or in violation of its charter.

The Court relied on the Bradfield decision in 1988 in Bowen v. Kendrick, the only other Supreme Court decision addressing government funding of faith-based human service programs. In Kendrick, the Court upheld a federal statute that provided government grants to religious organizations for the counseling of pregnant teenagers. Citing to Bradfield, the Kendrick Court stated that “this Court has never held that religious institutions are disabled by the First Amendment from participating in publicly sponsored social welfare programs.” The Court determined that Bradfield remained good law, especially given this country's long history of interdependency between the government and religious organizations in providing for the needy.

Since 1996, when the American welfare system was reformed, Bradfield has taken on increased importance. Among other things, the 1996 welfare legislation authorized the granting of federal funds to faith-based organizations that provide welfare-related social services. This provision is commonly called “charitable choice.” Opponents of charitable choice contend that charitable choice violates the separation of church and state. Proponents of charitable choice believe that faith-based organizations are particularly effective in combating social problems, and they are seeking to expand charitable choice programs to a wide array of federal human service programs. Bradfield provides legal support for these charitable choice programs. However, in both Bradfield and Kendrick, the faith-based organizations at issue were not using government funds to advance their religious missions. For instance, the hospital in Bradfield was not conducting religious services or discriminating against nonbelievers. Thus, Bradfield does not answer the question as to whether a government grant for social services that also flows to religious activities is constitutional. This question remains to be resolved by the Supreme Court.

MICHELE GILMAN

References and Further Reading

- Gilman, Michele, ‘Charitable Choice’ and the Accountability Challenge: Reconciling the Need for Regulation with the First Amendment Religion Clauses, Vanderbilt Law Review 55 (2002): 3:799–888.
- Rotunda, Ronald, and John E. Nowak. Nowak and Rotunda’s Hornbook on Constitutional Law. 7th ed. St. Paul, MN: West, 2004.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Bowen v. Kendrick*, 487 U.S. 589 (1988)
- Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act of 1996, 42 U.S.C. § 604a (charitable choice provision)
- See also Bowen v. Kendrick, 487 U.S. 589 (1988); Charitable Choice; Establishment Clause Doctrine; Supreme Court Jurisprudence

BRADY v. MARYLAND, 373 U.S. 83 (1963)

In Brady, the Supreme Court for the first time squarely recognized that the Fourteenth Amendment due process clause guarantees criminal defendants the right to be given favorable information in the possession of the prosecution or the police.

Brady admitted at his murder trial that he had participated in the crime but claimed that his confederate, Boblit, had actually committed the killing. After Brady was convicted and sentenced to death, his lawyers learned that the prosecution had withheld a statement Boblit made to the authorities before Brady’s trial in which Boblit confirmed that he was the killer. The Maryland Court of Appeals, reasoning that Brady’s admission that he had participated in the killing conclusively established his guilt, nonetheless ruled that the withheld statement was relevant to the question of punishment. Therefore, the state court granted Brady a new sentencing hearing.

Brady appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court, arguing that the withheld statement also entitled him to a new trial, but the Court rejected his argument by a vote of seven to two. The Court, however, used Brady’s case to broadly hold that if the prosecution has any information favorable to the defendant and material to his or her guilt or punishment, due process requires the prosecution to turn it over to the defense. In a series of subsequent cases, including United States v. Agurs, Pennsylvania v. Ritchie, and Arizona v. Youngblood, the Court has reaffirmed, but also limited, the defendant’s constitutional right to discovery of favorable information.

DAVID A. MORAN

References and Further Reading

- Imwinkelried, Edwin, and Norman Garland, 2d ed. Exculpatory Evidence. Charlottesville, VA: Michie, 1996.
- Stacy, Tom, The Search for Truth in Constitutional Criminal Procedure, Columbia Law Review 91 (1991): 1369.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Arizona v. Youngblood*, 488 U.S. 51 (1988)
- Pennsylvania v. Ritchie*, 480 U.S. 39 (1987)
- United States v. Agurs*, 427 U.S. 97 (1976)
- See also Arizona v. Youngblood, 488 U.S. 51 (1988); Due Process; Fourteenth Amendment; United States v. Agurs, 427 U.S. 97 (1976)

BRANDEIS, LOUIS DEMBITZ (1856–1941)

An extremely effective lawyer and reformer in the Progressive era before Woodrow Wilson named him to the Supreme Court in 1916, Brandeis had very little if any contact with issues that would be identified as civil liberties. About the only reform that even comes close was his involvement in efforts to improve the treatment of patients in public mental asylums in the late 1890s, and that work seems to have resulted more from a request from one of his reform colleagues than from any innate personal interest.

At the time when Brandeis took his seat on the bench, the dominant issue on the Court's docket involved economic rights, primarily the protection of private property through substantive due process and the negation of protective labor legislation through the doctrine of freedom of contract. Brandeis, who as a lawyer had convinced the Court to uphold maximum hours legislation for women in Muller v. Oregon (1908), believed that while important rights inhered in property, they had to be subservient to the greater good. Under the states' police powers, both property rights as well as freedom of contract could be curtailed to protect workers from the harsh conditions that they faced in modern industrialized factories.

Once on the Court, Brandeis often spoke out against the conservative interpretation of property rights as a danger to the rights of others, especially workers. It is not that Brandeis did not believe in property rights; he did, but believed that when the public good required it they should be limited. He especially believed in the right of laboring people to organize into unions and to bargain collectively, although throughout the 1920s he often stood alone or with Holmes in this view, as in Bedford Cut Stone Co. v. Journeymen Stone Cutters Association (1927). But his most original contributions came in the areas of free speech and privacy.

In March 1919, Brandeis joined Holmes in his landmark speech decision in Schenck v. United States (1919), in which the Court upheld a conviction for antiwar expression under the 1917 Espionage Act. In this decision Holmes set out what would be the defining test for free speech for the next half-century: "The question in every case is whether the words are used in such circumstances and are of such a nature to create a clear and present danger that they will bring about the substantive evils that Congress has a right to prevent." Since the clear and present danger test was so highly subjective, it served as a device by which conservative judges could silence almost any unpopular opinion, a danger that civil libertarians immediately recognized. Holmes, long the darling of liberals, suddenly found himself the object of their severe criticism.

Eight months later, in Abrams v. United States (1919), Holmes, joined by Brandeis this time in dissent, attempted to make the clear and present danger test more speech protective, and introduced his idea of free trade in ideas, in which all ideas should be heard so that the "best test of truth is the power of the thought to get itself accepted in the competition of the market."

Brandeis would join Holmes in all of the great speech cases of the 1920s, always in dissent, but a significant difference existed between the two men in why they valued free speech. Although Holmes provided the pithy phrases, Brandeis is the one who refined the concept and who ultimately provided the arguments that remain the basis of First Amendment free speech jurisprudence to this day.

In regard to the Schenck opinion, Brandeis later told Felix Frankfurter that "I have never been quite happy about my concurrence . . . I had not then thought the issues of freedom of speech out—I thought at the subject, not through it." In 1920, in his dissenting opinions in Schaefer v. United States (1920) and Pierce v. United States (1920), Brandeis, as he later recounted, began to understand the issues. Rather than list what the defendants should not have been allowed to say, Brandeis emphasized what they should have been allowed to say, and that would have been anything permitted in peacetime. Unlike his friend Herbert Hoover, who believed that criticism of the governmental policy ought to end at the water's shore—that is, there should be no dissent among Americans regarding foreign policy—Brandeis argued that all matters of public importance should always be open to full criticism, no matter how "radical" the speaker or how unpopular the ideas. Moreover, the test to be used in deciding whether a clear and present danger existed should not be the heightened emotional climate of wartime, but rather the quieter and presumably more rational environment of peacetime. While clearly the government could not allow war protesters to publish the times that troop ships sailed, in terms of policy criticism Brandeis would have utilized the same criteria in wartime as in peacetime, a standard that would have made convictions for seditious libel almost impossible.

In Gilbert v. Minnesota (1920), Brandeis and Holmes parted company over a state statute that prohibited interference with military enlistment. An official of the Nonpartisan League—hardly a radical organization—had been convicted under the law for telling a public meeting that the average citizen had not had a say in whether the United States should have entered the World War or whether Congress should have established a draft. Holmes silently concurred with McKenna's opinion for the majority that the speech constituted a clear and present danger, and that the state had the power to prevent such peril. Chief Justice White dissented on the grounds that the federal law preempted the field, grounds on which Brandeis agreed. But he apparently was very angry at his brethren who had consistently used the due process clause to strike down economic measures, but here forbore from even a rudimentary examination of a far greater imposition on civil liberties, freedom of speech. Gilbert is perhaps the best example that Brandeis saw a significant difference in how the Court should approach economic measures—with judicial restraint and deferring to the elected branches’ policymaking authority—and laws affecting such basic rights as speech, in which the Court should take a more strenuous approach to protect individual liberties. The dissent in Gilbert in many ways prefigured not only Harlan Fiske Stone’s Footnote Four in United States v. Carolene Products Co. (1938), but also the strict scrutiny standard adopted by the Warren Court in First Amendment cases.

Brandeis’s greatest contribution to free speech jurisprudence came in his concurring opinion in Whitney v. California (1927), which clearly delineated the differences between what one scholar has called his “republican” justification for the First Amendment and Holmes’s libertarian approach.

Charlotte Anita Whitney, a niece of Justice Stephen J. Field and “a woman nearing sixty, a Wellesley graduate long distinguished in philanthropic work,” had been convicted under the California Criminal Syndicalism Act of 1919 for helping to organize the Communist Labor Party in that state. The law, originally aimed at the Industrial Workers of the World, made it a felony to organize or knowingly become a member of any organization founded to advocate the commission of crimes, sabotage or violence as a means of bringing about political or industrial change. Whitney denied that the party had ever intended to become an instrument of violence and that no evidence existed to prove that it had ever engaged in criminal or violent acts. Nonetheless, the conservative majority upheld the conviction, and characterized the law as a legitimate decision by the state legislature to prevent the violent overthrow of society.

Because of technical issues (the defense had not raised the particular constitutional issue that concerned Brandeis), he chose not to dissent, but his concurrence, joined in by Holmes, provided an eloquent defense of intellectual freedom and its relation to democratic society unmatched in the annals of the Court. His opinion, which has often been cited, provides the modern basis for much of First Amendment jurisprudence.

Holmes had put forward a marketplace of ideas rationale for free speech, but it had little direct bearing upon democratic government. Holmes loved ideas, but in the abstract, and so his rationale is powerful, but in an abstract manner. His famous aphorism, that “one cannot falsely shout fire in a crowded theatre” is certainly true, but devoid of practical guidelines. Holmes cared little for the practical and dismissed reform and reformers as ineffective. The Constitution set up certain guidelines, and so long as people acted within those guidelines, he could not have cared less what they did.

For Brandeis, on the other hand, free speech constituted an essential ingredient of good government. For him, the highest calling was that of a citizen in a democracy, but the great privileges that position bestowed required corresponding responsibilities. In order to be a good citizen, one had to participate in the democratic process, to make one’s voice and views known to policymakers. One could not think responsibly about complex issues if the state censored, through sedition laws and other devices, a broad spectrum of ideas. People might agree or disagree with any one view, but they had to be aware of that view in order to fulfill their obligations. Democratic government, properly conducted, provided humankind with the great opportunity for individuals to achieve their dreams. In a famous and oft-quoted passage, he wrote that:

Those who won our independence believed that the final end of the State was to make men free to develop their faculties; and that in its government the deliberative forces should prevail over the arbitrary. They valued liberty both as an end and as a means. They believed liberty to be the secret of happiness and courage to be the secret of liberty. They believed that freedom to think as you will and to speak as you think are means indispensable to the discovery and spread of political truth; that without free speech and assembly discussion would be futile; that with them, discussion affords ordinary adequate protection against the dissemination of noxious doctrine; that the greatest menace to freedom is an inert people; that public discussion is a public duty; and that this should be a fundamental principle of the American government.

Rather than be afraid of what people might say, that radical ideas might undermine property rights, that strange ideas would yield “bad counsel,” Brandeis believed that the cure for “bad speech” was not fear, but more speech. Civic virtue, that hallmark of Athenian democracy that Brandeis prized so greatly, demanded that citizens not be afraid of the different. “Men feared witches and burnt women,” he noted. It is the function of speech to free men from the bondage of irrational fears.

Brandeis’s tying of free speech to government has led some people to argue that the First Amendment’s speech clause applies only to political speech, and that other kinds of expression do not fall within the ambit of its protection. While it is impossible to tell just how far Brandeis would have extended First Amendment protection, he clearly believed that it applied to some nonpolitical speech as well.

In Senn v. Tile Layers Protective Union (1937), the Court heard a challenge to a Wisconsin law that made peaceful picketing lawful, and forbade courts from issuing injunctions to prevent it. During a strike, a construction company owner tried to get an injunction to prohibit workers from peaceful picketing of his plant, on the grounds that it deprived him of his property rights. The Court, by a five-to-four vote, upheld the law, and Brandeis, in the majority opinion, intimated that picketing, aside from its value as a tool in a labor dispute, might also be a form of speech. Union members, he held, did not have to rely on statutes to make the facts of a labor dispute public, “for freedom of speech is guaranteed by the Federal Constitution.” Although the Court has refused to categorize picketing per se as a protected activity, it is clear that in Brandeis’s mind the First Amendment protected many forms of expression.

In his dissent in Gilbert v. Minnesota, Brandeis not only protested against the state sedition law but also added the following line: “I cannot believe that the liberty guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment includes only liberty to acquire and to enjoy property.” While at the time it appeared to many as little more than a sign of the justice’s frustration with his conservative brethren, in fact that sentence set in motion one of the most significant constitutional developments of the twentieth century, the incorporation of Bill of Rights protections through the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment so as to apply them to the states as well as to the federal government. (Ever since Barron v. Baltimore [1833], the Court had held that the protections in the first eight amendments to the Constitution applied only against Congress and not to the states.)

If Brandeis could have had his way, he would have wiped out the Fourteenth Amendment’s due process clause completely, or else severely limited it to procedural matters. Aware that the conservatives on the Court would never allow this to happen, Brandeis wanted the same protection now given to property rights to be applied to other rights that he considered fundamental, such as speech, education, choice of profession, and travel.

Ironically, one of the Court’s archconservatives first applied substantive due process to non-property rights. Justice McReynolds, in Meyer v. Nebraska (1922), struck down a statute that forbade teaching German in public schools. Although McReynolds used the language of property protection, he expanded it to include other rights including the raising and educating of one’s children, an argument that he applied again in Pierce v. Society of Sisters (1925).

That same year, while the majority upheld the conviction of communist leader Ben Gitlow under New York’s 1902 Criminal Anarchy Act (with Holmes and Brandeis dissenting), Justice Sanford noted, without any further elucidation, that: “For present purposes we may and do assume that freedom of speech and of the press—which are protected by the First Amendment from abridgement by Congress—are among the fundamental personal rights protected by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment from impairment by the States.”

Ever since that time there has been an ongoing debate over whether in fact the framers of the Fourteenth Amendment meant the Bill of Rights to apply to the states, and if so, whether only certain rights should apply (the idea of “selective incorporation” proposed by Justice Cardozo and limited to those rights deemed “fundamental”) or whether all of the Bill of Rights should apply (the idea of “total incorporation” championed by Justice Black). In the end, nearly all of the rights were in fact incorporated, but through the rationale of selective incorporation. The great revolution in civil liberties in the 1960s and afterwards owed much to Brandeis.

It is difficult to know whether Brandeis would have been an advocate of selective or total incorporation. While on the bench he had the satisfaction of seeing not only speech but freedom of press incorporated, in Near v. Minnesota (1931), as well as right to counsel in capital cases, in Powell v. Alabama (1932). But in 1937 he joined in Justice Cardozo’s opinion for the Court in Palko v. Connecticut (1937), in which Cardozo set forth his theory of selective incorporation and held that the Fifth Amendment bar against double jeopardy did not apply to the states. Brandeis had left the Court and died before Hugo Black developed his theory of total incorporation in Adamson v. California (1947).

Second only to Brandeis’s contribution to the jurisprudence of free speech was his belief that the Constitution protected a right to privacy. Brandeis had first become interested in privacy in the 1890s, when reporters had sneaked into parties given by his socially prominent partner, Samuel D. Warren. The two men had written an article titled “The Right to Privacy” and published it in the Harvard Law Review. According to Dean Roscoe Pound, the article did “nothing less than add a chapter to our law.” Warren and Brandeis had based their right to be let alone on common law protections, but once on the Court, Brandeis began to believe that privacy constituted such a fundamental right that—even though nowhere listed as such in the Constitution—it deserved the highest level of protection.

Brandeis found his chance to expound this idea in the first wiretapping case to come before the high court, Olmstead v. United States (1928). In the 1920s, technology gave the government a new tool to fight crime, the ability to listen in on the telephone conversations of alleged gangsters. By tapping Olmstead’s phone, government agents secured evidence to convict him under the National Prohibition Act. He appealed on grounds that the government had not secured a warrant, and had therefore violated the Fourth Amendment. By a bare majority of five to four, the Court upheld the conviction. In a mechanistic opinion, Chief Justice Taft said that since there had been no entry into the house itself, there had been no search within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment, and therefore a warrant had not been needed.

The opinion elicited a strong dissent from four justices—Holmes, Butler, Stone, and Brandeis. Holmes condemned wiretapping as “a dirty business” and seemed to imply that gentlemen should not read other gentlemen’s letters, or listen in on their conversations. Justice Butler tore apart Taft’s sterile interpretation of the warrant clause, but the most impressive opinion came from Brandeis, condemning not only the action of the government but also putting forth the idea of a constitutionally protected right to privacy.

First, he considered it “less evil that some criminals should escape than that the government should play an ignoble part.” The government is the great teacher in a democratic society, and if “government becomes a lawbreaker, it breeds contempt for the law.”

The most noted and influential part of the dissent dealt with the question of privacy. The framers of the Constitution, he wrote, “sought to protect Americans in their beliefs, their thoughts, their emotions and their sensations. They conferred, as against the Government, the right to be let alone—the most comprehensive of rights, and the right most valued by civilized men.” That passage was picked up and elaborated on until finally, in Griswold v. Connecticut (1965), the Court recognized privacy as a constitutionally guaranteed liberty. Although so-called originalists argue that since the Constitution does not mention privacy it cannot protect it, a majority of the Court and most of the American people have come to see privacy as Brandeis saw it—“the most comprehensive of rights, and the right most valued by civilized men.”

Wiretapping itself remained legally permissible for many years, although Congress in 1934 prohibited admitting evidence obtained by wiretapping in federal courts. Not until Berger v. New York (1967) did the Court finally adopt Brandeis’s view and bring wiretapping within the reach of the Fourth Amendment; now wiretap evidence may be introduced, but only if it has been secured after the issuance of a proper warrant.

During the 1920s and 1930s, as the Court’s agenda slowly changed from concern with property rights to concern with civil liberties, Louis Brandeis clearly stood as its foremost champion of civil liberties. One should not, however, confuse Brandeis with a modern liberal. Conservative in many ways, he was also a man of his times. He joined the majority of the Court in denying equal rights to Asiatics in Ng Fung Ho v. White (1922) and Ozawa v. United States (1922). He voted to uphold racially restrictive covenants in Corrigan v. Buckley (1926), and perhaps most infamously, joined in Holmes’s opinion upholding forced sterilization of mentally retarded people in Buck v. Bell (1927).

Nonetheless, his views on speech, wiretapping, privacy, and what came to be the doctrine of incorporation, although often propounded in dissent, eventually came to be the law of the land, and forms the basis of much of today’s civil liberties jurisprudence.

MELVIN I. UROFSKY

References and Further Reading

- Blasi, Vincent, The First Amendment and the Ideal of Civil Courage: The Brandeis Opinion in Whitney v. California, William & Mary Law Review 29 (1988): 653.
 Cortner, Richard C. The Supreme Court and the Second Bill of Rights: The Fourteenth Amendment and the Nationalization of Civil Liberties. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1981.
 Lahav, Pnina, Holmes and Brandeis: Libertarian and Republican Justification for Free Speech, Journal of Law & Politics 4 (1987): 451.
 Murphy, Walter F. Wiretapping on Trial: A Case Study in the Judicial Process. New York: Random House, 1965.
 Strum, Philippa. Brandeis: Beyond Progressivism. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1993.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Abrams v. United States*, 250 U.S. 616 (1919)
Adamson v. California, 332 U.S. 46 (1947)
Barron v. Baltimore, 7 Pet. 243 (1833)
Bedford Cut Stone Co. v. Journeymen Stone Cutters Association, 274 U.S. 37 (1927)
Berger v. New York, 388 U.S. 41 (1967)
Buck v. Bell, 274 U.S. 200 (1927)
Corrigan v. Buckley, 271 U.S. 323 (1926)
Gilbert v. Minnesota, 250 U.S. 325 (1920)
Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965)
Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390 (1922)
Muller v. Oregon, 208 U.S. 412 (1908)
Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697 (1931)
Ng Fung Ho v. White, 259 U.S. 276 (1922)
Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438 (1928)
Ozawa v. United States, 260 U.S. 178 (1922)
Palko v. Connecticut, 302 U.S. 319 (1937)
Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925)
Pierce v. United States, 252 U.S. 239 (1920)
Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45 (1932)
Schaefer v. United States, 251 U.S. 466 (1920)
Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919)
Senn v. Tile Layers Protective Union, 301 U.S. 468 (1937)
United States v. Carolene Products Co., 304 U.S. 144 (1938)
Whitney v. California, 274 U.S. 357 (1927)

BRANDENBURG INCITEMENT TEST

Even though the U.S. Constitution provides strong protections for speech, in a number of early decisions, the U.S. Supreme Court gave government broad authority to prosecute those who engage in speech advocating violence or illegal activity. For example, in Schenck v. United States (1919), the defendants circulated a petition urging resistance to the draft during World War I. Even though the advocacy did not come close to causing the violence or illegal activity to actually happen, defendants were nevertheless convicted.

Brandenburg v. Ohio (1969) significantly altered the Court's approach to "illegal advocacy." In Brandenburg, members of the Klu Klux Klan (KKK) held a rally at which they made derogatory comments about African Americans and Jews, and stated that there might be a need for "revengeance" if Congress and other public officials failed to respond to KKK concerns. The Court overturned the defendant's conviction for "criminal syndicalism" (defined roughly as speech advocating the use of force or law violation), finding that the state did not have the power to prohibit the discussion of abstract principles. A criminal conviction could only be sustained if it could be shown that the advocacy was directed to inciting or producing imminent lawless conduct and is likely to produce such conduct. In the Brandenburg case, even though the KKK members spoke stridently, their speech was not close to causing actual violence. As a result, their convictions were reversed.

RUSSELL L. WEAVER

References and Further Reading

- Weaver, Russell L., and Donald E. Lively. Understanding the First Amendment. Newark, NJ: LexisNexis, 2003.
- Weaver, Russell L., and Arthur E. Hellman. The First Amendment: Cases, Materials & Problems. Newark, N.J.: LexisNexis, 2002.

BRANDENBURG v. OHIO, 395 U.S. 444 (1969)

This case originated in the state of Ohio where Clarence Brandenburg, a Ku Klux Klan leader, was convicted, fined, and sentenced to jail for having made a speech in which he suggested that if the branches of the federal government did not stop suppressing the Caucasian race, violence might be the only answer. He was charged under the Ohio criminal syndicalism statute of 1919, which punished advocacy of violence against the government.

Brandenburg appealed his conviction on the grounds that the provisions of the Ohio law were so broad that they violated freedom of speech guarantees under the First and Fourteenth Amendments. The U.S. Supreme Court, in a per curiam opinion (with concurrences by Justices Hugo L. Black and William O. Douglas) overturned Brandenburg's conviction, and in doing so significantly broadened the reach of free speech protection. The decision overturned the earlier decision in Whitney v. California (1927) and rejected the clear and present danger test once and for all. In a striking defense of the importance of political speech, the Court emphasized the "principle that the constitutional guarantees of free speech and free press do not permit a state to proscribe or forbid advocacy of the use of force or law violation except where such advocacy is directed to inciting or producing imminent lawless action and is likely to incite or produce such action." The decision had the effect of invalidating state and federal laws that restricted the activities of political groups, including the Smith Act of 1940.

REBECCA S. SHOEMAKER

References and Further Reading

- Linde, Hans A., 'Clear and Present Danger' Reexamined: Dissonance in the Brandenburg Concerto, Stanford Law Review 22 (June 1970): 6:1163–86.
- BeVier, Lillian, The First Amendment and Political Speech: An Inquiry into the Substance and Limits of Principle, Stanford Law Review 30 (January 1978): 2:299–358.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Brandenburg v. Ohio* 395 U.S. 444 (1969)
- Whitney v. California* 274 U.S. 357 (1927)

See also Clear and Present Danger Test; Douglas, William Orville; Smith Act; Whitney v. California, 274 U.S. 357 (1927)

BRANTI v. FINKEL, 445 U.S. 507 (1980)

When a newly appointed Democratic public defender discharged two assistant public defenders because they were Republicans, the discharged lawyers claimed that their First Amendment freedoms of belief and association were violated. In a prior case, Elrod v. Burns, the U.S. Supreme Court had held that political patronage dismissals were constitutionally valid when there is a demonstrable need for the political loyalty of employees, but that those circumstances were limited to employees who perform a policymaking function or are entrusted with confidential political information. In Branti, the Supreme Court broadened Elrod by concluding that "the ultimate inquiry is not whether the label ‘policy-maker’ or ‘confidential’ fits a particular position; rather, the question is whether the hiring authority can demonstrate that party affiliation is an appropriate requirement for the effective performance of the public office involved.” The public defender could not sustain that burden because the function of assistant public defenders is to defend accused criminal defendants. Whatever policy an assistant public defender makes “relate[s] to the needs of individual clients and not to any partisan political interests,” and the confidential information obtained by an assistant public defender “has no bearing whatsoever on partisan political concerns.”

Later cases extended this principle. In Rutan v. Republican Party of Illinois, the Court applied its patronage doctrine to include sanctions short of discharge and O’Hare Truck Services, Inc. v. City of Northlake extended its scope to independent contractors terminated for partisan political reasons.

CALVIN MASSEY

References and Further Reading

Brinkley, Martin H., Despoiling the Spoils: Rutan v. Republican Party of Illinois, North Carolina Law Review 69 (1991): 719.

Johnson, Ronald N., and Gary D. Libecap, Courts, A Protected Bureaucracy, and Reinventing Government, Arizona Law Review 37 (1995): 791.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Elrod v. Burns, 427 U.S. 347 (1976)

O’Hare Truck Services, Inc. v. City of Northlake, 518 U.S. 712 (1996)

Rutan v. Republican Party of Illinois, 497 U.S. 62 (1990)

See also Elrod v. Burns, 427 U.S. 347 (1976); Freedom of Association; Political Patronage and First Amendment; Rutan v. Republican Party of Illinois, 497 U.S. 62 (1990)

BRANZBURG v. HAYES, 408 U.S. 665 (1972)

In Branzburg, the Supreme Court confronted an issue of continuing controversy: May journalists who are called to testify before grand juries protect the identities of their confidential sources? Branzburg is the only case to date in which the Court has squarely addressed whether the First Amendment provides a “reporter’s privilege.”

The case involved a reporter from the Louisville Courier-Journal who had published stories about illegal drug activity, as well as journalists from the New York Times and a Massachusetts television station who had reported on the Black Panthers. All had been called before grand juries and asked to reveal confidential information about what they had seen or heard during their reporting.

Advocates for the reporter’s privilege argue that it is grounded in the historic role of the press in holding government officials accountable and keeping citizens informed on matters of public concern. The First Amendment protects the freedom to publish and broadcast the news, but this freedom means little, advocates note, without constitutional protections for the freedom to gather the news.

In Branzburg, the Supreme Court held that the First Amendment did not provide a journalist’s privilege. A plurality of four justices declined to erect what they called “a virtually impenetrable constitutional shield, beyond legislative or judicial control” by giving journalists a privilege not enjoyed by most other citizens. The Court’s holding was limited to times when a news source is implicated in a crime or possesses information relevant to a grand jury’s work. Justice Byron White emphasized that the decision should not threaten “the vast bulk of confidential relationships between reporters and their sources.”

Justice Lewis Powell, who provided the crucial fifth vote in Branzburg, wrote separately to emphasize what he saw as limited scope of the Court’s holding. In an important concurring opinion, Powell said that courts should balance on a case-by-case basis the rights and needs of journalists with the traditional obligation of all citizens to testify about criminal conduct. When subpoenas threaten to improperly impair the news-gathering process, Powell said, “the courts will be available to [journalists] under circumstances where legitimate First Amendment interests require protection.” In dissent, Justice Potter Stewart said a reporter’s constitutional right to a confidential relationship with a source stems from the broad social interest in the free flow of information. Thus, he said, the Constitution protects journalistic freedom “not for the benefit of the press so much as for the benefit of all of us.”

In the years since Branzburg, more than half of the states have enacted statutes providing some limited form of a reporter’s privilege. But there is no such federal law, and federal courts asked to shield journalists from testifying have continued to invoke Branzburg and hold that a reporter’s privilege cannot be inferred out of the First Amendment. In a famous case in 2005, a judge jailed a New York Times reporter who refused to testify in an investigation concerning the leak of a CIA officer’s identity by members of the George W. Bush administration.

STEVE SANDERS

References and Further Reading

Pracene, Ulan C., ed. Journalists, Shield Laws and the First Amendment. New York: Novinka Books, 2005.

BRASWELL v. UNITED STATES, 487 U.S. 99 (1988)

The availability of the Fifth Amendment self-incrimination privilege to resist producing documents in response to a subpoena has depended on whether the government sought the records from an individual (or sole proprietorship) or from a larger business organization. In Fisher v. United States, the Supreme Court held that an individual may assert the Fifth Amendment if the act of production of the records would incriminate the person. Randy Braswell, the owner of a business who received a subpoena for its records, sought to apply Fisher's privilege analysis to a single-shareholder corporation.

The Supreme Court, relying on a consistent line of cases going back to its 1906 decision in Hale v. Henkel, reaffirmed the collective entity doctrine in Braswell v. United States to bar a corporation from asserting the Fifth Amendment to resist production of its records, regardless of the corporation's size or whether an owner or officer would be incriminated by the documents. The Court noted that allowing a corporation's representative to assert the self-incrimination privilege "would have a detrimental impact on the government's efforts to prosecute" white-collar crime, one of the most serious problems confronting law enforcement authorities. The Court further explained that the production of documents by the corporation's representative could not be used by the government against that person if the government charged that person with an offense in a personal capacity.

The decision to incorporate an enterprise means that it cannot assert the Fifth Amendment privilege to resist a government demand for its records.

PETER J. HENNING

References and Further Reading

LaFave, Wayne R., Jerold H. Israel, and Nancy J. King. Criminal Procedure. Vol. 3. 2nd ed. St. Paul, MN: Thomson West, 1999.

Mosteller, Robert P., Simplifying Subpoena Law: Taking the Fifth Amendment Seriously, Virginia Law Review 73 (1987): 1:1–110.

Note: Right Against Self-Incrimination—Production of Documents, Harvard Law Review 102(1988): 1:170–80.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Fisher v. United States, 425 U.S. 391 (1976)

Hale v. Henkel, 201 U.S. 43 (1906)

See also Fisher v. United States, 425 U.S. 391 (1976); Grand Jury Investigation and Indictment; Hale v. Henkel, 201 U.S. 43 (1906); Self-Incrimination (V): Historical Background

BRAUNFELD v. BROWN, 366 U.S. 599 (1961)

See Sunday Closing Cases

BRAY v. ALEXANDRIA WOMEN'S HEALTH CLINIC, 506 U.S. 263 (1993)

In Bray v. Alexandria Women's Health Clinic, the Supreme Court held that the anti-conspiracy provision of the 1871 Civil Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1985(3), known as the Ku Klux Klan Act, did not support a claim against an anti-abortion group's conspiracy to obstruct access to abortion clinics. Anti-abortion activists have targeted clinics, physicians, and their patients with advocacy and harassment, obstructed clinic access and, in extreme cases, bombed abortion clinics and murdered abortion providers. Bray challenged Operation Rescue's blockades of abortion facilities throughout the Washington, D.C. area.

Congress originally enacted Section 1985(3) to bar Ku Klux Klan-style mob violence that terrorized black people and Reconstruction supporters and impeded local officials from protecting them. The statute provides a civil cause of action against private conspiracies (1) to deprive "any person or class of persons" of the equal protection of the laws, or (2) to "prevent or hinder the constituted authorities of any State" from providing equal protection. The act applies not only to government conduct, but also to private groups like the Klan or Operation Rescue (see Bray and Griffin v. Breckenridge). To prevent Section 1985(3) from becoming "a general federal tort law," which is traditionally the province of the states, the Court had interpreted the statute's first clause—the "deprivation clause"—to impose two additional limitations: first, that "some racial, or perhaps otherwise class-based, invidiously discriminatory animus [lay] behind the conspirators' action," and, second, that the conspiracy aim to interfere with rights that are "protected against private, as well as official, encroachment" (see Griffin, and Carpenters v. Scott).

In an opinion written by Justice Scalia for a five-member majority, the Court held that the Bray plaintiffs had failed to meet both of those requirements. In the majority's view, the class of women as a whole was not targeted by Operation Rescue's opposition to abortion, and the subset of “women seeking abortions” is defined merely by its shared objective, making it not a statutorily protected class. In any event, the Court held, the deprivation clause does not prevent private interference with abortion, because constitutional abortion rights run only against the government. The right to interstate travel constrains private actors, but the Court viewed Operation Rescue’s interference with some women’s travel as a circumstantial effect rather than a purpose of the conspiracy. The majority did not rule on the belatedly raised hindrance claim.

For the four dissenters (Justices Stevens, O’Connor, Blackmun, and Souter), the case presented none of the federalism concerns that might justify restrictive interpretation of Section 1985(3). All four would have reached and sustained the plaintiffs’ hindrance claim. Three dissenters concluded that obstructing women’s access to abortion is sex-based “class animus” under the act, and that, unlike the deprivation clause, the hindrance clause protects the effectiveness of government and so applies even to private interference with official protection of rights like abortion. Justice Souter’s separate, broader dissent questioned the narrow deprivation-clause precedents requiring class-based animus and infringement of a right guaranteed against private impairment, and would have ruled for plaintiffs on that ground as well. Justice Stevens, joined by Justice Blackmun, also would have sustained the deprivation clause claim on the more limited ground that burdening interstate travel was “one of the intended consequences of [the] conspiracy,” and no specific intent to discriminate against out-of-staters should have been required.

The Bray majority did not foreclose litigation under the hindrance clause, and women in later cases have successfully pursued hindrance claims (see, for example, Libertad v. Welch and National Abortion Federation v. Operation Rescue), and also have gained protection under other sources of law. Partially in response to Bray, Congress in 1994 passed the Freedom of Access to Clinic Entrances Act (FACE), criminalizing the obstruction of clinics and the use of force to intimidate or interfere with persons seeking to provide or obtain abortions. Additionally, in Schenck v. Pro-Choice Network of Western New York, the Supreme Court upheld state-law buffer zones and other restrictions around abortion clinics against free speech challenges. While relief from anti-abortion protestors under RICO initially seemed promising, the Court held in Scheidler v. NOW that abortion protesters’ interference with or shutting down of clinics did not amount to the RICO predicate act of “extortion,” such that RICO did not apply.

NINA PILLARD

Cases and Statutes Cited

Carpenters v. Scott, 463 U.S. 825, 833 (1983)
Griffin v. Breckenridge, 403 U.S. 88 (1971)
Libertad v. Welch, 53 F.3d 428, 446–450 (1st Cir. 1995)
National Abortion Federation v. Operation Rescue, 8 F.3d 680 (9th Cir. 1993)
Scheidler v. NOW, 537 U.S. 393 (2003)
Schenck v. Pro-Choice Network of Western New York, 519 U.S. 357 (1997)

See also Abortion; Operation Rescue

BREITHAUPT v. ABRAM, 352 U.S. 432 (1957)

Breithaupt was convicted of involuntary manslaughter in New Mexico following an automobile collision resulting in three deaths. The primary evidence was a blood test showing his blood alcohol content at 0.17 percent. Breithaupt argued that this blood sample, which was obtained while he was unconscious due to his injuries, was illegally obtained and thus should have been excluded. Six justices, speaking through Justice Tom Clark, rejected this argument based on Wolf v. Colorado. Breithaupt also argued, on the basis of Rochin v. California, that the involuntary blood test “shocked the conscience,” thus violating his substantive due process rights.

The Court, however, distinguished the blood test at issue in Breithaupt from the forceful stomach pumping at issue in Rochin. The majority concluded that there was nothing offensive or brutal in the taking of a blood sample, under the supervision of a physician, despite the lack of conscious consent. Instead, a blood test was part of a routine medical examination and thus not violative of a suspect’s due process rights.

Chief Justice Earl Warren and Justice William O. Douglas wrote forceful dissents, both joined by Justice Hugo Black. The dissenters were especially outraged by police methods that, in Justice Douglas’s words, violated “the sanctity of the person.”

Breithaupt is most significant in limiting the “shocks the conscience” test elaborated in Rochin and in demonstrating the subjectivity involved in that test. The case was later reaffirmed in Schmerber v. California, decided after Wolf was overruled by Mapp v. Ohio.

EMERY G. LEE, III

References and Further Reading

LaFave, Wayne R., Jerold H. Israel, and Nancy J. King. Criminal Procedure. 2nd ed. St. Paul, MN: West, 1999.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961)
Rochin v. California, 342 U.S. 165 (1952)
Schmerber v. California, 384 U.S. 757 (1966)
Wolf v. Colorado, (1949), overruled by Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961)

BREWER v. WILLIAMS, 430 U.S. 387 (1977)

On Christmas Eve 1968, a ten-year-old child was abducted by Williams, a recent escapee from a mental hospital. A day later, police in Davenport, Iowa, found Williams's car and located at a rest stop some of the child's clothes and the blanket in which she had been wrapped. Police initiated a search of the surrounding countryside.

Williams turned himself in on December 26 to the Davenport police. When he was formally charged, he obtained attorneys in Davenport and Des Moines who instructed the police not to question Williams during his transport to Des Moines, 160 miles away. A detective and another officer were assigned to drive Williams to Des Moines. During the car ride, the detective "delivered what [was] referred to in the briefs and oral arguments as the "Christian burial speech."

I want to give you something to think about . . . I want you to observe the weather conditions . . . They are predicting several inches of snow for tonight, and I feel that you yourself are the only person that knows where this little girl's body is . . . [T]he parents of this little girl should be entitled to a Christian burial for the little girl who was snatched away from them on Christmas (E)ve and murdered. And I feel we should stop and locate it on the way in rather than waiting until morning and trying to come back out after a snow storm and possibly not being able to find it at all.

After listening to these comments, Williams directed the police to the child's body.

During his trial, over the objections of the defense, the judge allowed the prosecution to admit Williams's highly incriminating statements to the police as to the location of the body. The jury found Williams guilty of first-degree murder.

In a five-to-four decision, the U.S. Supreme Court decided that Williams was denied his right to counsel guaranteed by the Sixth and Fourteenth Amendments. The majority said that the detective's speech constituted an interrogation outside the presence of counsel after judicial proceedings had been initiated. This conclusion was based on the admission that the detective was trying to elicit information from Williams in the car before he could re-contact his attorney in Des Moines.

The Court rejected the view that Williams had waived his Sixth Amendment right to a lawyer voluntarily during the car ride. The justices found that the prosecution had failed to meet its burden to prove that Williams affirmatively relinquished his right to counsel through a knowing and intelligent waiver. Thus, the police violated the right to counsel by eliciting incriminating statements from Williams without his counsel present.

The Court remanded the case to the Iowa courts and directed that Williams's incriminating statements and any testimony regarding the retrieval of the body be excluded from evidence at a new trial. However, the Court left open the possibility that the body, as well as its condition, could be admitted into evidence unrelated to his statement. This, in fact, occurred in the second trial where the defendant was again convicted. The Court affirmed this conviction using the so-called inevitable discovery doctrine, meaning that the confession did not affect the other evidence, as it would have been found anyway, inevitably.

PAUL MARCUS

References and Further Reading

Kamisar, Yale, Brewer v. Williams—A Hard Look at a Discomfiting Record, Georgetown Law Journal 66 (1977): 209.

White, Welsh S., False Confessions and the Constitution: Safeguards Against Untrustworthy Confessions, Harvard Civil Rights-Civil Liberties Law Review 32 (1997): 105.

See also Nix v. Williams, 467 U.S. 431 (1984); Right to Counsel; Self-Incrimination: Miranda and Evolution

BREYER, STEPHEN GERALD (1938–)

Justice Stephen Breyer, a Massachusetts Democrat, was President Bill Clinton's second and final appointment to the Court (following Ruth Bader Ginsburg in 1993). A San Francisco native and son of a lawyer for the city's school board, Breyer was educated at Stanford (1959), Oxford (1961) (where he was a Marshall Scholar), and the Harvard Law School (1964). After law school, he clerked for Supreme Court Justice Arthur Goldberg (1964–1965) and went on to a distinguished career as a professor at Harvard's law school and lecturer at its Kennedy School of Government, and a high-level congressional and Justice Department staff member—special assistant to the assistant attorney general for anti-trust (1965–1967); assistant special prosecutor, Watergate Prosecution Force (1973); special (1974–1975) and chief counsel (1979–1980), U.S. Senate Judiciary Committee); and a Carter appointee to Boston's First Circuit Court of Appeals (1980), where he ultimately served as chief judge (1990–1994).

Although Breyer clerked on the Supreme Court at the height of the Warren Court's "rights revolution," his chief scholarly interest and contribution was never in civil liberties—or even constitutional law—but rather in the law and economics of regulation. At Harvard, Breyer taught courses on anti-trust, regulatory, and administrative law. While on leave from academia, as an aide to Senator Edward Kennedy in the late 1970s, he was an influential architect of the deregulation of the airline industry. Later, as a judge, he played a major role in crafting the sentencing guidelines of the U.S. Sentencing Commission (1985–1989). In addition to many articles, Justice Breyer is the author of Regulation and Its Reform (1982), Breaking the Vicious Circle: Toward Effective Risk Regulation (1993), and co-author of a prominent administrative law casebook. That Breyer had devoted little time to contentious civil liberties and civil rights issues proved important, in the aftermath of a number of ideologically charged confirmation battles, to Clinton's decision to name him to the Court. Besides having said little about issues like abortion and affirmative action, Breyer's impressive command of economics and his understanding of (and sympathy for) business won him the goodwill of pro-business Republicans. What limited opposition there was to his appointment came from the public interest and consumer movements within the Democratic Party itself.

The texture of Justice Breyer's constitutional jurisprudence reflects his "legal process" training and longstanding interest in the design of efficient and effective regulatory systems. The style of Breyer's civil liberties opinions makes manifest his conviction that judging is a purposive task in which judges, mindful of the limits of judicial authority and expertise, collaborate with the other governmental institutions to formulate rational, goal-directed, and empirically grounded public policy. Those opinions devote relatively little time to deduction from fundamental principles and extended time to the pragmatic parsing of particular fact situations in light of purposive public policy considerations.

Since joining the Court, Justice Breyer has been called upon to apply his approach to a panoply of civil liberties issues. Despite the distinctive flavor of his analysis, in most areas of civil liberties (and civil rights), Breyer's votes have been predictably liberal, aligning fairly consistently with the votes of Justices Ginsburg, Souter, and Stevens. Justice Breyer has been a reliable supporter of the right to privacy, including expansive understandings of abortion rights (Stenberg v. Carhart [2000]), the right to die (Washington v. Glucksberg [1997]), and gay rights (Romer v. Evans [1996]; Lawrence v. Texas [2003]). His free speech decisions are generally liberal. (See Denver Area Educational Telecommunications Consortium v. FCC [1995], Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition [2002], Republican Party of Minnesota v. White [2002], McConnell v. Federal Elections Commission [2003]. But see also United States v. American Library Association [2003]).

While maintaining a liberal predisposition, Justice Breyer has on occasion voted with the Court's conservatives in three areas of civil liberties law. While traditionally liberal in many criminal process cases involving matters such as capital punishment and other Eighth Amendment issues and the right to counsel (see, for example, Stogner v. California [2003], Atkins v. Virginia [2002], Penry v. Johnson [2001], Kansas v. Hendricks [1997]), Breyer has in some cases been more deferential to the government in search and seizure cases than quintessential constitutional liberals (Venonia School District v. Acton [1995], Minnesota v. Carter [1998], Wyoming v. Houghton [1999]). In a similar spirit, while evincing a quintessentially liberal concern for the civil liberties of detained persons, he has asserted that indefinite detentions might be constitutionally permissible in cases involving "terrorism or other special circumstances where special arguments might be made for forms of preventative detention and for heightened deference to the judgments of the political branches with respect to matters of national security" (Zadvydas v. Davis [2001]). Breyer sometimes evinces more flexibility in his establishment clause decisions than the Court's "strict separationist" justices. (Contrast Good News Club v. Milford [2001] and Mitchell v. Helms [2000], with Rosenberger v. University of Virginia [1995], Zelman v. Simmons-Harris [2002], and Santa Fe Independent School District v. Doe [2000].) Moreover, like many conservatives, Justice Breyer takes economic rights seriously (see BMW v. Gore [1996]). He nonetheless has refused to sign on to the conservative property rights jurisprudence pursuant to the Fifth Amendment's takings clause. (See Palazzolo v. Rhode Island [2001], Tahoe-Sierra Preservation Council v. Tahoe Regional Planning Agency [2002], and Brown v. Legal Foundation of Washington [2003].)

Perhaps the most innovative component of Justice Breyer's jurisprudence is his commitment to a belief that the Court should take greater cognizance in its decisions of the ways in which other nations and foreign and international courts have approached similar problems of law, governance, and public policy, a belief that has exerted a considerable influence on the Court's other justices. Breyer has gone so far as to suggest that this may involve American judges working to integrate the U.S. Constitution into the governing documents of other nations. He has asserted that international treaties “may eventually prove relevant” in death penalty cases, and that “the number of treaties relevant to particular domestic legal disputes seems to be growing.” In Grutter v. Bollinger (2003), Breyer joined an opinion by Justice Ginsburg that cited international human rights agreements as authority for upholding the affirmative action policies of the University of Michigan Law School. Breyer’s transnationalism is a piece with his interest in pragmatic systems building: He sees a worldwide system of governance emerging, particularly with regard to human rights, and believes that the Supreme Court has an important role to play in integrating the United States (and the U.S. Constitution) into this system. This globalist inclination could ultimately have a significant impact on the future path of the Court’s civil liberties jurisprudence.

KEN I. KERSCH

References and Further Reading

- Kersch, Ken I. “The Synthetic Progressivism of Stephen G. Breyer.” In Rehnquist Justice: Understanding the Court Dynamic, edited by Earl M. Maltz. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2003.
- . “Multilateralism Comes to the Courts.” The Public Interest (Winter 2004).

BROADCAST REGULATION

The history of broadcast regulation affords a unique civil liberties perspective because it is the sole example of a government agency created to supervise the press. That agency, the Federal Communications Commission (FCC), enforced specific statutory commands, such as the requirement to give equal time to candidates for elective office or suppressing indecency, as well as created its own, such as the “fairness doctrine” and the requirement to air local programming, based on its own notions of the public interest. All of these content regulations would have been unconstitutional if applied to the print media.

Until it was repealed in 1987, the fairness doctrine was the centerpiece of broadcast regulation. It required broadcasters to give adequate coverage to significant public issues and to ensure fair coverage that accurately presents conflicting viewpoints on those issues (although not necessarily in the same program). For years the FCC and the courts could not say enough good things about the fairness doctrine; it was, the Commission said, “the single most important requirement of operation in the public interest—the sine qua non for grant of renewal of license.” No station could avoid it as the FCC made clear when it rejected a defense that opposite sides of the issues in question were fully available on other stations in the area. The FCC then proceeded to strip the license from a Philadelphia station that aired more controversial programming than any other in that market. The FCC believed that each station acting as a market (airing something of everything) was superior to having stations differentiate themselves on the basis of content. It feared that listeners would stick with a single station and thus might not be as well informed as the Commission believed they should be.

In operation the fairness doctrine proved a failure. In the days before unique formats became common, most stations would automatically do what the fairness doctrine required so that the doctrine itself should have affected only those who did not wish to comply (and those who lacked the competency to comply). Because the doctrine was triggered by complaints, however, a station in compliance could nevertheless be forced to respond to the FCC. Indeed the more controversial issues that a station covered, the more likely it was to have a complaint filed against it. Responding to a complaint—taking time from management and possibly hiring a lawyer—constituted a tax on airing controversial programming. Yet airing such programming was what the FCC claimed it desired.

Supporters of the fairness doctrine claimed that its effects were exactly those stated in its purposes: fostering coverage of controversial issues. Its repeal put the lie to that assertion. Freed from the fairness doctrine, talk radio, with its controversies, became possible and flourished. Thus, occasionally a supporter of the fairness doctrine now laments its demise and pines for the days when radio was not “uninhibited, robust, and wide open,” and instead was tempered by the fairness doctrine. That, of course, is inconsistent with the premises of the First Amendment as articulated in New York Times v. Sullivan (1964).

In Red Lion Broadcasting v. FCC (1969), the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the fairness doctrine. Like the FCC, the Court assumed that the doctrine was synonymous with its purposes. Further, the Court was blind to the fact that such a good doctrine could have a chilling effect on broadcast speech; if there were a chilling effect, then the FCC would take appropriate action to eliminate it.

Red Lion announced a trust hierarchy. At the top were viewers and listeners whose rights were paramount. At the bottom were broadcasters who were mere proxies for the greater good. In between were the FCC and the federal courts poised to require that broadcasters give the people their due.

The Court never knew the actual facts behind Red Lion. If the facts had come out, perhaps the Court would have understood that government oversight of broadcasting would operate just like the Court knows that government oversight of the print media would work. It would be partisan.

In 1963, the Democratic National Committee created an operation to monitor rightwing radio stations and harass them with equal time and fairness doctrine complaints. The expressed hope was “that challenges would be so costly to them that they would be inhibited and decide it was too expensive to continue.” The monitoring did not cease with the 1964 elections and that picked up Red Lion’s supposed transgression. The station, accurately sensing that it was being harassed, fought back—and lost unanimously to a Court that was sure broadcasting was unique and that the FCC was promoting the public interest.

For almost every attempt by the FCC to coerce or coax diverse programming, there is an opposite one to mandate or persuade conformity. Thus, fresh from its success in Red Lion, the FCC turned on popular music attempting to rid the airwaves of songs that it believed promoted the drug culture (even though such songs had peaked three years previously and the phenomenon was subsiding). A “do not play” list of twenty-two songs was produced by the Broadcast Bureau. Included were “Lucy in the Sky with Diamonds” and “With a Little Help from my Friends” by the Beatles as well as “Truckin” by the Grateful Dead. Some panicked stations ceased playing “Puff, the Magic Dragon” by Peter, Paul, and Mary.

The Commission’s attention soon wandered to other issues—specifically sex and violence. Sometimes with censorship, sometimes with jawboning, the Commission attempted to return radio and television to the cultural standards of an earlier era. Like most attempts to move culture backward, this effort failed.

It has been over two decades since the Supreme Court last decided a broadcast case. Its discussions of broadcast regulation in cases involving cable and the Internet indicate that the Court recognizes its embrace of FCC actions was mistaken. Freedom of speech and the press will not blossom in an environment of government supervision. The Court knew that; broadcast regulation has proved it again.

SCOT POWE

References and Further Reading

- Krattenmaker, Thomas G., and Lucas A. Powe, Jr. Regulating Broadcast Programming. Cambridge, MA: MIT Press; Washington, D.C.: AEI Press, 1994.
- Powe, Lucas A., Jr. American Broadcasting and the First Amendment. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1987.

Spitzer, Matthew. Seven Dirty Words and Six Other Stories. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1986.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- New York Times v. Sullivan*, 376 U.S. 254 (1964)
- Red Lion Broadcasting v. Federal Communications Commission*, 395 U.S. 367 (1969)

BROOKS v. TENNESSEE, 406 U.S. 605 (1972)

In Brooks, the Supreme Court struck down a state statute requiring criminal defendants to testify, if at all, before any other defense witnesses take the stand. The Court concluded that such statutes violate both the Fifth Amendment self-incrimination clause and the right to counsel.

At the close of the prosecution’s case in his robbery trial, Brooks’s attorney requested that Brooks be allowed to testify after the other defense witnesses. Relying on a Tennessee statute requiring the defendant to testify at the beginning of the defense case or not at all, the judge refused the request. Brooks then elected to not testify, and he was convicted.

The U.S. Supreme Court reversed Brooks’s conviction by vote of six to three. The Court acknowledged that the statute was intended to prevent defendants from adjusting their testimony to fit with testimony given by other defense witnesses. However, the Court held that the statute unjustifiably burdened Brooks’s right not to testify because it forced him to decide whether to testify before he knew if his testimony would be necessary or helpful to his case. The Court also concluded that the statute violated Brooks’s right to the effective assistance of counsel because it prevented his attorney from exercising his professional judgment as to the best time to call his client to testify.

Brooks thus holds that states may not erect arbitrary barriers that frustrate a criminal defendant’s exercise of his right to testify or interfere with his attorney’s ability to effectively represent him.

DAVID A. MORAN

See also Right to Counsel; Self-Incrimination (V): Historical Background

BROTHERHOOD OF RAILROAD TRAINMEN v. VIRGINIA EX REL. VIRGINIA STATE BAR, 377 U.S. 1 (1964)

The legal profession has traditionally exhibited antipathy toward activities that could be perceived as encouraging litigation. It has also taken a dim view of nonlawyers providing legal advice. So it is not surprising that the Virginia State Bar (and the American Bar Association, as amicus curiae) sought to prevent a labor union from operating a “department of legal counsel.” This department functioned as a referral service, directing injured union members to local lawyers who could represent them in lawsuits against their employers, and also as an institutionalized warning system to employees, cautioning them not to settle injury claims without first consulting a lawyer.

The Virginia State Bar obtained an injunction against the department, contending that it constituted the unlawful solicitation of clients and the unauthorized practice of law. The U.S. Supreme Court reversed, however, on the grounds that the First Amendment’s guarantees of freedom of expression, assembly, and petition gave the employees the right to associate together for the purpose of petitioning for the redress of their grievances against the railroads. The Court noted that the Virginia bar may have a legitimate interest in preventing “ambulance chasing,” but that the union’s interest was not commercial gain but protecting the rights of its members. One might question whether this is a tenable distinction. Plaintiffs’ personal injury lawyers may be interested both in protecting the legal rights of their clients and in making money. Does one motivation diminish the other? In any event, read in conjunction with the commercial speech cases protecting most advertising by attorneys, this case is part of the foundation of the constitutional protection afforded to lawyers’ commercial activities.

W. BRADLEY WENDEL

References and Further Reading

Erichson, Howard M., Doing Good, Doing Well, Vanderbilt Law Review 57 (2004): 2087–125.

Wolfram, Charles W. Modern Legal Ethics. St. Paul, Minn.: West, 1986.

See also Freedom of Association; Lawyer Advertising; NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. 415 (1963)

BROWN v. BOARD OF EDUCATION, 347 U.S. 483 (1954)

The U.S. Supreme Court’s 1954 decision in Brown v. Board of Education, declaring state-mandated school segregation unconstitutional, was perhaps the Court’s most important decision of the twentieth century. Prior to the Brown decision, seventeen states (including all eleven states of the old Confederacy) and the District of Columbia either permitted or required racial segregation in public schools. Although such segregation relegated black children to poorly funded separate schools and imposed on them the stigma of second-class citizenship, many states were determined not to allow black children to attend school with whites.

Since the 1930s, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) had brought a number of lawsuits challenging various aspects of racial segregation in education. Early lawsuits included challenges to the exclusion of blacks from white state university graduate and professional schools. After the Supreme Court in 1950 held in Sweatt v. Painter (1950) that the exclusion of black students from the University of Texas Law School (requiring them to attend a fledgling racially separate law school) violated the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, the NAACP brought a number of lawsuits challenging racial segregation in elementary and secondary schools. Eventually, five of these suits—filed in Delaware, Kansas, South Carolina, Virginia, and the District of Columbia—were accepted for review by the U.S. Supreme Court.

On May 17, 1954, the Supreme Court in a unanimous decision declared state-mandated school segregation unconstitutional. The unanimity was hardly a foregone conclusion. After oral argument in the cases in 1952, the Court was sharply divided and scheduled reargument for 1953. In the meantime, Chief Justice Frederick Vinson died; his replacement, Earl Warren, worked skillfully and successfully to build unanimous support for a decision striking down segregation as violating the equal protection clause.

In its decision, the Court concluded that relegating black children to racially separate schools “solely because of their race generates a feeling of inferiority as to their status in the community that may affect their hearts and minds in a way unlikely ever to be undone.” Quoting from the district court in the Kansas case, the Supreme Court elaborated: “Segregation of white and colored children in public schools has a detrimental effect upon the colored children. The impact is greater when it has the sanction of the law; for the policy of separating the races is usually interpreted as denoting the inferiority of the negro group . . . Segregation with the sanction of law, therefore, has a tendency to [retard] the educational and mental development of negro children and to deprive them of some of the benefits they would receive in a [racially] integrated school system.”

In issuing its landmark decision, the Court postponed for one year the question of remedy. The Court heard argument on the remedy issue and on May 31, 1955, issued a second decision in the case, a decision that came to be known as “Brown II.” In this second decision, the Court directed lower courts to supervise the desegregation of southern school districts with “all deliberate speed”—a directive that some white Southerners interpreted as signaling the Court’s willingness to tolerate some delay.

The Brown decisions did not lead to the immediate desegregation of southern school systems. Although a few communities did desegregate their schools in a token fashion within the next few years, most southern school districts refused to take any action. By the fall of 1957, only 0.15 percent of black children in the eleven states of the old Confederacy attended school with whites. Even this extraordinarily modest level of school desegregation provoked intense controversy and sometimes led to violence. For example, Arkansas Governor Orval Faubus caused a national crisis when he ordered the Arkansas National Guard to bar nine black students from desegregating Central High School in Little Rock in 1957. President Dwight Eisenhower was eventually forced to deploy federal troops to defuse the Little Rock crisis. Southern resistance would continue. On the tenth anniversary of the first Brown decision—May 1964—only about 1.2 percent of Southern black children attended school with white children, and in a few states, such as Mississippi, desegregation had not even begun. In the meantime, the Supreme Court, with a few exceptions, remained largely silent on the issue of enforcing the desegregation mandate of Brown.

After Congress passed the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which included a fund withholding provision for entities (such as southern school districts) that engaged in racial discrimination, the pace of desegregation quickened. In 1965, the Office of Education of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare (HEW) issued a set of guidelines defining for school officials minimum desegregation standards that must be satisfied in order to retain federal funding. These guidelines, coupled with the threat of losing federal funds, contributed to an increase in school desegregation. Moreover, lower federal courts during the late 1960s began to insist that southern school districts had an affirmative duty to increase desegregation levels. In a series of decisions in the late 1960s and early 1970s, culminating in Swann v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg Board of Education (1971), the U.S. Supreme Court reentered the fray and insisted on significant desegregation. In the Swann decision, the Court legitimated the use of extensive school busing as a desegregation remedy, a decision that had an immediate and profound effect on desegregation levels across the South and in several northern and western cities as well.

Although Brown did not lead to the immediate desegregation of southern schools, it did contribute to a renewed insistence among many blacks that racial segregation was morally and legally wrong and should be opposed. While the full impact of Brown would not be felt until after the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the decision was nevertheless a crucial event in the development of civil rights in American society. Moreover, Brown helped legitimate the notion that it is sometimes appropriate for courts to step in and overrule legislative bodies that have enacted laws that serve to harm racial and ethnic minorities.

DAVISON M. DOUGLAS

References and Further Reading

- Cottrol, Robert J., Raymond T. Diamond, and Leland B. Ware. Brown v. Board of Education: Caste, Culture, and the Constitution. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2003.
- Klarman, Michael. From Jim Crow to Civil Rights: The Supreme Court and the Struggle for Racial Equality. New York: Oxford University Press, 2004.
- Kluger, Richard. Simple Justice: The History of Brown v. Board of Education and Black America's Struggle for Equality. New York: Knopf, 1976.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Swann v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg Board of Education*, 402 U.S. 1 (1971)
- Sweatt v. Painter*, 339 U.S. 629 (1950)

BROWN v. MISSISSIPPI, 279 U.S. 278 (1936)

In Brown v. Mississippi, the Supreme Court for the first time relied upon the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to exclude a confession from evidence in a state court. Brown was a seminal case, because the due process doctrine then dominated the Supreme Court’s confessions law jurisprudence until Miranda v. Arizona was decided in 1966. Even after Miranda, courts continue to exclude confessions extracted in violation of due process on the authority of Brown.

The facts of the case are appalling. Brown highlighted the fact that police officers in the South systematically abused black suspects in the criminal justice system during that era. A deputy sheriff, accompanied by other white men, hung defendant Ellington by a rope to a tree limb, let him down, hung him up again, and finally tied him to a tree and whipped him as the defendant protested his innocence. “[T]he signs of the rope on his neck were plainly visible during the so-called trial.” After the mob released Ellington, he went home, “suffering intense pain and agony.” A day or two later, the same deputy arrested Ellington and headed to a jail in an adjoining county, taking a route that went into Alabama. While in Alabama, the deputy stopped and again severely whipped Ellington, making clear that he would continue the beating until Ellington confessed. Ellington then confessed to a statement dictated by the deputy, and the deputy then took him to jail.

Two other defendants (including the named defendant Brown) were also arrested. At the same jail where Ellington was held, the deputy who had beaten Ellington was once again accompanied by a “number of white men,” including an officer, and the jailer. This group forced the two defendants to strip, laid the men over chairs, and “cut to pieces” their backs with a leather strap with buckles. The deputy made clear that the beatings would continue until defendants confessed “in every matter of detail as demanded by those present.” The defendants confessed, and the beating continued until the confessions conformed to the torturers’ demands.

The state’s only evidence against the defendants was their confessions, the circumstances of which were not disputed. Indeed, in admitting to the whipping of Ellington, the deputy stated that the severity of the beating was “[n]ot too much for a negro; not as much as I would have done if it were left to me.”

The Court had little trouble finding that the defendants’ convictions in these circumstances violated due process. Although noting that the states have great latitude in establishing court procedures, their freedom “is the freedom of constitutional government and is limited by the requirement of due process of law.” The states may not resort to torture to obtain convictions. The wrong committed in the case was “so fundamental that it made the whole proceeding a mere pretense of a trial and rendered the conviction and sentence wholly void.” The Court’s decision was unanimous. Professor Morgan Cloud has described Brown as “one of the Court’s great opinions.”

M. K. B. DARMER

References and Further Reading

- Cloud, Morgan, Torture and Truth, Texas Law Review 74 (1996): 1211.
Darmer, M.K.B., Beyond Bin Laden and Lindh: Confessions Law in an Age of Terrorism, Cornell Journal of Law and Public Policy 12 (2003): 319–64.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Miranda v. Arizona*, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)

BRUCE, LENNY (1925–1966)

Lenny Bruce is often considered the most influential figure in modern comedy, a pioneer of the acerbic social satire that would dominate the genre in the latter half of the twentieth century. His challenges to contemporary standards of artistic expression in the 1950s and 1960s also made him a target of authorities and a central figure in the debate over the limits of free speech, inspiring generations of performers and activists while exerting a substantial toll upon his own career and personal life.

Born Leonard Schneider in Long Island, New York, in 1925, Bruce began his comedy career as a vaudeville-style comedian after serving in World War II. After a brief hiatus, he returned to the stage in the early 1950s with an edgier, more experimental style heavily influenced by the emerging beat culture. His comedy routines often tested the boundaries of the decade’s rigid obscenity standards with irreverent, satirical commentary on social mores and institutions, and frequently included jokes about oral sex, bodily functions, racism, and religion.

Bruce reached the peak of his mainstream success with a sold-out performance at Carnegie Hall in 1961. However, his exposure to conventional audiences resulted in a series of arrests on obscenity charges in various cities across the United States. Bruce was acquitted of some of these charges but convicted of others; he continued to perform while free on bond and refused to compromise his material despite mounting legal and financial difficulties. Meanwhile, his health—and, critics charged, the quality of his performances—began to decline under the strain of numerous trials and ongoing struggles with drug addiction.

In April 1964, during a series of performances at the Café au Go-Go in New York City, Bruce was once again arrested and charged with obscenity, inspiring outrage from the city’s formidable community of artists, writers, and intellectuals. The prosecution presented a number of eyewitnesses to Bruce’s Café au Go-Go performances, whose testimony included graphic descriptions of Bruce’s language and gestures during the performance. The defense, spearheaded by renowned First Amendment attorney Ephriam London, countered with testimony from a series of expert witnesses, including psychiatrists, music and theater critics, and media experts, who testified that Bruce’s material possessed artistic merit and was not obscene according to the community standards of the city of New York. The Court ruled that Bruce’s performances were obscene, found him guilty, and sentenced him to four months of hard labor. He remained free on bond but would not live to complete the appeals process, dying of a morphine overdose in Los Angeles on August 3, 1966.

The performances and legal battles of Lenny Bruce set precedents for subsequent challenges to free speech restrictions, resulting in a gradual relaxation of obscenity standards that allowed subsequent generations of writers and performers to present content more provocative than that for which Bruce was repeatedly arrested. In 2003, in response to a petition from artists and free speech advocates, New York Governor George Pataki issued Bruce a full posthumous pardon for his 1964 conviction.

MICHAEL H. BURCHETT

References and Further Reading

- Bruce, Lenny. How to Talk Dirty and Influence People. Rep. ed. New York: Simon & Schuster/Fireside, 1992.
- Collins, Ronald K.L., Lenny Bruce and the First Amendment: Remarks at Ohio Northern University Law School, Ohio Northern University Law Review 30 (Winter 2004): 1:15–34.
- Collins, Ronald K.L., and David, Skover. The Trials of Lenny Bruce: The Fall and Rise of an American Icon. Naperville, IL: Sourcebooks Mediafusion, 2002.
- Saporta, Sol. Society, Language and the University: From Lenny Bruce to Noam Chomsky. New York: Vantage Press, 1994.

See also Obscenity; Obscenity in History; Pardon and Commutation; Public Figures; Public Vulgarly and Free Speech; Satire and Parody and the First Amendment

BRYAN, WILLIAM JENNINGS (1860–1925)

Perhaps best known for his famous “Cross of Gold” speech, William Jennings Bryan had a public career lasting some thirty years. He served two terms in the U.S. House of Representatives, ran for president three times, served as secretary of state under Woodrow Wilson, and had a successful career as a public speaker and attorney. He championed the causes of middle America, even when it cost him politically to do so. Yet one of his legacies is tied inextricably with the Scopes trial in 1925, and he is misunderstood and remembered as a knee-jerk fundamentalist for his role in prosecuting John Scopes for teaching evolution in Tennessee.

A believer in social contract theory, which stated that governments existed essentially to do for people what they could not do for themselves, Bryan became associated with free silver as a political issue. He preached constantly for the adoption of silver as circulating currency, making him a populist hero for much of Midwest America. Indeed, silver became a primary issue in the 1896 election, during which Bryan ran on both the Populist and Democratic tickets and lost to William McKinley. He sought to have the gold standard repealed and replaced with silver, but many contemporary observers believed that Bryan held onto the issue far too long, even after gold supplies increased enough to make circulation of silver irrelevant.

Partly because of his devotion to temperance as a social issue, Bryan also became an outspoken supporter of women’s suffrage. He, like many other suffrage activists, believed that women’s votes were critical to ensure the elimination of alcoholism and its various societal problems.

Despite his having served as a soldier in the Spanish-American War, Bryan became opposed to imperialism; he had particular problems with McKinley’s Philippine policies. He believed that the Philippines had the right to outright independence, as Cuba had received, rather than status as possessions of the United States. It cost the United States too much money, he argued, and led to poor relationships between the United States and Asian nations.

Bryan was also committed to reform, both economic and constitutional. He sought consumer protection against corporate excess and monopoly. He supported electoral-college reform and favored a constitutional amendment for the direct election of U.S. senators, declaring that if citizens were intelligent enough to elect representatives and the president, then they were surely smart enough to elect their senators. Nearly one hundred years before it became an issue in the 2000 and 2004 elections, Bryan called for public disclosure of campaign fundraising and spending.

The twilight of Bryan’s life saw his involvement as a prosecutor in Tennessee’s Scopes trial. When John Scopes was charged with violating state law, which forbade teaching evolution, Bryan found himself opposed by Scopes’s attorney, Clarence Darrow (provided by the American Civil Liberties Union). The trial climaxed with Bryan himself taking the witness stand to be cross-examined by Darrow. By all accounts, Bryan was a poor witness; Darrow made Bryan admit that he believed literally in the stories from the Bible, and made it seem as if Bryan were uneducated and ignorant of scientific teachings. Bryan’s team won the case, but Bryan died barely a week after it was over.

The truth about Bryan, though, was hardly that simple. Bryan’s writings indicate that he supported Scopes’s prosecution, not because he thought evolution had no place in schools, but because he thought that parents, not state legislatures, should decide what their children were taught in school.

Often remembered without sufficient nuance, Bryan deserves to be remembered as a defender of American civil liberties. He championed several reforms that were only accomplished after his death, and he represented the under-franchised in America.

JAMES HALABUK, JR.

References and Further Reading

- Anderson, David P. William Jennings Bryan. Boston: Twayne Publishing, 1981.
- Koenig, Louis W. Bryan: A Political Biography of William Jennings Bryan. New York: G.P. Putnam's Sons, 1971.
- Springen, Donald K. William Jennings Bryan: Orator of Small-Town America. New York: Greenwood Press, 1991.

BRYANT, ANITA (1940–)

If the Stonewall riot was the event that galvanized the movement for gays' civil rights, Anita Bryant was the personality that first embodied at the national level the opposition to those rights. Her successful campaign to repeal the gay rights ordinance in Dade County, Florida, not only inflicted an enduring setback for that state and ignited copycat referenda throughout the nation, but also set the negative terms of that debate for years to come.

Born on March 25, 1940, Bryant early achieved national attention when she represented Oklahoma in the 1959 Miss America pageant. Second runner-up in that competition, she parlayed the attention into a successful recording career. Bryant would become particularly known for her rendition of the Battle Hymn of the Republic, a patriotic association that she would effectively exploit during later antigay campaigns. To most households, however, Anita Bryant was known simply as the Florida orange juice lady, serving for many years as the national spokeswoman for the Florida Citrus Commission. Bryant wed Bob Green in 1969, a Miami disc jockey who then served as her manager, and went on to raise four children.

On January 18, 1977, the Miami Dade Metro Commission voted to include protections for gay men and lesbians in its human rights ordinance. The amendment to Chapter 11A of the Dade County Code would have prohibited discrimination in the areas of housing, public accommodation, and employment. Bryant founded the Save Our Children, Inc. organization to spearhead a petition drive to put the ordinance on the June 7 ballot for repeal by popular vote. An overwhelming majority rejected the ordinance, setting the stage for similar repeals in Wichita, Kansas, St. Paul, Minnesota, and Eugene, Oregon.

The unprecedented battle inflicted long-term consequences on all parties. At the local level, the non-discrimination provisions were not reinstated until 1997 (Ord. 97-17, February 25, 1997). The Christian right again forced a referendum vote on September 10, 2002, which this time failed. More enduring fallout, however, includes a state law enacted in the 1977 aftermath that bans adoptions by gay persons. This policy survived a challenge in 2005 when the U.S. Supreme Court refused an appeal from the Eleventh Circuit upholding its constitutionality against equal protection claims (Lofton v. Secretary of Dept. of Children and Family Services [2005]).

More generally, the Dade County fight significantly altered the terms of discourse concerning gay rights. Where before the predominant stereotype had been the ineffectual poof, Bryant popularized the image of the gay "militant" bent on converting others into homosexuality, largely through child molestation. This new characterization would help give rise to the favorite myth of the right of a literal "homosexual agenda" that explicitly targets the seduction of young children.

Although her antigay movement enjoyed considerable success, Bryant herself did not. Having built her reputation on defending the family, her conservative supporters rejected her after a 1980 divorce from Green. Permanently estranged from her base, she quickly lost her association with the Citrus Commission, initiating a series of financial setbacks that included bankruptcies in 1997 and 2001. Despite the personal costs incurred by her spearheading this early campaign, recent interviews at the time of this writing have indicated no softening of her antigay position.

JAMES M. DONOVAN

References and Further Reading

- Bryant, Anita. The Anita Bryant Story: The Survival of Our Nation's Families and the Threat of Militant Homosexuality. Old Tappan, NJ: Revell, 1977.
- Nussbaum, Martha C., and Saul M. Olyan, eds. Sexual Orientation & Human Rights in American Religious Discourse. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Lofton v. Secretary of Dept. of Children and Family Services*, 358 F.3d 804 (Fla. 2004), cert. denied 125 S.Ct. 869 (2005)
- Miami-Dade County Ordinance Chapter 11A

See also Christian Coalition; Gay and Lesbian Rights; Falwell, Jerry; Family Values Movement

BUCHANAN v. KENTUCKY, 483 U.S. 402 (1987)

David Buchanan was indicted on capital murder charges for the rape and murder of Barbel Poore. Buchanan requested that the capital portion of his charges be dropped, arguing Enmund v. Florida (1982) made him ineligible for the death penalty because he had neither intended to kill Poore nor had he been the gunman. This was granted. He and fellow participant Stanford were tried jointly by the state. Buchanan was found guilty and sentenced to a life sentence on the murder charge.

Following his conviction and sentence being upheld by the Kentucky Supreme Court, Buchanan appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court. Buchanan claimed that because his jury at trial had been “death qualified,” he had been deprived of his Sixth Amendment right to an impartial jury of a fair cross-section of the community.

The U.S. Supreme Court disagreed, and affirmed the lower court. Death qualification of the jury was previously permitted in Lockhart v. McCree (1986), where the death penalty was sought for one of the defendants being tried. And in Wainwright v. Witt (1985), the Court ruled that “Witherspoon-excludables” did not constitute a distinctive group in regards to fair cross-section purposes. Moreover, death qualifying a jury did not make them automatically excludable for cause because the court assumes that jurors will set aside personal beliefs and make decisions based solely on case facts and the letter of the law.

NICHOLE H. FRANKLIN

Cases and Statutes Cited

Enmund v. Florida, 458 U.S. 782 (1982)

Lockhart v. McCree, 476 U.S. 162 (1986)

Wainwright v. Witt, 469 U.S. 412, 423 (1985)

BUCHANAN v. WARLEY, 245 U.S. 60 (1917)

A 1914 Louisville, Kentucky city ordinance prohibited blacks from buying houses on blocks where the majority of the residents were white, and at the same time, prohibited whites from buying houses on blocks where the majority of the residents were black. No one was forced to move under the law. In order to challenge the law, Warley, who was black, agreed to buy Buchanan’s house. The contract for purchase provided that “It is understood that I am purchasing the above property for the purpose of having erected thereon a house which I propose to make my residence, and it is a distinct part of this agreement that I shall not be required to accept a deed to the above property or to pay for said property unless I have the right under the laws of the State of Kentucky and the City of Louisville to occupy said property as a residence.” After signing the contract, Warley then refused to pay for the house, asserting that the law prohibited him from doing so. This allowed Buchanan, the white seller, to sue Warley, for breach of contract. The Kentucky Supreme Court upheld the ordinance and declared that Warley did not have to pay for the house. This allowed the case to go to the U.S. Supreme Court.

This was the first case brought to the Supreme Court by the newly organized civil rights organization, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). Moorfield Storey, one of the leaders of the American bar, argued the case for Buchanan. The posture of the case was of course odd. Buchanan, a white man, was suing Warley, a black, to force him to buy a house in a predominately white neighborhood. If Buchanan won, then all blacks would win.

The Supreme Court framed the question in simple terms: “May the occupancy, and, necessarily, the purchase and sale of property of which occupancy is an incident, be inhibited by the States, or by one of its municipalities, solely because of the color of the proposed occupant of the premises?” The Court refused to limit the Fourteenth Amendment to the rights of blacks or other minorities, noting that “while a principal purpose of the [Fourteenth] Amendment was to protect persons of color, the broad language used was deemed sufficient to protect all persons, white or black, against discriminatory legislation by the States.” Thus, under the Fourteenth Amendment, Buchanan had just as much of a right to sell his house as Warley did to buy a house.

In upholding Buchanan’s right to sell his house, and Warley’s right to buy it, the Court quoted from Strauder v. West Virginia (1880), which had struck down a West Virginia law that prohibited blacks from serving on juries. In Strauder, the Court had said that the Fourteenth Amendment was “designed to assure to the colored race the enjoyment of all the civil rights that under the law are enjoyed by white persons, and to give to that race the protection of the general government, in that enjoyment, whenever it should be denied by the States. It not only gave citizenship and the privileges of citizenship to persons of color, but it denied to any State the power to withhold from them the equal protection of the laws, and authorized Congress to enforce its provisions by appropriate legislation.” If this was so, then surely blacks could buy houses wherever they wanted. The Court also quoted the federal Civil Rights Act of 1866, which had specifically guaranteed that blacks would have the same right as whites to “inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property.” Justice William Day then asked, “In the face of these constitutional and statutory provisions, can a white man be denied, consistently with due process of law, the right to dispose of his property to a purchaser by prohibiting the occupation of it for the sole reason that the purchaser is a person of color intending to occupy the premises as a place of residence?” The answer was obviously that a law could not prevent the sale of property solely on the basis of the race of the buyer or seller.

While properly understood as a civil rights case, Buchanan must also be seen as civil liberties case protecting the right to own and convey property. The founders saw private property as a fundamental institution in society and key to a democratic state. Many of the early states had predicated voting on property ownership because they believed that only those with a financial stake in society should be able to vote. While this theory of political participation has long been discredited, the right to own—and to buy and sell—property has been seen as a fundamental civil liberty. Here the Court accepted this notion and applied it to race discrimination.

In reaching this result, the Court rejected the idea that racial segregation, which it had approved in Plessy v. Ferguson (1896), applied to the sale of real estate. The Court had no difficulty distinguishing between separating the races on trains, or in schools, and the real estate transaction in this case. Here there was no attempt to mix the races in a social setting. The Court declared that it lacked any power to influence racial relations and acknowledged that the “the law is powerless to control” racial views and feelings of white superiority to blacks or white hostility to blacks. But, in upholding the right of people to buy and sell property, the Court did not see itself doing any of these things. It was merely allowing citizens to exercise “their constitutional rights and privileges” to own land.

This case did not lead to housing integration. White landowners avoided integration through restrictive covenants which the Court approved on the same theory that approved Buchanan’s right to sell his land: that private individuals have a right to engage in contracts for their property. Thus, in Corrigan v. Buckley (1926), the Court undermined the value of Buchanan v. Warley by demonstrating that residential segregation could be achieved by private action—with court enforcement—even if it could not be achieved by actions of the state. Corrigan involved a private agreement among thirty-one landowners in Washington, DC, who all signed a restrictive covenant that prevented them from selling law their houses or land for twenty-one years. The Court unanimously upheld the covenant, thus preventing Irene Corrigan from selling her land to a black woman. In Shelley v. Kraemer (1948), the Court would finally hold that restrictive covenants could not be enforced by courts because that would force the courts to violate the equal protection of citizens. Thus, after 1948 people were free to sign restrictive covenants, but they could not be enforced by courts and thus anyone would break the covenant without fear of being sued.

PAUL FINKELMAN

References and Further Reading

Vose, Clement. Caucasians Only: The Supreme Court, The NAACP, and the Restrictive Covenant Cases. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1959.

BUCK v. BELL, 274 U.S. 200 (1927)

In 1924, the state of Virginia passed a law granting certain state hospitals the authority to sterilize patients deemed mentally defective. After becoming pregnant out of wedlock, possibly from being raped, seventeen-year-old Carrie Buck was institutionalized by her foster parents. While institutionalized, she, like her mother before her, was deemed “feeble minded,” and the hospital recommended sterilization pursuant to the new statute. This decision was upheld through a review process that included a special hospital review board, a hearing before the state trial court, and review by the state supreme court.

Under the theories of eugenic sterilization that were popular during this era, the state argued that sterilizing those with unwanted mental deficiencies would lessen the presence of these traits in future generations, save government tax dollars spent on these individuals, and allow more patients to be released from state mental hospitals. Buck’s attorney argued that the statute violated her right of bodily integrity under the due process clause and cited equal protection concerns.

Based on a very limited and possibly one-sided record from the lower court, the Supreme Court found the state’s arguments convincing. With only one justice dissenting without comment, the Court found that the statute provided for ample due process through the statute’s review procedures and it did not violate her rights to equal protection. Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, writing the Court’s opinion, noted that since the best citizens are often required to give up their lives for the good of society, “[i]t would be strange if [the State] could not call upon those who already sap the strength of the State for these lesser sacrifices . . . in order to prevent our being swamped with incompetence.” Acknowledging that other mandatory medical procedures were considered acceptable, Holmes noted, “The principle that sustains compulsory vaccination is broad enough to cover cutting the Fallopian tubes.” Referring to Carrie Buck, her mother, and her newborn daughter, Holmes noted, “Three generations of imbeciles are enough.”

Following the decision, several states passed similar sterilization laws and the number of sterilization procedures grew dramatically. While involuntary sterilization and the eugenics movements lost much of their support in the 1940s and 1950s, including the repeal of many states’ sterilization statutes, the decision itself has never been overturned. The case has been used as valid precedent in state courts to uphold sterilization laws and was cited by the Court in Roe v. Wade as an example of the states’ ability to limit privacy rights. However, the Court has taken some steps back from Buck v. Bell, such as striking down mandatory sterilization laws aimed at habitual criminals in Skinner v. Oklahoma and suggesting that the Buck decision upheld a “harsh measure” in Board of Trustees of the University of Alabama v. Garrett. Concurring in the 2004 case of Tennessee v. Lane, Justice David Souter went even further by citing Buck as an example of past judicial endorsement of disability discrimination. Debates over related issues, such as the sterilization of welfare recipients and criminals, whether voluntarily or involuntarily, have brought further attention to the legacy of Buck v. Bell, with many viewing it as one of the most intrusive encroachments into personal liberties.

TODD A. COLLINS

References and Further Reading

- Berry, Roberta M., From Involuntary Sterilization to Genetic Enhancement: The Unsettled Legacy of Buck v. Bell, Notre Dame Journal of Law, Ethics, & Public Policy 12 (1998): 1:401–48.
- Blake, Meredith, “Welfare and Coerced Contraception: Morality Implications of State Sponsored Reproductive Control,” University of Louisville Journal of Family Law 34 (1995): 311–44.
- Lombardo, Paul A., Three Generations, No Imbeciles: New Light on Buck v. Bell, New York University Law Review 60 (1985): 1:30–63.
- Reilly, Philip. The Surgical Solution: A History of Involuntary Sterilization in the United States. Baltimore: John Hopkins University Press, 1991.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Board of Trustees of the University of Alabama v. Garrett*, 531 U.S. 356 (2001)

Buck v. Bell, 130 S.E. 516 (Va. 1925)

Buck v. Bell, 274 U.S. 200 (1927)

Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)

Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535 (1942)

Tennessee v. Lane, 541 U.S. 509 (2004) (Souter, J., concurring)

Virginia Sterilization Act, Act of Mar. 20, 1924, c. 394, 1924 Va. Acts 569, repealed by Act of Apr. 2, 1974, c. 296, 1974 Va. Acts 445

See also Abortion; Eugenic Sterilization; Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 197 U.S. 11 (1905); Right of Privacy; Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973); Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535 (1942)

BUCKLEY v. VALEO, 424 U.S. 1 (1976)

To appreciate the significance of Buckley v. Valeo, it is important to take a step back and consider the role of money in politics since the founding of the nation, but especially with the rise of the modern campaign in the twentieth century. To address the perceived abuses of money in the political system, Congress passed a series of acts throughout the 1900s, including the Tillman Act of 1907 (banning corporate contributions to presidential campaigns), the Hatch Act of 1939 (prohibiting political contributions of more than $5,000 to federal candidates or campaign committees, among other things), and the most significant of all, the Federal Election and Campaign Act (FECA). This act, passed by Congress in 1971 and amended in 1974—in the wake of the Watergate scandal and the general decline in public trust of elected officials—called for the disclosure of the sources of campaign contributions and campaign expenditures, the public funding of presidential primaries and general elections, limits on campaign expenditures for those accepting public funding, limits on expenditures from individuals’ personal funds, $1,000 limitation on independent expenditures, establishment of the Federal Election Commission (FEC), and a range of contribution limits for various individuals and organizations.

Convinced that the amended act violated core First Amendment rights, a collection of individuals and groups from across the political spectrum led by Senator James L. Buckley of New York filed suit against Francis Valeo, secretary of the Senate and ex-officio member of the newly formed FEC in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia. This court certified the constitutional questions in the case to the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals, which upheld virtually all of the substantive provisions of the FECA. Senator Buckley, et al., appealed the decision to the U.S. Supreme Court, which announced its decision on January 30, 1976.

The Buckley decision is one of the longest, most complicated, and most controversial decisions that the Court has ever produced. It is a per curiam opinion of the eight justices sitting at the time (Justice John Paul Stevens took no part). In essence, the Court found constitutional the limitations on contributions to candidates for federal office, the disclosure and recordkeeping provisions, and the public financing of presidential elections. The Court found unconstitutional the limitations on expenditures by candidates and their committees (except for presidential candidates accepting public funds), the $1,000 limitation on independent expenditures, the limitation on expenditures drawn from candidates' personal funds, and the method of appointment for FEC members.

The opinion, however, was quite fractured, with all the justices joining only in the "case or controversy" section of the decision. Three justices (William Brennan, Potter Stewart, and Lewis Powell) joined all parts of the decision, Justice Thurgood Marshall joined all except for the finding that limitations on expenditures by candidates from personal or family resources were unconstitutional, and Justice Harry Blackmun joined all parts except for the finding that contribution limits were constitutional. Then-Associate Justice William Rehnquist joined all parts except for the holding that public financing was constitutional with respect to the financing of nominating conventions, while Chief Justice Warren Burger joined only the sections explaining that the interest in preventing corruption was insufficient to justify expenditure limits and the section pertaining to the scope of the FEC's authority, and Justice Byron White joined only in the holding that public financing was constitutional.

While the disclosure and public funding provisions are of critical importance to the operations of modern campaigns, it was the Court's qualitative distinction drawn between campaign expenditures and campaign contributions that has had the greatest lasting significance. In its reasoning, the per curiam opinion held that expenditure limits violated the First Amendment, while the state's legitimate interest in preventing corruption and "the appearance of corruption" justified the limits on contributions to candidates for federal office to $1,000 for individual and groups, $5,000 for political committees, and $25,000 in total contributions during any calendar year. Further, the governmental interest in the disclosure of contributors, and amounts of $100 or more, outweighed the potential damage done to some minor parties and independent candidates. Finally, the system of public financing for presidential candidates was found to be constitutional, while the method of appointing members of the FEC was found unconstitutional.

In light of the recent abuses of public authority (that is, Watergate), the Court in this case was more prepared to accept a defense of the FECA that relied on public perceptions—whether accurate or not. As the per curiam opinion explained, it was not necessary to look beyond the primary purpose of the act—limiting "the actuality and appearance of corruption resulting from large individual financial contributions"—to find a constitutional justification for the contribution limits. "Under a system of private financing of elections," the opinion continued,

[a] candidate lacking immense personal or family wealth must depend on financial contributions from others to provide the resources necessary to conduct a successful campaign To the extent that large contributions are given to secure political quid pro quo's from current and potential office holders, the integrity of our system of representative democracy is undermined. Of almost equal concern as the danger of actual quid pro quo arrangements is the impact of the appearance of corruption stemming from public awareness of the opportunities for abuse inherent in a regime of large individual financial contributions . . . [emphasis added].

Laws criminalizing bribery were insufficient to address these more systemic problems, because they addressed only the "most blatant and specific attempts of those with money to influence governmental action."

The Buckley decision dramatically altered American politics and shaped the nature of the modern campaign. Like water pressing against a dam, as the saying goes, money searches for a way into the political sphere and the numerous progeny since Buckley (dealing with limits on political action committee [PAC] spending, "hard" versus "soft" money restrictions, coordination versus correlation in a party's relationship to its candidate, etc.) indicate that the Court will continue to play a role in the superintending of campaign finance as long as the central provisions of this paradigm case are upheld.

BRIAN K. PINAIRE

References and Further Reading

- Alexander, Herbert, and Brian Haggerty. The Federal Election Campaign Act: After a Decade of Political Reform. Los Angeles: Citizens' Research Foundation, 1981.
- Polsby, Daniel. "Buckley v. Valeo: The Special Nature of Political Speech." In The Supreme Court Review, edited by Philip Kurland, 1–43. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1976.
- Rosenkranz, E. Joshua, ed. If Buckley Fell: A First Amendment Blueprint for Regulating Money in Politics. New York: The Century Foundation, 1999.
- Smith, Bradley. Unfree Speech. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 2001.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971, 2 U.S.C. 441b(a); later amended in 1974, 1976, and 1979
 Hatch Act of 1939, 18 U.S.C. §610
 Tillman Act, ch. 420, 34 Stat. 864

See also Burger Court; Campaign Finance Reform, No. 1021; Freedom of Speech: Modern Period (1917–Present); Politics and Money

BULLINGTON v. MISSOURI, 451
 U.S. 430 (1981)

Bullington was indicted and convicted of capital murder. Under Missouri law, this meant that he would receive either death or life imprisonment without eligibility for parole for fifty years. In addition, under Missouri law, there was a separate presentence hearing wherein the prosecutor must prove to the trial jury the existence of aggravating circumstances beyond a reasonable doubt, in order for the death penalty to be imposed. The jury imposed a life sentence. Bullington appealed and was granted a new trial because of an error in the jury selection process.

The prosecutor, then, in the second trial, sought the death penalty. Bullington objected, arguing that Benton v. Maryland (1969), held that the double jeopardy clause barred the seeking of the death penalty in a second trial when the first jury did not impose it. The Missouri Supreme Court agreed with the prosecutor, stating that double jeopardy did not apply in this case.

This case made its way to the Supreme Court, where the judgment of the Missouri Supreme Court was reversed. The justices felt that because the sentencing proceeding at the petitioner's first trial was like the trial of guilt or innocence, the protection of the double jeopardy clause was also available to him at retrial. This overruled Stroud v. United States (1919), in which the Court stated that a defendant whose conviction is reversed may receive a more severe sentence at retrial than he received at his first trial.

BRIAN M. IANNACCHIONE

Cases and Statutes Cited

Benton v. Maryland, 395 U.S. 784, 794 (1969)
Stroud v. United States, 251 U.S. 15 (1919)

See also Capital Punishment; Double Jeopardy (V): Early History, Background, Framing

BURDEAU v. MCDOWELL, 256
 U.S. 465 (1921)

Following an internal investigation into unlawful conduct, Henry L. Doherty & Co. fired its employee, J.C. McDowell. An agent of the company took control of the office that McDowell formerly occupied, searched the office, and took possession of documents locked inside two safes and one desk; after reviewing the documents, some of which were personal, the company forwarded them to Burdeau at the Justice Department. McDowell claimed a violation of his Fourth and Fifth Amendment rights on the grounds that the documents, illegally obtained by a private entity, would have otherwise been unavailable to Burdeau and thus self-incriminated the defendant.

Overturing a lower court's decision by a seven-to-two vote (Brandeis and Holmes dissenting), the Supreme Court found no Fourth or Fifth Amendment violations. The majority opinion acknowledged that Doherty & Co.'s seizure of the documents was likely illegal, but because the search had been performed by a private party acting on its own behalf, the Fourth Amendment did not apply. The company was a private business, not working in association with the government. The Fifth Amendment question centered on whether the government may retain papers dubiously obtained by a private party for use as evidence against a criminal defendant. Writing for the majority, Justice Day reasoned that because the papers were held by a private party, the government could have legally subpoenaed the documents had they not been sent to the Justice Department. The Court held that the evidence, although stolen from McDowell by an agent of Doherty & Co., could be used in a criminal case against him.

Burdeau v. McDowell represents an articulation of the scope of the Fourth Amendment; the ruling remains standing law, allowing evidence stolen by a private party to be used against a criminal defendant.

JOHN GREGORY PALMER

BURDEN OF PROOF: OVERVIEW

If the notion of civil rights or civil liberties entails some fundamental freedoms from governmental overreaching, one of the most telling but perhaps subtle expressions of a commitment to the preservation of civil liberties is found in the legal concept of burden of proof. The burden of proof is traditionally described as a procedural device relating to the rules of engagement in the conduct of a trial. It sets out the parameters for which side should win a close case when the evidence is in equipoise or is ambiguous. However, this feature, the effect of resolving close cases, reveals that burdens of proof also have substantive effect; that is, they often represent normative judgments about who should prevail, who is more likely to be “correct,” what substantive policy is to be advanced, and so forth. This aspect of burdens of proof is often obscured by the emphasis on its mechanical or procedural features, particularly when the area under examination is civil. The burden of proof as a commitment of substantive law emerges more clearly in the criminal context.

Burdens of proof are typically described, thanks to Thayer’s 1890 discussion in the Harvard Law Review, as consisting of two parts—the burden of production, that is, who is responsible for coming up with evidence, and the burden of persuasion. Most often the burden of both production and persuasion is on the same party, usually the party bringing the suit, that is, the plaintiff, or in the case of a criminal prosecution, the prosecutor. However, this is not always the case, and sometimes meeting a production burden with respect to a particular issue allows a party to then shift the burden to his opponent, such as the duty to produce counterevidence and/or to persuade the trier of fact as to an alternative interpretation of the evidence presented.

One of the most familiar examples of this shifting of burdens is the self-defense defense to a homicide prosecution. Of course, the prosecutor has the burden of production and persuasion as to the theory of homicide. But this burden can be increased if the defendant pleads and puts on a self-defense case. Typically, the defendant bears the burden of product and some burden of persuasion that the killing with which he is charged was done in self-defense. Assuming that the defendant meets this burden, the burden would then shift back to the prosecutor to disprove the affirmative defense beyond a reasonable doubt. Because the Constitution requires that the prosecution prove its case beyond a reasonable doubt, the concept of an affirmative defense complicates the prosecutor’s burden. The Model Penal Code tends to place the burden on the prosecutor to disprove any affirmative defenses. But because the task of anticipating all affirmative defenses is a daunting one, not too mention somewhat inefficient, this duty is often not triggered until the defense is raised by the defendant with the appropriate amount and quality of evidence—how much evidence the defendant must produce and the nature of his burden, whether preponderance, or some other standard, varies.

In addition, burdens of proof intersect to a large degree with yet another device with both procedural and substantive aspects—the presumption. Presumptions are evidentiary devices which require that a particular fact be assumed to be true or to exist in the absence of evidence to the contrary. Such presumptions can be conclusive or rebuttable, shifting or “bursting,” but they function in much the same way as burdens of proof: to describe the contours of the way the law asserts the world should be or probably is. Thus, often discussions of burdens of proof often also involve the interaction of burdens of proof with presumptions.

A burden of proof of some kind applies to all cases, both civil and criminal. However, the quantum of proof that will satisfy the burden differs depending on whether a case is criminal or civil. And within the civil area the burden of proof can vary and shift depending upon the nature of the cause of action. Typically, however, in a civil case the burden, usually on the plaintiff, is a preponderance of the evidence. In certain types of cases, the burden may be the purportedly higher standard of “clear and convincing.” Arguably, however, the most important and well-known burden of proof, which is relevant for purposes of civil rights and civil liberties, is the burden of proof that distinguishes most criminal cases—beyond a reasonable doubt.

In the area of criminal law, the burden of proof has been an issue of constitutional dimension ever since the Supreme Court’s decision in In re Winship in 1970, although even prior to this decision, “beyond a reasonable doubt” was apparently the governing standard for criminal cases for some time, perhaps since this country’s founding. The “beyond a reasonable doubt” burden applies to both state and federal criminal cases. Thus, with respect to the criminal law, the burden of proof has an explicitly substantive aspect. Academic and political commentators often view the “beyond a reasonable doubt” standard in criminal cases as a forthright acknowledgment that the playing field is not level. Like a handicap in golf, the burden of proof of “beyond a reasonable doubt” arguably represents an attempt to even out some differences in the distribution of advantages as between the state and a defendant. At a minimum, the higher standard recalibrates the array of factors that would normally heavily favor the government.

As a practical matter, the state (whether state or federal) typically has little difficulty in convincing a jury that it has met its burden, at least in the average criminal case. Nevertheless, the common perception is that placing the burden of proof on the state in criminal cases and making that burden a high one, represents a nontrivial limitation on the potential for governmental overreaching. Still, most cases do not go to trial and it can be argued that burdens of proof that apply to the conduct of trials have less impact when it comes to settlement and pleas. Given that the state's probability of prevailing is, in general, usually perceived to be fairly high, and defendants can be presumed to know that, it may be that the state is often able to use this knowledge to exert pressure on a defendant to enter a guilty plea even when the state might be at some risk if it had to go to trial. That is, the state can still use its power to bluff about its evaluation of the likelihood of prevailing in a particular case. Nevertheless, the burden of proof lurks in the background of any plea negotiations, serving as something of a counterweight, a means by which a defendant can call the state's bluff in a close case.

Apart from whether placing the burden of proof on the government at trial accomplishes the substantive goals asserted as its justification when, in fact, most cases settle, there is the issue of whether, even if a case goes to trial, the verbal formulation of "beyond a reasonable doubt" accomplishes what it is intended to do. There is some evidence from jury studies that juries do not understand this particular verbal formulation as placing the evidentiary burden on the government that lawmakers assume or intend for it to do. Indeed, such experiences led to the abandonment in the United Kingdom of this formulation in favor of one that requires a jury to be "firmly convinced" of a defendant's guilt before conviction.

Although the criminal case is the paradigmatic case of the use of a procedural device like the burden of proof to further goals related to civil liberties, its use or impact on civil liberties and civil rights is by no means limited to criminal cases. All manner of civil cases implicate important civil rights or liberties. Just a few of these are civil commitment proceedings, termination of parental rights, legitimacy proceedings, civil forfeitures, dependency proceedings, and other similar actions involving liberty, property, or family issues. In addition, there are civil causes of action that explicitly relate to civil rights such as actions under Section 1983 and Title VII. Adjustments to the burdens of proof, and shifts in understanding of who bears the burden and what sorts of evidence are necessary to meet that burden, have long been ways in which it is possible to track a strand of skepticism, perhaps even fear, in the creation of a variety of causes of action related to civil liberties and civil rights.

From time to time, burdens have been raised and shifted to suggest that claims related to civil rights or their protection have favored status, such as in New York Times v. Sullivan when the Supreme Court raised the burden of proof in defamation against public figures to exclude causes of action with lower burdens of proof. (Actually, the Court changed the substantive law in a way that had the effect of raising the burden of proof, thus providing an excellent illustration of the issue described above of the degree to which burdens of proof implicate both substance and procedure, and presumptions and substantive evidentiary elements. What the Court did, among other things, was to rule that a presumption of damages, once a "libel per se" case had been made, was unconstitutional. One feature of this presumption was to shift the burden to the defendant to prove that his statements were true.)

In other cases, such as Texas Department of Community Affairs v. Burdine, changes in the understanding of who had the burden of proof have arguably signaled the shift to disfavored status for the protection of civil rights. In Burdine, the Supreme Court held that in a Title VII action, if an employer could prove the existence of a nondiscriminatory reason for discharge, the burden of proof shifted back to the employee/plaintiff to show that it was the improper, discriminatory motive that had led to the discharge, not the nondiscriminatory motive.

Tinkering with burdens of proof, either of production or persuasion, represents a way to "stack the deck" in particular kinds of cases. Thus, although facially neutral, burdens of proof can betray current normative positions about the desirability of the pursuit of a particular type of claim or of the likelihood that a particular type of claim is meritorious.

TAMARA R. PIETY

References and Further Reading

- Allen, Ronald J., Burdens of Proof, Uncertainty, and Ambiguity in Modern Legal Discourse, Harvard Journal of Law and Public Policy 17 (1994): 627–46.
- Cleary, Edward W., Presuming and Pleading: An Essay on Juristic Immaturity, Stanford Law Review 12 (1959): 5–28.
- Jeffries, Jr., John Calvin, and Paul B. Stephan, III., Defenses, Presumptions, and Burden of Proof in the Criminal Law, Yale Law Journal 88 (1979): 1325–427.
- Solan, Lawrence M., Refocusing the Burden of Proof in Criminal Cases: Some Doubt About Reasonable Doubt, Texas Law Review 78 (1999): 105–47.
- Thayer, James B., The Burdens of Proof, Harvard Law Review 4 (1890): 45–70.
- Underwood, Barbara D., The Thumb on the Scales of Justice: Burdens of Persuasion in Criminal Cases, Yale Law Journal 86 (1977): 1299–348.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- In re Winship*, 397 U.S. 358 (1970)
- Texas Department of Community Affairs v. Burdine*, 450 U.S. 248 (1981)
- New York Times v. Sullivan*, 376 U.S. 254 (1964)
- See also Due Process; In re Winship, 397 U.S. 358 (1970); Proof Beyond a Reasonable Doubt; Title VII and Religious Exemptions

BURGER COURT (1969–1986)

The Burger Court was a transitional institution. It reflected the conflicting currents produced by the transition from the America of John F. Kennedy and Lyndon B. Johnson to the America of Ronald Reagan and his successors. In some areas, it ranged well beyond the civil libertarian aspects of the Warren Court. At the same time, it engendered many of the conservative tendencies that were to prevail during subsequent decades under Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist.

The composition of the Burger Court reflected its nature. In its heyday, the Warren Court had comprised Chief Justice Earl Warren leading a slim but solid liberal majority of justices made up of Hugo Black, William O. Douglas, William J. Brennan, and at different times, Arthur Goldberg, Abe Fortas, and Thurgood Marshall.

By 1972, four new justices had been appointed—Chief Justice Burger, and Justices Harry Blackmun, Lewis F. Powell, and William H. Rehnquist—replacing the liberal Warren, Fortas, and Black, and the conservative John M. Harlan, respectively. Four years later Justice Douglas left, replaced by John Paul Stevens, and in 1981 the conservative Potter Stewart was succeeded by the first female justice, Sandra Day O'Connor.

The Supreme Court of the second half of the twentieth century was thus an accurate reflection of the nation: activist liberalism led by a slim liberal majority during the 1950s and 1960s, some additional liberal advances, and a gradual movement towards conservatism in the 1970s and 1980s, and vigorous conservatism in the 1990s.

Social Issues: Abortion

The most controversial of the Burger Court decisions was Roe v. Wade (1973), which found that “the right of privacy founded in the Fourteenth Amendment’s concept of personal liberty” barred a state’s prohibiting women from terminating a pregnancy on the advice of their doctors. In a seven-to-two decision written by Justice Blackmun, with only Justices White and Rehnquist dissenting, the Court established a three trimester system: virtually no state regulation of the abortion procedure was permissible during the first trimester; “reasonable” regulation of abortion to protect the health of the mother was acceptable during the second trimester; and abortions could be prohibited during the last trimester unless the health of the mother was endangered by the pregnancy. In a companion case, Doe v. Bolton (1973), the same seven-to-two majority struck down state regulations of abortion that it deemed inconsistent with the right established in Roe.

The decision did not come out of nowhere. In 1965, the Warren Court had recognized a right of privacy for married couples to use contraceptives. Griswold v. Connecticut (1965). The year before Roe, the Court had extended the right to use contraceptives to single people in Eisenstadt v. Baird (1972), and for several years prior to Roe, lower courts and some state courts had also struck down abortion laws. Also, some states, notably California under Governor Ronald Reagan, and New York, had legislatively liberalized their abortion laws.

Nevertheless, the decision set off a firestorm of protest, particularly among some religious groups, and the Republican Party made overturning Roe v. Wade a central feature of its party platform. A substantial majority of the public accepted the decision, however, and wanted it retained.

Three subsidiary issues soon arose: public funding; the rights of minors to terminate a pregnancy without parental consent or notification; and state and local regulation of the abortion procedure.

Five years after Roe, the Court ruled that Connecticut did not have to use Medicaid funds for first trimester abortions, even if it chose to pay for childbirth or “medically necessary” abortions (Maher v. Roe [1977]). Three years later the Court ruled that Congress may even bar Medicaid funding for medically necessary abortions (Harris v. McRae [1980]).

Minors who sought to terminate their pregnancy without either notifying or obtaining the consent of either or both parents were allowed to do so, but only with court approval (Bellotti v. Baird [1979], Planned Parenthood of Kansas City v. Ashcroft [1983]).

As the abortion wars heated up and the anti-abortion forces gained strength, state and local governments adopted a wide array of regulations designed to make it more difficult for women to obtain an abortion and for abortion providers to operate. All were struck down by the Burger Court, over persistent dissents by Justices White, Rehnquist, and O'Connor, and increasingly Chief Justice Burger.

After Justice Powell’s departure in 1987, the justices unhappy with Roe v. Wade were in the majority, and in 1992 they cut back sharply on that decision while affirming its “central holding.” In Planned Parenthood of S.E. Pa. v. Casey (1992), Justices O'Connor, Anthony Kennedy who succeeded Justice Powell, and David Souter, who followed Justice Brennan, redefined the right established in Roe as the right not to be encumbered by “undue burdens” in obtaining an abortion. The state’s interest in potential life from the inception of the pregnancy was recognized, and the trimester system was abandoned. The plurality and the dissenters went on to uphold five of the six state regulations limiting abortion at issue, all of which had earlier been struck down, including provisions requiring waiting periods, favoring childbirth over abortion, and “informed consent;” only the requirement that a spouse be notified before an abortion was struck down. As of 2005, over four hundred state and local laws designed to make an abortion more difficult to provide and to obtain have been enacted.

Social Issues: Homosexual Intercourse

During these years, homosexuals, among the most oppressed of American minorities, also tried to free themselves from the legal burdens they faced, especially laws that made sexual intercourse between members of the same sex a criminal offense. These laws were rarely enforced but could be used for blackmail and to justify employment and other disabilities.

By the mid-1980s, some twenty-six states no longer had such laws. Nevertheless, in 1986, the last year of Chief Justice Burger’s tenure, a five-to-four majority of the Court refused to strike down a Georgia sodomy statute (Bowers v. Hardwick [1986]).

Bowers remained the law for seventeen years. During this period, many states repealed such laws or had them struck down by their highest courts. Finally, in 2003, the Court overruled Bowers and struck down a Texas law on due process grounds (Lawrence v. Texas [2003]).

Religion: The Establishment Clause

Religion has always played a central role in American life and politics. At the same time, the Constitution mandates a separation between church and state. Reconciling these two forces has resulted in a complex, often baffling series of Supreme Court decisions, a high proportion of which were issued during the Burger Court.

The difficulties and resulting inconsistencies appeared in the Supreme Court’s first decision on the use of public funds for aid to religious schools. In Everson v. Board of Education (1947), the Court, speaking through Justice Black, erected a “wall of separation between church and state” as a result of which, “[n]either [a state nor the federal government] can aid one religion, aid all religions, or prefer one religion over another.” Despite the apparent comprehensiveness of that statement, a five-to-four majority of the Court went on to approve New Jersey’s willingness to fund bus transportation for children attending religious schools. That inconsistency pervaded the many subsequent separation decisions.

Guiding principles were announced early in the life of the Burger Court by the Chief Justice in Lemon v. Kurtzman (1971): “First, the statute must have a secular legislative purpose; second, its principal or primary effect must be one that neither advances nor inhibits religion; finally, the statute must not foster ‘an excessive government entanglement with religion.’” In Lemon, the Court ruled that government may not fund salary supplements for teachers of secular subjects at religious schools or pay for their secular textbooks or other instructional materials or services, because that would “excessively entangle” the government in the administrative affairs of the church in order to ensure that the grant was not used for religious purposes. The chief justice also raised the dangers of political divisiveness because of religious strife over aid.

Although Chief Justice Burger sought to weaken the “wall of separation” metaphor by calling it “blurred, indistinct and variable,” the Court initially took a strong separationist position, holding that the Constitution bars the loan of maps, magazines, tape recorders, and laboratory equipment to parochial schools (Meek v. Pittinger [1975], Wolman v. Walter [1977]), as well as remedial and therapeutic services on parochial school premises (Aguilar v. Felton [1984]). The Rehnquist Court later overruled these decisions in Mitchell v. Helms (2000) and Agostini v. Felton (1995). The Burger Court did, however, allow the state to provide standardized testing and diagnostic services even when done on religious school premises in Wolman. In Committee for Public Education v. Nyquist (1973), the Court had also refused to allow government-funded tuition rebates and tax deductions for attendance at nonpublic schools. Ten years later, however, in Mueller v. Allen (1983), a five-to-four majority held that a tax deduction for parents of children in all schools (public and nonpublic) for tuition, textbooks, and transportation was constitutionally permissible. Writing for the Court, then-Justice Rehnquist stressed that the aid was “channel[ed]” through the parents for the benefit of the child, rather than given to the schools, and was “neutrally available” to a broad spectrum of citizens. The prospect of religious strife was disparaged and the fact that 96 percent of the nonpublic schoolchildren went to religious schools was deemed irrelevant. In succeeding years, individual choice and neutrality became key factors.

With respect to higher education, the Burger Court took a less restrictive position right from the start.

In Tilton v. Roemer (1971), and Roemer v. Board of Pub. Works (1973), the Court allowed states to provide money for building construction and for other non-sectarian activities because religious indoctrination was less likely either to be attempted or to be successful, given the nature of both the courses and the less impressionable nature of college students. In a case at the intersection of the establishment and free speech clauses, the Court allowed the speech clause to override separationist concerns. In Widmar v. Vincent (1981), the Court refused to allow a state university to deny a religious group use of the university's facilities to meet for religious discussion and prayer. The university grounded its refusal on the establishment clause, but the Court rejected its defense and found that an "equal access" policy was required to avoid discrimination against religious speech, once the university created a public forum; the assistance to religion was deemed only "incidental." And in one of the last Burger Court decisions, the Court unanimously agreed to allow state payment to assist a visually handicapped person who was studying to become a minister (Witters v. Washington Dept. of Service for the Blind [1986]).

The Court also dealt with other forms of governmental religious involvement in public schools. In Wallace v. Jaffree (1985), the Court struck down an Alabama law that mandated a moment of silence for "meditation or voluntary prayer" because it was clear to seven of the nine justices (the chief justice and Justice Rehnquist dissenting) that the inclusion of "voluntary prayer" in the Alabama legislation was an "effort to return voluntary prayer" to the schools." And in Stone v. Graham (1980), for similar reasons, a five-to-four majority of the Court summarily refused to allow public schools to hang a copy of the Ten Commandments in public school classrooms, issuing a per curiam opinion without oral argument concluding that there was "no secular legislative purpose."

One of the Burger Court's few important free exercise cases also arose in education. In Wisconsin v. Yoder (1972), a six-to-one majority concluded that the Old Order Amish, a religious order, could withdraw their children from the public schools after the eighth grade despite the state's compulsory school attendance law. Since the Amish believe that their salvation "requires life in a church community separate and apart from the world and worldly influence," the state's interest in education was subject to strict scrutiny because it impinged on rights protected by the free exercise clause. The state could not meet that test because the Amish alternative of informal education achieved whatever goals the state sought to deliver with its compulsory school attendance.

Because religion has been so intertwined with public life in America, the Burger Court had to struggle with two other issues: religious worship in public bodies and displays of religious symbols on public property. In Marsh v. Chambers (1983), a six-to-three majority ignored the Lemon test and looked to history and tradition to allow the Nebraska legislature to open each legislative day with a prayer by a Presbyterian minister paid by the state. The following year, in Lynch v. Donnelly (1984), a five-to-four majority of the Court allowed Pawtucket, Rhode Island to erect a nativity scene in a local park at Christmas time. The Court called it an "accommodation" to religious belief that did not advance religion but "depict[ed] the pastoral origins of this merely traditional event long recognized as a national holiday." Both opinions for the Court were written by Chief Justice Burger, but the most influential opinion in the two cases was Justice O'Connor's opinion in Lynch, in which she reinterpreted the effects prong of the Lemon test to focus on whether the government "endorsed" the religion in question. The O'Connor formulation, which was frequently used in subsequent years, reflected a persistent disenchantment with the Lemon test. Nevertheless, the test continued to be invoked throughout the Rehnquist Court era, although it was also often ignored and even criticized by many of the justices.

Free Speech: Campaign Finance

Since 1930, when the Supreme Court first struck down a statute for violating the free speech clause of the First Amendment, speech cases have accounted for a substantial portion of the Court's docket. The Burger Court's leading speech cases fall into four categories: electoral campaign financing; commercial speech; offensive speech including obscenity, pornography and vulgarity; and the rights of the press.

Perhaps the most perplexing speech issue to come before the Burger Court was its response to Congress's effort in 1974 to limit electoral campaign contributions and expenditures in the wake of the Watergate scandals. In Buckley v. Valeo (1976) (per curiam), the Court ruled that although limitations on both forms of financing would reduce political speech and association, Congress could restrict contributions by individuals and groups, including political action committees, in order to avoid both the actuality and appearance of corruption; the Court later made an exception for individual contributions to a public interest group in connection with a proposed ballot measure (Citizens Against Rent Control v. Berkeley [1981]). Expenditure limits, however, were struck down, including limits that Congress tried to impose on a candidate's expenditure of personal funds. The Court found that unlike contribution limits, expenditure limits on explicit advocacy for or against a specific candidate—which is how the Court read the statute to avoid finding it unconstitutionally vague—“impose direct and substantial restraints on the quantity of political speech,” and were not justifiable; fiscally equalizing the electoral playing field was not an acceptable goal. Fourteen years later, however, the Rehnquist Court allowed Michigan to require the Chamber of Commerce and other business corporations to insist on a segregated fund for expenditures on elections for public office (Austin v. Michigan Chamber of Commerce [1990]), although expenditures on referenda and similar issues could not be so limited (First National Bank v. Bellotti [1978]).

Free Speech: Commercial Speech

Overturning prior law, in 1976 the Court ruled that speech that “does no more than propose a commercial transaction” was entitled to constitutional protection unless it was false or misleading or against public policy (Va. St. Bd. of Pharmacy v. Va. Citizens Consumer Council, Inc. [1976]). Restraints on such speech, however, including prior restraints, would not be subject to the most stringent level of judicial scrutiny—strict scrutiny—so long as the restraint advanced a substantial governmental interest and was no more extensive than necessary (Central Hudson Gas & Electric Co. v. P.S.C. of New York [1980]). Commercial speech thus received less judicial protection than political, artistic, or other forms of speech, which were normally entitled to strict scrutiny protection. In later years, the Rehnquist Court further refined the Central Hudson test.

Free Speech: Obscene, Pornographic, and Vulgar Speech

For over fifteen years, the Warren Court had struggled to define a limited category of speech that would be denied First Amendment protection because it could be categorized as “obscene.” The result was confusion. Finally, a newly constituted majority of the Burger Court ruled that expression would be considered “obscene” if “(a) . . . ‘the average person, applying contemporary community standards’ would find that the work, taken as a whole, appeals to the prurient interest; (b) . . . the work depicts or describes in a patently offensive way, sexual conduct specifically defined by the applicable state law; and (c) . . . the work, taken as a whole lacks serious literary, artistic, political or scientific value” (Miller v. California [1973]). Local juries would apply “contemporary community standards” to determine “prurency” and “patent offensiveness.”

Concerned about child abuse, the Court also refused to protect material that put children in sexually explicit settings even if the material would not be considered obscene under Miller (New York v. Ferber [1982]). And though the Burger Court refused to allow the banning of “indecent” speech, regulating the location of adult movies houses was upheld (City of Renton v. Playtime Theatres, Inc. [1986]). Also, the government's power to regulate broadcasting was used to uphold Federal Communications Commission sanctions against a broadcaster for airing indecent speech (F.C.C. v. Pacifica Foundation [1978]).

On the other hand, in Cohen v. California [1971]), the Court refused to allow California to make it illegal to wear a jacket with the words “Fuck the Draft,” underscoring the principle that the state cannot deny protection to speech that is merely offensive, whether morally, aesthetically, or politically.

Free Speech: The Press

One of the Warren Court's landmark decisions was New York Times Co. v. Sullivan (1964), in which the Court ruled that the First Amendment required a plaintiff in a libel case to prove that the defendant had defamed him with “actual malice—that is, with knowledge that it [the statement] was false or made with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not.” Ten years after the Sullivan case, the Court ruled that only “public figure” plaintiffs had to meet this demanding standard in Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc. (1974); the states could define for themselves the standards for suits by private plaintiffs. It remained uncertain when a private citizen who is thrust into public prominence involuntarily would be considered a “public figure.” The Court later ruled that if defamatory statements do not involve matters of public concern, but only private matters such as a confidential credit report, they would not be subject to the Times v. Sullivan standard (Dun & Bradstreet, Inc. v. Greenmoss Builders, Inc. [1985]).

The Court consistently refused to grant the press privileges or protection unavailable to the general public. In 1972, it refused to create a privilege for journalists who were called before a grand jury and ordered to reveal information received confidentially or the source of the information (Branzburg v. Hayes [1972]). In libel case litigation (Herbert v. Lando [1979]), the Court required the press to open its files for a libel plaintiff suing under the Sullivan case, in order to enable the plaintiff to prove actual malice.

The press suffered other defeats at the hands of the Burger Court. In Zurcher v. Stanford Daily (1978), the Court denied a college newspaper any special protection against an ex parte warrant of the newsroom. In Pell v. Procunier (1974), the Court refused to require a prison administration to allow press interviews with individual inmates, and in 1978, it ruled that both the media and the general public could be denied any access to prisons and most other public institutions (Houchins v. KQED [1978]).

The press did gain some significant victories from the Burger Court. The most celebrated victory came in the Pentagon Papers case, or New York Times Co. v. United States (1971), in which a bitterly divided six-to-three majority refused to allow the government to enjoin publication of a classified Defense Department study of the origins of the Vietnam War, declaring such an injunction to be an unconstitutional prior restraint. In Nebraska Press Ass'n v. Stuart (1976), the Court also found an unlawful prior restraint in a “gag order” against publication of an accused’s confession or admissions in a widely publicized murder case. On the other hand, a former government employee was enjoined from publishing information about official activities because he had signed an agreement not to divulge such information without government approval (Snepp v. United States [1980]).

Finally, the print press was released from any obligation to allow a target of press criticism a right of reply in Miami Herald Pub. Co. v. Tornillo (1974). A year earlier, the Court had also allowed the broadcast networks to refuse to sell air time to the Democratic National Committee and others for political advocacy in Columbia Broadcasting System v. Democratic Nat’l Committee (1973), but Congress was allowed to mandate “reasonable access” to the air waves for federal political candidates in CBS, Inc. v. F.C.C. (1981).

Prisoners’ Rights

The Burger Court’s shifting nature was also reflected in its decisions on the rights of prisoners. For decades, the federal courts had refused to exercise any oversight over prison conditions. As part of the increasing concern for social justice in the 1960s, however, the federal courts began to accept prisoner petitions filed under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, the 1871 Civil Rights law. In a summary opinion in 1972 decided without a signed opinion, the unanimous Court made it possible for prisoners to file their own suits, and set a high standard for dismissal of such suits (Haines v. Kerner [1972]). The Court followed this up with decisions allowing suits challenging prison conditions to be filed in federal court without first exhausting state judicial and administrative remedies. In short order, the prisoner’s right to practice his religion was given protection, mail censorship was limited, arbitrary disciplinary procedures were changed, physical abuse and corporal punishment were condemned, prisoner expression within the institution received some protection, unnecessary visiting restrictions were voided, improvements in medical care were ordered, strip searches were limited, and parole procedures were improved. In many cases, the entire state system was condemned.

In 1974, the tide began to turn. Although prisoners continued to receive some protection, their right to fair procedures in disciplinary hearings was curtailed in Wolff v. McDonnell. That same year, the Court upheld the authority of states to deny the right to vote to persons convicted of a felony, influencing elections for many years to come in Richardson v. Ramirez. In 1979, the rights of pretrial detainees were severely curtailed in Bell v. Wolfish. Although it was still possible to bring suits challenging brutal and inhumane conditions, as in Hutto v. Finney (1978), by 1986, there was a return to almost total deference to administrative discretion. In later years, the Rehnquist Court would extend such deference to more and more contexts, in the process limiting or overturning Burger Court precedents. Compare, for example, Lewis v. Casey (1996) with Bounds v. Smith (1978) (prisoners’ access to law libraries).

The transition to a more conservative federal judiciary initiated by the Burger Court is now complete. The Rehnquist Court developed and expanded many of the conservative doctrines originated during Chief Justice Burger’s tenure, and as this is being written, the Court is again being reshaped along conservative lines. Nevertheless, many of the advances in civil liberties made during Chief Justice Burger’s tenure and earlier are still in effect and will probably remain, if only because of the American judiciary’s respect for precedent. But predictions about the Supreme Court are notoriously unreliable, and the civil liberties legacy of the Burger Court is unpredictable.

HERMAN SCHWARTZ

References and Further Reading

Barron, Jerome A., and C. Thomas Dienes. First Amendment Law. St. Paul, MN: Thomson West, 2000.

- Blasi, Vince, ed. The Burger Court: The Counter-Revolution That Wasn't. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1983.
- Greenhouse, Linda. Becoming Justice Blackmun. New York: Henry Holt & Company, 2005.
- Jeffries, John. Justice Lewis F. Powell, Jr. New York: C. Scribner's Sons; Toronto: Maxwell Macmillan Canada; New York: Maxwell Macmillan International, 1994.
- Schwartz, Herman, ed. The Burger Years. New York: Viking Press, 1987.
- , ed. The Rehnquist Court. New York: Hill & Wang, 2002.
- Tribe, Laurence. American Constitutional Law. 2d ed. Mineola, NY: Foundation Press, 1988.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Agostini v. Felton*, 521 U.S. 203 (1995)
- Aguilar v. Felton*, 473 U.S. 402 (1984)
- Austin v. Michigan Chamber of Commerce*, 494 U.S. 652 (1990)
- Bell v. Wolfish*, 441 U.S. 520 (1979)
- Bellotti v. Baird*, 443 U.S. 622 (1979)
- Bounds v. Smith*, 437 U.S. 678 (1978)
- Bowers v. Hardwick*, 478 U.S. 186 (1986)
- Branzburg v. Hayes*, 408 U.S. 665 (1972)
- Buckley v. Valeo*, 424 U.S. 1 (1976)
- CBS, Inc. v. F.C.C.*, 453 U.S. 367 (1981)
- Central Hudson Gas and Electric Co. v. P.S.C. of New York*, 447 U.S. 557 (1980)
- Citizens Against Rent Control v. Berkeley*, 454 U.S. 90 (1981)
- City of Renton v. Playtime Theatres, Inc.*, 475 U.S. 41 (1986)
- Cohen v. California*, 403 U.S. 15 (1971)
- Columbia Broadcasting System v. Democratic Nat'l Committee*, 412 U.S. 94 (1973)
- Committee for Public Education v. Nyquist*, 413 U.S. 756 (1973)
- Doe v. Bolton*, 410 U.S. 179 (1973)
- Dun & Bradstreet, Inc. v. Greenmoss Builders, Inc.*, 472 U.S. 749 (1985)
- Eisenstadt v. Baird*, 405 U.S. 408 (1972)
- Everson v. Board of Education*, 330 U.S. 1 (1947)
- F.C.C. v. Pacifica Foundation*, 438 U.S. 726 (1978)
- First National Bank v. Bellotti*, 435 U.S. 765 (1978)
- Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc.*, 418 U.S. 323 (1974)
- Griswold v. Connecticut*, 381 U.S. 479 (1965)
- Haines v. Kerner*, 404 U.S. 519 (1972)
- Harris v. McRae*, 448 U.S. 297 (1980)
- Herbert v. Lando*, 441 U.S. 153 (1979)
- Houchins v. KQED*, 438 U.S. 1 (1978)
- Hutto v. Finney*, 437 U.S. 678 (1978)
- Lawrence v. Texas*, 539 U.S. 588 (2003)
- Lemon v. Kurtzman*, 403 U.S. 602 (1971)
- Lewis v. Casey*, 518 U.S. 343 (1996)
- Lynch v. Donnelly*, 465 U.S. 668 (1984)
- Maher v. Roe*, 432 U.S. 464 (1977)
- Marsh v. Chambers*, 463 U.S. 783 (1983)
- Meek v. Pittinger*, 421 U.S. 349 (1975)
- Miami Herald Pub. Co. v. Tornillo*, 418 U.S. 241 (1974)
- Miller v. California*, 413 U.S. 15 (1973)
- Mitchell v. Helms*, 530 U.S. 793 (2000)
- Mueller v. Allen*, 463 U.S. 388 (1983)
- Nebraska Press Ass'n v. Stuart*, 427 U.S. 539 (1976)
- New York v. Ferber*, 458 U.S. 747 (1982)
- New York Times Co. v. Sullivan*, 376 U.S. 254 (1964)
- New York Times Co. v. United States*, 403 U.S. 713 (1971)
- Pell v. Procunier*, 417 U.S. 817 (1974)
- Planned Parenthood of S.E. Pa. v. Casey*, 505 U.S. 833 (1992)
- Richardson v. Ramirez*, 418 U.S. 24 (1974)
- Roe v. Wade*, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)
- Roemer v. Board of Public Works*, 426 U.S. 736 (1973)
- Snepp v. United States*, 444 U.S. 507 (1980)
- Stone v. Graham*, 449 U.S. 39 (1980)
- Tilton v. Roemer*, 403 U.S. 672 (1971)
- Va. St. Bd. Of Pharmacy v. Va. Citizens Consumer Council, Inc.*, 425 U.S. 748 (1976)
- Wallace v. Jaffree*, 472 U.S. 38 (1985)
- Widmar v. Vincent*, 454 U.S. 263 (1981)
- Wisconsin v. Yoder*, 406 U.S. 205 (1972)
- Witters v. Washington Dept. of Service for the Blind*, 474 U.S. 481 (1986)
- Wolff v. McDonnell*, 418 U.S. 539 (1974)
- Wolman v. Walter*, 433 U.S. 229 (1977)
- Zurcher v. Stanford Daily*, 436 U.S. 547 (1978). 42 U.S.C. § 1983, Civil Rights law of 1871

See also Abortion; Access to Prisons; Accommodation of Religion; Amish and Religions Liberty; Birth Control; Burger, Warren E.; Campaign Finance Reform, No. 1021; Commercial Speech; Defamation and Free Speech; Equal Protection Clause and Religious Freedom; Establishment Clause Doctrine; Supreme Court Jurisprudence; Establishment of Religion and Free Exercise Clause; Felon Disenfranchisement; Freedom of Speech and Press: Nineteenth Century; Freedom of the Press: Modern Period (1917–Present); Freedom of Speech and Press under Constitution: Early History (1791–1917); Gag Orders in Judicial Proceedings; Lemon Test; Miller Test; National Security Prior Restraints; Newsroom Searches; Obscenity; Politics and Money; Prisoners and the Free Exercise Clause Rights; Prisons and Freedom of Speech; Privacy; Public Vulgarity and Free Speech; Rehnquist Court; Rehnquist, William H.; Release Time from Public Schools (For Religious Purposes); Religious Symbols on Public Property; Reporter's Privilege; Right to Reply and Right of the Press; Sodomy Laws; State Aid to Religious Schools; Subpoenas to Reporters; Ten Commandments on Display in Public Buildings; Warren Court; Warren, Earl

BURGER, WARREN E. (1907–1995)

Chief Justice Warren Earl Burger was the fifteenth chief justice of the U.S. Supreme Court. Appointed in 1969 to the Supreme Court by President Nixon, Burger served for seventeen years until 1986. Born on September 17, 1907, in St. Paul, Minnesota, Burger was the fourth of seven children of Charles Joseph and Katharine Schnittger Burger. Charles Burger was a railroad cargo inspector and traveling salesman, while Katherine Burger (as Warren Burger recalled) ran an “old-fashioned German house” based on “common sense” and respect for traditional values. Burger’s paternal grandfather, Joseph Burger, was a Swiss immigrant who joined the Union Army at age fourteen and became a Civil War hero. His maternal parents were immigrants from Germany and Australia.

Because he suffered from polio at age eight, Burger stayed at home for a year. Even then, he was already a fan of the U.S. Constitution and knew he wanted to be a lawyer. Thus, his teacher brought him autobiographies of judges and lawyers. At age nine, Burger began delivering newspapers to help with his family’s finances. In high school, Burger did not compile an outstanding academic record, but he was otherwise very active in several extracurricular activities. He was the president of the student council, head of the student court, and editor of the student newspaper. In addition, he participated in several sports, and ended up lettering in football, hockey, swimming, and track. Because of his extensive extracurricular activities, he was awarded a scholarship by Princeton University.

Concluding that the Princeton scholarship was insufficient to meet his financial needs and wanting to help support his family, Burger turned down the offer. He then enrolled in extension classes at the University of Minnesota in 1925, and after two years started attending night classes at the St. Paul College of Law (now the William Mitchell College of Law). He graduated magna cum laude from law school in 1931 and was admitted to the Minnesota Bar the same year. Burger worked as a life insurance salesman while attending college and law school, and served as the student body president. He met his wife, Elvera Stromberg, in college and married her in 1933. They later had two children, Wade and Margaret.

Burger began his legal career as an associate at a law firm in 1931 and became a partner at the firm in 1935. He earned a reputation as a capable lawyer who specialized in corporate, real estate, and probate law. While practicing law, Burger also taught contract law at his alma mater from 1931 to 1953 and was the president of the local junior chamber of commerce in 1935. Unable to sign up for military service during World War II because of a spinal condition, Burger nonetheless served as a member of Minnesota’s emergency war labor board from 1942 to 1947. After World War II, he served as a member of the governor’s interracial commission from 1948 to 1953. During that period, Burger also became the first president of the St. Paul’s Council on Human Relations, wherein his responsibilities included improving the relationship between that city’s police and its racial minorities.

A lifelong Republican, Burger played an active part in politics. He was one of the founders of the Minnesota’s first Young Republicans organization, and served as floor manager for Harold Stassen’s unsuccessful campaigns for the Republican presidential nomination both in 1948 and in 1952. During the 1952 Republican convention when General Eisenhower emerged as the frontrunner, Burger shifted his support to Eisenhower. His support for President Eisenhower led to his appointment in 1953 to head what is now the civil division of the Justice Department. In 1955, President Eisenhower nominated Burger to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. Although his confirmation stalled in the Senate for several months due to allegations of discrimination charges raised by former Justice Department employees that he had dismissed, Burger was confirmed and seated on the Appeals Court in April 1956. Burger’s record on the Appeals Court was largely conservative, especially with respect to criminal cases involving suspects and defendants. Although he served a total of thirteen years on the Appeals Court, he was considered a surprise choice for the Supreme Court.

In 1967, Burger in a speech delivered at Ripon College complained of the “prolonged conflict” characterizing the U.S. system of criminal justice. He noted that the adversary system has become “glorified” to a point whereby defendants are encouraged, even after conviction, to continue their fight with society. President Nixon, who had previously met Burger during the 1948 Republican Convention, must have taken note of that speech when trying to fulfill his own campaign promise to place “political conservatives” and “strict constructionists” on the federal bench. Therefore, on May 21, 1969, President Nixon nominated Burger to fill the seat and position being vacated by Chief Justice Earl Warren on the Supreme Court. Confirmed by the Senate on a seventy-four to three vote on June 9, 1969, Burger was sworn in by his predecessor, Earl Warren, on June 23, 1969. Burger ended up serving seventeen years, one of the longest terms of any Supreme Court chief justices, until September 26, 1986. President Reagan nominated Justice Rehnquist to replace Burger as the nation’s sixteenth chief justice.

After his retirement from the Supreme Court, Burger chaired the Commission on the Bicentennial of the United States, a role he took very seriously. Burger was extremely delighted that the 200th birthday of the U.S. Constitution on September 17, 1987, was also his own eightieth birthday. After his wife passed away in 1994, Burger’s health rapidly deteriorated and he died of congestive heart failure on June 25, 1995. Chief Justice Burger was laid in state in the Great Hall of the Supreme Court, and buried next to his wife at Arlington National Cemetery on June 29, 1995.

Burger's Judicial Philosophy

Chief Justice Burger proved to be less of a knee-jerk conservative than most hard-line conservatives expected when he was nominated. In fact, the entire Burger Court era did not generate the counter-revolution Warren Court critics were anticipating.

Part of the disappointment felt by hard-line conservatives desiring a different Supreme Court from that of the liberal Warren Court was that they had raised their expectations far too high while forgetting that each justice, including the chief justice, had only one vote.

The Burger Court consisted of five holdovers from the Warren era that served long tenures during the Burger era. Three of these five holdovers—William O. Douglas, William J. Brennan, Jr., and Thurgood Marshall—were regarded as liberal activists, while the other two—Potter Stewart and Byron White—were considered more moderate to conservative justices. In addition to Burger, President Nixon appointed three other justices to the Supreme Court—Harry A. Blackmun, William H. Rehnquist, and Lewis F. Powell. After Nixon, two other justices—John Paul Stevens (appointed by President Ford) and Sandra Day O'Connor (nominated by President Reagan)—joined the Burger Court. During the overall course of the Burger Court, Blackmun and Stevens became part of the liberal bloc, Rehnquist and O'Connor (albeit not always) joined the conservative wing, while Powell generally maintained a centrist position.

Considered as lacking analytical rigor or great eloquence by critics, Burger brought a common-sense approach to his decisions. He tried to strike a balance between liberal excesses and conservative extremes. On most civil rights issues, Burger was a moderate. He believed that school busing should be limited to instances when de jure segregation had actually occurred and not for the purpose of racial balance (Milliken v. Bradley [1974]). On affirmative action, Burger maintained that congressionally mandated but not state-enacted preferences could be used to remedy past discrimination (Fullilove v. Klutznick [1980], later repealed by Adarand Constructors v. Peña [1995] during the Rehnquist era). In Wisconsin v. Yoder (1972), writing for the Court, Burger rejected compulsory high school education for the Amish, deeming it a violation of their religious beliefs. But

Burger was protective of the freedom of the press, claiming, for example, that newspapers should not be required to give space to the people they criticize as their right to reply (Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo [1974]). However, Burger was hostile to other First Amendment issues such as pornography, dirty words, and disruptive speech in schools.

Unlike hard-line conservatives in more recent years, Burger was a “traditional” conservative on many important policy issues. For example, noting that it would only benefit the entire society, he advocated for the rehabilitation of prison inmates by urging job provisions for inmates. In addition, Burger believed in gun control and was a staunch advocate of gun licensing. In a magazine article in 1990 after his Supreme Court years, Burger explained the rationale behind the Second Amendment of the U.S. Constitution as being reflective of the founding fathers’ purpose and objectives then, and cautioned against the literal reading of the amendment in today’s world.

In the field of criminal justice, Burger acted as predicted. He participated in decisions limiting Warren-era precedents that gave criminal defendants substantial leeway. For example, Burger helped limit the Fourth Amendment exclusionary rule as merely deterring police misconduct rather than a constitutional requirement. He refused to extend the exclusionary rule to grand jury proceedings and “good faith” police seizures of evidence based on invalid warrants. As for Miranda warnings, Burger did not have problems with using tainted confessions to impeach a defendant’s trial testimony or to obtain other evidence against suspects. He also agreed with the Court’s decision not to apply Miranda to grand jury proceedings or to instances when police initiate interrogation to avoid an imminent danger to public safety. However, some of Burger’s Republican friends were not too happy that he wrote the Court’s opinion (albeit with significant assistance from his colleagues) in United States v. Nixon (1974) preventing President Nixon from withholding from Congress and the courts materials related to the Watergate affair.

Regardless of what Burger critics thought of his judicial temperament, they uniformly agree that he made a significant and memorable mark on judicial administration in U.S. history. He worked with the American Bar Association on judicial education programs and in creating the Institute of Judicial Administration. He improved the administration of the Supreme Court itself by either creating or adding new administrative positions such as administrative assistant to the chief justice, judicial fellows, public relations professionals, librarians, and clerks. He substantially improved the Court's law library and enhanced its technology. Burger sponsored the National Center for State Courts, championed the creation of the Federal Judicial Center, and encouraged similar organizations to conduct scholarly research on the Court. Burger is celebrated as the chief architect of court mediation, alternative dispute resolution, arbitration, and other alternatives to litigation that are now widely used in U.S. jurisprudence.

Burger Court's Legacy on Civil Liberties

Although the Burger Court left its indelible mark on American civil liberties, it did not produce a seismic change as President Richard Nixon and his political allies would have preferred. Moreover, the Burger Court concentrated on non-economic issues rather than on property rights. Similar to other Supreme Court eras after 1937, the Burger Court did not nullify any economic regulation on substantive due process grounds. However, the Burger Court subjected Bill of Rights issues and other personal non-economic rights matters to strict judicial scrutiny.

On religious liberty, the Burger Court kept and extended many Warren Court precedents outlawing state-sponsored religious exercises in the public schools. Ruling in Lemon v. Kurtzman (1971), the Court established a three-pronged test for determining whether laws or government actions affecting religion activities violated the First Amendment establishment clause. Applying the Lemon test required that laws affecting religion were to be held constitutional only if they had a secular purpose, had a primary effect that neither advanced nor harmed religion, and did not create an excessive entanglement between church and state. In one particular application of the Lemon test, the Burger Court, in a six-to-three majority ruling, invalidated the posting of the Ten Commandments on the walls of classrooms (Stone v. Graham [1980]). However, the Burger Court sometimes took on a more expansive view of the First Amendment religion clauses. For example in Widmar v. Vincent (1981), the Court, disallowing a state university's concern over violating the establishment clause, concluded that the university could not exclude religious student groups from facilities available to secular student organizations.

On First Amendment free expression and association cases, the Burger Court mostly relied on the Warren era rulings except in certain instances when it clarified the Supreme Court's position on prior restraints on the press. The Burger Court maintained that in order for the government to impose prior restraints on the press, the government must demonstrate a "heavy burden" of justification.

The Burger Court left a strong legacy on equal protection issues. Unlike the unanimity maintained mostly by the Warren era justices on many school desegregation cases, the Burger Court lacked such cohesion. Although the Burger Court unanimously ruled in Swann v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg Bd. of Education (1971) that trial judges in desegregation cases had broad remedial powers, Chief Justice Burger elaborated that racial balance was not a constitutional mandate but only a temporary remedy for past de jure segregation. The Burger Court was also split on other major desegregation school cases. For example, in Milliken v. Bradley (1974), it was only a five-to-four majority that held that de jure segregation must be distinguished from de facto segregation. The Court's majority was equally adamant that civil rights orders be limited to instances whereby there had been previous intentional discrimination.

On affirmative action cases, the Burger Court did not provide clear guidance. On the one hand, it ruled in Regents of the University of California v. Bakke (1978) that states were precluded from imposing racial quotas to correct the effects of past discrimination. On the other hand, the following year the Burger Court decided that under the 1964 Civil Rights Act, Congress did not bar affirmative action quotas voluntarily established by a private company (United Steelworkers v. Weber [1979]). In both cases, Burger made clear that he was opposed to affirmative action programs.

SALMON A. SHOMADE

References and Further Reading

- Maltz, Earl M. The Chief Justiceship of Warren Burger, 1969–1986. Columbia: University of South Carolina, 2000.
- Yarborough, Tinsley E. The Burger Court: Justices, Rulings, and Legacy. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2000.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Adarand Constructors v. Peña*, 515 U.S. 200 (1995)
- Fullilove v. Klutznick*, 448 U.S. 448 (1980)
- Lemon v. Kurtzman*, 403 U.S. 602 (1971)
- Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo*, 418 U.S. 241 (1974)
- Milliken v. Bradley*, 418 U.S. 717 (1974)
- Regents of the University of California v. Bakke*, 438 U.S. 265 (1978)
- Stone v. Graham*, 449 U.S. 39 (1980)
- Swann v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg Bd. of Education*, 402 U.S. 1 (1971)
- United States v. Nixon*, 418 U.S. 683 (1974)

United Steelworkers v. Weber, 443 U.S. 193 (1979)
Widmar v. Vincent, 454 U.S. 263 (1981)
Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205 (1972)

BURKE, EDMUND (1729–1797)

Edmund Burke, British statesman and political philosopher, and the “father” of modern conservatism, was born in Dublin on January 29, 1729. He was the son of a Protestant lawyer and a Roman Catholic mother. After graduating from Trinity College, Dublin, Burke entered the Middle Temple in London to study law in 1750. He, however, soon abandoned the law for literature. Burke started his political career in 1765 when he became the private secretary for the Marquis of Rockingham. He served in Parliament from 1765 to 1794, almost always in the minority, where he gained fame, power, and influence far beyond most of his compatriots. It is a measure of Burke’s genius and force of personality that he managed to achieve political success in a tremendously hierarchical society that viewed the Irish as somewhat less than human and Catholics as little more than idolaters.

Burke’s family connections to Catholicism (in addition to having a Catholic mother and sister, he married the daughter of a Catholic doctor) allowed him to witness firsthand the tremendous oppression Catholics labored under in eighteenth-century Britain. This undoubtedly was one of the driving forces of his interest in toleration for minorities, especially in terms of religion.

Until the 1790s, one of Burke’s main concerns was liberty. Burke’s concept of liberty, however, was not the individualist type celebrated in twenty-first-century America. It was an organic form, closely related to responsibility. For Burke, rights, liberties, and indeed political significance itself, was not found in individuals, but in their collective identities. Humans, according to Burke, were qualified for liberty in proportion to control of their baser instincts, such as selfishness and licentiousness. It was society’s task to provide a stabilizing hand when a sense of justice and control were missing in a people. The expansion of liberty should only be done gradually and cautiously, according to Burke.

When Burke entered Parliament, the crisis that would develop into the American Revolution was already at a critical stage. Throughout that crisis, Burke continually attacked the British government’s attempt to assert what he considered arbitrary power over the colonists. Through his speeches and writings Burke laid out his case that only by respecting the rights and liberties of the American Colonies could the British hope to win back their loyalty. He contended that even if the political argument for the arbitrary use of power were strong, prudence and justice would overawe it. For Burke, the revolutionaries were not the Americans, but the British ministry.

Burke’s title as the father of modern conservatism is due in large part to his most famous writing—Reflections on the Revolution in France (1790). Appalled by the excesses of that revolution, Burke delineated his philosophy on reform and revolution. While accepting the desire (even necessity) for change, he cautioned that any reform was to be approached cautiously and with an eye toward the lessons of history and tradition. By the 1790s, justice and order were the key concepts of government for Burke.

ENOCH W. BAKER

References and Further Reading

- Burke, Edmund. Burke’s Political Writings. Edited by John Buchan. New York: Thomas Nelson and Sons, n.d.
 ———. Speeches and Letters on American Affairs. Edited by Hugh Law. New York: Dutton, 1961.
 ———. Reflections on the Revolution in France. Edited by J. G.A. Pocock. Indianapolis: Hackett Publishing, 1987.
 Kirk, Russell. Edmund Burke: A Genius Reconsidered. Wilmington, DE: Intercollegiate Studies Institute, 1997.

BURKS v. UNITED STATES, 437 U.S. 1 (1978)

At the robbery trial of David Burks, the defendant presented three unchallenged witnesses testifying that he was insane. In response, the government presented two expert witnesses who did not express definite opinions. The jury nonetheless convicted Burks. He asked for a new trial and argued that the evidence was insufficient to support the guilty verdict. The Sixth Circuit reversed the conviction, agreeing that Tennessee had not fulfilled its burden of proving sanity, but rather than terminating the case it asked the District Court to decide whether a directed acquittal should be entered or a new trial ordered. Burks contended that the double jeopardy clause precluded another trial because the appellate court found the evidence insufficient, which was the equivalent of a judgment of acquittal.

The Supreme Court reversed, remanding Burks for a judgment of acquittal. The Court held that the prosecution could not have another opportunity to convict after it had been given a full and fair opportunity to do so. The Court determined that it made no difference that the determination of evidentiary insufficiency was made by the appellate court because the double jeopardy considerations were identical.

Burks establishes that the double jeopardy clause precludes a second trial once the reviewing court finds the evidence legally insufficient. Burks expressly overrules Bryan v. United States, Yates v. United States, and Forman v. United States. Also, any earlier decisions suggesting that moving for a new trial waives one's right to a judgment of acquittal on the basis of evidentiary insufficiency were also overruled.

SARA FAHERTY

Cases and Statutes Cited

Bryan v. United States, 338 U.S. 552 (1950)
Forman v. United States, 361 U.S. 416 (1960)
Yates v. United States, 354 U.S. 298 (1957)

See also Double Jeopardy (V): Early History, Background, Framing; Proof beyond a Reasonable Doubt

BURTON, JUSTICE HAROLD (1888–1964)

Harold Hitz Burton, mayor of Cleveland, senator from Ohio and associate justice to the U.S. Supreme Court was born on June 22, 1888, in Jamaica Plain, Massachusetts. After graduating from Bowdoin College, he went on to attend Harvard Law School where he graduated in 1912. After law school, Burton moved to Cleveland, Ohio, where he began his law practice. His law career was interrupted, however, by the outbreak of World War I. Burton served in the army and was wounded in combat for which he received the Purple Heart. After the war, Burton resumed his law practice in Cleveland. In 1935, he ran for and was elected mayor of Cleveland, and served in that capacity until 1940 when he was elected to the U.S. Senate. In 1945, President Truman nominated Burton to the Supreme Court. Burton remained on the Court for thirteen years until his retirement for health reasons in 1958. Justice Burton died on October 28, 1964 from complications due to Parkinson's disease.

While Burton was generally considered a conservative justice who favored a philosophy of judicial restraint, his contributions to civil liberties is best illustrated in his stance on the equal protection of the laws, and nowhere was that more apparent than in his opposition to the doctrine of separate but equal. Writing for the Court in Henderson v. United States, Burton found that the Southern Railway Company's practice of limiting black passengers to a small curtained-off section of the dining car, even when open seats were available elsewhere, was a patent violation of Section 3(1) of the Interstate Commerce Act, which made it illegal for a railroad traveling in interstate commerce to subject passengers to "any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage." Burton went on to state that equality of treatment was a fundamental right guaranteed to all citizens. Moreover, Burton repeatedly joined in decisions that overturned segregationist laws. In 1948, Burton voted with the majority in Shelley v. Kraemer, where the Court found that it was unconstitutional for states to prevent the sale of real property, covered in racially restrictive covenants, to blacks. Then again in 1954, Burton was part of the unanimous decision in Bolling v. Sharpe, which found segregated schools in Washington, DC to be an unconstitutional violation of due process protected by the Fifth Amendment. Burton was also part of the unanimous decision in the landmark desegregation case Brown v. Board of Education, which was decided on the same day as Bolling. Burton was reportedly instrumental in bringing about the unanimous vote. Indeed, in a personal letter written to Chief Justice Earl Warren, Burton reveals his feeling that the Bolling and Brown cases where probably the most "significant decisions" made during his time on the Court and that it was a honor to have taken part in them. The segregation cases did, as Burton predicted, become two of the most important cases decided during the Warren Court. Accordingly, Burton's support for overturning racial segregation is perhaps his greatest legacy.

MARCEL GREEN

References and Further Reading

Langran, Robert W. "Why are Some Supreme Court Justices Rated as 'Failures'?" Supreme Court Historical Society 1985 Yearbook. http://www.supremecourthistory.org/04_library/subs_volumes/04_c19_d.html.
Rudko, Frances Howell. Truman's Court: A Study in Judicial Restraint. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1988.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Bolling v. Sharpe, 347 U.S. 497 (1954)
Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954)
Henderson v. United States, 339 U.S. 816 (1950)
Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U.S. 1 (1948)

BUTLER v. MCKELLAR, 494 U.S. 407 (1990)

When the Supreme Court decides a case in a way that alters the constitutional rights available to a criminal defendant, can prisoners who have already completed their appeals benefit from that case through a petition for a writ of habeas corpus? In Teague v. Lane (1989), the Court decided that "new rules" would not be available to habeas petitioners. In Butler v. McKellar

(1990), the Court decided, five to four, that if the outcome of a case was “susceptible to debate among reasonable minds,” its rule would be deemed new.

Butler had been arrested for assault, about which he declined to speak to the police, invoking his Miranda rights. The police then began to ask him about an unrelated rape and murder. The settled law was Edwards v. Arizona (1981), prohibiting police from asking a suspect about a criminal charge once the suspect invoked Miranda. Arizona v. Roberson (1988), decided after Butler had completed his appeals, extended Edwards to questioning about all charges. If Roberson were not a new rule, the questioning of Butler was unconstitutional. Roberson suggested that it was dictated by Edwards, but Butler concluded otherwise; lower courts had reached conflicting results before Roberson was decided, demonstrating that reasonable minds disagreed. Thus, it was a new rule.

Butler’s definition of a new rule was extremely broad; many, if not most, of the cases that the Supreme Court hears involve conflicting decisions among lower courts and would create new rules. However, subsequent new rule cases appeared to cut back on Butler.

TUNG YIN

References and Further Reading

Yackle, Larry W. Reclaiming the Federal Courts. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1994.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Arizona v. Roberson, 486 U.S. 675 (1988)

Edwards v. Arizona, 451 U.S. 477 (1981)

Teague v. Lane, 489 U.S. 288 (1989)

See also Edwards v. Arizona, 451 U.S. 477 (1981); Habeas Corpus: Modern History; Harlan, John Marshall II; Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966); Right to Counsel (VI)

BUTLER, PIERCE (1866–1939)

Pierce Butler, one of the most conservative justices ever to sit on the U.S. Supreme Court, was born March 17, 1866, in a log cabin on a Minnesota farm. One of six children of Irish immigrant parents, Butler, an ardent patriot and devout Catholic, regarded economic liberty and self-reliance as indispensable components of democracy.

A tireless legal advocate for railroads, who was intolerant of social and political dissent, Butler, as an University of Minnesota regent (1901–1924), spearheaded the removal of professors with unorthodox views. Criticism of his reactionary attitude and perceived corporate bias threatened his 1922 Court nomination.

As a Supreme Court justice, Butler, a rugged individualist, often opposed public control of private economic affairs. Due process, he believed, protected contractual freedom from the unreasonable exercise of state police powers, whose scope he narrowly construed to invalidate industrial regulations in Weaver v. Palmer Bros. Co. (1926) and Burns Baking Co. v. Bryan (1924). Refusing to balance public and private rights, Butler’s Village of Euclid v. Ambler Realty Co. (1926) dissent decried zoning ordinances that restricted businesses. Similarly, he invoked economic liberty to invalidate a minimum wage law in Morehead v. New York ex. rel. Tipaldo (1936), taxation in Miller v. Standard Nut Margarine Co. (1932), and sought to void Social Security in Steward Machine Co. v. Davis (1937) (dissent). A vociferous New Deal critic, Butler and three other justices comprised the notorious Four Horsemen, who persisted in interpreting the Constitution inflexibly rather than adapting its limitations to the Depression’s changing circumstances.

In contrast, Butler was more deferential toward public restrictions of free speech and citizenship. Rigidly patriotic, Butler was unsympathetic to social agitators. In United States v. Schwimmer (1929) and United States v. MacIntosh (1931), he upheld governmental authority to reject alien pacifists’ citizenship applications, and in Kessler v. Strecker (1939) (dissent), Butler thought that the government could deport a former communist. Similarly, his dissents in Stromberg v. California (1931) and Herndon v. Lowry (1938) demonstrate Butler’s willingness to apply criminal syndicalism laws to communists engaged in expressive activity. Concerned about the dissemination of unorthodox and controversial opinions, Butler’s dissents in Near v. Minnesota (1931) and Hague v. Committee of Industrial Organizations (1939) would have permitted public officials to restrict speech as a public nuisance through prior restraint and vague indirect regulations of its content.

Generally solicitous of criminal defendants’ procedural rights, Butler criticized federal prohibition officials whose search and seizure efforts violated the Fourth Amendment in Olmstead v. United States (1928) (dissent); United States v. Lefkowitz (1932), and Go-Bart Importing v. United States (1931). Butler also demonstrated a slight civil libertarian bent when he dissented silently from Buck v. Bell (1927), which upheld Virginia’s sterilization law.

In matters of race, Butler was less vigilant. In The Alien Land Use Cases (1923), he sustained laws that restricted Asians from owning land, and sanctioned a poll tax in Breedlove v. Suttles (1937) (dissent). Reluctant to expand the scope of due process beyond economic liberty, Butler would have left undisturbed Texas's all-white primary in Nixon v. Condon (1932) (dissent); educational segregation in Missouri ex. rel. Gaines v. Canada (1938) (dissent); and the conviction of poor black defendants not afforded effective assistance of counsel in the infamous Scottsboro rape case, Powell v. Alabama (dissent).

Pierce Butler, whose social conservatism imbued his constitutional jurisprudence, died November 16, 1939, in Washington, DC.

SAMUEL R. OLKEN

References and Further Reading

- Brown, Francis J. The Social and Economic Philosophy of Pierce Butler. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America Press, 1945.
- Danelski, David J. A Supreme Court Justice Is Appointed. New York: Random House, 1964.
- Olken, Samuel R., The Business of Expression: Economic Liberty, Political Factions and the Forgotten First Amendment Legacy of Justice George Sutherland. William & Mary Bill of Rights Journal 10 (Winter 2002): 249–357.
- White, G. Edward. The Constitution and the New Deal. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2000.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- The Alien Land Use Cases* (1923): Frick v. Webb, 263 U.S. 326; Porterfield v. Webb, 263 U.S. 225; Terrace v. Thompson, 263 U.S. 197; Webb v. O'Brien, 263 U.S. 326 (all 1923)
- Breedlove v. Suttles*, 302 U.S. 277 (1937)
- Buck v. Bell*, 274 U.S. 200 (1927)
- Burns Baking Co. v. Bryan*, 264 U.S. 504 (1924)
- Euclid v. Ambler Realty Co.*, 272 U.S. 365 (1926)
- Go-Bart Importing v. United States*, 282 U.S. 344 (1931)
- Hague v. Committee of Industrial Organizations*, 307 U.S. 496 (1939)
- Herndon v. Lowry*, 301 U.S. 444 (1938)
- Kessler v. Strecker*, 307 U.S. 22 (1939)
- Miller v. Standard Nut Margarine Co.*, 284 U.S. 489 (1932)
- Missouri ex. rel. Gaines v. Canada*, 305 U.S. 337 (1938)
- Morehead v. New York ex. rel. Tipaldo*, 298 U.S. 587 (1936)
- Near v. Minnesota*, 283 U.S. 697 (1931)
- Nixon v. Condon*, 286 U.S. 73 (1932)
- Olmstead v. United States*, 277 U.S. 438 (1928)
- Powell v. Alabama*, 287 U.S. 45 (1932)
- Steward Machine Co. v. Davis*, 301 U.S. 548 (1937)
- Stromberg v. California*, 283 U.S. 359 (1931)
- United States v. Lefkowitz*, 285 U.S. 452 (1932)
- United States v. MacIntosh*, 283 U.S. 605 (1931)
- United States v. Schwimmer*, 279 U.S. 644 (1929)
- Weaver v. Palmer Bros. Co.*, 270 U.S. 294 (1926)

BYERS v. EDMONDSON, 712 SO.2D 681 (1999) (“NATURAL BORN KILLERS” CASE)

The judgment rendered concerns the issue of whether the film Natural Born Killers is protected speech under the First Amendment, that is, should movie producers, directors, and studios be responsible for encouraging criminal behavior? Attorneys for the producers and director of the movie Natural Born Killers petitioned Louisiana's high court to review a lower court ruling that they say is the first of “American court decisions to hold that the creators of a fictional story can be sued for the deviant criminal acts of alleged imitators or copycats.” The Louisiana Court of Appeals upheld a District Court summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The Court found that, contrary to plaintiffs' claims, “nothing in [the film] constitutes incitement,” and therefore is protected speech.

Patsy Byers, a clerk shot by a young man and woman robbing a convenience store, sued Time Warner, Inc. and Oliver Stone in July 1995, alleging that they were responsible for her paralyzing injuries. Her lawsuit claimed that she was shot because the young couple was enamored with the movie Natural Born Killers and its glamorization of violent behavior. According to the attorney for the Byers estate, Time Warner and Oliver Stone should be liable for “intentionally, recklessly, or negligently including in the video subliminal images which either directly advocated violent activity or which would cause viewers to repeatedly view the video and thereby become more susceptible to its advocacy of violent activity.”

In May 1998, a Louisiana appeals court reversed the ruling that the trial court should not have dismissed the case and the plaintiffs presented adequate allegations to avoid dismissal on First Amendment grounds. Byers' allegations, which the appeals court said it had to accept as true at the early procedural stage of the lawsuit, are that the movie falls into a category of speech that directly incites and will likely lead to imminent, lawless action, which is unprotected by the First Amendment. In reaching its decision, the Louisiana appeals court relied on Rice v. Paladin Enterprises, Inc. (1997), in which the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit ruled that the First Amendment did not merit wrongful death action against the publishers of an instructional book titled Hit Man: A Technical Manual for Independent Contractors.

In their appeal to the Louisiana Supreme Court, attorneys for the defendants noted that “no court in American has ever held a filmmaker or film distributor liable for injuries allegedly resulting from imitation of a film.” Their argument addressed the issue of whether “the specter of such boundless liability would cause those who create movies, music, books, and other creative works to avoid controversial or provocative subjects.”

G. L. TYLER

CABLE TELEVISION REGULATION

Cable television regulation began in the late 1940s and 1950s primarily as a local matter. The first cable systems needed easements to construct facilities on public and private land. Local authorities created franchises to provide access to rights of ways, and state regulators addressed questions of access to attach the cable plant to existing utility poles.

Federal regulation first began with questions of whether and how cable operators could retransmit distant and local broadcasters, a controversy that continues 40 years later. Importing major market stations into small communities that might have one TV station, for instance, bringing Denver stations to Casper, Wyoming, made for a good service for customers but created competitive issues for the local station. The Federal Communications Commission (FCC) set limits on the number and kind of stations that could be imported under “ancillary jurisdiction” approved by the U.S. Supreme Court. The Supreme Court also found no copyright liability on the cable operator’s part for carrying stations.

Congress began regulating cable, first in 1976 by creating copyright liability for station carriage in tandem with a cable compulsory copyright in those signals, and in 1978 with the first of several laws establishing pole attachment arrangements. In 1984, the first comprehensive federal cable law provided for explicit FCC authority, ground rules for granting and renewing franchises by localities, and public access and leased access channels.

In 1992, because of complaints over high cable rates and access by large-dish satellite competitors to program networks owned by operators, Congress passed the 1992 Act, which led to a complex set of rate regulation of cable rates (generally lifted in the 1996 Telecommunications Act.) The 1992 Act also imposed a requirement that operators generally “must carry” all local TV and alternatively granted TV stations the right to negotiate carriage rights, irrespective of the compulsory copyright created in TV signals in 1976.

The 1996 Telecommunications Act focused on facilities-based competition to incumbent local exchange carriers; cable, as the second wire to residences figured prominently in the debate. Although cable has provided some facilities-based phone competition using its hybrid fiber-coax plant, its primary new offering is cable modem service. Initially considered a cable service, the FCC in 2002 declared cable modem service an “interstate information service,” but judicial review may lead to the determination that it is a “telecommunications service.”

As cable operators offer modem service along with Voice over Internet Protocol, the laws surrounding its video service may be less significant than its role as an operator of a broadband network. Policies relating to nondiscrimination of applications or attachments to cable’s broadband network have engendered considerable policy debates.

Another significant provision of the 1996 Act, Sec. 629, requires the commercial availability of set-top boxes, historically leased by the operator to subscribers both as a marketing matter and a way to control signal theft. Because digital transmissions pose new problems for copyright holders, regulations have also developed on how copying of cable programming may be accomplished along with rules for preventing unauthorized distribution on the Internet.

DANIEL L. BRENNER

CAIN v. KENTUCKY, 387 U.S. 319 (1970)

In a per curiam decision, based on Redrup v. New York (1967), the Supreme Court disposed of Cain v. Kentucky and reversed Kentucky's ban of public showings of the film "I, A Woman." Warren Burger, who had been confirmed as Chief Justice in 1969, and Harlan dissented. The Court disposed of two other cases (Hoyt v. Minnesota [1970] and Walker v. Ohio [1970]) in similar fashion, sparking dissents by Blackmun and Burger, respectively.

Until Burger's appointment, per curiam "redrapping" cases followed a fairly standard format with a simple declaration, "The judgment is reversed. Redrup v. New York, 386 U.S. 767." Harlan then would provide a dissent that cited his opposition in previous cases that the syllabus would summarize as "Mr. Justice Harlan would affirm the judgment of the state court upon the premises stated in his separate opinion in Roth v. United States . . . and his dissenting opinion in Memoirs v. Massachusetts" As the Court's composition shifted and became more conservative, the use of per curiam and redrapping attracted new dissenters and declined in frequency.

Burger's appointment meant that Harlan was no longer alone in his dissents to per curiam resting on Redrup's authority. Both Burger and Harlan thought the Court's majority in Cain failed to pay sufficient deference to the states. In Cain, they both issued separate dissents. Harlan modified his standard dissent, indicating he thought Ohio's decision presented a "borderline question" but concluded he could not say the state exceeded the "constitutional speed limit" in banning public showings of the film. Burger complained the Court was inflexible and denied the states the opportunity to adopt their own standards or deal with the problem on their own terms.

In Walker, Burger cited his dissent in Cain but added he found no justification for the Court to assume the role of national, unreviewable board of censorship for the states, "subjectively judging each piece of material brought before it without regard to the findings or conclusions of other courts, state or federal." Blackmun did not participate in Walker, but in Hoyt he dissented, arguing the Constitution did not "necessarily prescribe a national and uniform measure" dealing with obscenity, and he was joined by Harlan and Burger.

Burger, Blackmun, and Harlan constituted the core coalition to challenge the majority's use of *per curiam*s to overrule state courts that in their eyes conscientiously tried to apply the Supreme Court's standards first laid out in Roth.

ROY B. FLEMMING

Cases and Statutes Cited

Cain v. Kentucky, 397 U.S. 319 (1970)
Hoyt v. Minnesota, 399 U.S. 524 (1970)
Redrup v. New York, 386 U.S. 767 (1967)
Walker v. Ohio, 398 U.S. 434 (1970)

CALDER v. BULL, 3 U.S. 386 (1798)

The Connecticut legislature enacted a resolution granting a new hearing in a probate trial. The disappointed heirs challenged the legislative action as a violation of Article 1, Section 10, Clause 1 of the Constitution of the United States, which prohibits any state from passing an "ex post facto" law.

The Supreme Court of the United States unanimously upheld the legislative act, concluding that the ex post facto clause applies only in the criminal context. For example, Connecticut would have been prohibited by the clause from enacting a law establishing criminal sanctions for an activity that was legal at the time it was done. The probating of a will is a civil matter, however, and the federal Constitution's prohibition against ex post facto laws does not cover it.

Calder v. Bull was one of the Supreme Court's first decisions involving limitations on governmental power. It remains a landmark decision for that reason alone. It also remains significant because it was the first case in which members of the Court openly disagreed with one another about how the Constitution should be interpreted. Justice Samuel Chase maintained in his opinion that the meaning of the Constitution—including specific clauses in the Constitution such as the ex post facto clause—cannot be discerned from the text of the Constitution alone. He wrote: "An act of the Legislature (for I cannot call it a law) contrary to the first great principles of the social compact, cannot be considered a rightful exercise of legislative authority The genius, the nature, and the spirit, of our state governments, amount to a prohibition of such acts of legislation; and the general principles of law and reason forbid them."

Justice James Iredell responded directly to Justice Chase's approach and rejected it. Justice Iredell

maintained that the only legitimate form of judicial review is interpretation of the written text of the Constitution. He wrote: "If . . . the legislature of the union, or the legislature of any member of the union, shall pass a law, within the general scope of their constitutional power, the court cannot pronounce it to be void, merely because it is, in their judgment, contrary to the principles of natural justice. The ideas of natural justice are regulated by no fixed standard; the ablest and the purest men have differed upon the subject."

The Chase-Iredell exchange about how to interpret the Constitution has been characterized by scholars as "the opening salvo in a running battle that has never simmered down completely." The specific rule of the case remains good law: the ex post facto clause applies only in the criminal context. One member of the current Court—Clarence Thomas—believes that the clause also applies in the civil context. Consequently, he has suggested that Calder v. Bull be overruled: despite the fact that the decision has stood as precedent for 200-plus years.

Before Justice Thomas's concurring opinion in Eastern Enterprises v. Apfel (1998), no member of the Supreme Court had called Calder into question since William Johnson in the 1829 case of Satterlee v. Matthewson. Justice Johnson wrote for himself alone in Satterlee, as he did when he first called Calder into question in Ogden v. Saunders (1827), and Justice Thomas wrote only for himself in Apfel. The future of Calder seems secure.

SCOTT D. GERBER

Cases and Statutes Cited

Eastern Enterprises v. Apfel, 524 U.S. 498 (1998)
Satterlee v. Matthewson, 27 U.S. (2 Pet.) 380 (1829)

CALERO-TOLEDO v. PEARSON YACHT LEASING CO., 416 U.S. 663 (1974)

Federal and state laws authorize the government to seize and forfeit property that is "tainted" by its connection to specified crimes. In Calero-Toledo, the Supreme Court addressed, albeit ambiguously, the question of whether the Constitution's due process clause protects an "innocent owner" from forfeiture when her property was illegally used without her knowledge or consent. Citing a number of precedents, the Court upheld the civil forfeiture of a rented yacht after a marijuana cigarette was discovered onboard, even though the yacht's owner was innocent of wrongdoing and ignorant of the renters' illegal activity.

Justice Brennan's opinion for the Court found forfeiture against the unwitting lessor rational, because it could induce owners to exercise greater care in transferring possession of their property. However, the opinion included dicta implying that the Constitution might mandate a narrower innocent owner defense, protecting owners who are not only unaware of the wrongful activity, but also have done everything "that reasonably could be expected" to prevent it.

On the basis of this language, some lower courts found a limited constitutional defense for owners who are both unknowing and non-negligent regarding the illegal use of their property. However, in Bennis v. Michigan (1996), the Supreme Court reaffirmed Caldero-Toledo with an even broader holding that dropped all reference to any circumstances that might constitutionally protect an unwitting and non-negligent owner. Bennis did not know of, and could not prevent, her husband from using their car for sex with a prostitute, but the Court held five to four that she had no constitutional protection against forfeiture of her interest in the automobile.

Despite the Calero-Toledo and Bennis cases, innocent owners have alternative remedies. Statutory innocent owner defenses have found their way into several forfeiture laws, and the Civil Asset Forfeiture Reform Act of 2000 creates a uniform innocent owner defense applicable to most federal forfeiture procedures. Moreover, federal and most state laws allow for administrative remission or mitigation of unduly severe forfeitures. Finally, the Supreme Court has held that the Eighth Amendment's excessive fines clause applies to forfeitures, and the Court has yet to decide whether subjecting an innocent owner to forfeiture of her property is necessarily excessive.

Caldero-Toledo also found no constitutional violation in the government's denial of notice or a hearing to the owner until after its seizure of the yacht. The Court subsequently modified this holding in United States v. James Daniel Good Real Property et al. (1993), finding that a preseizure notice and hearing is required for land, houses, and other real property, because in such cases, advanced notice cannot create a risk that the property will be removed from the jurisdiction.

ERIC D. BLUMENSON

References and Further Reading

Department of Justice. Asset Forfeiture Law and Practice Manual. June 1998.
 Kessler, Steven L. Civil and Criminal Forfeiture: Federal and State Practice §6.01, 1993.
 Smith, David B. Prosecution and Defense of Forfeiture Cases. Matthew Bender.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Bennis v. Michigan, 516 U.S. 442 (1996)

United States v. James Daniel Good Real Property et al., 510 U.S. 43 (1993)

See also Civil Asset Forfeiture; Due Process; United States v. 92 Buena Vista Avenue, 507 U.S. 111 (1993)

CALHOUN, JOHN CALDWELL (1882–1850)

John C. Calhoun received an elite education, studying under a prominent reverend tutor, and then graduating from Yale College. After his admission to the South Carolina bar, Calhoun was elected to the South Carolina legislature. He served in the U.S. House of Representatives, then as Secretary of War under James Monroe, then as Vice-President twice, under John Quincy Adams and Andrew Jackson. After resigning his position as Vice-President, he was elected to the U.S. Senate and then served as John Tyler's Secretary of State. At the end of that term, he returned to the Senate, where he served until his retirement. His connection to civil rights centers on two ideas: his belief in states' rights and his defense of slavery.

After the hated Tariff of 1828 (called the Tariff of Abominations in the South) was passed, Calhoun published The South Carolina Exposition, which outlined his theory of "state interposition." Also known as Nullification, Calhoun's theory gave individual states the authority to ignore, or nullify, federal law that interfered with any states' interests or sovereignty. The South Carolina Legislature eagerly embraced Calhoun's theory and voted to ignore the Tariff, but President Andrew Jackson was outspoken in his intention to enforce the law. Calhoun actually resigned from his position as Vice-President, was immediately elected as U.S. Senator from South Carolina, and began fighting for nullification on the Senate floor. The controversy grew into a crisis as Congress passed the Force Bill, giving Jackson authority to use federal troops to compel South Carolina to enforce the Tariff. Violence was averted only by compromise: Jackson agreed to lower the Tariff, South Carolina rescinded its nullification ordinance, and Calhoun, who wanted South Carolina to remain in the union but insisted on their right to nullify or secede, endorsed the agreement.

Calhoun also consistently defended the institution of slavery. He was a supporter of the "positive good" theory, which described slavery as a beneficial institution. Under positive good rationalization, slavery civilized blacks. Slaveholders educated, supported, and managed their slaves so that American slaves had reached a level of civilization that no other society of blacks had ever reached before. Thus, slavery allowed both black slaves and white slave owners to thrive. To be sure, the doctrine was not widely accepted outside of the South, but it allowed Calhoun and other slaveholders to justify their institution. In a civil rights irony, Calhoun considered himself a great defender of civil rights because he held property rights sacred. Because slaves were considered property (and neither the Constitution nor the federal government challenged that idea), Calhoun was able to counter abolition movements by citing the Constitution's protections of private property. Finally, as a fierce defender of both South Carolina's and the South's interests, he was concerned about maintaining legislative balance between free and slave states. To that end, he supported the Missouri Compromise, which allowed Missouri into the Union as a slave state while allowing Maine in as a free state.

Calhoun thought of himself as a defender of civil rights; he saw the rights of South Carolina to make laws for its citizens as paramount over the federal government's, and he believed that because southern slaveholders owned slaves, the protection of slavery was simply a matter of protecting property.

JAMES HALABUK, JR.

References and Further Reading

Bartlett, Irving H. John C. Calhoun: A Biography. New York: W.W. Norton and Company, 1993.

Thomas, John L., ed. John C. Calhoun, A Profile. New York: Hill and Wang, 1968.

CALIFORNIA v. ACEVEDO, 500 U.S. 565 (1991)

The Fourth Amendment's protection against unreasonable searches generally requires law enforcement to obtain a search warrant before initiating a search. In Carroll v. United States, the Supreme Court had crafted an exception for moving vehicles, which permitted law enforcement to conduct a warrantless search of an automobile when they had probable cause to believe that contraband was contained somewhere in a vehicle but not when probable cause extended only to a specific container.

Police officers in California observed Charles Acevedo exit the apartment of a man who that morning had picked up a package that they knew contained marijuana. Acevedo placed a brown paper bag, identical in size to one of the marijuana packages, in the trunk of his car and drove off. The officers stopped him, opened the trunk, and discovered marijuana in the bag.

Although the officers only had probable cause to believe that the bag located in the car contained marijuana, rather than the car, the Supreme Court held that the Fourth Amendment did not require the officers to obtain a search warrant before opening the bag. It reasoned that if a warrantless search of a vehicle is permissible, then the Fourth Amendment must also allow a less intrusive search for a closed container based on probable cause. The Court stressed that the search of an automobile based on probable cause to believe that a closed container contains contraband is limited to a search for that object and does not extend to the entire car.

REBECCA L. BARNHART

References and Further Reading

LaFave, Wayne R. Search and Seizure, 4th ed. 6 vols. St. Paul: West, 2004.
William E. Ringel, et al. Searches & Seizures, Arrests and Confessions, 2nd ed. 3 vols. Deerfield, Ill.: Clark Boardman Callaghan, 1979 [updated three times a year but copyright listed as “1979”].

Cases and Statutes Cited

Carroll v. United States, 267 U.S. 132 (1925)

See also Automobile Searches; Carroll v. United States, 267 U.S. 132 (1925); Probable Cause; Search (General Definition); Search Warrants

CALIFORNIA v. GREENWOOD, 486 U.S. 35 (1988)

In California v. Greenwood, the police searched a defendant’s garbage bags left on the curb. The Supreme Court concluded that the Fourth Amendment did not apply, and thus the police are able to search people’s trash with no limitations and without the judicial oversight of a warrant. The Fourth Amendment only applies when a person has an expectation of privacy that society is prepared to recognize as reasonable. The Court reasoned that there was no reasonable expectation in the trash because “[i]t is common knowledge that plastic bags left on or at the side of a public street are readily accessible to animals, children, scavengers, snoops, and other members of the public.” The Court also reasoned that the trash was left at the curb “for the express purpose of conveying it to a third party, the trash collector, who might himself have sorted through [the] trash or permitted others, such as the police, to do so.”

The Court’s reasoning equates privacy with total secrecy. If anything is exposed to others in any way, even if others are unlikely to see it, then according to the Court, there is no reasonable expectation of privacy. According to the dissenting opinion, a study of a person’s trash can reveal much about an individual’s personality and lifestyle. People often throw out very private items, such as prescription drug bottles, contraceptive devices, old financial documents, personal letters, and so on.

DANIEL J. SOLOVE

References and Further Reading

LaFave, Wayne R., Jerold H. Israel, and Nancy J. King. Criminal Procedure. 142–143 (3d ed. 2000).
Solove, Daniel J., Digital Dossiers and the Dissipation of Fourth Amendment Privacy, Southern California Law Review 75 (2002): 1083–1168.

See also Expectation of Privacy; Search (General Definition)

CALIFORNIA v. LARUE, 409 U.S. 109 (1972)

When a commercial activity requires a license or permit from a government, can a state use this authority to regulate “expression” even if aspects of the conduct do not meet the Roth standard of obscenity?

In 1970, the California Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control promulgated rules regulating entertainment in businesses serving alcoholic beverages. On the basis of legislative findings that the “gross sexuality” of topless or bottomless dancing in bars and nightclubs encouraged sexual encounters between the performers and customers, as well as sex crimes and prostitution outside the businesses, California’s regulations prohibited live or filmed sexual entertainment that included performances or simulations of specific sexual acts. A three-judge federal district court struck down the regulation as unconstitutional, because some of the proscribed entertainment was not obscene.

This is the Court’s first major obscenity decision in which the four Nixon nominees (Burger, Blackmun, Powell, and Rehnquist) participated. In a 6:3 decision reversing the lower court, Rehnquist, writing for the majority with Steward and White joining the four Nixon nominees, does not focus on whether nude dancing could be obscene but rather on its harmful, secondary effects in establishments selling alcoholic beverages and whether state licensing power could regulate nude dancing to minimize its effects. Thus, he did not use the heightened tests usually associated with the “preferred freedoms” of the First Amendment. Instead, he notes the regulations dealt with bars and nightclubs selling liquor, not “a dramatic performance in a theater.” He thus uses a rationality test to the department’s regulations that are not unreasonable in light of the legislative findings and the questionable effectiveness of other options.

The lynchpin of the LaRue decision was Rehnquist’s view that the “broad sweep” of the Twenty-first Amendment conferred “something more than the normal state authority” over public health and morals. This amendment gave the states power to regulate the sale of alcohol, authority that, according to Rehnquist, outweighed any First Amendment interest in nude dancing. Brennan, and especially Marshall, attacked Rehnquist’s view in their dissents. In subsequent cases dealing with nude dancing and liquor licensing, for example, New York State Liquor Authority v. Bellanca (1981) and City of Newport, Kentucky v. Iacobucci (1986), both per curiam opinions resting on LaRue, Stevens, who joined the Court after LaRue was handed down, wrote dissenting opinions, launching a campaign challenging Rehnquist’s view of the Twenty-first Amendment, which provided a fortuitous way of upholding California’s regulations without having to directly address the relationship between nude dancing and the First Amendment.

Finally, in 1996, the Supreme Court in 44 Liquormart, Inc. v. Rhode Island (1996) with Stevens writing for the majority disavowed the reasoning in LaRue without questioning, however, its holding. According to Stevens, the result in LaRue would have been the same if the majority had not relied on the Twenty-first Amendment. States, he argued, with their inherent police powers have ample authority to regulate the sale of alcoholic beverages to avoid “bacchanalian revelries.” Equally important, the Twenty-first Amendment, Stevens wrote, does not allow states to “ignore their obligations” under other provisions of the Constitution, nor does it “in any way diminish the force of the supremacy clause.”

ROY B. FLEMMING

Cases and Statutes Cited

44 Liquormart, Inc. v. Rhode Island, 517 U.S. 484 (1996)
California v. LaRue, 409 U.S. 109 (1972)
City of Newport, Kentucky v. Iacobucci 479 U.S. 92 (1986)
New York State Liquor Authority v. Bellanca, 452 U.S. 714 (1981)

CALIFORNIA v. RAMOS, 459 U.S. 1301 (1982)

People who disagree about something can be induced to set aside their disagreement to unite against a common enemy. Prosecutors often use the “common-enemy rule” in death-penalty trials, highlighting the specter of the convicted capital defendant someday getting out of prison to harm the community again. The fear of a predator again walking the streets—the “common enemy” of all the jurors—can be so powerful that jurors will set aside their disagreement over whether to impose life imprisonment or death and rally against the prospect of the defendant’s future release.

California v. Ramos presented the Supreme Court with the issue of when a prosecutor may deploy this sort of argument (though neither the Court nor the litigants used the “common-enemy” locution). The capital statute at issue in Ramos allowed the jury to consider the fact that a sentence of life imprisonment without the possibility of parole leaves open the possibility of future commutation of the sentence by the governor. The defendant argued that this “inject[ed] an unacceptable level of unreliability into the capital sentencing determination” and “deflect[ed] the jury from its constitutionally mandated task of basing the penalty decision on the character of the defendant and the nature of the offense.” The Court rejected this challenge to California’s allowance of a commutation possibility to be considered in a death-penalty trial. The Court ruled that the possibility of commutation—though remote; indeed, very remote—was relevant to the issue of the defendant’s future dangerousness. The Court sidestepped the concern that this remote possibility might warp the jury’s decision-making process by emphasizing that the instruction to the jury to consider possible commutation was accurate and the defendant had the opportunity to argue the remoteness of this possibility. Thus, in a broader sense, California v. Ramos represents one instance where the Court places enormous—too much?—faith in the adversarial process to reject a constitutional challenge on the basis of the prospect of unreliable capital sentencing. For a contrasting instance where the Court exhibits a profound distrust of the adversarial process, consider its decision in Roper v. Simmons, where it constitutionally bans executing juvenile offenders in part because the adversarial process is ill-equipped to decide life or death for juvenile offenders.

DAN WILLIAMS

References and Further Reading

California v. Ramos, 463 U.S. 992 (1983).

Carter, Linda E. and Ellen Kreitzberg, Understanding Capital Punishment Law. (2004)

See also Capital Punishment; Capital Punishment and the Equal Protection Clause Cases; Capital Punishment: Due Process Limits; Capital Punishment: History and Politics; Capital Punishment: Eighth Amendment Limits

CALIFORNIA v. TROMBETTA, 467 U.S. 479 (1984)

In Trombetta, the Supreme Court held that the Fourteenth Amendment due process clause does not require the government to preserve evidence that could potentially be useful to a criminal defendant.

Trombetta was one of several defendants charged with drunk driving after failing breath tests on California highways. Each defendant unsuccessfully moved to suppress the test results, because the police did not preserve the breath samples so that the defendants could attempt to prove the results were inaccurate. However, the state appellate court ruled that the failure to preserve the breath samples violated the defendants' due process rights.

The U. S. Supreme Court unanimously reversed. The Court explained that although the state has a duty under Brady v. Maryland to preserve and disclose exculpatory evidence, that duty does not generally extend to evidence that might or might not be exculpatory. The Court concluded that the destruction of the breath samples did not violate the defendants' rights, because it was very unlikely that retesting of the evidence would have benefited the defendants and because there was no indication that the police had destroyed the samples in a bad faith effort to hamper their defenses.

Trombetta thus made clear that the government is not always required to preserve potentially exculpatory evidence. Four years later, in Arizona v. Youngblood, the Court extended Trombetta to hold that the police may always destroy potentially exculpatory evidence, including evidence that could conclusively exonerate the defendant, so long as they do not act in bad faith.

DAVID A. MORAN

References and Further Reading

Imwinkelried, Edwin, and Norman Garland. Exculpatory Evidence. 2d ed. Michie, 1996.
 Stacy, Tom, The Search for Truth in Constitutional Criminal Procedure, Columbia Law Review 91 (1991): 1369.
 Whitaker, Barbara. "DNA Frees Inmate Years After Justices Rejected Plea." New York Times, August 11, 2000.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Arizona v. Youngblood, 488 U.S. 51 (1988)
Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963)

See also Arizona v. Youngblood, 488 U.S. 51 (1988); Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963); Due Process; Fourteenth Amendment

CAMARA v. MUNICIPAL COURT OF THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO, 387 U.S. 523 (1967)

The Fourth Amendment's requirement that the government obtain a warrant before any search or seizure of private property is well established for criminal investigations. Whether a warrant was required when the government conducts a health and safety inspection, an administrative investigation, however, was not established until Camara v. Municipal Court of the City and County of San Francisco.

In 1963, a San Francisco public health inspector attempted to search the ground floor of an apartment building after learning that the lessee might be violating the building's occupancy permit. The inspector did not have a warrant, and the lessee refused to consent on three separate occasions. The lessee's refusal to allow the inspection resulted in the lessee's criminal prosecution under San Francisco's housing codes.

The Supreme Court held that administrative health and safety inspections conducted without a search warrant violated the Fourth Amendment. The Court reasoned that a search of private property without proper consent is unreasonable, except in narrowly defined situations, unless it has been authorized by a valid search warrant. Even if the inspections are not conducted to discover criminal activity, administrative inspections made pursuant to fire, health, and housing codes threaten interests of the property owner protected by the Fourth Amendment.

Although the Court held that a warrant is required to conduct administrative searches absent consent, the Court stated that the warrant for such a search need not be based on suspicion that any particular dwelling is in violation of health and safety codes. Rather, it is reasonable for the government to conduct periodic inspections of an entire area to protect the public's health and safety. Moreover, the Court's holding does not prevent prompt inspections of dwellings without a warrant in emergency situations.

KATY H. H. YANG-PAGE

References and Further Reading

Sunby, Scott E., A Return to Fourth Amendment Basics: Undoing the Mischief of Camara and Terry, University of Minnesota Law Review 72 (1988): 383–447.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Camara v. Municipal Court of the City and County of San Francisco, 387 U.S. 523 (1967)

See also Administrative Searches and Seizures; Probable Cause; Search (General Definition); Search Warrants; Warrantless Searches

CAMERAS IN THE COURTROOM

The phrase “cameras in the courtroom” refers to the presence of news media cameras, both still and television cameras, inside courtrooms recording trial proceedings for the public. Since the early days of the American courts, members of the news media have been present in courtrooms, documenting proceedings for their audience. Before the arrival of cameras, reporters relied on pen and paper and courtroom sketch artists to relay details of trial proceedings to the public. In the television age, the simple installation of a small video camera in an unobtrusive location in a courtroom has allowed a much larger public to view the activities inside a courtroom. Trials are no longer accessible to only those who can fit into often-cramped courtrooms, but thousands, if not millions, turn on a television set to watch a trial. The most famous case in which cameras in the courtroom played a pivotal role was the murder trial of football star O. J. Simpson. Yet the overwhelming presence of the news media and the day-to-day coverage of the trial created a circus-like atmosphere and raised concerns over whether cameras should be permitted to record trial proceedings.

At the heart of the debate over cameras in the courtroom are the two constitutionally guaranteed rights: a defendant’s Sixth Amendment right to a fair trial and the news media’s First Amendment right of a free press. Those opposed to allowing news media cameras inside courtrooms argue that cameras would cause lawyers to overdramatize their arguments, scare away potential witnesses, and disrupt the solemn conduct of a trial, all of which could be detrimental to the defendant. Proponents of cameras in the courtroom argue that the public should have direct access to how the American judicial system really works. Television, proponents claim, is the best tool for allowing the public into the often shadowy world of the courts without having to attend a trial or having to sit on a jury.

Two cases directly addressing the constitutionality of allowing news media cameras inside courtrooms were brought to the U. S. Supreme Court. The case of Estes v. Texas (1964) involved the swindling conviction of Texas businessman Billy Sol Estes. Estes appealed his conviction on the grounds that the presence of the news media cameras infringed on his right to a fair trial. The Court ruled that the defendant’s right to a public trial did not mean that the news media had a right to bring in their cameras to record the trial. The Court’s decision in Estes was amended in the case of Chandler v. Florida (1981). The Court examined Florida’s rules regarding cameras in the courtroom and concluded that there was not enough evidence to prove that the presence of news media cameras violated the due process of the defendants.

Currently, cameras are not permitted in federal courtrooms, although there have been attempts by the news media to gain access. State courts, however, are more receptive to the idea of cameras in the courtroom, although judges are very cautious in what they will allow the news media to cover.

STEPHANIE HSZIEH

References and Further Reading

Freedman, Warren. Press and Media Access to the Criminal Courtroom. New York: Quorum Books, 1988.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Estes v. Texas, 381 U.S. 532 (1964)

Chandler et al v. Florida 449 U.S. 560 (1981)

See also Estes, Billy Sol; Free Press/Fair Trial

CAMPAIGN FINANCE REFORM, NO. 1021

A California politician once famously observed: “Money is the Mother’s Milk of Politics.” For at least a century, the Congress has tried to legislate against this dictum. Since 1907, with the passage of the Tillman Act, which banned corporations from making direct contributions to political parties, Congress has enacted six major laws designed to regulate the use of money in politics. The Federal Corrupt Practices Act of 1925 provided for disclosure of certain federal campaign receipts and expenditures. The Taft–Hartley Act of 1947 subjected labor unions to the kinds of restrictions on campaign giving and spending that covered corporations. Each of these laws was enacted against a background of claimed corruption of the political process by those groups and individuals who wielded financial power.

It was widely believed, however, that these laws were not effective in achieving their objectives of deterring corruption and undue influence. They were narrowed by judicial interpretation and avoided by clever politicians. Indeed, President Lyndon B. Johnson once observed that federal campaign finance law was “more loophole than law.”

The fourth major push for reform began building with the high-spending, media-focused presidential campaigns of the 1960s. A well-known book, The Selling of the President, fueled fears that politicians were being marketed like toothpaste and that democracy was being sold to the highest bidder. These concerns culminated in the next major piece of campaign finance reform legislation, the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971. Enacted before Watergate, the Act sought to limit the amount of media advertising that federal candidates could do and vastly expand and improve campaign finance reporting and disclosure to close the loopholes that Lyndon Johnson had noted.

But civil liberties problems soon surfaced as the government tried to use these new provisions against nonpartisan criticism of government officials. If campaign finance laws could be used to prevent the publication of advertisements criticizing the government or subject the speakers to intrusive government regulation, that would raise enormous First Amendment problems of freedom of speech and association. Recognizing these problems, some courts gave a narrow scope to the Federal Election Campaign Act provisions, excluding their application to nonpartisan organizations. (United States v. National Committee for Impeachment; American Civil Liberties Union v. Jennings).

That sensible resolution of the clash between free speech and campaign finance regulation might have solved the problem had it not been for the Watergate scandals of the early 1970s, partially involving payments for wrongdoing out of President Nixon’s reelection campaign funds. Congress was stampeded into enacting the Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments of 1974, a wide-ranging statute that imposed new and Draconian restrictions and penalties on campaign finance activity. This was the fifth major campaign finance enactment of the twentieth century.

It must be remembered, of course, that such activity almost invariably involves the exercise of First Amendment rights: speaking, associating, supporting candidates, electioneering, getting out the vote. Nonetheless, Congress decreed limits on how much any candidate could spend on seeking election, on how much candidates could contribute of their own funds to their own campaigns, how much their supporters could contribute to them, and, most alarmingly, severely limiting (to $1,000 per year) how much independent groups and individuals could spend to speak about candidates during a campaign season. That latter provision effectively made it a crime to run more than a minuscule ad in a newspaper criticizing the President of the United States. The amendments also tightened the disclosure requirements, so that as little as a $15 contribution to any political party—even controversial ones—might be reported to the government. The one positive note was that the new law did provide, for the first time, for public financing of primary and general election campaigns at the Presidential level. Placed in charge of these onerous new speech restrictions was a new federal agency that was under the control and domination of the Congress. Substantial criminal penalties were prescribed for violation of these new campaign finance provisions.

There was an immediate challenge to this far-reaching new law by a coalition of “strange bedfellows,” including liberal Senator Eugene McCarthy, conservative Senator James Buckley, the American Conservative Union and the New York Civil Liberties Union (Buckley v. Valeo). All these challengers claimed that restrictions on political campaign funding were restrictions on political campaign speech and derogated the First Amendment values of freedom of speech and association. The Court agreed in part. It struck down all limitations on campaign expenditures, reasoning that such restraints cut to the core of First Amendment values while not advancing the valid concerns with political corruption. (The Court also rejected the concept that expenditure limits could be justified on the ground that campaigns had become too “extravagant” or that government could level down the free speech of all citizens.) It also ruled that only those expenditures for activities or advertisements that “expressly advocated” the election or defeat of specified candidates could be subject to any regulation whatsoever. Mere criticism of elected officials, no matter how strong, was immune from regulation.

On the other hand, the Court upheld limitations on contributions to candidates from others (the Court held that candidates could contribute as much as they could to their own campaigns.) The rationale was that large contributions, even though fully disclosed to the public, posed the potential for corruption or the appearance of corruption and could be sharply limited (to $1,000). Likewise, routine disclosure of campaign contributors of as little as $101 could be demanded, though those giving to controversial minor parties might be exempt from such public revelation, a point confirmed in a later case (Brown v. Socialist Workers '74 Campaign Committee). The provision of public financing for Presidential candidates was upheld against the challenge that it was incestuous for the government to be subsidizing politics and that the particular scheme enacted favored the two major political parties, the Republicans and the Democrats, to the detriment of new, independent, and third parties and their candidates.

Finally, the appointment of the monitoring agency was found to violate separation of powers principles, because the primary designations were made by the Congress, not the President. (A new and properly constituted Federal Election Commission was installed shortly thereafter).

For the next twenty-five years, the landmark Buckley decision would provide the ground rules for resolving the clash between campaign finance restrictions and First Amendment rights. But two developments of the 1980s and 1990s would set the stage for the sixth major Congressional enactment in this area. They were the raising and spending of “soft money” by political parties for a wide range of electoral activities as long as they did not directly back their chosen candidates and the running of broadcast ads that strongly condemned or praised specific candidates while steering clear of “expressly advocating” any candidate’s election or defeat. Many believed that both developments—soft money and issue advocacy—were end runs around the contribution limitations that the Court had consistently upheld, because they involved large contributions from individuals, unions, and corporations, which would be illegal if given directly to candidates themselves or spent for “express advocacy.”

These concerns led to the enactment of The Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002, widely known as the McCain–Feingold law. That act outlawed “soft money” contributions to political parties and broadcast advertising by corporations or unions that even so much as mentioned the name of a federal candidate. Another coalition of candidates and cause organizations challenged these new restrictions as well, led by Republican Senator Mitch McConnell and including groups as diverse as the American Civil Liberties Union, the National Rifle Association, the AFL-CIO, and the Republican National Committee (McConnell v. Federal Election Commission). In another landmark ruling, a closely divided Supreme Court upheld this major feature of the law. The Court majority believed that the large soft money contributions to political parties were an effort to skirt the restrictions on contributions to candidates and carried the same potential for corruption or the appearance of corruption. The ban on broadcasting was upheld on the ground that the advertisements were really political, despite the lack of “express advocacy,” and could be banned if they were sponsored by corporations or unions or even nonprofit membership organizations like the ACLU.

Thus, the pendulum has swung back to permit a greater regulation of campaign financing and, therefore, a greater regulation of First Amendment rights.

JOEL M. GORA

References and Further Reading

- Association of the Bar of the City of New York. Dollars and Democracy: A Blueprint for Campaign Finance Reform, 2000.
- Mutch, Robert E. Campaigns, Congress and the Courts: The Making of Federal Campaign Finance Law, 1988.
- Smith, Bradley A. Unfree Speech: The Folly of Campaign Finance Reform, 2000.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Buckley v. Valeo*, 424 U.S. 1 (1976)
- McConnell v. Federal Election Commission*, 124 S. Ct. 619 (2003)

CAMPUS HATE SPEECH CODES

During the 1980s and early 1990s, many colleges and universities responded to incidents of racial and sexual harassment by adopting campus hate speech codes. In 1994, Arati Korwar reported that more than 350 public colleges and universities had adopted some form of a hate speech code. Proponents of the codes contended that their goal, which was to reduce hateful, prejudiced speech, was legitimate, for such speech should receive little or no First Amendment protection. The courts, however, have repeatedly struck down campus hate speech codes on the First Amendment grounds of vagueness, overbreadth, and their tendency to permit content-based discrimination with respect to the topics that may be discussed or the views that may be expressed on campus.

Hate speech codes tend to be enacted in response to pressure from campus groups that become upset about insensitive or offensive student conduct, such as the use of racial epithets, verbally or in writing, or the perpetuation of ethnic and racial stereotypes, often in the context of fraternity functions. Such was the case at the University of Michigan, which adopted a hate speech code after a group of students had become upset over the use of racial epithets on campus, and at the University of Wisconsin, which adopted a hate speech code with a plan called “Design for Diversity” in response to several incidents including two instances of fraternity functions involving racial and ethnic stereotyping.

Using the Supreme Court's "fighting words" doctrine as a springboard, which holds that words that are likely to incite an immediate violent response are not entitled to First Amendment protection, campus hate speech codes have attempted to regulate expressions intended to stigmatize or demean an individual on the basis of the person's race, gender, handicap, religion, national or ethnic origin, age, sexual orientation, marital status, etc. The University of Michigan's policy, for example, prohibited "[a]ny behavior, verbal or physical, that stigmatizes or victimizes an individual on the basis of race, ethnicity, religion, sex, sexual orientation, creed . . . and that . . . [c]reates an intimidating, hostile, or demeaning environment for educational pursuits, employment or participation in University sponsored extra-curricular activities."

When challenged, in Doe v. University of Michigan (1989), the court found the University of Michigan's policy to be overbroad, in that it might be applied to restrict speech when the speech in question is merely unseemly or offensive. The court also found the policy to be unconstitutionally vague, because the limits of the scope and reach of the policy were too difficult to discern. In UWM Post v. Board of Regents of University of Wisconsin System (1991), the court struck down the University of Wisconsin's quite similar policy on the grounds that the hate speech code permitted the university to engage in content-based discrimination with respect to the types of speech that it would permit on campus, a form of "governmental thought control." These results, combined with the Supreme Court's ruling in R. A. V. v. City of St. Paul (1992), which struck down a hate-crime ordinance on First Amendment grounds, created a formidable barrier for hate speech codes that in a succession of later cases involving other universities has not been cleared.

In an effort to address the underlying problems caused by the types of speech in question, such as racial or sexual harassment, without running afoul of First Amendment protections, some colleges and universities have more recently taken the approach recommended by Arthur Coleman and Jonathan Alger in their article, "Beyond Speech Codes: Harmonizing Rights of Free Speech and Freedom from Discrimination on University Campuses." Rather than addressing these underlying problems by prohibiting certain forms of expression, colleges and universities can take the alternative approach of prohibiting the discriminatory harassment itself, even though speech may be involved in the harassing activity. These policies follow the applicable antidiscrimination statutes and standards as closely as possible and avoid any attempt to proscribe particular forms of expression apart from the context of the situation in which such expressions may fit the legal definitions of unlawful harassing activity.

In the higher education context, a violation of Title VI or Title IX occurs if a college or university that receives federal funds fails to provide a non-discriminatory environment that is conducive to learning. Determining whether a violation has occurred depends on whether the conduct complained of, which may or may not involve speech, is sufficiently "severe, pervasive or persistent" that the victim cannot fully benefit from the educational opportunities provided by the institution. Courts use a "totality of the circumstances" test to assess whether the conduct is sufficiently "severe, pervasive or persistent" standard such that a similarly situated, "reasonable" (not hypersensitive) student would be significantly and adversely impacted in his or her ability to benefit from or participate in educational programs or activities. These protections do not, however, go so far as to entitle a student to complete comfort or agreement with the expressions and opinions encountered in an educational environment. There is a range of conduct that students might find offensive but that is not sufficiently "severe, pervasive or persistent" as to interfere with a "reasonable" student's educational experience.

In creating alternatives to campus hate speech codes, the First Amendment concern to be avoided is that the same words, phrases, or symbols that might be prohibited by a hate speech code could, in an appropriate setting, be important to use to advance the learning process. For example, a hate speech code that prohibits the use of racial epithets may interfere with the study of important literature such as Mark Twain's Huckleberry Finn, which uses a particular racial epithet more than 200 times. Study of such literature might even help to address problems of racial bias by making students more aware of the forms and harms of racism if handled with sensitivity and care.

A majority of the Supreme Court recognized in R. A. V. that a hostile environment discrimination claim could survive a First Amendment challenge under the standards that the Court set forth in that case. A college or university policy that seeks to prohibit expression animated by racial prejudice or sexist bias as forms of discriminatory harassment will still need to provide enough specific guidance for individuals to be able to understand the types of behavior that are prohibited under the policy to withstand First Amendment-based overbreadth and vagueness challenges.

DAVID T. BALL

References and Further Reading

- Coleman, Arthur L., and Jonathan R. Alger, Beyond Speech Codes: Harmonizing Rights of Free Speech and Freedom from Discrimination on University Campuses, Journal of College and University Law 23 (1996): 91–132.
- Korwar, Arati R. War of Words: Speech Codes at Public Colleges and Universities. Nashville, TN: Freedom Forum First Amendment Center, 1994.
- Shiell, Timothy C. Campus Hate Speech on Trial. Lawrence, KS: University Press of Kansas, 2000.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Doe v. University of Michigan*, 721 F.Supp. 852 (E.D. Mich. 1989)
- R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul*, 505 U.S. 377 (1992)
- UWM Post v. Board of Regents of University of Wisconsin System*, 774 F.Supp. 1163 (E.D. Wis. 1991)

See also Fighting Words and Free Speech

CANTWELL v. CONNECTICUT, 310 U.S. 296 (1940)

Jehovah's Witnesses believe proselytizing is an essential part of their faith and, therefore, a religious obligation. As such, they preach on street corners, sell and/or distribute literature about their faith, and often engage in discussions with individuals about what the Witnesses believe. All of these are "activities," and, under the old belief/action dichotomy enunciated by the Court in Reynolds v. United States (1879), would not be protected under the First Amendment and could thus be regulated by the states. In a series of cases beginning in the late 1930s, however, the Supreme Court gradually came to the position that the line between belief and action could not always be clearly drawn, especially when certain actions flowed ineluctably from the tenets of the faith.

The Court first brought the First Amendment to bear in Lowell v. City of Griffin (1938), when it struck down a municipal ordinance requiring groups to get a permit before handing out pamphlets. That decision, however, had been based on the speech clause; in Cantwell, the Court for the first time in the modern era began exploring the meaning of the First Amendment's free exercise clause.

Newton Cantwell had gone door-to-door in overwhelmingly Catholic neighborhoods asking people if they would listen to a recording or receive one of the Witnesses' pamphlets. The materials all included attacks on Catholicism. When the residents objected, police arrested Cantwell, and he was subsequently convicted of failure to secure the necessary permit for door-to-door solicitation from the secretary of public welfare.

The Supreme Court unanimously overturned the conviction, and the majority opinion, by Justice Owen Roberts, is notable for two reasons. First, it relied on the Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment rather than the Speech Clause. The state had the power to license solicitors, Roberts held, but the arbitrary power lodged in the secretary of public welfare constituted an impermissible form of censorship over religion. The Court would still have trouble deciding whether religious activities came under the protection of the Speech Clause or the Free Exercise Clause (see, for example, Justice Jackson's opinion in West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette [1943]), but in Cantwell at last began to move beyond the simplistic action/belief dichotomy that had been the untouched basis of Free Exercise interpretation since Reynolds.

In another important aspect of his opinion, Roberts set out what would become a universal rule of First Amendment jurisprudence, namely, that although a state may regulate the time, place, and manner in which groups hold public meetings or engage in solicitation, it may not ban them altogether or discriminate on the basis of the content of the message.

MELVIN I. UROFSKY

References and Further Reading

- Peters, Shawn Francis. Judging Jehovah's Witnesses: Religious Persecution and the Dawn of the Rights Revolution. Lawrence, KS: University Press of Kansas, 2000.
- Waite, Edward F., The Debt of Constitutional Law to Jehovah's Witnesses, Minnesota Law Review 28 (1944): 209.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Reynolds v. United States*, 98 U.S. 145 (1879)
- Lowell v. City of Griffin*, 303 U.S. 444 (1938)
- West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette*, 319 U.S. 624 (1943)

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Introduction and Early Years

Capital punishment is a punishment option of the federal government in more than two thirds of states in the United States. The method of execution overwhelmingly used is lethal injection, although various states also allow execution by the electric chair, firing squad, gas chamber, and hanging.

Proponents of the death penalty argue that the death penalty serves important functions of deterrence and retribution. Those who argue for abolition of the death penalty, however, argue that the risk of executing the innocent is too great, there is no evidence the death penalty deters crime more than life imprisonment, and complex capital cases are significantly more expensive than life imprisonment cases. Furthermore, abolitionists argue that the death penalty is applied unfairly and arbitrarily to the poor and to people of color. Both sides also make arguments that focus on religious and moral foundations.

Historically and internationally, the death penalty has been used as a punishment for a wide variety of crimes. In North America around 1700, the colonists used the death penalty instead of prison as the main punishment for a range of serious crimes. With the adoption of prison as the normal punishment in the late eighteenth century, the death penalty's use became more limited. Since the late 1970s, capital punishment has only been used in the United States in murder cases.

Although the United States retains capital punishment while much of the world has abandoned the punishment, the United States was initially one of the leaders in the death penalty abolition movement. The Territory of Michigan voted to abolish capital punishment for all crimes except treason in a law that took effect March 1, 1847, more than twenty years before Portugal became the first European country to abolish the death penalty. During the next century, other state legislatures dealt with the issue of whether to abolish capital punishment, but the U. S. Supreme Court only examined the death penalty in a few cases, such as Wilkerson v. Utah, where the Court upheld execution by firing squad, and In re Kemmler, where the Court upheld execution by electrocution.

Capital Punishment Developments in the Supreme Court

In the 1960s and 1970s, however, the courts began to take a closer look at capital punishment, and organizations like the NAACP Legal Defense and Education Fund organized strategies to attack the punishment on constitutional grounds. In 1971 in McGautha v. California, the Supreme Court rejected a constitutional challenge to the procedures used to impose the death penalty.

However, the following year, the Supreme Court held in Furman v. Georgia that the death penalty statutes in use at the time violated the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments of the U.S. Constitution, in effect invalidating the death penalty's use in the United States. There was no clear majority on the rationale for the result in Furman, but several Justices reasoned that the procedures used in capital cases at the time gave too much discretion to jurors in deciding whether to impose the death penalty, so that the sentences were arbitrary and often resulted in racial discrimination. Although Justice William J. Brennan, Jr. concluded that the death penalty was degrading to human dignity and Justice Thurgood Marshall also agreed that the death penalty was unconstitutional per se, other Justices' written opinions left open the issue of whether the death penalty violates the constitution in all circumstances.

In 1976, the Court decided several cases that upheld the use of the death penalty and, along with Furman, laid the foundation for the modern use of the death penalty in the United States. In Gregg v. Georgia, the Court examined new capital punishment statutes that limited the discretion of jurors, and a Plurality held that these statutes did not violate the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. The Plurality, in an opinion written by Justice Potter Stewart, concluded that a statute with a list of factors for jurors to consider in sentencing provided "clear and objective standards" and gave adequate guidance to the sentencer. On the same day, the Court upheld other states' guided sentencing statutes in Jurek v. Texas and Proffitt v. Florida. Subsequent cases, like Godfrey v. Georgia, clarified that capital sentencing procedures must provide a way to distinguish the few cases that deserve the death penalty from those cases that do not.

At the same time as Gregg, the Court struck down death penalty statutes that automatically imposed the death penalty for certain crimes. In Woodson v. North Carolina, the Plurality concluded that in death penalty cases the Eighth Amendment requires consideration of the record and character of the defendant and the circumstances of the crime. Individualized sentencing in capital cases is required, because there is an increased need for reliability because the death penalty is significantly different from all other punishments. The Supreme Court further emphasized the concern about individualized sentencing in Lockett v. Ohio, where Ohio's death penalty statute was struck down because it limited a capital jury from being able to consider factors presented to mitigate the sentence.

Thus, two important principles emerge from the Supreme Court's Eighth Amendment capital punishment procedural jurisprudence: (1) sentencing juries must be given clear and objective standards to determine who is eligible for the death penalty and to narrow the group of those executed from the group of all murderers; and (2) the sentencing jury must be allowed to consider mitigating factors that include all aspects of a defendant's character and record, as well as the circumstances of the offense. In 1994, Justice Harry A. Blackmun, who had voted to uphold the death penalty in Gregg, argued in dissent in Callins v. Collins that these two principles are incompatible and that the death penalty cannot be imposed fairly. Justice Blackmun concluded that "the death penalty experiment has failed" and then dissented from every case affirming a death sentence until retiring later that term.

In 1987 in another significant capital case, McCleskey v. Kemp, the Supreme Court considered evidence that the race of the defendant and the victim affects the determination of who receives the death penalty. The Court assumed the evidence was correct, including the statistics that showed that a defendant who kills a white victim is four times more likely to get the death penalty than a defendant who kills a black victim, but held that such racial disparities do not violate the constitution. Justice Lewis F. Powell, who wrote the majority opinion in McCleskey, noted after he retired that he regretted upholding the death penalty.

The Modern Death Penalty

Since the 1990s, there has been a growing concern about the use of the death penalty in the United States. In some recent decisions, the Supreme Court has narrowed the use of the death penalty. In the early twenty-first century, the Court reversed prior decisions in two significant cases. In Atkins v. Virginia, the Court held that it violates the constitution to execute mentally retarded individuals, and in Roper v. Simmons it held that it is unconstitutional to execute juveniles who commit their crimes while younger than eighteen years of age. In both of those cases, the Court reasoned that the Eighth Amendment required it to consider "evolving standards of decency" in American society, including recent political and public opinion changes, resulting in the Court reversing prior decisions.

One reason for the growing concern about the use of the death penalty has been the discovery that since Furman, more than 100 prisoners have been exonerated and released from death row. Developments in technology and DNA evidence have contributed to the new discoveries of innocence. Although some members of the Supreme Court stated in Herrera v. Collins in 1993 that a claim of innocence might not be the basis of a constitutional claim in itself, concerns about innocence have caused judges, legislators, and jurors to question the value of the death penalty. In 2003, Governor George Ryan of Illinois commuted the sentences of everyone on death row in that state because of recent discoveries of innocent people on death row. In 2000, he had imposed a moratorium on executions in that state for the same reason.

Although Court challenges since Furman have been unsuccessful in eliminating the death penalty in the United States, more than half of the countries in the world have abolished the death penalty, at least in practice, and the long-range trend around the world is to abolish the death penalty. For example, since the United States reinstated the death penalty in 1976, more than seventy countries have abolished the death penalty. During that time in the United States, however, there have been close to 1,000 executions and there are more than 3,000 men and women on death rows across the United States. Still, as noted previously, concerns about the use of the death penalty and the unfairness of the system in the United States have continued to grow. The death penalty is used significantly less than it was 100 years ago, leaving the question for the future of whether 100 years from now capital punishment will be used at all.

JEFFREY L. KIRCHMEIER

References and Further Reading

- Acker, James, Robert M. Bohm, and Charles S. Lanier, eds. America's Experiment with Capital Punishment, 2nd ed. Durham, NC: Carolina Academic Press, 2003.
- Death Penalty Information Center web site, <http://www.deathpenaltyinfo.org/>.
- Kirchmeier, Jeffrey L. "Aggravating and Mitigating Factors: The Paradox of Today's Arbitrary and Mandatory Capital Punishment Scheme." William & Mary Bill of Rights Journal 6 (1998): 2:345-459.
- , Another Place Beyond Here: the Death Penalty Moratorium Movement in the United States, Colorado Law Review 73 (2002): 1:1-116 (article available at <http://www.colorado.edu/law/lawreview/issues/summaries/73-1.htm>).
- Zimring, Franklin E., and Gordon Hawkins. Capital Punishment and the American Agenda. New York, NY: Cambridge University Press, 1989.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Atkins v. Virginia*, 536 U.S. 304 (2002)
- Callins v. Collins*, 510 U.S. 1141 (1994)
- Furman v. Georgia*, 408 U.S. 238 (1972)
- Gregg v. Georgia*, 428 U.S. 153 (1976)
- Herrera v. Collins*, 506 U.S. 390 (1993)
- In re Kemmler*, 136 U.S. 436 (1890)
- Jurek v. Texas*, 428 U.S. 262 (1976)
- Lockett v. Ohio*, 438 U.S. 586 (1978)
- McCleskey v. Kemp*, 481 U.S. 279 (1987)
- McGautha v. California*, 402 U.S. 183, 196 (1971)
- Proffitt v. Florida*, 428 U.S. 242 (1976)

Roper v. Simmons, 125 S. Ct. 1183 (2005)
Wilkerson v. Utah, 99 U.S. 130 (1879)
Woodson v. North Carolina, 428 U.S. 280, 305 (1976)

See also Capital Punishment and the Equal Protection Clause Cases; Capital Punishment and Race Discrimination; Capital Punishment and Resentencing; Capital Punishment and the Right of Appeal; Capital Punishment and Sentencing; Capital Punishment: Proportionality; Capital Punishment Held Not Cruel & Unusual Punishment Under Certain Guidelines; Capital Punishment for Felony Murder; Capital Punishment Reversed; Capital Punishment: 8th Amendment Limits; Capital Punishment: Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996; Capital Punishment: Due Process Limits; Capital Punishment: Execution of Innocents; Capital Punishment: History and Politics; Capital Punishment: Lynching; Capital Punishment: Methods of Execution

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT AND RACE DISCRIMINATION

Race detrimentally affects the administration of capital punishment in the United States. The origins of this situation are found in the former practice of chattel slavery. During this time, people of African descent had a greater risk of being sentenced to death. This risk increased if the victim was Caucasian. For example, slaves were automatically sentenced to death if they were convicted of killing a Caucasian. Conversely, since slaves were not considered human beings, Caucasians could murder blacks with impunity.

After the Civil War, the U. S. Supreme Court ("the Court") held in Plessy v. Ferguson that the institutionalized racism doctrine of "separate but equal" did not violate the Equal Protection of Law. The Court's endorsement of this doctrine facilitated the continued viability of these racial disparities in the administration of capital punishment. This was especially evident if a man of African descent was convicted of raping a Caucasian woman. For example, in Furman v. Georgia, Justice Marshall notes that between 1930 and 1972, "455 persons, including 48 whites and 405 Negroes, were executed for rape" Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238, 364 and note 151 (Marshall, J. concurring).

These concerns are aggravated by the impact race has on the selection of a capital jury. Since slaves were property, they were not afforded the same criminal procedural rights, including the right to trial by jury, as Caucasians. After slavery's demise, many states enacted laws to continue this exclusionary practice. Consequently, the fate of capital defendants of African descent was historically decided by all white juries. In 1880, the Court held in Strauder v. West Virginia that using race to bar someone from serving on a jury violated the Equal Protection of Law. Nonetheless, this admonition was circumvented by prosecutors who exercised their peremptory challenges in a racially discriminatory manner. This was accepted practice until 1965, when the Court decided to prohibit the purposeful racially discriminatory use of peremptory challenges in Swain v. Alabama. Defendants alleging a violation had to prove that the prosecutor actually purposefully exercised the peremptory challenge at issue to strike the potential juror because of the juror's race. States were able to continue exercising peremptory challenges in a manner contrary to the Court's rule, because it was difficult for defendants to satisfy this burden of proof.

In the Court's 1972 landmark opinion in Furman v. Georgia, several Justices acknowledged that race affects the administration of capital punishment. In 1986, in Batson v. Kentucky, the Court attempted to take remedial action by relaxing the burden of proof its earlier decision in Swain imposed on a defendant. Accordingly, the Court concluded that the burden of proof could be satisfied if the defendant could establish an inference that the prosecutor exercised a peremptory challenge in a purposefully racially discriminatory manner. The Court permitted the state to refute the inference by articulating a nonpretextual race neutral explanation for the challenge. The next year the Court rendered an opinion in McCleskey v. Kemp, a case presenting many of the issues of racial disparity identified and addressed in the Baldus Study. The Baldus Study's findings confirmed the continued presence of the bias historically experienced by people of African descent: The murderers of Caucasians remain more likely to be sentenced to death than those who murdered people of African descent. This was especially the case if the offender was of African descent. Although the Court declined to grant the defendant relief, it did not contradict the validity of the Baldus Study's findings. Subsequent studies examining the interaction between race and the death penalty in other jurisdictions reached conclusions similar to those made in the Baldus Study.

Execution statistics collected from 1976 when the Court's decision in Gregg v. Georgia lifted the legal moratorium on the use of the death penalty in the United States reinforce the validity of these findings. Compared with Caucasians, people of African descent comprise a significantly smaller percentage of the population in the United States. In contrast, they are overrepresented on this nation's death rows, because there the number of people of African descent almost equals the number of Caucasians. Two other statistics reveal that the United States's history of racial discrimination continues to adversely affect the administration of capital punishment. First, the overwhelming majority of the victims of the people executed since 1976 were Caucasian. Similarly, the same disparity is found when the number of people of African descent executed for killing Caucasians is compared with the few number of Caucasians executed for killing people of African descent.

ROBERTA M. HARDING

References and Further Reading

- Baldus, David C., Charles Pulaski, and George Woodworth, Comparative Review of Death Sentences: An Empirical Study of the Georgia Experience, The Journal of Criminal Law & Criminology 74 (1983): 3:661–753.
- Bedau, Hugo Adam, ed. The Death Penalty in America: Current Controversies. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.
- Blankenship, Michael B., and Kristie R. Blevins, Inequalities in Capital Punishment in Tennessee Based on Race: An Analytical Study of Aggravating and Mitigating Factors in Death Penalty Cases, University of Memphis Law Review 31 (2001): 4:828–859.
- Flcury-Steiner, Benjamin. Jurors' Stories of Death: How America's Death Penalty Invests in Inequality. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 2004.
- Issac, Unah, and Jack Boger. Race and the Death Penalty in North Carolina: an Empirical Analysis, 1993–1997. Raleigh, NC: Common Sense Foundation, 2001.
- Lyon, Andrea D., Naming the Dragon: Litigating Race Issues During a Death Penalty Trial, DePaul Law Review 53 (2004): 4:1647–1661.
- McNally, Kevin, Race to Execution: Race and the Federal Death Penalty, DePaul Law Review 53 (2004): 4:1615–1645.
- Radelet, Michael L. "Executions of Whites For Crimes Against Blacks: Exceptions to the Rule?" The Sociological Quarterly 30, no. 4.(1989): 529–544.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Batson v. Kentucky*, 476 U.S. 79 (1986)
- Furman v. Georgia*, 408 U.S. 238 (1972)
- McCleskey v. Kemp*, 481 U.S. 279 (1987)
- Plessy v. Ferguson*, 163 U.S. 537 (1896)
- Strauder v. West Virginia*, 100 U.S. 303 (1880)
- Swain v. Alabama*, 380 U.S. 202 (1965)

See also Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954); Capital Punishment; Capital Punishment and the Equal Protection Clause Cases; Capital Punishment: Lynching; Coker v. Georgia, 433 U.S. 584 (1977); Discriminatory Prosecution; Dred Scott v. Sandford, 60 U.S. 393 (1857); Emancipation Proclamation (1863); Jury Trials and Race; Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1 (1967); Miscegenation Laws; Race and Criminal Justice; Scottsboro Trials; Segregation; Slavery and Civil Liberties; Thirteenth Amendment

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT AND RESENTENCING

Sometimes a defendant facing the death penalty once will have to undergo another trial for the same capital offense and face the death penalty again. That sounds odd, in view of the double-jeopardy protection against twice being “put in jeopardy of life or limb” (U.S. Const. Amend. V). In a case in which a defendant has been sentenced to death but achieves a reversal of either the conviction or death sentence, no double-jeopardy concerns arise, because prosecutors as a general rule may retry defendants for the same crime in the aftermath of an appellate reversal. Often, such defendants are relieved to have a second opportunity to avoid a death sentence. Still, there are instances in which a death-sentenced defendant who succeeds in overturning a death verdict will argue that a capital resentencing ought not to be allowed. That occurs when the basis for overturning the death verdict involves a finding, implicit or explicit, that the defendant ought not to have been eligible for the death penalty in the first place.

But what if the defendant received a life sentence and later succeeds in overturning the conviction—may the prosecution now retry the defendant and seek a death sentence? Put in stark terms, does a defendant who avoids getting the death sentence in the original trial assume the risk of getting sentenced to death in a second trial, should he succeed in overturning his conviction?

In noncapital cases, prosecutors may retry defendants whose convictions have been reversed and seek the same or tougher sentence as that sought in the original trial. But a capital sentencing process is unlike the conventional sentencing process in that the capital penalty-phase proceeding resembles a trial, with testimony taken and the burden of proof placed on the prosecution to convince the jury to impose death. That fact triggers the Double Jeopardy Clause. In Bullington v. Missouri, 451 U.S. 430 (1981), the Supreme Court held that a prosecutor may not seek the death penalty in a retrial against a defendant who has received a life verdict in the original trial. The Bullington jury's life verdict, in effect, constituted an “acquittal” vis á vis the death penalty, and that acquittal barred putting the defendant again in jeopardy of losing his life.

Bullington is not as sweeping in its reach as one might think. It is possible that a capital defendant who succeeds in securing a life verdict could be reprosecuted and again face the death penalty. The Supreme Court confronted a not-so-unique situation in Sattazahn v. Pennsylvania, 537 U.S. 101 (2003), and authorized a reprosecution for the death penalty on a defendant who had in his original trial secured a life verdict. A jury convicted Sattazahn of capital murder but deadlocked on the issue of whether to impose death (nine voting for life, three for death). Pennsylvania law required the judge to impose a life sentence in the event of a hung jury. Sattazahn successfully appealed his conviction, and on retrial the prosecution sought again to secure a death verdict. The Supreme Court, in a five to four vote, ruled that the Double Jeopardy Clause did not bar putting Sattazahn again in jeopardy of losing his life. Whereas in Bullington, the jury rendered a life verdict—thus affirmatively acquitting the defendant of the death penalty—the Sattazahn jury's failure to arrive at a verdict meant that there had been no such "acquittal." The dissenters argued that the life sentence, which was mandated by law, terminated the proceedings in defendant's favor, thus barring the renewed attempt to secure a death verdict. But the Sattazahn majority construed the Double Jeopardy Clause narrowly, finding that it only applies when there has been an actual jury finding that some element of the prosecution's case had not been proved.

DANIEL R. WILLIAMS

References and Further Reading

Carter, Linda E., and Ellen Kreitzberg. Understanding Capital Punishment Law, 2004.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Bullington v. Missouri, 451 U.S. 430 (1981)
Sattazahn v. Pennsylvania, 537 U.S. 101 (2003)

See also Capital Punishment; Double Jeopardy: Modern History

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT AND SENTENCING

Currently, forty jurisdictions (thirty-eight states, the federal government, and the military) authorize capital punishment. Although the U. S. Supreme Court has found there to be some constitutional restrictions on the imposition of the death penalty, it has yet to find that the punishment itself is cruel and unusual. In 1972, the Supreme Court effectively overturned all then-existing capital statutes when it held in Furman v. Georgia that such statutes must ensure that the death penalty will not be imposed in an "arbitrary and capricious" manner.

In the aftermath of the Furman decision, thirty-five states drafted new death penalty statutes. The statutes that the Supreme Court upheld as complying with the Eighth Amendment included those with the following characteristics: separating the guilt/innocence phase from the sentencing phase of the trial; limiting the types of crimes that would qualify for capital punishment; creating specific aggravating factors, at least one of which must be found to exist before a jury can even consider the death penalty; specialized appellate review of death sentences; requiring that juries weigh aggravating and mitigating factors in determining whether a death sentence is appropriate. The Supreme Court struck down statutes mandating a death sentence for specific crimes, ruling that such statutes violate the Eighth Amendment because they do not allow for an individualized determination of sentence.

Although the specific death penalty sentencing procedures vary by jurisdiction, every state currently has what is referred to as a "bifurcated" trial procedure. In these proceedings, the jury first determines whether the defendant is guilty or not guilty of the offense of capital murder. Then, if a verdict of guilty is returned, the jury determines the defendant's sentence, which, in most jurisdictions, includes a choice between life without the possibility of parole and death. The sentencing phase of a capital trial shares many of the same characteristics as the guilt/innocence phase. For example, double jeopardy provisions have been deemed to apply to a jury "verdict" of life imprisonment, and the defendant is entitled to have a jury determine the existence of aggravating factors. Special rules also apply with respect to selection of jurors for capital cases, a process referred to as "death qualification." This process seeks to eliminate those jurors who would be unable to consider both life and death as potential sentences.

Although capital sentencing statutes also vary by jurisdiction, they all essentially involve, in some form, a weighing of mitigating factors against aggravating factors. Generally, if the aggravating factors outweigh the mitigating factors, the jury may return a verdict of death, although it is not always required. Common aggravating factors include the manner in which the killing is committed, any future danger that the defendant may pose, and the status of the victim. Common mitigating circumstances include the age of the defendant at the time the crime was committed, the relative role that the defendant played in the killing, mental health issues suffered by the defendant, lack of prior criminal record, and the defendant's personal background.

JUDITH M. BARGER

References and Further Reading

Carter, Linda E., and Ellen Krietzberg. Understanding Capital Punishment Law, LexisNexis Publishing, 2004.

Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972)
Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153 (1976)
Proffitt v. Florida, 428 U.S. 242 (1976)
Jurek v. Texas, 429 U.S. 262 (1976)

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT AND THE EQUAL PROTECTION CLAUSE CASES

Although the legal institution of slavery was dismantled by the Emancipation Proclamation and the Thirteenth Amendment, discrimination on the basis of race and racially motivated violence continued unabated. That black Americans received a different brand of justice than white Americans was made plain in the passage of Black Codes. These laws explicitly provided for criminal punishments that varied, depending on the race of the victim and the race of the criminal. Crimes involving either white victims or black perpetrators were punished more severely than crimes involving either black victims or white perpetrators.

The Fourteenth Amendment was framed and adopted . . . to assure to the colored race the enjoyment of all the civil rights that under the law are enjoyed by white persons, and to give to that race the protection of the General Government, in that enjoyment whenever it should be denied by the states” Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U.S. 303, 306 (1886). Among its many other provisions, the Fourteenth Amendment contains the Equal Protection Clause that provides that “[no state shall] deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.” The principle of equality enshrined in the Equal Protection Clause has famously been described by one Supreme Court Justice as requiring racial neutrality in the application of the laws: “Our Constitution is color-blind, and neither knows nor tolerates classes among citizens.” Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537, 551 (1896) (Harlan, J., dissenting).

Prosecutors enjoy broad discretion in making critical decisions, such as the determination whether a particular suspect should be formally accused of crime and, if so, what charge or charges should be filed. However, prosecutorial discretion is not completely unfettered. In certain circumstances, the Constitution itself may impose constraints on a prosecutor’s power. For example, discriminatory prosecutions are prohibited by the Equal Protection Clause. According to the Supreme Court in Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U.S. 356 (1886):

Though the law itself be fair on its face and impartial in appearance, yet, if it is applied and administered by public authority with an evil eye and an unequal hand, so as practically to make unjust and illegal discriminations between persons in similar circumstances, material to their rights, the denial of equal justice is still within the prohibition of the Constitution.

Each step in the prosecution of a capital case—arrest, charging, plea bargaining, jury selection, conviction, sentencing, appeal, clemency and execution—is equally subject to the application of inexact standards of decision making. The inevitable result, according to death penalty opponents, is a high risk of arbitrariness in the determination of who is ultimately put to death.

Of course, race is not the only basis on which discriminatory decisions may rest. The American Bar Association has cautioned that prosecutors, in discharging both their investigative and charging functions, “should not invidiously discriminate against or in favor of any person on the basis of race, religion, sex, sexual preference, or ethnicity,” whether the person appears as the defendant or as the victim. Standards for Criminal Justice Standard 3-3.1(b) (comment). Thus far, however, the most significant equal protection challenges have been predicated on race discrimination.

Before his execution in Florida’s electric chair in 1979, John Spenselink, a white man condemned to die for the murder of a white man, presented in state and federal court a study purporting to show that the revised Florida death penalty statutes were being applied far more often against killers of whites than against killers of blacks. The following year, two Northeastern University criminologists, William Bowers and Glenn Pierce, published a study of homicide sentencing in Georgia, Florida, and Texas, the three states whose new death penalty statutes were the first to be approved by the Supreme Court after its landmark decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972).

Bowers and Pierce found that in white victim cases, black defendants in all three states were from four to six times more likely to be sentenced to death than white defendants. In Georgia, black on white killings resulted in death sentences thirty-three times more often than black on black killings. In Florida, a black defendant was thirty-seven times more likely to be sentenced to death if his victim was white than if his victim was black. And in Texas, black killers of white victims were eighty-four times more likely to be sentenced to death than black killers of black victims.

In 1981, John Eldon Smith, a Georgia death row inmate, introduced the Bowers and Pierce study in federal court. The court of appeals rejected the study as too crude to be legally significant, because it failed to take into account dozens of circumstances in each case—other than race—that might have accounted for unequal sentencing patterns.

A far more comprehensive analysis of the impact of race in capital cases was offered on behalf of a different condemned prisoner on Georgia's death row. Warren McCleskey, a black man, was convicted of murder and sentenced to die for his role in the shooting death of white police officer Frank Schlatt during a furniture store robbery.

Iowa law professor David Baldus and a team of researchers examined nearly 2,500 homicide cases that occurred in Georgia between 1973 and 1979. Unlike the less sophisticated study undertaken by professors Bowers and Pierce, Professor Baldus subjected his data to an exhaustive analysis, taking account of 230 variables that could have explained the disparities on nonracial grounds. The Baldus study, like the studies that preceded it, purported to show a disparity in the imposition of the death penalty in Georgia based on the race of the victim and, to a lesser extent, the race of the defendant.

Specifically, the Baldus study showed that for the universe of cases examined, defendants charged with killing white persons received the death penalty in eleven percent of the cases; defendants charged with killing blacks received the death penalty in only one percent of the cases. The death penalty was assessed in twenty-two percent of the cases involving black defendants and white victims; eight percent of the cases involving white defendants and white victims; one percent of the cases involving black defendants and black victims; and three percent of the cases involving white defendants and black victims.

Charging decisions were found to be similarly skewed along racial lines. Prosecutors asked for the death penalty in seventy percent of the cases involving black defendants and white victims; thirty-two percent of the cases involving white defendants and white victims; fifteen percent of the cases involving black defendants and black victims; and nineteen percent of the cases involving white defendants and black victims.

After taking into account nonracial variables, defendants charged with killing whites were found to be 4.3 times as likely to be sentenced to death as defendants charged with killing blacks. Black defendants were 1.1 times as likely to receive a death sentence as other defendants. The troubling conclusion of the Baldus study is that black defendants—such as Warren McCleskey—who kill white victims have the greatest likelihood of receiving the death penalty.

In the Supreme Court, McCleskey argued that the Baldus study demonstrated that the Georgia death penalty system discriminated on the basis of race in violation of the Equal Protection Clause. The Court disagreed five to four. Writing for the majority, Justice

Powell noted that a defendant claiming an equal protection violation has the burden to provide “the existence of purposeful discrimination.” In addition, the defendant must show that the purposeful discrimination “had a discriminatory effect” on him or her.

McCleskey's sole reliance on the Baldus study and his failure to show how any state actor had acted with discriminatory purpose in his case proved fatal to McCleskey's argument and, ultimately, to McCleskey himself. Although the Court has accepted statistics as proof of intent to discriminate in the context of a state's selection of a jury venire and in the context of statutory violations under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the Court refused to find that statistics alone were sufficient to demonstrate that the discretion inherent in the criminal justice system had been abused by racist decision makers.

Nor did the Court find the Baldus study persuasive proof that Georgia violated the Equal Protection Clause by adopting the capital punishment scheme and allowing it to remain in force despite its allegedly discriminatory application. For that claim to prevail, McCleskey would have to show that the Georgia legislature either enacted the statute to further a racially discriminatory purpose or maintained the statute because of the racially disproportionate impact suggested by the Baldus study.

Warren McCleskey died in Georgia's electric chair on September 25, 1991. That same year, retired Justice Lewis Powell, who had authored the majority opinion denying relief to McCleskey was asked by a biographer if he would change any of his votes as a justice if he could. Powell said that he would change his vote in McCleskey's case if he could.

Justice Brennan was one of the four McCleskey dissenters. He wrote, “It is tempting to pretend that minorities on death row share a fate in no way connected to our own, that our treatment of them sounds no echoes beyond the chambers in which they die. Such an illusion is ultimately corrosive, for the reverberations of injustice are not so easily confined.” McCleskey v. Kemp, 481 U.S. 279 (1987) (Brennan, J., dissenting).

The Court's McCleskey ruling has been harshly criticized. There are those who have likened the McCleskey decision to the Court's discredited opinion in Plessy v. Ferguson. According to an editorial that ran in the Tallahassee Democrat newspaper:

It is the same reasoning that enabled the Court in the late 1800s to approve the ‘separate-but-equal’ doctrine for the nation's schools . . . In McCleskey the Court essentially says Blacks must accept a separate-and-unequal system of justice in capital cases.

RANDALL T. COYNE

Cases and Statutes Cited

Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972)
McCleskey v. Kemp, 481 U.S. 279 (1987)
Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537, 551 (1896)
Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U.S. 303, 306 (1886)
Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U.S. 356 (1886)

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT AND THE RIGHT OF APPEAL

Appellate review should ensure that no death sentence is handed down in an arbitrary and capricious manner. When the U.S. Supreme Court voided forty state death penalty statutes in Furman v. Georgia, it held that unrestricted jury discretion in imposing a death sentence resulted in arbitrary sentencing. Four years later, in Gregg v. Georgia, the U.S. Supreme Court reinstated the death penalty, holding that capital punishment does not violate the Eighth Amendment prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment, provided that a death sentence is not arbitrary and capricious.

After Gregg, all capital crimes are prosecuted in a bifurcated trial, with the guilt–innocence phase conducted separately from the penalty phase. If the jury finds the defendant guilty, the same jury will turn to the question of whether to impose a death sentence. Capital defendants are entitled to meaningful appellate review of both stages of the bifurcated trial.

The Court declared that the sentencing scheme in Gregg was constitutional because the appellate court would review the death sentence in every case to determine whether the jury had imposed death under the influence of passion or prejudice, whether the evidence supported the jury finding of a statutory aggravating circumstance, and whether the death sentence was proportionate to sentences in similar cases. In Proffitt v. Florida, handed down the same day as Gregg, the Court endorsed Florida's appellate review process because it guaranteed a review of aggravating circumstances and proportionate sentencing.

Most of the thirty-eight death penalty states provide for automatic appellate review of all death sentences, though in denying cert in U.S. v. Hammer the Court implicitly held that a mandatory review is not required by the Constitution. Furthermore, in Gilmore v. Utah, the Court found that a defendant could, with full knowledge of his right to seek an appeal, waive that right. In Sattazahn v. Pennsylvania, the trial judge imposed a life sentence after a jury hung during the sentencing phase. The defendant appealed, the case was reversed, the defendant was retried, and he received a death sentence at the retrial. On appeal, the Court held that there was no double jeopardy bar to the death sentence on retrial because the life sentence at issue did not amount to an acquittal on the basis of the government's failure to prove one or more aggravating circumstances beyond a reasonable doubt at sentencing during the first trial.

After completing the direct appeals process, capital defendants may exercise their right to file a petition for habeas corpus review. These petitions usually raise new issues that were not expressly part of the trial. Ineffective assistance of counsel, police and prosecutor misconduct, and newly discovered evidence are typical subjects for habeas petitions. The reviewing court must assess whether the alleged error substantially affected the jury in deciding to sentence the defendant to death.

The Federal Death Penalty Act sets out appellate guidelines used in most capital cases. The act requires the appellate court to review the entire record, including the procedures used and evidence admitted during the sentencing and to examine the aggravating and mitigating factors enumerated in the statute. Whereas the appellate court may not reverse for harmless error, it must reverse if it concludes that the jury imposed the death sentence under the influence of passion, prejudice, or any other arbitrary factor.

J. AMY DILLARD

References and Further Reading

Golden, Sara L., Constitutionality of the Federal Death Penalty Act: Is the Lack of Mandatory Appeal Really Meaningful Appeal? Temple Law Review (Summer 2001): 429–468.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Gilmore v. Utah, 429 U.S. 1012 (1976)
Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153 (1976)
Furman v. Georgia, 409 U.S. 902 (1972)
Proffitt v. Florida, 428 U.S. 242 (1976)
Sattazahn v. Pennsylvania, 537 U.S. 101 (2003)
U.S. v. Hammer, 226 F.3d 229 (3d Cir. 2000)
 39 C.J.S. Habeas Corpus § 159

See also Capital Punishment: Due Process Limits; Habeas Corpus: Modern History

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT FOR FELONY MURDER

Felony murder must not be confused with murder during the course of a felony. Murder during the course of a felony is an ordinary, intentional murder. When it is committed during the course of certain dangerous felonies, such as robbery, arson, or rape, the felony may be used as an aggravating factor to impose the death penalty.

Felony murder, by contrast, is a legal term of art that means that person can be found guilty of murder, even though he lacks the mental state or mens rea ordinarily required for murder, if the killing took place during a felony. Thus, if while robbing a store, the robber's gun goes off accidentally, killing the proprietor, the defendant would lack the mens rea for murder, which would be something like malice a forethought or intentional depending on the state. Nevertheless, in many States, he would be guilty of murder anyway, because the killing occurred during the course of a felony. The concept of felony murder has been used to convict people of murder even when their culpability as to death is relatively low, such as where the victim dies of a heart attack during a robbery, where the deceased is a co-felon, shot by the victim of the original crime, and where the victim is shot by a co-felon whom the defendant had no reason to know would be armed.

In Enmund v. Florida, 458 U.S. 782 (1982), the Supreme Court considered whether a person who aids and abets a felony, but does not commit or have an intention to commit a killing, could be put to death. In a five to four opinion, the Court held that the death penalty in such a case was disproportionate to the crime and therefore violated the Eighth Amendment. The Court did not disapprove of the defendant's conviction for murder, despite the fact that he only served as a driver for the robbery in this case. It was only his death sentence that was struck down. In reaching this conclusion, the Court relied on its 1977 decision in Coker v. Georgia, 433 U.S. 584, in which it had invalidated, also on proportionality grounds, the death penalty for the crime of raping an adult woman.

The Court limited Enmund somewhat in the 1987 case of Tison v. Arizona, 481 U.S. 137. In Tison the death penalty was imposed on two sons whose father had killed a family of four whom the group had abducted at gunpoint during a prison escape. The Court conceded that the sons had neither inflicted the fatal wounds nor intended to kill the victims. Nevertheless, their death sentence was upheld on the ground that they displayed reckless indifference to the deaths: The reckless disregard for human life implicit in knowingly engaging in criminal activities known to carry a grave risk of death represents a highly culpable mental state that is appropriate for capital punishment, held the five to four majority. 481 U.S. at p. 157. This is not surprising considering that reckless indifference to death has traditionally been a mental state sufficient for conviction of murder, regardless of the felony. Thus, person who shoots randomly into a house and kills someone would be guilty of murder even though he lacked intent to kill. Tison, however, limits the death penalty to cases where the defendant not only displays a reckless disregard for life but has also knowingly engaged in criminal activities known to create a grave risk of death. Thus, a participant in a robbery where someone is accidentally killed would not usually be subject to the death penalty.

After Ring v. Arizona, 536 U.S. 584 (2002), the aggravating factor justifying the death penalty must be found by the jury, beyond a reasonable doubt, not a judge.

CRAIG M. BRADLEY

References and Further Reading

- Bedau, Hugo, ed. The Death Penalty in America: Current Controversies, 1997.
- Rosen, Richard, Felony Murder and the Eighth Amendment Jurisprudence of Death, B.C. Law Review 31 (1990): 1103–1170.
- Roth, Nelson, and Scott Sundby, The Felony Murder Rule: A Doctrine at the Constitutional Crossroads, Cornell Law Review 70 (1985): 446–492.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Coker v. Georgia*, 433 U.S. 584 (1977)
- Enmund v. Florida* 458 U.S. 782 (1982)
- Ring v. Arizona*, 536 U.S. 584 (2002)
- Tison v. Arizona*, 481 U.S. 137 (1987)

See also Capital Punishment; Capital Punishment: History and Politics; Capital Punishment: Eighth Amendment Limits

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT HELD NOT CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT UNDER CERTAIN GUIDELINES

After its finding the death penalty unconstitutional in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), in 1976, the Supreme Court confronted newly enacted death penalty statutes from five states. The cases were Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153; Jurek v. Texas, 428 U.S. 262; Proffitt v. Florida, 428 U.S. 242; Woodson v. North Carolina, 428 U.S. 280; and Roberts v. Louisiana, 428 U.S. 325.

In Gregg, rejecting the argument that the death penalty is inherently cruel and unusual punishment, the Court upheld a death sentence for murder, approving the Georgia system of a bifurcated trial in which the guilt and punishment phases are separate, with the jury hearing additional evidence and argument during the punishment phase. The Georgia statute further set out elements of aggravation, one of which must be found beyond a reasonable doubt for death to be imposed, as well as mitigation, that would allow the defendant to avoid the death penalty. Moreover, the Georgia Supreme Court mandatorily reviewed each death sentence to ensure that it was not disproportionate to sentences imposed in similar cases or otherwise on the basis of arbitrary or prejudicial factors.

Again there was no majority opinion, but a joint opinion by Justices Stewart, Stevens, and Powell expressed the plurality view and was agreed with in most respects by an opinion concurring in the judgment by Justice White, joined by Chief Justice Burger and Justice Rehnquist. Justice Blackmun concurred in the judgment as well.

In Jurek the same seven Justice majority upheld a similar scheme in Texas, and in Proffitt the same Justices upheld a Florida scheme in which the sentence was imposed by a judge. In Woodson and Roberts, however, a joint opinion by Stewart, Stevens, and Powell, with Justices Brennan and Marshall concurring in the judgment, struck down mandatory death sentences as generally unduly harsh and unworkably rigid (Woodson, 428 U.S. at p. 293).

Subsequent to these cases, which reinstated the death penalty and suggested a blueprint for constitutionally acceptable death penalty procedures, the Court has imposed a number of other limitations under the Eighth Amendment. In Coker v. Georgia, 433 U.S. 584 (1977) it rejected the death penalty for the rape of an adult woman as disproportionate to the crime, and in Enmund v. Florida, 458 U.S. 782 (1982) it held that the death penalty was also disproportionate for one who neither killed nor intended to kill the victim. In Lockett v. Ohio, 438 U.S. 586 (1978) it held that the defendant must be allowed to present, as a mitigating factor, any (relevant) aspect of a defendant's character or record and any of the circumstances of the offense that he wishes. Id. at p. 604. In Thompson v. Oklahoma, 487 U.S. 815 (1988), the Court held that the death penalty could not be applied to a person under the age of sixteen. And in Atkins v. Virginia, U.S., 122 S.Ct. 2242 (2002) it likewise exempted the mentally retarded from execution.

CRAIG M. BRADLEY

References and Further Reading

- Gross, Samuel L., The Romance of Revenge: Capital Punishment in America, Studies in Law, Politics and Society 13 (1993): 71–104.
Model Penal Code and Commentaries. Comment to '210.6. Philadelphia: American Law Institute, 1985.

Radin, Margaret, The Jurisprudence of Death: Evolving Standards for the Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause, U. of Pennsylvania Law Review 126 (1978): 989–1064.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Atkins v. Virginia*, U.S., 122 S.Ct. 2242 (2002)
Coker v. Georgia, 433 U.S. 584 (1977)
Enmund v. Florida, 458 U.S. 782 (1982)
Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972)
Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153 (1976)
Jurek v. Texas, 428 U.S. 262 (1976)
Lockett v. Ohio, 438 U.S. 586 (1978)
Proffitt v. Florida, 428 U.S. 242 (1976)
Roberts v. Louisiana, 428 U.S. 325 (1976)
Thompson v. Oklahoma, 487 U.S. 815 (1988)
Woodson v. North Carolina, 428 U.S. 280 (1976)

See also Capital Punishment; Capital Punishment: History and Politics; Capital Punishment: Eighth Amendment Limits

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT REVERSED

In the 1972 case of Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238, the Supreme Court struck down the death penalties of three men. The majority opinion was a brief, unsigned, per curiam (for the Court) simply declaring that The Court holds that the imposition and carrying out of the death penalty in these cases constitute cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. Id. at p. 240. No further elaboration of the Court's reasoning appeared in this opinion.

However, each of the nine Justices wrote a separate opinion explaining the reasons for his agreement (five Justices) or disagreement (four Justices) with the holding. Justice Douglas noted that the death penalty was meted out mostly to the poor young and ignorant. Id. at p. 250, and applied disparately to racial minorities. He concluded that these discretionary (death penalty) statutes are unconstitutional in their operation. They are pregnant with discrimination, and discrimination is an ingredient not compatible with the idea of equal protection of the laws that is implicit in the ban on "cruel and unusual" punishments. Id. at pp. 256–257. He did not consider whether a mandatory death penalty might be constitutional.

Justice Brennan argued that, since the death penalty was being used in only a small percentage of cases in which it was available, and because it was a punishment that did not comport with evolving standards of human dignity, it had become cruel and unusual and therefore was unconstitutional under any circumstances.

Justice Marshall pointed out that the various purposes supposedly served by capital punishment, deterrence, retribution, and so forth, were equally well served by life imprisonment. Id. at p. 359. He further noted that the death penalty had been discriminatorily applied: A total of 3,859 persons have been executed since 1930, of whom 1,751 were white and 2,066 were Negro. Id. at p. 364. He agreed with Brennan that the death penalty should be abolished altogether.

Justice Stewart, like Douglas, did not rule out mandatory death sentences for certain crimes, but as to the cases before the Court he declared, and Justice White agreed:

These death sentences are cruel and unusual in the same way that being struck by lightning is cruel and unusual. For, of all the people convicted of rapes and murders in 1967 and 1968, many just as reprehensible as these, the petitioners are among a capriciously selected random handful upon whom the sentence of death has in fact been imposed (T)he Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments cannot tolerate the infliction of a sentence of death under legal systems that permit this unique penalty to be so wantonly and freakishly imposed. Id. at pp. 309–310.

Thus, with no clear majority either declaring the death penalty flatly unconstitutional or explaining under what circumstances it would be acceptable, the states were left in considerable confusion as to how to proceed. By 1976 at least thirty-five states and the federal government had reenacted either mandatory death penalty statutes or statutes containing guidelines by which the penalty could appropriately be imposed. The Court was soon to decide challenges to these enactments. Capital Punishment Held not Cruel and Unusual Punishment Under Certain Circumstances.

CRAIG M. BRADLEY

References and Further Reading

- Bedau, Hugo, ed. The Death Penalty in America: Current Controversies, 1997.
- Kaplan, John, Robert Weisberg, and Guyora Binder. Capital Murder and the Death Penalty in Criminal Law, Cases and Materials (4th ed.), 509–564. Gaithersburg, NY: Aspen Law and Business, 2000.
- Sellin, Thorsten, ed. Capital Punishment, 1967.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972)

See also Capital Punishment; Capital Punishment: History and Politics; Capital Punishment: Eighth Amendment Limits

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT: ANTITERRORISM AND EFFECTIVE DEATH PENALTY ACT OF 1996

When Congress in the mid-1990s began considering reforms of federal post-conviction review, lawmakers faced an ongoing dilemma about the scope of habeas corpus law. That is, should habeas broadly protect constitutional rights of state prisoners through independent federal review, or should habeas be a narrow and extraordinary remedy that does not interfere with comity, finality, and federalism? Congress adopted the latter approach in the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996 (AEDPA), a response to the April 1995 Oklahoma City bombing and one that quickly served as a vehicle for revamping habeas law and, more specifically, for attempting to ensure swifter, more certain imposition of capital punishment.

Particularly during the Warren Court years, habeas corpus was viewed as a means for explicating constitutional norms and broadly protecting individual rights. Critics of this trend argued that the existing system had become too slow, burdensome, and destructive of important state interests in defining and enforcing the criminal law. A variety of reform proposals died in the 1970s, 1980s, and early 1990s. After Republicans gained working control of Congress in 1995, however, and after the Burger and Rehnquist Courts consistently articulated a more restrictive approach to federal habeas review, Congress used the AEDPA to address its disenchantment with habeas jurisprudence. Although the AEDPA applies to capital and noncapital cases, the legislative debate focused on the effect the reforms would have on death penalty cases.

Congressional supporters of the legislation argued that the existing habeas system allowed death row inmates to abuse the process by repeatedly challenging their convictions and death sentences, indefinitely delaying execution of their sentences. Supporters further claimed that, in reviewing state cases, federal courts were improperly substituting their own judgment for that of the state courts. This system was, therefore, bad for federal-state comity, compromised the value of finality, and demeaned federalism, the healthy balance of authority between the state and federal governments. The AEDPA thus requires federal deference in cases involving state prisoners. In those cases, federal courts may grant the writ only if the state court decision involved an unreasonable application of clearly established Supreme Court precedent, or an unreasonable determination of the facts in light of the evidence presented in the state court. Beginning with (Terry) Williams v. Taylor (2000), a capital case, the Supreme Court has interpreted these provisions to mean that the state court decision must be objectively unreasonable, not merely incorrect. In addition, the AEDPA provides a presumption of correctness for state court fact-findings, restricts a prisoner's ability to obtain a federal evidentiary hearing, and places severe limits on successive habeas petitions. Finally, the law provides "fast-track" procedures for a limited category of capital cases from qualifying jurisdictions.

The AEDPA was, and remains, controversial. Critics say it improperly hinders the federal judiciary's role as arbiter of federal rights, leaving many constitutional violations unchecked. Still, however, supporters contend the reforms have proven helpful in giving States latitude to administer their penal laws—particularly their systems of capital punishment—with minimal federal judicial interference.

J. RICHARD BROUGHTON

References and Further Reading

- Broughton, J. Richard, Habeas Corpus and the Safeguards of Federalism, Georgetown Journal of Law & Public Policy 2 (2004): 1:109–168.
- Lee, Evan Tsen, Section 2254(d) of the New Habeas Statute: An (Opinionated) User's Manual, Vanderbilt Law Review 51 (1998): 1:103–137.
- Yackle, Larry W., A Primer on the New Habeas Corpus Statute, Buffalo Law Review 44 (1996): 2:381–449.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- (Terry) Williams v. Taylor, 529 U.S. 362 (2000)
- Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996, Pub.L. No. 104-132, 110 Stat. 1217, 1220 (1996), codified at 28 U.S.C. §2244 et seq. (2000)

See also Habeas Corpus: Modern History

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT: DUE PROCESS LIMITS

The Due Process Clauses in the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to the U. S. Constitution have played an important role in efforts to promote fairness in the use of capital punishment. Principles derived from the Eighth Amendment provide the central limitations on the use of the death penalty. However, the Eighth Amendment rules apply in state courts, where most capital prosecutions occur, only because the Supreme Court has deemed them incorporated through the Due Process Clause in the Fourteenth Amendment. Moreover, the Supreme Court has relied on principles of free-standing due process to provide additional special protections in capital cases, and the mandates of due process that apply in all criminal cases also limit capital prosecutions.

From the time of the American founding through the middle of the twentieth century, the notion of in favorem vitae ("in favor of life") often moved courts to take extra precautions to promote fairness in capital prosecutions. Concern about the severity of capital punishment manifested itself in many ways by trial judges administering individual capital trials and by appellate courts reviewing capital convictions. Courts frequently interpreted statutes imposing the death penalty literally and strictly so as to avoid their application. Courts also showed special concern for the procedural rights of capital defendants, sometimes justifying this concern openly on the special nature of the death penalty.

In the modern era, the central legal assault on the death penalty has focused on its arbitrary and discriminatory imposition, and the Supreme Court has relied for a remedy on the prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment in the Eighth Amendment, which then applies against the states as a matter of due process. Reform-minded lawyers argued before the Supreme Court in McGautha v. California, 402 U.S. 183 (1971), that the then-prevailing practice of submitting the capital sentencing decision to the largely unrestricted discretion of a jury violated principles of free-standing due process. However, the Supreme Court rejected the challenge in an opinion concluding that the articulation of appropriate standards to guide capital sentencers was impossible and that jurors confronted with the capital sentencing decision would generally act appropriately. Nonetheless, the following year, in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), the Court rejected standardless capital sentencing under the Eighth Amendment, concluding that the potential for arbitrariness rendered death sentences imposed under standardless systems cruel and unusual. The Court also later judged revised capital-sentencing statutes under the Eighth Amendment, upholding several that provided for a sentencing hearing with standards while rejecting others that mandated the death penalty on conviction. Most of the modern doctrine regulating capital sentencing proceedings also builds on this Eighth Amendment grounding, with due process operating only as the means of incorporating the rulings against the states.

While relying primarily on the Eighth Amendment to address arbitrariness, the Supreme Court has occasionally turned to general notions of due process to promote other forms of fairness in capital prosecutions. Some of the due process decisions that provide special protection to capital defendants have focused on the provision of notice and an opportunity to be heard at the capital sentencing trial. For example, in Gardner v. Florida, 430 U.S. 349 (1977), the Court reversed a death sentence where the sentencing judge had relied in part on a section of a sentencing report that had been kept confidential from the defense. Likewise, in Lankford v. Idaho, 500 U.S. 110 (1991), the Court reversed a death sentence where it seemed that the defense had not been adequately notified before the sentencing trial that the death penalty was being considered as a possible punishment.

Decisions that impose special protections in capital cases have also focused on a variety of other issues. For example, in Green v. Georgia, 442 U.S. 95 (1979), the Court held that a state could not appropriately object on hearsay grounds to the introduction at a capital sentencing trial of a codefendant's statement that the defendant had not been present when the victim was killed, where the state had previously introduced the same statement against the codefendant to obtain a death sentence at the codefendant's separate trial. Likewise, in Beck v. Alabama, 447 U.S. 625 (1980), the Court held that a state could not impose a death sentence when the jury at the guilt-or-innocence trial was not permitted to consider a verdict of guilt of a lesser included noncapital offense, although the evidence would have supported such a verdict. Further, in Turner v. Murray, 476 U.S. 28 (1986), the Court held that due process guaranteed a black capital defendant accused of killing a white person the opportunity to question potential sentencing jurors about their racial biases, although the interracial nature of the crime would not alone have triggered such a right in a noncapital case.

Principles of due process that apply in all criminal cases, of course, also protect capital defendants. Long ago, in Brown v. Mississippi, 297 U.S. 278 (1936), the Court reversed a capital conviction where the state was allowed to introduce the defendant's "involuntary" confession. Likewise, in Ake v. Oklahoma, 470 U.S. 68 (1985), the Supreme Court overturned a capital conviction because the state had denied an indigent defendant the assistance of a court-appointed psychiatrist to help prepare and present his defense at both the guilt-or-innocence and sentencing trials. Also, in Kyles v. Whitley, 514 U.S. 419 (1995), the Court set aside a capital conviction where the prosecution had failed to disclose before trial evidence in its possession that was material and favorable to the defense. Furthermore, in Cooper v. Oklahoma, 517 U.S. 348 (1996), the Court reversed a capital conviction where the state required the accused to prove his incompetence to stand trial by a standard of proof greater than a preponderance of the evidence. While these kinds of general due process rulings apply in all criminal cases, the Supreme Court has often first announced them in capital prosecutions, which underscores their role in regulating the use of the death penalty.

SCOTT W. HOWE

References and Further Reading

- Israel, Jerold H., Free-Standing Due Process and Criminal Procedure: The Supreme Court's Search for Interpretive Guidelines, St. Louis University Law Journal 45 (2001): 303-432.
- Steiker, Carol S., and Jordan M. Steiker, Sober Second Thoughts: Reflections on Two Decades of Constitutional Regulation of Capital Punishment, Harvard Law Review 109 (1995): 355-438.
- Thurschwell, Adam. "Federal Courts, the Death Penalty, and the Due Process Clause: The Original Understanding of the 'Heightened Reliability' of Capital Trials." Federal Sentencing Reporter 14 (2002): 14-36.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Ake v. Oklahoma*, 470 U.S. 68 (1985)
- Beck v. Alabama*, 447 U.S. 625 (1980)
- Brown v. Mississippi*, 297 U.S. 278 (1936)
- Cooper v. Oklahoma*, 517 U.S. 348 (1996)
- Furman v. Georgia*, 408 U.S. 238 (1972) (per curiam)
- Gardner v. Florida*, 430 U.S. 349 (1977)
- Green v. Georgia*, 442 U.S. 95 (1979)
- Kyles v. Whitley*, 514 U.S. 419 (1995)
- Lankford v. Idaho*, 500 U.S. 110 (1991)
- McGautha v. California*, 402 U.S. 183 (1971)
- Turner v. Murray*, 476 U.S. 28 (1986)

See also Capital Punishment: Eighth Amendment Limits; McGautha v. California, 402 U.S. 183 (1971)

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT: EIGHTH AMENDMENT LIMITS

The U. S. Supreme Court has interpreted the prohibition on "cruel and unusual punishments" in the Eighth Amendment to regulate but not forbid the use of capital punishment. The prohibition applies directly against the federal government and against the states through the Due Process Clause in the Fourteenth Amendment. The prohibition restricts the use of capital punishment in three ways. First, it limits execution methods. Second, it proscribes the death penalty for certain classes of offenders and crimes. Finally, it requires that states take steps to limit arbitrariness in the process for selecting the persons who will receive death sentences.

Limits on Execution Methods

Supreme Court decisions offer only general guidance regarding permissible execution methods. The Court has said little about these questions since In re Kemmler, 136 U.S. 436 (1890). Although authorizing electrocution, the Kemmler opinion implied that the Eighth Amendment proscribes not only certain barbarous execution methods that were prohibited at the time of the founding but any method that involves the wanton infliction of pain beyond that justified to extinguish life. In the last century, states have used various forms of execution, including hanging, shooting, gassing, electrocution, and lethal injection. All of these methods have usually been upheld by lower courts. In Louisiana ex rel Francis v. Resweber, 329 U.S. 459 (1947), the Supreme Court also upheld a second death warrant after the electric charge in a prior electrocution attempt failed to kill the inmate. However, since the 1970s, a few opinions of lower courts or of certain Justices dissenting from a Supreme Court denial of review have concluded that some of the methods, particularly hanging, gassing, and electrocution, are always or at least sometimes cruel and unusual. Disagreement remains over precisely how to analyze such claims. Nonetheless, in the modern era, these questions have eluded resolution by the Supreme Court, in part, because states faced with serious challenges have responded by making lethal injection the sole form of execution or an optional form at the request of the inmate. Although the level of physical pain involved will depend on the chemicals and method used, lethal injection is now generally regarded as the most humane execution method. Indeed, lethal injection became the accepted form of execution by the end of the twentieth century.

Prohibitions on the Use of the Death Penalty

The Supreme Court has derived a “disproportionality” principle from the Eighth Amendment that restricts the use of the death penalty mostly to certain murder cases. The disproportionality notion contemplates that a particular punishment can be excessive in application although it is not proscribed altogether. The Supreme Court first articulated this idea in Weems v. United States, 217 U.S. 349 (1910), a non-capital case in which the Justices struck down as excessively harsh for a relatively minor crime a sentence involving twelve years of hard labor and other forfeitures of civil rights. The Supreme Court used the idea in Coker v. Georgia, 433 U.S. 584 (1977), to hold the death penalty categorically impermissible for the rape of an adult woman where no life was taken, and this prohibition has also been applied to other typical, nonhomicidal felonies. The Coker conclusion ultimately reflected a value judgment by the Court that the death penalty was too much retribution for Coker’s crime, although the Justices also pointed to objective evidence that the death penalty was only rarely imposed in the relevant context. Since Coker, the Court has also outlawed the penalty for felony-murder accomplices who are not otherwise highly blameworthy, for the retarded, for previously death-sentenced inmates who are insane, and to those who were juveniles at the time of their crime. The Court has not addressed whether the disproportionality principle forbids the death penalty for treason or similarly serious nonmurder crimes.

Protections against Arbitrariness

The most famous line of Supreme Court cases applying the Eighth Amendment to capital punishment focuses on protections against arbitrariness. These decisions started with Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972) (per curiam), where the Court struck down the then-prevailing approach of submitting the capital sentencing decision to a jury’s largely unfettered discretion. After Furman, many states quickly passed new death-penalty legislation, and the Supreme Court subsequently concluded that certain procedural protections could satisfy the Eighth Amendment. In a famous quintet of cases decided in 1976, including Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153 (1976) (plurality opinion), the Supreme Court struck down statutes from North Carolina and Louisiana that mandated the death penalty on conviction, but it upheld statutes from Georgia, Florida, and Texas that provided for a separate sentencing hearing with at least some standards to limit the capital sentencer’s discretion.

Two principal doctrines of capital sentencing grow out of the 1976 cases. First, in rejecting the mandatory statutes, the Court concluded that capital defendants are entitled to “individualized consideration” on the sentencing question. The Court distinguished noncapital cases, where mandatory sentencing is permitted, on grounds that the unique severity and finality of the death penalty call for heightened reliability. The Court later amplified on the mandate of individualized consideration in Lockett v. Ohio, 438 U.S. 586 (1978) (plurality opinion), holding that a capital sentencer must be free to vote against the death penalty on the basis of any evidence that the offender offers concerning his character, record, or crime.

The Court also stated in the 1976 cases that capital sentencers require guidance but soon modified this idea in Zant v. Stephens, 462 U.S. 862 (1983), to require only a narrowing of the death-eligible group. States have met the narrowing mandate by simply requiring the capital sentencer to find the presence of at least one “aggravating” factor from a statutory list before going on to consider mitigating circumstances at a final stage at which its discretion to reject the death penalty is essentially unfettered.

After Furman, efforts to attack capital sentences using statistical evidence of arbitrariness have failed. In McCleskey v. Kemp, 481 U.S. 279 (1987), the Supreme Court rejected a challenge to Georgia’s post-Furman capital-selection system that relied on a sophisticated, statistical study finding racial bias. The Court questioned whether the study adequately proved racial bias but concluded, in any event, that compliance with procedural rules satisfied the Eighth Amendment.

SCOTT W. HOWE

References and Further Reading

- Denno, Deborah. “Execution and the Forgotten Eighth Amendment” In America’s Experiment With Capital Punishment, edited by James R. Acker, Robert M. Bohm, and Charles S. Lanier, 547–577. Durham, North Carolina: Carolina Academic Press, 1998.
- Howe, Scott W., The Failed Case for Eighth Amendment Regulation of the Capital Sentencing Trial, University of Pennsylvania Law Review 146 (1998): 795–863.
- Mortenson, Julian Davis, Earning the Right to be Retributive: Execution Methods, Culpability Theory, and the Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause, Iowa Law Review 88 (2003): 1099–1163.
- White, Welsh S. The Death Penalty in the Nineties. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1991.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Coker v. Georgia*, 433 U.S. 584 (1977)
- Furman v. Georgia*, 408 U.S. 238 (1972) (per curiam)
- In re Kemmler*, 136 U.S. 436 (1890)
- Lockett v. Ohio*, 438 U.S. 586 (1978) (plurality opinion)
- Louisiana ex rel Francis v. Resweber*, 329 U.S. 459 (1947)
- McCleskey v. Kemp*, 481 U.S. 279 (1987)
- Weems v. United States*, 217 U.S. 349 (1910)
- Zant v. Stephens*, 462 U.S. 862 (1983)

See also Capital Punishment; Capital Punishment and the Equal Protection Clause Cases; Capital Punishment: Due Process Limits; Capital Punishment: History and Politics; Capital Punishment Reversed; Capital Punishment and Race Discrimination

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT: EXECUTION OF INNOCENTS

Until recent years, the execution of innocents was mostly an abstract debate. Although abolitionists would point to a handful of cases where innocent individuals allegedly had been put to death, capital punishment supporters dismissed these examples and rejected the notion of wrongful execution as a mere theoretical possibility. Moreover, the U.S. Supreme Court’s seminal decision in this area, the 1993 case of Herrera v. Collins, held that a free-standing claim of actual innocence was not a basis for federal habeas corpus review in a death penalty case. Throughout most of the modern era of capital punishment, the bulk of discussion involved issues apart from wrongful conviction, such as racial disparities in the death penalty.

Around the time of the Herrera decision, a budding innocence movement began to take shape, largely as a result of advances in DNA technology. In 1992, Barry Scheck and Peter Neufeld started the Innocence Project at Cardozo Law School to investigate possible cases of wrongful conviction, and similar programs were initiated across the nation. But it would take a string of events in Illinois to draw public attention to the issue of actual innocence in capital punishment, beginning with a 1998 conference at Northwestern University that brought together scholars, practitioners, and a number of exonerated former death row inmates. Shortly after the conference, Lawrence Marshall and others helped secure the release of Anthony Porter, a wrongfully convicted man who came within two days of execution. In turn, the Chicago Tribune published a series of articles describing grave flaws in Illinois’s capital punishment system. Since the reinstatement of the death penalty in 1976, the state had executed twelve individuals, whereas thirteen of its death row inmates had been exonerated. In 2000, Illinois Governor George Ryan declared a moratorium on capital punishment on the basis of this information, and three years later Ryan commuted all remaining death sentences.

According to some sources, the modern era of capital punishment has witnessed the release of more than 100 individuals based on evidence of innocence. Leading causes of wrongful conviction include erroneous witness identifications, police or prosecutor misconduct, defective or “junk” science, false confessions, poor legal representation, and dishonest informants. In light of these problems, several states and the federal government have instituted studies of their capital punishment systems, and a number of reforms have been proposed, such as required videotaping of police interrogations and legislation providing post-conviction access to DNA testing. Most recently, the U.S. Supreme Court agreed to hear the case of Paul House, a death row inmate whose case was described by one judge as “a real-life murder mystery, an authentic ‘who-done-it’ where the wrong man may be executed.”

Supporters of capital punishment still contend that no demonstrably innocent individual has been executed in the modern era, that few if any innocents remain or will be placed on death row, and that the minimal risk of wrongful execution is outweighed by the retributive and utilitarian benefits of the death penalty. Nonetheless, the issue of actual innocence has become central to today’s debate over capital punishment in America.

ERIK LUNA

References and Further Reading

- Armstrong, Ken, and Steve Mills. “The Failure of the Death Penalty in Illinois.” Chicago Tribune (November 14–18, 1999).
- Bedau, Hugo Adam, and Michael L. Radelet, Miscarriages of Justice in Potentially Capital Cases, Stanford Law Review 40 (1987): 21–179.
- Center on Wrongful Convictions. Web site available at <http://www.law.northwestern.edu/wrongfulconvictions>.
- Dwyer, Jim, Peter Neufeld, and Barry Scheck. Actual Innocence: Five Days to Execution and Other Dispatches from the Wrongly Convicted. New York: Doubleday, 2000.
- Godsey, Mark A., and Thomas Pulley, The Innocence Revolution and our “Evolving Standards of Decency” in Death Penalty Jurisprudence, University of Dayton Law Review 29 (2004): 265–292.
- Innocence Project. Web site available at <http://www.innocenceproject.org>.
- Liebman, James S., et al., Capital Attrition: Error Rates in Capital Cases, 1973–1995, Texas Law Review 78 (2000): 1839–1865.
- Markman, Stephen J., and Paul G. Cassell, Protecting the Innocent: A Response to the Bedau-Radelet Study, Stanford Law Review 41 (1988): 121–160.
- Marshall, Lawrence C., The Innocence Revolution and the Death Penalty, Ohio State Journal of Criminal Law 1 (2004): 573–584.
- Radelet, Michael L., Hugo Adam Bedau, and Constance E. Putnam. In Spire of Innocence: Erroneous Convictions in Capital Cases. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1992.
- Rosen, Richard A., Innocence and Death, North Carolina Law Review 82 (2003): 61–113.
- Symposium: Innocence in Capital Sentencing. Journal of Criminal Law & Criminology 95 (2005): 371–636.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Herrera v. Collins*, 506 U.S. 390 (1993)
- House v. Bell*, 386 F.3d 668 (6th Cir. 2004), cert. granted, 125 S.Ct. 2991 (U.S. Jun 28, 2005) (No. 04-8990)
- Schlup v. Delo*, 513 U.S. 298 (1995)

See also Capital Punishment; DNA and Innocence; Eyewitness Identification; False Confessions; Herrera v. Collins, 506 U.S. 390 (1993); Pardon and Commutation

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT: HISTORY AND POLITICS

It will be useful to examine this topic by examining six eras of American history.

The Colonial Era

Almost all the American Colonies were established by England, and English penal law was naturally transported across the Atlantic. English law contained many capital offenses, all of which had a Biblical basis, although most also had a pragmatic basis in the protection of person and property. The first of the estimated more than 20,000 executions in American history took place almost as soon as colonization began—in 1608 in Jamestown. Part of the reason for the existence of the death penalty at the outset of colonial history was the absence of any other severe sanction. The idea of prisons for long-term incarceration had not yet been conceived.

Despite the common English influence, there were significant variations among the colonies concerning capital punishment. On one end of the spectrum stood two colonies strongly influenced by Quaker beliefs: West Jersey had no capital offenses, and Pennsylvania levied the ultimate sanction only for murder and treason. On the other end of the spectrum was Virginia, which authorized capital punishment for many of the same crimes (sometimes petty) as in England. And Puritan-influenced colonies like Massachusetts mandated capital punishment for crimes like adultery, sodomy, bestiality, witchcraft, and blasphemy. On average, the colonies each had about ten crimes at any given time for which death was the prescribed sanction, always including murder, and usually including rape, robbery, and arson.

The very early days of colonization manifested a trend that has continued throughout American history: the death penalty was much more prevalent in the South. This was largely due to the influence of slavery. As early as the 1600s southern colonies enacted Slave Codes to suppress any hint of revolt. Those codes prescribed the death penalty for many crimes for slaves that were not so punishable if committed by others.

The first significant abolitionist argument was put forth by Italian lawyer Cesare Beccaria in the 1763 essay On Crimes and Punishments. This tract was part of the Enlightenment movement in Europe that was inspired by scientific advances to attempt to supplant traditional Christian dogma with more rationalist discourse. Beccaria argued for extended incarceration with hard labor in lieu of death. The essay was translated into English in 1767 and became influential in America to some of the intellectual elite who were at the forefront of the American Revolution.

From the American Revolution to the Civil War

Among those influenced by Beccaria was Thomas Jefferson, who advocated scaling back severely on the use of capital punishment. Also influenced was Dr. Benjamin Rush, a Philadelphia physician who signed the Declaration of Independence, and who, through a tract written in 1787, became the first vocal abolitionist in the new country. Rush was an advocate for the new penitentiary movement, which aimed to reform criminals in an institutional setting. This movement was a manifestation of the Enlightenment, and its primary spokesperson was English rationalist philosopher Jeremy Bentham, who wrote extensively and in detail about how penitentiaries could secure the greatest happiness for the greatest number in society.

An important gain for abolitionists came in 1794 when Pennsylvania divided murder into two degrees, with only first-degree murder punishable by death. This measure was a compromise between the still-influential Quakers, who would have abolished capital punishment, and retentionist forces. Many other states soon embraced the division of murder into degrees.

By the first decade of the 1800s, the bloom of optimism about penitentiaries had wilted in the light of endemic bad administration and rampant recidivism. Thus, capital punishment continued unabated until the 1840s. Then a tide of abolitionism crested, fueled by religious liberals of Unitarian, Universalist, and Quaker beliefs and rationalist social reformers. This movement was closely affiliated with antislavery activism, since it was clear that capital punishment was inextricably intertwined in the South with the institution of slavery. In 1847, Michigan became the first English-speaking jurisdiction to effectively and permanently (so far) abolish capital punishment, followed by Rhode Island in 1852, and Wisconsin in 1853. However, by the 1850s, social activists began to direct most of their efforts against what they saw as the greatest evil afflicting the country: slavery. Then the Civil War supplanted everything else as a matter of national interest. The movement to abolish the death penalty would not become a major force again until the end of the century.

Two additional important developments occurred in the mid-1800s. First, from colonial days, executions had been carried out in public. But public executions sometimes led to rowdy behavior and even riots. So in 1834, Pennsylvania became the first state to execute a prisoner outside public view. This idea was quickly adopted by most other jurisdictions, although the trend would not completely prevail for a century—the last public execution was conducted in the mid-1930s.

The other important development during this era was according jurors sentencing discretion. Until 1841, juries were not called on to render a sentencing verdict—the mandatory penalty on conviction of a capital offense was death. But in 1841, both Tennessee and Alabama bestowed on the jury the power to choose between a death sentence and an alternative prison sentence. The motivation behind this change is obscure: the best guess is that it was designed to permit jurors to discriminate between black and white defendants. Whatever the reason, this idea was also adopted by many jurisdictions, although mandatory death sentencing for some crimes continued in some states until this practice was struck down by the Supreme Court in 1976.

From the Civil War to World War I

Abolitionist sentiment lay largely dormant as the country struggled through the Civil War and Reconstruction. But around the turn of the century, the movement sprang back to life as part of the Progressive agenda.

By this era, it had become clear that there were two separate streams feeding the abolitionist movement, one religious and the other philosophical. Religiously, the movement was originally supported by “liberal” Christians who valued grace over judgment, and they have continued to be a strong force in the movement to the present. On the other hand, many “conservative” Christians supported capital punishment as legitimated by the Bible and continue that support to the present.

Philosophically, humanists, who believed flourishing of persons was the highest good, objected to the extinguishment of any human life. These reformers, too, have continued to be a strong force in the movement. These abolitionists fall on the “liberal” end of the political spectrum and often believe that life circumstances severely constrain the choices available to those who commit crimes; thus, full-scale responsibility is diluted to the point that these persons cannot deserve a punishment as severe as death. On the other side of the coin, political “conservatives” believe strongly in free will, and thus believe very bad criminals deserve very harsh punishment, which can include the death penalty.

The turn-of-the-century abolitionist movement bore fruit with abolition in nine states between 1907 and 1917. However, the Progressive movement was derailed by World War I, and by 1920 five of the nine states that had abolished the penalty had reinstated it (and two others reinstated it in the 1930s—only in Minnesota and North Dakota has abolition “stuck” until the present).

One important development during this era was the movement to alternatives to hanging as the method of execution. Hanging had proven to be an inexact science that too often resulted in suffering for the condemned, and vicarious suffering for the witnesses. Thus, in 1888, New York became the first jurisdiction to adopt the newly developed electric chair for executions. Fifteen states had followed suit by 1913 and many more by 1950, although hanging and the firing squad persisted in a couple of states.

From World War I to 1957

The abolitionist movement experienced a four-decade period of relative dormancy after World War I. The most likely explanation is that world events—the economic boom of the 1920s, the Great Depression of the 1930s with its concomitant fear of crime, the Second World War and its aftermath, and the Cold War, simply drew attention and energy away from the death penalty issue. With relatively little public attention or protest, more than 5,000 people were executed during this period. (Of course, illegal lynchings, particularly of blacks, accounted for many additional deaths—indeed, it is estimated that in some years illegal lynchings outnumbered legal executions.) The year 1935 constituted the peak year in American history for legal executions, with 199. Still, the execution rate per capita, and per homicide, declined steadily over these four decades.

The search continued for a more humane method of execution. In 1923, Nevada opted for the newly devised gas chamber as a superior alternative to either hanging or electrocution, and thereafter about a dozen other states did likewise.

1957–1976

Beginning in 1957, the moribund abolitionist movement began to gather steam. The abolitionist movement experienced its first lasting successes since North Dakota abolished capital punishment forty-two years earlier: the Territories of Alaska and Hawaii abolished capital punishment shortly before they became states (Delaware abolished in 1958 but reinstated in 1961). Then in 1959, French philosopher Albert Camus wrote an influential polemic against the death penalty, and criminologist Thorsten Sellin published an empirical analysis in which he concluded that the death penalty had no deterrent effect above lengthy imprisonment. In 1960, the execution in California of Caryl Chessman brought the death penalty issue into high focus. Chessman had been sentenced to death for kidnapping but managed by various legal maneuvers to postpone his execution for eleven years, during which time he wrote several best-selling books from death row. Also, the country was experiencing relatively low crime rates. Meanwhile, the pace of executions slowed to a crawl, in large part because appellate review of death penalty cases was becoming relatively routine.

In the mid-1960s, death penalty opponents succeeded in effecting repeal in Iowa and West Virginia. But they also broadened their focus beyond state legislatures, where they had experienced only spotty success, to the courts. In a dissent in Rudolph v. Alabama (1963), Supreme Court Justice Arthur Goldberg hinted that more than one Justice was ready to hear arguments against the death penalty on constitutional grounds. In about 1966, the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) and the Legal Defense Fund (LDF) of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) decided to bring court challenges to the death penalty. This coincided with the lowest ebb of American public sentiment in support of the death penalty—a mere forty-two percent in a 1966 Gallup Poll. (Ironically, this turned out to be a brief anomaly—by 1967, as the media was filled with news of a suddenly skyrocketing crime rate, “The Boston Strangler” [Albert DeSalvo] who killed at least thirteen women, and Richard Speck, who murdered eight student nurses in Chicago—death penalty support rose to fifty-three percent and continued climbing another twenty-five percent over the next three decades.)

The LDF decided in 1967 to provide representation to every death-sentenced inmate who had an execution date. This strategy soon tied up virtually every death penalty case that was approaching execution in constitutional challenges. An unofficial death penalty moratorium was affected.

The abolitionists' first major Supreme Court victory came in Witherspoon v. Illinois (1968). Professor/litigator Anthony Amsterdam on behalf the LDF convinced the Court that it was unconstitutional to permit the prosecution to strike every potential juror who expressed any scruples against the death penalty.

The retentionists had their day in the sun, though, in a pair of cases, McGautha v. California and Crampton v. Ohio (1971), in which the Court held that due process did not preclude giving juries unguided discretion to impose the sentence nor did it bar unitary trials in which the issues of guilt and punishment were tried together. Since these were two of the primary abolitionist challenges, the prospect for a major abolitionist victory that would stop capital punishment in its tracks seemed dim.

Yet in the next term, the Court agreed to hear essentially the same challenges but founded on the Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause of the Eighth Amendment, rather than the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. And in a surprise decision in Furman v. Georgia (1972), the Court in a five to four vote held that the death penalty was so unpredictably administered that it violated the Eighth Amendment. The decision had the effect of invalidating the death sentences of every one of the more than 600 prisoners then under death sentences across the country and leaving no state with a constitutional death penalty scheme.

The Court had not held, though, that the death penalty was per se unconstitutional, only that it was not being assessed fairly. This left open the possibility that states could write new legislation that would pass constitutional muster. Many state legislatures hastened to do just that as the opinion polls showed support for capital punishment by far more than half of those polled.

Abolitionists challenged these new statutes, and in 1976 the Court decided that the Georgia statute defining death-eligible crimes via aggravating circumstances and providing for separate guilt/innocence and penalty determinations was constitutional in Gregg v. Georgia and so was the Texas statute defining a limited category of death-eligible crimes with a death sentence required if the jury found specified additional facts in Jurek v. Texas; but that the North Carolina and Louisiana statutes that made death the mandatory sentence for conviction of certain specified kinds of murder were held unconstitutional in Woodson v. North Carolina and Roberts v. Louisiana. The Supreme Court was now in the thick of the death penalty battle, where it has remained.

1976 to the Present

The highlights of Supreme Court death penalty jurisprudence after 1976 were that: (1) the death penalty was disproportionate to serious felonies other than murder—Coker v. Georgia (1977); (2) defendants must be permitted to present mitigating evidence on any aspect of their character, record, or the circumstances of the offense at the penalty phase—Lockett v. Ohio (1978); (3) the common “heinous, atrocious, or cruel” aggravating circumstance was unconstitutionally vague—Godfrey v. Georgia (1980); (4) competence of defense counsel was not judged by any higher standard in death penalty cases—Strickland v. Washington (1984); (5) even strong statistical evidence was insufficient to prove that the death penalty was administered in a racially biased manner—McCleskey v. Kemp (1987); (6) felony murderers who did not personally kill the victim could still be death-eligible if they acted with extreme reckless indifference to human life—Tison v. Arizona (1987); (7) that defendants must have been sixteen or older when they committed their crimes to be death-eligible—Stanford v. Kentucky (1989); and (8) mentally retarded offenders were not death-eligible—Atkins v. Virginia (2002).

Although abolitionists had significant, if mixed, success in the courts, they made little progress in legislatures during this era. Only one state abolished the penalty (Massachusetts), whereas four restored it (Kansas, New York, Oregon, and South Dakota). Furthermore, the federal government vastly expanded the list of federal death offenses, even though the number of federal death penalty cases remained a small slice of the death penalty pie. Public sentiment remained in the range of sixty-five percent to eighty percent support when asked a standard polling question like, “Do you approve of the death penalty for murder?” This figure overstated solid support, though, because when asked an alternative question like, “Do you prefer life without parole instead of the death penalty for murder?” support often slipped by more than twenty percentage points. Nonetheless, politicians during the 1970s through the present sensed that it was the kiss of death to oppose the death penalty, and even many Democrats, like Bill Clinton, gave it lip service.

In the late 1990s, though, the abolitionist forces found a fulcrum that seemed to move public opinion—the possibility of executing innocent persons. This issue came into stark relief in Illinois. There, journalism students showed that several convicts on death row were, in fact, innocent. Indeed, as many convicts had been released from death row for innocence as had been executed since the reinstatement of capital punishment after Furman. This prompted Governor George Ryan to impose a moratorium on executions and in 2002 to commute the sentences of all of the more than 160 death-sentenced inmates on the ground that the system under which they were convicted was intolerably riddled with error. The innocence issue, though, had the potential to be a bittersweet one for abolitionists: it seems perhaps more likely to lead to death penalty system reforms than to complete abolition.

During this era, as in all past eras, the death penalty continued to show great variation along regional lines. The vast bulk of executions occurred in the South, with Texas leading the way by a wide margin.

The search for a more humane mode of execution continued during this era. Lethal injection, developed in the 1970s, almost completely displaced other modes of execution.

Executions slowly increased, but court challenges to virtually every death sentence often resulted in reversals. Even for those inmates whose convictions and sentences were upheld, the average time from conviction to execution increased in many states to more than ten years. In the meantime, far more defendants were being sentenced to death than were being executed, so the population of death rows across the country increased to well over 3,000, even as the task of providing legal representation to the condemned became ever more daunting. Still capital punishment seemed firmly entrenched in the United States, particularly in certain regions of the country.

DAVID McCORD

References and Further Reading

- Banner, Stuart. The Death Penalty: An American History. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2002.
- Bedau, Hugo Adam. "Background and Developments" In The Death Penalty in America: Current Controversies, edited by Hugo Adam Bedau, 3–25, New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.
- Camus, Albert. Reflections on the Guillotine. Translated by Richard Howard. Michigan City, IN: Fridtjof-Karla, 1959.
- Haines, Herbert H. Against Capital Punishment: The Anti-Death Penalty Movement in America 1972–1994, 1996.
- Kronenwetter, Michael. Capital Punishment: A Reference Handbook (2d ed.). Denver: ABC-CLIO, 2001.
- Rush, Benjamin. "An Enquiry into the Effects of Public Punishments Upon Criminals and Upon Society (1787), reprinted in Capital Punishment in the United States: A Documentary History, edited by Bryan Vila and Cynthia Morris, 20–23, Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1997.

Sellin, Thorsten. The Death Penalty. Philadelphia: The American Law Institute, 1959.

Vila, Bryan, and Cynthia Morris, eds. Capital Punishment in the United States: A Documentary History. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1997.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Atkins v. Virginia*, 536 U.S. 304 (2002)
- Coker v. Georgia*, 433 U.S. 584 (1977)
- Furman v. Georgia*, 408 U.S. 238 (1972)
- Godfrey v. Georgia*, 446 U.S. 420 (1980)
- Gregg v. Georgia*, 428 U.S. 153 (1976)
- Jurek v. Texas*, 428 U.S. 153
- Lockett v. Ohio*, 438 U.S. 586 (1978)
- McCleskey v. Kemp*, 481 U.S. 279 (1987)
- McGautha v. California* and Crampton v. Ohio, 402 U.S. 183 (1971)
- Roberts v. Louisiana*, 428 U.S. 325 (1976)
- Rudolph v. Alabama*, 375 U.S. 889 (1963)
- Stanford v. Kentucky*, 492 U.S. 361 (1989)
- Strickland v. Washington*, 466 U.S. 668 (1984)
- Tison v. Arizona*, 481 U.S. 137 (1987)
- Witherspoon v. Illinois*, 391 U.S. 510 (1968)
- Woodson v. North Carolina*, 428 U.S. 280 (1976)

See also Capital Punishment; Capital Punishment and the Equal Protection Clause Cases; Capital Punishment: Due Process Limits; Capital Punishment: History and Politics; Capital Punishment Reversed; Capital Punishment and Race Discrimination; Capital Punishment: Eighth Amendment Limits

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT: LYNCHING

Lynching has a long history in the United States, beginning at least around the time of the Revolutionary War. The term "lynching" comes from the practices of Charles Lynch, a Virginia Justice of the Peace who, during the Revolutionary War, helped establish informal courts for the trial and punishment of individuals suspected of engaging in criminal behavior. While lynching originally was associated with imposition of physical punishment for suspected criminal or immoral behavior, since the mid-to-late 1800s, lynching has been understood to mean execution by a group of persons without legal authority for the purpose of punishing a crime or enforcing moral or social standards. Those who engaged in lynching acted outside the legal process to achieve what they claimed was public justice. The so-called "lynch mobs" generally claimed to be acting on behalf of the community, justifying their actions as a necessary means of keeping the peace and promoting moral behavior. It is believed that lynching was committed with the tacit support of the community, and sometimes with the tacit support of the government.

What began as an effort to promote public justice and maintain order eventually became a means of promoting more private goals, such as political and economic gain. For example, vigilante groups formed in the frontier states during the mid 1800s for the avowed purposes of maintaining peace and protecting morals. But these groups eventually engaged in lynching to win political power, as well as the economic benefits that accompany such power. They also used lynching to intimidate or eliminate business competitors.

By the late 1800s, the most common reason for lynching in America was to target and intimidate disfavored racial and ethnic groups. Lynch mobs executed people of many racial and ethnic groups, including African Americans, Native Americans, and Chinese, Japanese, Mexican, and Italian immigrants. Again, political and economic interests played a role, because these lynchings largely were the result of industrial strife and post-Civil War resistance to African-American freedom.

While lynch mobs targeted many racial and ethnic groups, lynching is most commonly associated with the nonlegal execution of African Americans, particularly those living in the South, during and after Reconstruction. Between 1882 and 1968, more than 3,400 African Americans were lynched in the United States. These numbers likely are conservative given that lynchings were not always publicized. Most of the lynchings during the 1882–1968 time period occurred in the South, with Mississippi, Georgia, Texas, Louisiana, and Alabama leading the country in the number of lynchings. Lynching, along with other forms of violence, helped prevent African Americans from fully enjoying economic, social, and political gains after the Civil War.

Lynchings began to decline toward the mid 1900s. By the late 1960s, lynchings had largely subsided, although observers might characterize certain modern-day hate crimes as a type of lynching.

CELESTINE RICHARDS McCONVILLE

References and Further Reading

- Dray, Philip. At the Hands of Persons Unknown, The Lynching of Black America. New York: Random House, 2002.
- DuBois, W. E. B. Black Reconstruction. New York: Russell & Russell, 1935.
- Ifill, Sherrilyn A., Creating a Truth and Reconciliation Commission for Lynching, Law and Inequity: A Journal of Theory and Practice 21 (Summer 2003): 263–311.
- Lynching in America: Statistics, Information, Images. <http://www.law.umkc.edu/faculty/projects/ftrials/shipp/lynchingyear.html> (statistics provided by Tuskegee Institute Archives) (visited January 8, 2004).
- NAACP. Thirty Years of Lynching in the United States: 1889–1918. New York: Arno Press, 1969.

Steelwater, Eliza. The Hangman's Knot, Lynching, Legal Execution, and America's Struggle with the Death Penalty. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 2003.

Tolnay, Stewart E., and E. M. Beck. A Festival of Violence. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1995.

See also Capital Punishment; Capital Punishment and the Equal Protection Clause Cases; Capital Punishment: Due Process Limits; Capital Punishment: History and Politics; Capital Punishment Reversed; Capital Punishment and Race Discrimination; Cross-Burning; Dred Scott v. Sandford, 60 U.S. 393 (1857); Due Process; Hate Crimes; Ku Klux Klan; Segregation; Shepard, Matthew

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT: METHODS OF EXECUTION

Introduction

Jurisdictions with capital punishment use one or more of the following methods to implement the sentence: hanging, firing squad, electrocution, lethal gas, and lethal injection. The Eighth Amendment of the U. S. Constitution bars states from using a method that constitutes Cruel and Unusual Punishment. Lawsuits alleging that the methods violate this federal and state constitutional right have been commenced in both court systems.

Hanging

Hanging has a lengthy history in this country and abroad. It requires attaching one part of a rope to an elevated item, securing the other end of the rope around the person's neck, and suspending the person from the rope. The "short drop" method preceded the "long drop" method. The latter was preferred because the former often resulted in protracted deaths through strangulation. The "long drop" requires constructing a gallows, an edifice with a beam from which the hanging rope is suspended and a floor containing a trap door. A rope treated to eliminate springing is attached to the beam and suspended over the trap door. A noose is created by making a knot in the rope and lubricating it with wax or soap. After ascending the gallows, the condemned's legs are bound and a leather halter is used to secure the arms and hands. Next the person is blindfolded or a hood is placed over his or her head. This is followed by putting the noose around the person's neck and positioning the knot behind the left ear. After the warden signals, the executioner releases the trap door. The weight of the person's body plummeting through the trap door is supposed to cause a rapid fracture and dislocation of the neck, resulting in an instantaneous death. This method's popularity began to wane because of the realization that death often did not occur in this manner. Instead, the person died from strangulation or decapitation. This concern is evidenced by the fact that very few death penalty jurisdictions still authorize using this method and then only if the person selects it or the alternative method is deemed unconstitutional.

Firing Squad

Execution by firing squad also has a lengthy history of being an accepted method of execution. It requires strapping the condemned in a chair that is surrounded by sandbags to absorb the person's blood. Next a target, a white cloth circle, is placed over the person's heart. Then the person is blindfolded or a hood is placed over his or her head. The shooters, positioned behind an enclosure with slots in it exposing the barrels of their rifles, are instructed to shoot at the target. One shooter is not given live ammunition. The firing squad still remains an unpopular method of execution. The few jurisdictions still permitting it also have lethal injection as an alternative method.

Electrocution

Unlike the firing squad, execution by electrocution was once a popular method of execution. Its popularity was partially due to technological advances in the form of the increasing availability of electricity. In 1888, New York became the first death penalty jurisdiction to require that executions be carried out by electrocution rather than by hanging. First, the person is seated in a wooden chair. Leather belts are used to secure the person's chest, groin, legs, and arms. A natural sponge moistened with saline solution is placed on top of the prisoner's shaved head and covered with a metal electrode. Another electrode moistened with conductive jelly is fastened to a shaved area of the prisoner's leg to reduce resistance to the electricity. A hood is usually put over the person's head, and a chin strap secures the head. The electrical current starts flowing through the prisoner's body when the executioner pulls a handle or pushes a button. An alternating current system is usually used. The initial jolt is around 2,000 volts and lasts for three to five seconds. It is followed by a second reduced charge. If a heartbeat is detected, the cycle recommences and continues until the prisoner is dead. Several jurisdictions still authorize this method, but only one mandates it, and the rest allow the condemned to select another method or make electrocution the default method.

Lethal Gas

Technological advances, this time in the field of chemistry, played a role in the adoption of lethal gas as a method of execution. In 1924, Nevada became the first jurisdiction to eliminate hanging and adopt this method. First, the condemned must be securely strapped to a chair in an airtight chamber. Sulfuric acid is put in a dish under the chair. The executioner moves a lever releasing sodium cyanide pellets into the dish. Mixing these two chemicals produces poisonous hydrogen cyanide gas. The person has been instructed to start inhaling deeply when he or she hears the lever fall. Eventually, the person loses consciousness and dies of hypoxia. Lethal gas never reached the same level of popularity as electrocution, and today very few states authorize its use. All these jurisdictions designate lethal injection as the alternative method.

Lethal Injection

In 1977, Oklahoma became the first death penalty jurisdiction to adopt lethal injection as a method of execution. To carry out an execution this way, the condemned person is strapped to a gurney and then several heart monitors are placed on his or her skin. Two needles, one a back up, are inserted into a vein. Tubes are connected to these needles. These tubes run through a hole in a wall leading to a room adjacent to the execution chamber and, depending on which protocol the jurisdiction uses, are attached to two or three drips that intravenously administer the chemicals. If the three chemical process is used, saline is first injected. Once the warden gives the signal, the curtain preventing the witnesses from seeing the condemned is raised. At this point sodium thiopental, a fast-acting anesthetic, is administered. Pavulon or pancuronium bromide is then injected, paralyzing the person and suppressing the respiratory system. Potassium chloride, the last chemical injected, causes the heart to stop beating. Lethal injection is the most common method of execution in the United States.

ROBERTA M. HARDING

References and Further Reading

- Denno, Deborah W., Is Electrocutation an Unconstitutional Method of Execution? The Engineering of Death over the Century, Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 35 (1994): 2:551–692.
- , When Legislatures Delegate Death: The Troubling Paradox Behind States Uses of Electrocutation and Lethal Injection and What It Says About Us, Ohio St. L. J. 63 (2002): 1:63–260.
- Essig, Mark. Edison & the Electric Chair: A Story of Light and Death. New York: Walker & Company, 2003.
- Gatrell, V. A. C. The Hanging Tree: Execution and the English People 1770–1868. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1994.
- Harding, Roberta M., The Gallows to the Gurney: Analyzing the Un(Constitutionality) of the Methods of Execution, Boston Univ. Pub. Int. L. J. 6 (1996): 1:153–178.
- Moran, Richard. Executioner's Current: Thomas Edison, George Westinghouse, and the Invention of the Electric Chair. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 2003.

See also Capital Punishment; Capital Punishment: Eighth Amendment Limits; Cruel and Unusual Punishment (VIII); Cruel and Unusual Punishment Generally; Electric Chair as Cruel and Unusual Punishment

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT: PROPORTIONALITY

Proportionality in principle justifies, limits, or condemns capital punishment. That deeply held common value—that punishment must not be grossly disproportionate to the crime—dominates U.S. Supreme Court jurisprudence.

When the Court struck down the death penalty (five to four) in Furman v. Georgia (1972), Justices Brennan and Marshall held capital punishment per se cruel and unconstitutional. For these and like-minded absolutist opponents, death as punishment is an inhumane, morally disproportionate response to any crime, no matter how heinous. Other death penalty opponents may concede that sadistic mass murdering rapists do deserve to die. “Abstractly,” the punishment of death may fit that crime. But, they insist, history proves that government can never be trusted to kill proportionately.

In Furman, three Justices of the five who concurred found the death penalty only unconstitutional, because it was “freakishly imposed”. As then administered, the death penalty was “like being struck by lightning” (Stewart), applied chaotically to a

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT: PROPORTIONALITY

“capriciously selected, random handful”—in no proportion and thus cruel and unusual punishment. Separately concurring in Furman, Justice Douglas also condemned the death penalty as unconstitutionally malproportioned, because “disproportionately imposed and carried out on the poor, the Negro, and members of unpopular groups.”

After Furman, thirty-five states enacted new death penalty statutes. “The punishment must not be grossly out of proportion to the severity of the crime,” a plurality warned in Gregg in 1976, considering Georgia’s new statute. “We cannot say the punishment is invariably disproportionate to the crime,” the Court concluded, restoring the death penalty to the United States. “This is an extreme sanction, suitable to the most extreme of crimes.”

Was rape, or treason, also a “most extreme” crime? Death was “indeed a disproportionate penalty for the crime of raping an adult woman,” Justice White declared for a plurality (Coker). Ordinarily, death was a disproportionate penalty for the crime of rape, Justice Powell separately agreed in this case where the rape victim was not otherwise injured. But it “may be that the death penalty is not disproportionate punishment for the crime of aggravated rape.” Dissenting Justices in Coker also agreed in principle: “I accept that the Eighth Amendment’s concept of disproportionality bars the death penalty for minor crimes,” Justice Burger, joined by Rehnquist conceded. “But rape is not a minor crime,” and death was not necessarily disproportionate for a “chronic rapist” who had been previously convicted of murder and escaped from prison to rape again.

Although the death penalty for child rape and similarly heinous crimes remains an open question, the mantra of modern capital jurisprudence—“death is different”—suggests that Constitutional proportionality inherent in the Eighth Amendment may limit death as punishment only to murder. (See Proportionality in Punishment.)

Five years after Coker, the Court in Enmund, five to four, held that death was a disproportionate penalty for a getaway car driver who neither intended nor expected his cofelon to shoot and kill their robbery victim. Dissenting in this particular case, Justice O’Connor stated common ground for the Court: “The penalty imposed in a capital case [must] be proportional to the harm caused and the defendant’s blameworthiness.” How serious the crime, how morally culpable the killer? This depends not only on the harm to the victim, but also on the killer’s mental state and motive. In Tison, Justice O’Connor, this time in the majority, held that a reckless and depraved indifference to human life without an intent to kill could make death a proportional penalty for a felony murder accomplice.

Harm and blameworthiness—essential components of proportionality—require a particularized consideration of each crime and each criminal. Thus, as constitutional punishment, death must not be grossly disproportionate to the crime, and it must not be disproportionate to the criminal's particular culpability, however measured. Capital punishment may neither be applied randomly, nor automatically, for any crime. Thus, the very same day the Court affirmed statutes from Georgia, Florida, and Texas, in Woodson and Roberts, it struck down North Carolina's and Louisiana's mandatory death penalties.

Since then, in a series of cases, explicitly or implicitly, a substantial majority has insisted that proportionality requires the capital sentencer to consider all relevant mitigating circumstances, not only of the crime, but also the background and character of the criminal (Lockett and Eddings).

Although proportionality constraints prohibit a state from mandating death for all individuals who commit even the most aggravated murder legislatively defined in advance, the Court itself has used proportionality, categorically to exempt from a death penalty entire classes of offenses (Coker) and also offenders. Thus, in 2002, a majority held death per se disproportionate punishment for any crime committed by a mentally retarded defendant (Atkins). And in 2005, a majority found the death penalty per se "disproportionate punishment for offenders under 18." (Roper)

Roper intensified controversy over how to measure proportionality. Constitutionally disproportionate punishment outlawed by the Eighth Amendment is not static, but must be informed by "the evolving standards of decency of a maturing society." (Trop, 1958) All Justices presently agree that "time works changes," that what's 'excessive' "may acquire meaning as public opinion becomes enlightened by a humane justice" (Weems, 1910). In determining proportionality vel non, the Roper majority, along with Justice O'Connor in dissent, would consider the views of the international community, while insisting that in the end the Court determines "moral proportionality" by exercising "our own independent judgment." Justices Scalia and Rehnquist in dissent insisted that Constitutionally mandated "moral proportionality" is an antidemocratic cover, by which individual Justices impose and substitute their subjective personal views for those of legislatures.

While the Court has focused constitutional attention on whether and when death is a too severe response, retributivists insisting on "just deserts" force the opposite proportionality question into the debate:

Is life in prison (with or without parole) a sufficiently unpleasant experience? (See Retribution) A public convinced that prison life is so unbearable that "life is worse than death" may abolish the death penalty, comfortable it has maintained proportionality. An informed public, however, aware that sadists who rape and torture children to death end up watching television and playing volleyball, may insist, that as administered, life without parole destroys the "moral proportionality," which only a death penalty can maintain.

ROBERT BLECKER

Cases and Statutes Cited

Atkins v. Virginia 536 U.S. 304 (2002)
Coker v. Georgia 433 U.S. 584 (1977)
Eddings v. Oklahoma 455 U.S. 104 (1982)
Enmund v. Florida 458 U.S. 782 (1982)
Furman v. Georgia 408 U.S. 238 (1972)
Gregg v. Georgia 428 U.S. 153 (1976)
Lockett v. Ohio 438 U.S. 586 (1978)
Roberts v. Louisiana 428 U.S. 325 (1976)
Roper v. Simmons 125 S.Ct. 1183 (2005)
Tison v. Arizona 481 U.S.137 (1987)

See also Capital Punishment; Capital Punishment and the Equal Protection Clause Cases; Capital Punishment: Due Process Limits; Capital Punishment: History and Politics; Capital Punishment: Eighth Amendment Limits

CAPITOL SQUARE REVIEW AND ADVISORY BOARD v. PINETTE, 515 U.S. 753 (1995)

Capitol Square is a 10-acre, state-owned plaza surrounding the statehouse in Columbus, Ohio. For over a century the square had "been used for public speeches, gatherings, and festivals advocating and celebrating a variety of causes, both secular and religious." As authorized by Ohio state statute, the Advisory Board denied a Ku Klux Klan application to place an unattended, unlabeled cross in the square during the Christmas season—while approving other displays, at least one of which was religious. The Klan was then permitted to erect its cross pursuant to a federal court injunction, and the Board appealed, claiming its denial was required by the First Amendment Establishment Clause.

The Supreme Court affirmed the lower courts' action, stating "There is no doubt that compliance with the Establishment Clause is a state interest sufficiently compelling to justify content-based restrictions on [expression]." However, "[r]eligious expression cannot violate the Establishment Clause where it (1) is purely private and (2) occurs in a traditional or designated public forum, publicly announced and open to all on equal terms. Those conditions are satisfied here, and therefore the State may not bar respondents' cross from Capitol Square." The Court declined to deal with the possible political implications of the Klan's racist views because that issue had not been considered in the lower courts.

In addition, there was considerable discussion (and no majority agreement) among the justices on the proper use and application of the so-called endorsement test: whether permission by government for the display on its property of an unlabeled cross sent a message of government promotion of Christianity. Two justices dissented, focusing on the likelihood that the cross sends such a message.

The decision and accompanying disagreements are consistent with the Court's two prior holiday display cases, County of Allegheny v. American Civil Liberties Union, 492 U.S. 573 (1989); Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668 (1984).

DANIEL G. GIBBENS

Cases and Statutes Cited

Capitol Square Review and Advisory Board v. Pinette, 515 US 753 (1995)
County of Allegheny v. American Civil Liberties Union, 492 U.S. 573 (1989)
Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668 (1984)

CAPTIVE AUDIENCES AND FREE SPEECH

The idea that speech may be curbed to protect the sensibilities of an audience held captive by the speaker is rooted in the notion that governmental power "to shut off discourse solely to protect others from hearing it [is] dependent upon a showing that substantial privacy interests are being invaded in an essentially intolerable manner" Cohen v. California, 403 U.S. 15 (1971). This principle is especially applicable to audiences held captive in their own homes. In Rowan v. United States Post Office Department, 397 U.S. 728 (1970), the Supreme Court upheld a federal law that permitted mail recipients to require the Post Office not to deliver mailings of "sexually provocative" materials from senders specified by the postal customer. The sanctity of the home is, however, not unlimited. In Consolidated Edison v. Public Service Commission, 477 U.S. 530 (1980), the Court struck down a government regulation barring utilities from mailing political matter to their customers along with their bills, and in Bolger v. Youngs Drug Products Corp., 463 U.S. 60 (1983), the Court voided a federal law banning the mailing of unsolicited advertisements for contraceptives, reasoning that the short "journey from mail box to trash can" was an acceptable burden to preserve free speech. These cases may be reconciled by noting that in Rowan the government merely acquiesced to private choice concerning the avoidance of unwanted communications, whereas in Consolidated Edison and Bolger the government itself decided on the material from which private citizens should be shielded. On that reading, the captive audience doctrine amounts to a privately held veto over speech that intolerably invades substantial privacy interests.

Captive audiences are not confined to the home. In FCC v. Pacifica Foundation, 438 U.S. 726 (1978), the Supreme Court upheld discipline of a radio station for broadcasting a vulgar comedy routine during hours that children might be listening. While Pacifica involved more factors than a captive audience, both Lehman v. Shaker Heights, 418 U.S. 298 (1974), and Public Utilities Commission v. Pollak, 343 U.S. 451 (1952), were concerned, respectively, with the captivity of bus passengers subjected to placard advertising and radio programming. Because the passengers had little choice but to listen or watch, Justice Douglas characterized them as captives.

Because the Supreme Court has never fully explained the import of the captive audience principle, its scope remains unclear. For example, may governments require computer and television manufacturers to insert devices that enable users to block certain unwanted programming? The principle reconciling Consolidated Edison, Bolger, and Rowan suggests that governments could do so. What if the blocking technology does not permit unlimited user choice, but merely gives the user a choice among a variety of preselected forms of programming? The same principle suggests that constriction of private choice would be impermissible if mandated by government, but perhaps not if it resulted from only the manufacturers' decisions. In short, there remains uncertainty about what constitutes a captive audience and what governments may do to protect captive audiences from unwanted messages.

CALVIN MASSEY

References and Further Reading

Strauss, Marcy, Redefining the Captive Audience Doctrine, Hastings Const. L. Q. 85 (1991): 19.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Bolger v. Youngs Drug Products Corp., 463 U.S. 60 (1983)

Cohen v. California, 403 U.S. 15 (1971)
Consolidated Edison v. Public Service Commission, 477 U.S. 530 (1980)
FCC v. Pacifica Foundation, 438 U.S. 726 (1978)
Lehman v. Shaker Heights, 418 U.S. 298 (1974)
Public Utilities Commission v. Pollak, 343 U.S. 451 (1952)
Rowan v. United States Post Office Department, 397 U.S. 728 (1970)

See also Bolger v. Youngs Drug Products Corp., 463, U.S. 60 (1983); Broadcast Regulation; Cohen v. California, 403 U.S. 15 (1971); FCC v. Pacifica Foundation 438 U.S. 726 (1978); Rowan v. United States Post Office Department, No. 399, 397 U.S. 728 (1970)

CARDOZO, BENJAMIN (1870–1938)

Benjamin Nathan Cardozo was born into a Sephardic Jewish family in New York City in 1870. Shortly after his birth, his father, Albert Cardozo, was forced to resign his position as a judge on the New York Supreme Court in the wake of charges of corruption. The standard treatments of Benjamin Cardozo's life and career suggest that he spent the better part of his adult life attempting to transcend, consciously or not, the disgrace of his father's professional malfeasance.

As a young teenager, Cardozo was tutored at home by Horatio Alger, Jr. He entered Columbia College at the age of fifteen. On graduation, he matriculated into the Columbia Law School at the age of nineteen, leaving after two years of study but without a law degree. After his departure from law school, Cardozo sat for the New York Bar, and thereafter entered into private practice with his brother, specializing in commercial practice and appellate litigation. Most accounts of Cardozo's work as a lawyer describe him as an extremely able practitioner—a "lawyer's lawyer." After slightly more than two decades of law practice, Cardozo was elected to the New York Supreme Court in 1913 and would take his seat as a justice on the court on January 5, 1914. Five weeks into his first term on the trial court, Cardozo was temporarily designated by Governor Martin Glynn to the court of Appeals (the state's highest court) to help clear a backlog of cases. In 1917, Cardozo was first appointed, and then elected, to a seat on the court of Appeals. It would be through his service on the New York high court that Cardozo would earn his reputation as one of America's most respected jurists. He served on the court of Appeals until 1932, when Cardozo, a Democrat, was appointed to the U. S. Supreme Court by Republican President Herbert Hoover. Cardozo served as an Associate Justice until his death in 1938.

Cardozo has been considered by many to be the quintessential common law jurist, a judicial craftsman respected not only for the quality of his judicial reasoning, but for the quality of his written opinions as well. Fundamental features of the common law define Cardozo's understanding of and approach to the judicial process: sensitivity to the importance of the judicial role in a system of judge-made law; and, the centrality of the judge in the process of legal development, maintaining continuity with the past by respect for the principle of stare decisis, while nurturing modest change by keeping the law relevant to changing social circumstances and need. Cardozo accepted the idea that law was not, and should not be, isolated from social life, and that judicial reasoning involved more than the mechanical application of abstract concepts, the relations of which being logically derived. Moreover, he resisted the simplistic notion that the judge is merely an "empty vessel," an unbiased figure through which the law itself might speak. Instead, Cardozo understood the importance of the subjectivity of the judge. The classic exposition of this view came in Cardozo's Storrs Lectures, delivered at Yale Law School and published in 1921 under the title, The Nature of the Judicial Process. In one of its most memorable passages, Cardozo observed, "There is in each of us a stream of tendency . . ." which gives coherence and direction to thought and action. Judges cannot escape that current any more than other mortals. All their lives, forces that they do not recognize and cannot name have been tugging at them—inherited instincts, traditional beliefs, acquired convictions; and the resultant is an outlook on life . . ." Roper v. Simmons 125 S.Ct. 1183 (2005).

In this mental background every problem finds its setting. We may try to see things as objectively as we please. Nonetheless, we can never see them with any eyes except our own.

In other words, we are all—judges included—constituted by the society and culture in which we live; our vision of the world is inevitably a "shaped" vision. To concede, however, that the judicial view is a biased one has obvious implications for the rule of law ideal, if that ideal is understood as government by law and not by persons. Anticipating the possibility of an anxious response to his claims of the inherent subjectivity of the judicial process, Cardozo assured his Yale audience that "[w]e may wonder sometimes how from the play of all these forces of individualism, there can come anything coherent, anything but chaos and the void. Those are the moments in which we exaggerate the elements of difference. In the end there emerges something which has a composite shape and truth and order." Cardozo urged a mature recognition of the fact that judges are inevitably “law-makers,” and of the related point that their lawmaking was based on their ideological orientation. The “business of the judge” is not to “discover [my emphasis] the objective truth.” Rather, according to Cardozo, the real duty of the judge is to “objectify in law, not my own aspirations and convictions and philosophies, but the aspirations and convictions and philosophies of the men and women of my time.” The judge functions, then, as a translator between his or her community and the law, rearticulating the interests and needs of the community into legal form and, in turn, giving voice to the law so that it may continue to speak relevantly and responsively to the community of which it is a part.

Cardozo has generally been characterized as a progressive and innovative jurist. And, his candor about the nature of the judicial process inevitably could be seen to gesture toward later, more radical developments in legal thought, such as Legal Realism. Yet, Cardozo’s actual judicial work-product generally appears (or is intended to appear) much more modest in aspiration. For example, in MacPherson v. Buick Motor Company, one of the canonical opinions from Cardozo’s corpus, he announces an important shift in the law of negligence, yet strives to characterize the decision as one that has simply made more clear an emerging trend in the development of negligence doctrine.

The vast bulk of Cardozo’s judicial experience came while serving as an appellate judge on New York’s Court of Appeals. Therefore, he rarely dealt with legal issues that today garner so much attention, issues of constitutional law—such issues would come at the very end of his judicial career. However, while on the New York Court of Appeals, he did deal with a number of criminal law/criminal procedure matters. And, although usually thought of as a “liberal” judge, Cardozo’s record in this area seems rather more mixed; he often seemed less sympathetic to criminal defendant’s rights than one might think a “liberal” judge would be. For example, in People v. Defore, Cardozo, writing for the court of Appeals, resisted the adoption of the exclusionary rule in New York and held that evidence obtained through an illegal police search of a criminal suspect’s home was, nonetheless, admissible in trial. And, toward the end of his life, while on the U. S. Supreme Court, in his opinion for the Court in Palko v. Connecticut, Cardozo rejected the Petitioner’s argument that the double jeopardy provision of the Fifth Amendment should be incorporated through the Fourteenth Amendment and applied against the State of Connecticut. The result was to uphold a capital murder conviction obtained in the second trial of the defendant, after the state appealed a second-degree murder conviction from the first trial.

Certainly, there were instances when Cardozo was more receptive to the claims of criminal defendants—for example, joining the decision in Powell v. Alabama (otherwise known as one of the “Scottsboro Cases”), which found a constitutional right to counsel in state capital trials. Yet, it was primarily in cases dealing with the freedom of speech that Cardozo’s liberal inclinations seemed to be most fully engaged. In Herndon v. State of Georgia, Cardozo authored a strongly worded dissent from a decision that rejected, on procedural grounds, the appeal of an African-American communist who had been imprisoned for violating Georgia’s anti-surrection statute by “inducing others to join in combined resistance to the authority of the state.” Here, as elsewhere, Cardozo endorsed Holmes’ “clear and present danger” standard as the test to be used in cases involving the incitement of illegal activity, to balance a state’s interest in preserving order with an individual’s constitutional guarantee of freedom of speech. Indeed, it was in an essay celebrating Holmes’ life and career that Cardozo seemed to offer something more than simply an appreciation of Holmes’ contribution to the protection of freedom of speech, but a glimpse of his own views as well: “Only in one field is compromise to be excluded, or kept within the narrowest limits. There shall be no compromise of the freedom to think one’s thoughts and speak them, except at those extreme borders where thought merges into action. There is to be no compromise here . . . There is no freedom without choice, and there is no choice without knowledge—or none that is not illusory.”

WILLIAM ROSE

References and Further Reading

- Cardozo, Benjamin N. The Nature of the Judicial Process. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1921/1960.
- , Mr. Justice Holmes, Harvard Law Review 44 (1931): 682–692.
- Hall, Margaret E. Selected Writings of Benjamin Nathan Cardozo: The Choice of Tycho Brahe. New York: Matthew Bender, 1947/1975 reprint.
- Kaufman, Andrew L. Cardozo. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1998.
- Polenberg, Richard. The World of Benjamin Cardozo: Personal Values and the Judicial Process. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1997.
- Posner, Richard. Cardozo: A Study in Reputation. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1990.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Herndon v. State of Georgia*, 295 U.S. 441 (1935), Cardozo dissenting

MacPherson v. Buick Motor Company, 217 N.Y. 382 (1916)
Palko v. Connecticut, 302 U.S. 319 (1937)
People v. Defore, 242 N.Y. 13 (1926)
Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45 (1932)

CAREY v. POPULATION SERVICES INTERNATIONAL, 431 U.S. 678 (1977)

Whether, and to what extent, minors should enjoy the same constitutional rights as adults is one of the most vexing and unsettled questions of constitutional law. In Carey v. Population Services International, the Supreme Court considered this question in the context of minors' right to privacy.

In 1976, the Supreme Court decided, in the case of Planned Parenthood of Central Missouri v. Danforth, that a state may not impose a blanket requirement that a minor obtain parental consent before getting an abortion. One year later, in Carey, the Supreme Court considered a challenge to a New York law regulating access to contraceptives by individuals younger than sixteen.

The law had three provisions. First, it prohibited the distribution of contraceptives to individuals younger than sixteen, except by a physician. Second, it allowed only licensed pharmacists to distribute non-prescription contraceptives to individuals older than sixteen. Finally, the law banned the advertisement or display of contraceptives.

The Supreme Court struck down all three provisions. The Court concluded that the fundamental right of the individual to make decisions about whether to procreate, recognized by the Court in Griswold v. Connecticut and Eisenstadt v. Baird, was unconstitutionally burdened by the requirement that only licensed pharmacists could distribute condoms. Furthermore, the Supreme Court decided that the prohibition on advertising or displaying contraceptives was an unconstitutional restriction on free speech.

The portion of the Court's decision striking down the prohibition on access to contraceptives by individuals younger than sixteen was joined by only four Justices, however. In that opinion, Justice Brennan rejected the argument that the prohibition could be justified by the state's desire to protect minors' health or morals. Justice Brennan found the state's argument that the law served to deter sexual activity by teenagers to be unworthy of serious consideration, expressing doubts that this method of deterrence would actually work, and further asserting that it was illogical to try to protect teens by making the consequences of their sexual activity more severe and harmful. Justice Brennan noted there was no medical justification for allowing only physicians to distribute nonprescription contraceptives and reaffirmed the vitality of the Supreme Court's earlier decision in Planned Parenthood of Central Missouri v. Danforth that the state cannot itself exercise, nor can it give to a third party, an arbitrary veto power over minors' reproductive rights.

Justices White, Powell, and Stevens concurred in Justice Brennan's decision but not his reasoning. Each expressed concern about the breadth of the privacy right recognized by Justice Brennan's opinion and emphasized that states still have broad powers to regulate adolescents' sexual behavior. Nonetheless, all three agreed that the means New York had used to regulate adolescent sexual behavior in this instance were unacceptable.

Thus, in Carey, the Court provided an important precedent affirming the right of individuals, including minors, to a realm of sexual and decisional privacy into which the government could not constitutionally intrude; at the same time, however, the Court did not go so far as to recognize an absolute right of sexual autonomy on the part of either minors or adults.

B. JESSIE HILL

References and Further Reading

Cruz, David B., The Sexual Freedom Cases? Contraception, Abortion, Abstinence, and the Constitution, Harvard Civil Rights-Civil Liberties Law Review 35 (2000): 2:299–383.
Garrow, David J. Liberty and Sexuality: The Right to Privacy and the Making of Roe v. Wade, 600–704, New York: Macmillan, 1994.
Posner, Richard A., The Uncertain Protection of Privacy by the Supreme Court, Supreme Court Review (1979): 173.
Tribe, Laurence H. American Constitutional Law, 2nd ed., Mineola, NY: Foundation, 1988.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438 (1972)
Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965)
Planned Parenthood of Central Missouri v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52 (1976)

See also Birth Control; Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438 (1972); Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965); Planned Parenthood of Missouri v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52 (1976); Privacy; Right of Privacy; Substantive Due Process

CAROLINE PRODUCTS v. U.S., 304 U.S. 144 (1938)

This relatively minor case is remembered not for the issue supposedly before the Court, but for a footnote that in the eyes of many scholars launched a constitutional revolution.

The case itself involved a challenge to a federal law that prohibited the interstate shipment of “filled milk,” defined in the statute as skim milk “compounded with . . . any fat or oil other than milk fat.” The law had clearly been intended to benefit certain parts of the dairy industry, and Carolene Products, convicted of shipping “filled milk,” challenged it as exceeding Congress’s commerce powers.

Justice Stone practically dismissed this argument out of hand, and in doing so put forward a simple test for weighing the constitutionality of economic regulations. Legislation “affecting ordinary commercial transactions is not to be pronounced unconstitutional unless in the light of the facts made known or generally assumed it is of such a character as to preclude the assumption that it rests upon a rational basis within the knowledge and experience of the legislators.” This “rational basis” test became and remains the basic test for economic regulation; it is the least demanding of all constitutional tests, and few laws have ever failed it.

But immediately after the statement of the rational basis test, Stone inserted footnote four. In it he declared:

There may be narrower scope for operation of the presumption of constitutionality when legislation appears on its face to be within a specific prohibition of the Constitution, such as those of the first ten amendments, which are deemed equally specific when held to be embraced within the Fourteenth.

The note went on to say that such legislation would be subject to a “more exacting judicial scrutiny,” as could laws aimed at particular religions, the integrity of the political process, or at “discrete and insular minorities.”

Although Stone did not himself use the term “strict scrutiny,” footnote four led to a new jurisprudence in which economic and other legislation not affecting individual civil rights and liberties would be examined by the courts on a minimal, “rational basis.” If the legislature, either Congress or the states, had the general constitutional power—in this instance, to regulate interstate commerce—and had acted with sufficient reason, the courts would not question the wisdom of the policy.

But when it came to individual rights protected by the Constitution, then the courts would apply a much higher standard. The individual would only have to make out a prima facie case that a right had been restricted, and the burden of proof would shift to the state to prove that the limitation of individual liberty resulted from a compelling governmental interest and had been constructed in the least intrusive manner.

In the 1940s, the Court began applying strict scrutiny to laws affecting First Amendment guarantees—especially speech—and statutes affecting race. As a result of footnote four, lower courts began assuming the role of interpreter of property rights vis-à-vis the state, and by applying the rational basis test rarely overturned economic regulation. The Court would rarely grant review in such cases. But in the area of free speech and other constitutionally protected rights—and after 1954 laws classifying people on the basis of race—the Supreme Court became the nation’s chief guardian of civil rights and civil liberties.

MELVIN I. UROFSKY

References and Further Reading

Perry, Michael, Mr. Justice Stone and Footnote 4, George Mason University Civil Rights Law Journal 35 (1996): 6.
Powell, Lewis F. Jr., Carolene Products Revisited, Columbia Law Review 1087 (1982): 82.

CARROLL v. UNITED STATES, 267 U.S. 132 (1925)

The Supreme Court has held that, under the Fourth Amendment to the Constitution, police officers must obtain a warrant to engage in a search or a seizure, unless their activity falls within one of “a few specifically established and well delineated exceptions.” One of the most important of these exceptions is the “car search doctrine,” often called the “Carroll Doctrine,” as it was first enunciated in this case.

Carroll was a bootlegging case from Prohibition times. Police officers knew that the “Carroll boys” were bootleggers. They had previously offered to supply undercover agents in Grand Rapids with whiskey. So when officers saw their car by chance, outside Grand Rapids, coming from the direction of Detroit, it was stopped, searched, and sixty-eight bottles of whiskey were found stashed behind the back seat.

Chief Justice Taft, for the majority, was untroubled by the fact that the officers did not have a warrant. Automobiles, unlike “a store, dwelling house, or other structure,” are readily mobile, and “it is not practicable to secure a warrant, because the vehicle can be quickly moved out of the locality or jurisdiction in which the warrant must be sought.”

That did not mean that officers could lawfully stop every car on the road on the chance that they might find contraband. To undertake a warrantless search and seizure of a car, officers had to possess probable cause.

While the Carroll Doctrine still applies, permitting a warrantless search and seizure of a vehicle where officers have probable cause to believe that evidence of crime is present, the Court has subsequently held that it is not justified only by the fact of ready mobility. Instead, the car search exception to the warrant requirement survives today because people have a reduced expectation of privacy in their vehicles due to “pervasive and continuing governmental regulation and controls, including periodic inspection and licensing requirements.”

JOHN M. BURKOFF

See also Automobile Search; California v. Acevedo, 500 U.S. 565 (1991); Probable Cause; Search (General Definition); Warrantless Searches

CATEGORICAL APPROACH TO FREE SPEECH

The “categorical approach” is a method of judging where decisions are reached through use of a preestablished system of classifications or categories. Judges compare the case before them to cases in the past to determine the category to which the new case belongs. Judges then apply legal rules already developed for that category to resolve the dispute.

In free speech cases, the categorical approach has been the dominant analytical method for many years. Multiple classification schemes have evolved that help courts systematically dissect and compare the complexities of First Amendment free speech disputes. Classification systems are applied to evaluate the nature of the speech being restricted by government, the setting where the speech would occur, and the nature of the speech restriction. Thus, in resolving a free speech case, a judge would determine first whether the speech at issue is “protected” or “unprotected” by the First Amendment. Categories of “unprotected” speech include obscenity, defamation, incitement, and child pornography produced with real children. If the speech were in the “protected” category, the judge would classify the setting of the speech as either some type of “public forum” or else a “non-public forum.” The judge would also classify the type of governmental speech restriction as either “content based” or “content neutral.” Depending on the outcome of that sequence of categorical moves, the judge would choose which category of “scrutiny” levels to apply to the speech restriction, whether “strict” or “rational basis” or a possible intermediate category.

In First Amendment jurisprudence, the “categorical approach” is usually contrasted with “balancing approaches” and “absolutist approaches.”

Balancing approaches involve weighing the competing interests and rights at stake and assessing their relative strengths to decide whether the speaker or the government speech-restriction will prevail. Absolutist approaches take literally the First Amendment’s command that “Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech,” and only ask whether the restricted speech at issue is genuinely speech rather than conduct.

The categorical approach has been viewed as more speech-protective than balancing approaches, particularly since the U.S. Supreme Court’s use of a balancing method to decide a series of McCarthy-era speech cases in favor of government restrictions on speech (Dennis v. United States is the prime example). In addition to being seen as more protective generally of free speech rights, the categorical approach is praised by its proponents for being protective of those speech rights most in danger: the rights of unpopular or distasteful speakers. The categorical approach is commended for providing principled, objective guidance to courts, for helping judges take a pro-speech stand against the popular will, and for providing speakers with notice and fair warning about when governments can restrict speech. The categorical approach is also praised for bolstering the images of courts as dispensers of fair and equal treatment and for making judges less vulnerable to charges of legislating from the bench.

Opponents of categorical approaches, however, question the claimed objectivity of free-speech categories. What seem to be fixed, consistent categories can often be manipulated to produce the desired outcome in the case. Thus, liberal judges are more likely to classify as “content-based” laws regulating sexual expression, whereas conservative judges will often classify the same laws as “content-neutral;” conversely, liberal judges are more likely to categorize laws regulating abortion protesters as “content-neutral,” whereas conservatives assign them to the “content-based” category of speech restrictions. Critics of the categorical approach charge that it is mere labeling, that it is mechanical and formulaic, and that it is not adaptable to a changing world and new technologies. Critics further complain that categories mask the real but unarticulated assessments of facts and policies that occur whenever judges decide speech cases. To the extent such “silent” covert judging happens, the development of constitutional jurisprudence suffers.

Although balancing approaches have been making a comeback in free-speech cases since the days when they were discredited as too pro-government, the multiple classification schemes that comprise the categorical approach remain the primary means of adjudication of free speech cases for the U.S. Supreme Court and the lower courts. Recent Supreme Court justices who are strong proponents of the categorical approach include Justices Scalia and Kennedy. See Justice Kennedy's defenses of categorical approaches in Denver Area Educational Telecommunications Consortium and in Simon & Schuster. An example of the Supreme Court using the categorical approach can be seen in Justice Kennedy's opinion for the Court in Free Speech Coalition.

The debate between advocates of categorizing and advocates of balancing parallels debates between advocates of "rules" and advocates of "standards."

IRENE SEGAL AYERS

References and Further Reading

- Aleinikoff, T. Alexander, Constitutional Law in the Age of Balancing, Yale L. J. 943 (1987): 96.
 Barron, Jerome A., The Electronic Media and the Flight from First Amendment Doctrine: Justice Breyer's New Balancing Approach, U. Mich. J. L. Reform 817 (1998): 31.
 Huhn, Wilson R., Assessing the Constitutionality of Laws that are Both Content-Based and Content-Neutral: The Emerging Constitutional Calculus, Ind. L. J. 801 (2004): 79.
 Scalia, Antonin, The Rule of Law as a Law of Rules, U. Chi. L. Rev. 1175 (1989): 56.
 Smolla, Rodney A. Smolla and Nimmer on Freedom of Speech, vol. 1, 2:55-73. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 2003.
 Sullivan, Kathleen M., Post-Liberal Judging: The Roles of Categorization and Balancing, U. Colo. L. Rev. 293 (1992): 63.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition*, 535 U.S. 234 (2002)
Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494 (1951)
Denver Area Educational Telecommunications Consortium, Inc. v. Federal Communications Commission, 518 U.S. 727, 780-812 (1996)
Simon & Schuster v. Members of the New York State Crime Victims Board, 502 U.S. 105 (1991)

See also Absolutism and Free Speech; Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, 535 U.S. 234 (2002); Balancing Approach to Free Speech; Content-Based Regulation of Speech; Content-Neutral Regulation of Speech; Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494 (1951); Intermediate Scrutiny Test in Free Speech Cases; Public Forum Doctrines; Public/Nonpublic Forums Distinction

CATHOLICS AND RELIGIOUS LIBERTY

The twentieth century witnessed a remarkable realignment of the Roman Catholic Church with the cause of religious liberty. The widespread embrace of individual rights among Western democracies in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries had been met with skepticism by the Church, which traditionally favored a confessional state and insisted that freedom must rest on truth. This relationship between freedom and truth was understood to require that the state recognize and defend the Church's unique status among religions.

In his 1832 encyclical Mirari vos, for example, Pope Gregory XVI lamented the "absurd and erroneous proposition which claims that liberty of conscience must be maintained for everyone." Pope Pius IX, in his 1864 encyclical Quanta cura, warned that "if human arguments are always allowed free room for discussion, there will never be wanting men who will dare to resist truth." The encyclical's accompanying Syllabus of Errors listed among "the principal errors of our times" the increasingly popular beliefs that "every man is free to embrace and profess that religion which, guided by the light of reason, he shall consider true," that "it is no longer expedient that the Catholic religion should be held as the only religion of the State, to the exclusion of all other forms of worship," and the broader notion that "[t]he Church ought to be separated from the State, and the State from the Church." These sentiments were prompted, at least in part, by the era's persistent and violent anticlericalism, particularly in Europe; nevertheless, their breadth seemed to sweep in America's more conciliatory experiment in church-state separation.

An Evolving Embrace

The tone and substance of the Vatican's pronouncements on religious liberty had changed dramatically by the mid-twentieth century. The shift was part of a broader reconception of the Church's relationship with the modern world. Modern liberalism's individualist presumptions forced the Church to think more deeply and articulate more carefully the scope and relevance of natural rights. This exercise was not aimed simply at solidifying a defensive posture against individualism; rather, the Church sought to address the more pressing dangers of materialism, fascism, and communism. In other words, the overlap between the Church's world view and modern liberalism became more obvious as other, more foreboding, threats loomed.

First, as market economies spawned great disparities in wealth along with an increased emphasis on material consumption, the Church broadened and deepened its teaching on social justice, effectively linking itself with a broader progressive movement, initially focusing on the economic sphere, especially labor rights, but eventually extending to a variety of issues, including race. These causes facilitated the Church's friendlier stance toward individual rights generally, including religious liberty.

Second, in the wake of World War II, the Church was reminded that liberalism and fascism could not be considered moral equivalents. The Church could not be neutral, at least ideologically, on the contest that left Europe physically and spiritually devastated. More practically, World War II shaped the debate over religious liberty by forcing many European Catholic intellectuals to flee to the United States. A generation of influential thinkers was able to make firsthand comparisons between the American and European approaches to church-state separation. Given their divergent national histories, Americans saw liberalism as grounded in religion, whereas Europeans thought it necessary to escape religion to realize liberalism's promise. As a consequence, religion maintained its public relevance and vitality in the United States; this was not lost on observers.

Third, in the postwar climate, communism emerged as an even more overtly hostile threat, becoming the first political force of global reach founded on atheism. Not only did Western liberalism's emphasis on individual rights offer a preferred aspirational ideal, the rights-based system also offered the only realistic means by which to counter communism's expanding threat.

In addition to these sociopolitical factors, the Church's teaching on religious liberty was influenced by development in its theological stance toward other religions. The twentieth century saw renewed debate regarding the presence of truth and potential for salvation in other faith traditions. In this vein, the Second Vatican Council, in Gaudium et spes (1965), asserted the possibility of salvation "not only for Christians, but for all men of good will in whose hearts grace works in an unseen way." The Council also declared, in Nostra aetate (1965), that the Church "rejects nothing that is true and holy" in other religions and "regards with sincere reverence those ways of conduct and of life, those precepts and teachings which, though differing in many aspects from the ones she holds and sets forth, nonetheless often reflect a ray of that Truth which enlightens all men." Even more significantly, the Council warned that "[w]e cannot truly call on God, the Father of all, if we refuse to treat in a brotherly way any man, created as he is in the image of God." For purposes of religious liberty, this led to the essential recognition that "[n]o foundation therefore remains for any theory or practice that leads to discrimination between man and man or people and people, so far as their human dignity and the rights flowing from it are concerned."

The Church's evolving embrace of religious liberty was also shaped by the work of several key Catholic intellectuals. Philosopher Jacques Maritain emphasized natural rights and played a key role in the development of the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights. The theology of Yves Congar, Henri de Lubac, and Karl Rahner displayed an increasing openness to much of modern human experience. Bernard Lonergan sought to reframe the conception of understanding in light of modernity. John Henry Newman made the provocative claim that the experience of the faithful has a role in the development of doctrine. These figures loom large in a story that proceeded, in significant part, as a theory-driven conversation.

But no figure looms as large as that of John Courtney Murray, the American theologian who insisted that state-sponsored religion need not be the Catholic ideal, that separate church and state spheres did not threaten—and indeed could enhance—the vitality of religion in society, and that economic and religious individualism must be distinguished from the political individualism of a rights-based democracy. Reflecting how stark his challenge was, he was forbidden by the Vatican from writing on church-state issues during the mid-1950s. (Indeed, virtually all of these key intellectual figures experienced significant institutional opposition from the Church at some point in their careers.) By the time of the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965), however, Murray managed to play an active role in drafting the key documents on which the Church's support for religious liberty would be based for years to come.

The Second Vatican Council

All of these contributing factors culminated in the Second Vatican Council's Declaration on Religious Freedom, Dignitatis Humanae (1965), in which the Church plainly declared that "the human person has a right to religious freedom." The key theoretical development was the Council's recognition of the civil sphere/religious sphere distinction, which facilitated in turn a distinction between moral or religious freedom and civil freedom. The Council stated that "[t]he truth cannot impose itself except by virtue of its own truth," and thus a person's "duty to worship God" demands "immunity from coercion in civil society.” This left “untouched,” in the Council’s estimation, “traditional Catholic doctrine on the moral duty of men and societies toward the true religion and toward the one Church of Christ.”

The perceived necessity of articulating a civil freedom of religion emanated from the nature of the human person. As “beings endowed with reason and free will and therefore privileged to bear personal responsibility,” the Council explained that the human person must exercise his or her moral obligation to seek and adhere to truth, but that he or she can only do so if immune from external coercion. Thus, religious liberty “has its foundation not in the subjective disposition of the human person, but in his very nature,” and immunity from external coercion “continues to exist even in those who do not live up to their obligation of seeking the truth and adhering to it.” The dignity of the human person on which the Church’s conception of religious liberty is founded is known not only through divine revelation—in particular, the “respect which Christ showed toward the freedom with which man is to fulfill his duty of belief in the word of God”—but also is knowable through the human reason developed over the course of human experience, and so is accessible universally.

The Second Vatican Council denied any suggestion that its declaration amounted to an about-face on religious liberty. While the Council acknowledged that “in the life of the People of God, as it has made its pilgrim way through the vicissitudes of human history, there has at times appeared a way of acting that was hardly in accord with the spirit of the Gospel or even opposed to it,” it insisted that “the doctrine of the Church that no one is to be coerced into faith has always stood firm.” Subsequently, Pope John Paul II has recognized that the Church’s approach to human rights has been dynamic. In 1980, he observed that “[d]uring these last decades the Catholic Church has reflected deeply on the theme of human rights, especially on freedom of conscience and of religion,” and that “in so doing, she has been stimulated by the daily life experience of the Church herself and of the faithful of all areas and social groups.”

Championing the Cause

In the post-Vatican II era, John Paul II’s contributions to the theme of religious liberty stand out, as they reflect his own experience with fascism and communism. His voice deepened the Church’s commitment to the civil sphere/religious sphere distinction, as explored in a 1980 letter:

On the basis of his personal convictions, man is led to recognize and follow a religious or metaphysical concept involving his entire life with regard to fundamental choices and attitudes. This inner reflection, even if it does not result in an explicit and positive assertion of faith in God, cannot but be respected in the name of the dignity of each one’s conscience, whose hidden searching may not be judged by others. Thus, on the one hand, each individual has the right and duty to seek the truth, and, on the other hand, other persons as well as civil society have the corresponding duty to respect the free spiritual development of each person.

Indeed, in John Paul II’s estimation, religious liberty is foundational of all other liberties “insofar as it touches the innermost sphere of the spirit.” His unwavering commitment to religious liberty became especially noteworthy as he used the Church’s moral authority as a leading rallying point of efforts to liberate Soviet bloc countries.

All of this is not to suggest that the Church’s vision of religious liberty has simply melded into the vision embodied in mainstream secular liberalism. The Church has long understood religious liberty not just as an individual right, but is a bulwark against state interference with society’s religious institutions. And at the individual level, the Church stakes out positions requiring a more robust conception of religious liberty than many modern liberals will grant. For example, the Church expects authentic religious liberty to encompass parents’ choice of schooling options for their children. As stated in Dignitatis Humanae, the Church expects the government to “acknowledge the right of parents to make a genuinely free choice of schools and of other means of education, and the use of this freedom of choice is not to be made a reason for imposing unjust burdens on parents, whether directly or indirectly.” Religious liberty also cannot be equated, in the Church’s view, with privatized religion. On this front, the Vatican expressed its concern to the United Nations that “[t]he greater exercise of individual freedoms may result in greater intolerance and greater legal constraints on the public expressions of people’s beliefs,” and that “what is being challenged, in effect, is the right of religious communities to participate in public, democratic debate in the way that other social forces are allowed to do.”

On the core concept of religious liberty, however, civil libertarians have a stalwart ally in the Roman Catholic Church. Moreover, by grounding the case for liberty in the very nature of the human person, the Church’s approach may offer a more compelling, less transient justification than the necessarily contingent defense of liberty emerging from the majoritarian and pragmatic foundations used in modern liberal dialogue.

ROBERT K. VISCHER

References and Further Reading

- Bruce, Douglass, R., and David Hollenbach, eds. Catholicism and Liberalism: Contributions to American Public Philosophy. Cambridge: University Press, 1994.
- McGreevey, John T. Catholicism and American Freedom: A History. New York: W.W. Norton & Co., 2003.
- Murray, John Courtney. Religious Liberty: Catholic Struggles With Pluralism. Louisville: Westminster/John Knox Press, 1993.
- Steinfels, Margaret O'Brien, ed. American Catholics and Civil Engagement: A Distinctive Voice. New York: Rowan & Littlefield, 2004.

CATT, CARRIE CHAPMAN (1859–1947)

In 1859, Carrie Chapman Catt was born Carrie Clinton Lane in Wisconsin. She and her family soon moved to Iowa where she graduated with a bachelor's degree from Iowa State Agricultural College in 1880. During college, she enjoyed public speaking and after reading law for a year after college, she began teaching high school. She then became the school's principal and the superintendent of schools. In 1885, she wed Leo Chapman, the editor of the weekly Mason City Republican. She became coeditor of the paper and created a feature known as "Woman's World" to discuss women's rights issues. Due to political problems evolving from accusations made by Leo Chapman in the paper and an eventual lawsuit, the Chapmans sold the paper and left town. Leo looked for work in San Francisco while Carrie stayed with her parents. En route to see Leo, she received word that her husband had died of typhoid fever. Carrie remained in San Francisco for a year, where she worked as a reporter and began lecturing. She then returned to her hometown of Charles City, Iowa, to continue lecturing and working for local newspapers. She also joined the Woman's Christian Temperance Union at this time.

When she attended the Iowa Woman Suffrage Association convention in 1889, the association elected her state lecturer and organizer. At the national suffrage convention in 1890, the two leading woman suffrage organizations reunited as the NAWSA (National American Woman Suffrage Amendment) after a rupture two decades earlier, recognizing both methods of attaining woman suffrage—through state amendments and through a federal constitutional amendment. Also in 1890, Chapman married engineer George Catt. During her first election campaign as a budding feminist politician, Catt went to South Dakota in 1891 to help gain support for a referendum to enfranchise women, and the campaign went disastrously. The following year, the Catts moved to New York. She continued her speaking engagements and became head of the NAWSA's new business committee. Catt wrote detailed instructions on how to start and maintain suffrage clubs, and she significantly helped to both create new and revitalize local clubs. At the 1893 World's Columbian Exposition, Catt began thinking about working with women on an international level. In 1902, she founded the International Woman Suffrage Alliance (IWSA) nearly entirely on her own and despite substantial opposition from her very powerful mentor, Susan B. Anthony. Catt held the presidency of the NAWSA from 1900 to 1904, but resigned her office then due to her husband George's poor health.

Catt continued both her national and international work for women, but her own health was deteriorating. In 1911, in a trip around the world, she announced that the battle for justice must be for the women of the entire world. In 1915, she again became president of the NAWSA and remained its president through the successful passage of the Nineteenth Amendment—which gave women the right to vote—in 1920. Throughout this time period, Catt and the NAWSA supported gaining the vote by constitutional means, whether through individual states or through a federal amendment. States were necessary because they could use their representatives to press for a federal bill, and the federal amendment was essential since it might be nearly impossible to get every individual state to ensure women the franchise.

When the United States declared war on Germany in 1917, the NAWSA decided to stand by the government. Catt would be widely criticized for NAWSA's decision, with pacifists accusing her of selling out to war and antisuffragists criticizing her lack of wartime work. Yet Catt herself had opposed war throughout her life, and in 1915, along with Jane Addams, she helped found the Woman's Peace party. She considered peace to be the greatest objective of any reformer. Catt led a critical suffrage campaign in New York State through the New York Woman Suffrage party that she founded earlier in the decade. Along with New York, six other states passed woman suffrage in 1917. In May 1919, the House ratified the woman suffrage bill, and the Senate followed the following month. After being passed by three quarters of the states, the Nineteenth Amendment passed into law on August 26, 1920.

Once woman suffrage was gained, Catt shifted her emphasis to increasing women's political power. In 1925, Catt organized the first annual Conference on the Cause and Cure of War to promote international solutions to conflict. Throughout her life, Catt led women throughout the world in the quest for suffrage. She died at her home in New York in 1947.

MELISSA OOTEN

References and Further Reading

- Catt, Carrie Chapman, and Nettie Rogers Shuler. Woman Suffrage and Politics: The Inner Story of the Suffrage Movement. New York: Scribner's, 1926.
- Fowler, Robert. Carrie Catt: Feminist Politician. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1986.
- Peck, Mary. Carrie Chapman Catt: A Biography. New York: The HW Wilson Company, 1944.

See also Anthony, Susan B.

CENTRAL HUDSON GAS AND ELECTRIC CORP. v. PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION OF NEW YORK, 447 U.S. 557 (1980)

In 1973, when an oil embargo caused fuel shortages, the New York Public Service Commission issued a regulation prohibiting electric companies from advertising to promote electricity use. Central Hudson Gas & Electric, a public utility company, challenged the regulation, arguing that its advertisements were commercial speech protected by the First Amendment.

Before the 1970s, commercial speech was viewed as outside the scope of First Amendment protection. By the mid-1970s, however, the Supreme Court began recognizing some degree of protection for commercial speech, striking down advertising restrictions in Bigelow and Virginia State Board of Pharmacy.

In Central Hudson, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that the ban on advertisements for electricity violated the First Amendment. In doing so, the Court established a four-part test, balancing government and commercial-speech interests to determine when commercial-speech regulations infringe on free-speech rights. Under this "intermediate scrutiny" test, if the commercial speech is truthful and relates to lawful activity, the regulation must directly advance a substantial government interest and be no more extensive than necessary to serve that interest.

In Central Hudson, the Court held that although energy conservation represented a substantial government interest, and the restriction on advertising directly advanced that interest, the restriction was more extensive than necessary, as it banned even advertisements for products and services that use energy efficiently.

Since 1980, the Central Hudson test has endured as the standard governing regulation of commercial speech, despite being frequently criticized as too malleable, both by those favoring greater protection for commercial speech and by those favoring more government control over commercial speech. The most vocal critic of the Central Hudson test has been U.S. Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas, who would deem per se illegitimate any asserted government interest in withholding information from the public to manipulate their choices in the marketplace.

IRENE SEGAL AYERS

References and Further Reading

- Blasi, Vincent, The Pathological Perspective and the First Amendment, Columbia Law Review 449 (1985): 85:484–89.
- Hudson, David L., Jr., Justice Clarence Thomas: The Emergence of a Commercial-Speech Protector, Creighton Law Review 485 (2002): 35.
- Kozinski, Alex, and Stuart Banner, Who's Afraid of Commercial Speech? Virginia Law Review 627 (1990): 76.
- Post, Robert, The Constitutional Status of Commercial Speech, UCLA Law Review 1 (2000): 48.
- Smolla, Rodney A. Smolla and Nimmer on Freedom of Speech, vol. 2, 20:1–47, St. Paul, MN: West Group, 2003.
- Sullivan, Kathleen, Cheap Spirits, Cigarettes, and Free Speech: The Implications of 44 Liquormart, 1996, Supreme Court Review 123 (1996).

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Bigelow v. Virginia*, 421 U.S. 809 (1975)
- Virginia State Board of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, Inc.*, 425 U.S. 748 (1976)
- See also Balancing Approach to Free Speech; Balancing Test; Commercial Speech; First Amendment Balancing; 44 Liquormart v. Rhode Island, 517 U.S. 484 (1996); Freedom of Speech Extended to Corporations; Intermediate Scrutiny Test in Free Speech Cases; Thomas, Clarence; Virginia State Board of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, Inc., 425 U.S. 748 (1976)

CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE AGENCY

As a result of the need for intelligence on the Axis Powers during World War II, the Office of Strategic Services (OSS) was created. After the war, policy makers realized the need for foreign intelligence.

Consequently, in 1947 the National Security Act was passed by Congress, creating the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA). The CIA absorbed the duties of the OSS, additionally taking on the responsibility of coordinating, evaluating, and disseminating intelligence from other U.S. agencies and advising both the president and the National Security Council. The CIA was one of the primary agencies on the front lines of the Cold War, often operating clandestinely in enemy territory.

After the 2001 terrorist attacks, political pressure led to the restructuring of the Intelligence Community of the United States. The CIA, once the hub of the community, came under the umbrella of a community-wide Director of National Intelligence (DNI) on February 17, 2005. The CIA still retains the community's most sizable and well-funded Human Intelligence (HUMINT) function, housed within the Directorate of Operations (DO). The DO, often cited as the most controversial and publicized section of the CIA, is only one of four directorates. The Directorate of Intelligence (DI) analyzes and disseminates collected intelligence. The Directorate of Science and Technology assists with technological systems and devices, document creation, disguises, and other technical activities. Finally, the Directorate of Support (DS), formerly the Directorate of Administration, handles finances, logistical support, security and background investigation, and other administrative activities.

The CIA relies heavily on the expertise of undercover foreign operatives even though their use has been controversial even before the CIA was created. As far back as 1876, the Supreme Court heard a case regarding the use of such operatives by the president in which the Court upheld their use. The CIA has often been the subject of criticism and accusations of legal violations because all of their operations are based on secrecy. Even the exact budget of the CIA is kept secret. In a democracy based on openness, this lack of transparency makes some elements of society uncomfortable. Though it could be argued that the secret nature of the organization and its budget are, in fact, the result of democratic governance, wherein the majority of Americans democratically support the decision.

After the creation of the CIA, the agency faced some of its harshest criticism during the Watergate investigation. During this time, President Nixon was accused of attempting to use the CIA to halt an investigation being conducted by the Federal Bureau of Investigations (FBI), which eventually led to accusations of obstruction of justice against President Nixon.

In addition, the CIA has been accused of several violations of civil liberties in foreign countries regarding various assassination plots of foreign leaders. After the CIA failed to recognize the terrorist threat prior to September 11, 2001, the agency has been under a lot of pressure to aggressively locate and stop terrorist organizations. The CIA has been accused of hiding information regarding their knowledge and actions. Often, the CIA has been questioned about their use of torture as an interrogation method, although the CIA has consistently denied that it engages in such violations of law and human rights.

CAROL WALKER

References and Further Reading

- Andrew, Christopher. For the President's Eyes Only. New York: Harper Collins, 1996.
- Breckinridge, Scott D. The CIA and the U.S. Intelligence System. Boulder: Westview Press, 1986.
- Farren, Mick. CIA: Secrets of The Company. Barnes & Noble Books: New York, 2003.
- Kessler, Ronald. The CIA at War: Inside the Secret Campaign Against Terror, 1st ed. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2003.
- Olmsted, Kathryn S. Challenging the Secret Government: The Post-Watergate Investigations of the CIA and the FBI. Chapel Hill, NC: University of North Carolina Press, 1996.
- Shulsky, Abram, and Gary Schmitt. Silent Warfare: Understanding the World of Intelligence. Washington DC: Brassey's Inc., 2002.

CEREMONIAL DEISM

One of the difficult church-state issues is determining when the use of religious language by the government violates the Establishment Clause. During the past quarter century, a few Supreme Court justices have defined certain types of government religious speech as "ceremonial deism"—speech that though religious in nature has a secular purpose and hence is constitutional.

The phrase originates with Eugene Rostow, then Dean of the Yale Law School, who explained in his 1962 Meiklejohn Lecture at Brown University that certain types of religious speech, which he called "ceremonial deism," were "so conventional and uncontroversial as to be constitutional." Although Rostow's speech was unpublished, Harvard law professor Arthur Sutherland discussed Rostow's use of ceremonial deism in an essay in the Indiana Law Journal in 1964, which helped to give the concept prominence among jurists and legal scholars.

Twenty years later, in 1984, Justice William Brennan became the first U.S. Supreme Court justice to invoke the phrase ceremonial deism to explain aspects of the Court's Establishment Clause jurisprudence. In his dissenting opinion in Lynch v. Donnelly (1984), a case in which the Court considered the constitutionality of a government-supported holiday display that contained religious symbols, Justice Brennan explained that certain types of government religious speech "serve such wholly secular purposes as solemnizing public occasions, or inspiring commitment to meet some national challenge in a manner that simply could not be fully served in our culture if government were limited to purely nonreligious phrases." For Brennan, religious speech such as "the designation of 'in God We Trust' as our national motto, or the references to God contained in the Pledge of Allegiance to the flag can best be understood, in Dean Rostow's apt phrase, as a form of 'ceremonial deism,' protected from Establishment Clause scrutiny chiefly because they have lost through rote repetition any significant religious content." For Justice Brennan, these religious expressions have "an essentially secular meaning."

Five years later, in County of Allegheny v. ACLU (1989), another case dealing with the constitutionality of religious symbols in holiday displays, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor also used the phrase ceremonial deism to explain why certain religious speech by government actors does not violate the Establishment Clause: "Practices such as legislative prayer or opening Court sessions with 'God save the United States and this honorable Court' serve the secular purposes of 'solemnizing public occasions' and 'expressing confidence in the future.'" For Justice O'Connor, it was not enough that these forms of religious speech enjoyed long historical practice. Rather, what was crucial was that this use of religious language had a secular purpose, as opposed to a purpose of promoting religion. In that same case, Justice Harry Blackmun also relied on the concept of ceremonial deism for his conclusion that certain forms of governmental religious speech are "not understood as conveying government approval of particular religious beliefs."

More recently, in Elk Grove Unified School District v. Newdow (2004), Justice O'Connor again invoked the concept of ceremonial deism when addressing in a concurring opinion the constitutionality of the phrase "under God" in the Pledge of Allegiance recited in public schools. Justice O'Connor described as ceremonial deism that government religious speech about which there is "a shared understanding of its legitimate nonreligious purposes." For O'Connor, four factors were relevant to an assessment of whether religious speech has the requisite "nonreligious purpose" to render it a constitutional expression of ceremonial deism: (1) whether the speech has "been in place for a significant portion of the Nation's history" and has been "observed by enough persons that it can fairly be called ubiquitous"; (2) whether the speech does not constitute "worship or prayer"; (3) whether there is an absence of reference to a particular religion; and (4) whether the speech contains "minimal reference" to religion at all. For Justice O'Connor, the "under God" language in the Pledge of Allegiance satisfied all four factors and hence was constitutional ceremonial deism.

No other justice joined Justice O'Connor's opinion in the Newdow case, and no other sitting justice has authored an opinion using the phrase ceremonial deism, but even for those justices who do not expressly rely on the concept of ceremonial deism as part of their Establishment Clause jurisprudence, all of the justices agree that the question whether government speech has a religious or secular purpose is highly relevant to an assessment of the constitutionality of that speech. Many lower courts have used, and continue to use, the concept of ceremonial deism in determining whether government religious speech offends the Establishment Clause.

DAVISON M. DOUGLAS

References and Further Reading

- Epstein, Steven B., Rethinking the Constitutionality of Ceremonial Deism, Columbia Law Review 96 (1996): 2083–2174.
- Sutherland, Arthur, Book Review (Religion and American Constitutions, by Wilber G. Katz), Indiana Law Journal 40 (1964): 83–87.
- Warren, Charles Gregory, No Need to Stand on Ceremony: The Corruptive Influence of Ceremonial Deism and the Need for a Separationist Reconfiguration of the Supreme Court's Establishment Clause Jurisprudence, Mercer Law Review 54 (2003): 1669–1718.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- County of Allegheny v. ACLU*, 492 U.S. 573 (1989)
- Elk Grove Unified School District v. Newdow*, 542 U.S. 1 (2004)
- Lynch v. Donnelly*, 465 U.S. 668 (1984)

See also Establishment Clause (I): History, Background, Framing; National Motto "In God We Trust"; O'Connor, Sandra Day; Pledge of Allegiance ("Under God")

CHAE CHAN PING v. U.S., 130 U.S. 581 (1889) AND CHINESE EXCLUSION ACT

Chinese first emigrated to the United States in large numbers in 1849, when they joined thousands of Americans and other foreign fortune-seekers in the “gold rush” to the American West. By 1852, there were approximately 25,000 Chinese in California. With the federal government’s blessing, more entered in the 1860s, when they provided cheap labor to complete the nation’s railroad system. By the time of the 1880 census, 105,465 Chinese were counted in the United States. Concentrated in the West, Chinese made up 8.7 percent of California’s population.

As the numbers of Chinese grew and labor needs subsided, the California legislature repeatedly tried to regulate their activities, as did some other Western states. Under California law, Chinese were subject to entry taxes and discriminatory regulation of their businesses, they were not allowed to vote or testify in court, and their children were prohibited from attending school with white children. Most of these state and local statutes were declared invalid by federal courts.

But beginning in the 1870s, California’s demand for restrictive legislation began to have a national impact. In an unprecedented series of laws in 1882, 1884, 1888, 1892, 1902, and 1904, Congress enacted the “Chinese exclusion laws,” designed to regulate, deter, and ultimately prevent, further Chinese immigration to the United States. The 1882 legislation imposed a ten-year suspension on immigration by Chinese laborers and restricted the ability of Chinese residing in the United States to re-enter after a trip abroad. These restrictions were refined and expanded in subsequent enactments. They quickly had the desired effect; in 1887, Chinese immigration fell to a low of ten admitted Chinese immigrants. However, these laws were not without controversy. With the case of Chae Chan Ping v. United States, the Chinese exclusion laws became the first federal immigration laws to be subject to judicial scrutiny.

Chae Chan Ping was a Chinese laborer who entered the United States in 1875. He lived in San Francisco for twelve years until 1887, when he left to visit relatives in China. Before departing, he obtained the “certificate of identity” required by the 1882 and 1884 acts that would permit him to re-enter the United States after his trip.

While Chae Chan Ping was in China, Congress enacted the 1888 Chinese exclusion law, called the Scott Act. Under the act, Congress suspended issuance of identity certificates, and specifically stated that no Chinese who had left the country would be permitted to re-enter, even if they held certificates that had been validly issued before the 1888 Act. Chae Chan Ping was stranded. He attempted to return to the United States less than a week after the 1888 Act came into effect, but he was denied readmission. He sued, claiming that the 1888 Act violated the Constitution and conflicted with treaties between the United States and China that provided for admission of Chinese laborers.

A unanimous Supreme Court upheld the 1888 Act. The Court treated the legislation with extreme deference, invoking the U. S. government’s inherent power to control its borders. According to the Court, despite Chae Chan Ping’s long-time residence in the United States, his government-issued identity certificate was revocable at any time. Furthermore, the Court opined, if China was concerned about United States’ compliance with treaty obligations, it could raise this directly with the political branches. Treaty enforcement was not an issue for judges.

After this decision, Congress further expanded Chinese exclusion laws with the Geary Act in 1892. The 1892 legislation extended suspension of immigration of Chinese laborers for another ten years. It also required that all Chinese laborers living in the United States obtain a certificate of residence from the commission of internal revenue. The certificate would be issued only with the support of an affidavit from a witness (presumably white) who attested to the alien’s residence. Without a certificate, the alien would be subject to deportation. Although this statute was challenged on numerous constitutional grounds, it was upheld by the Supreme Court in 1893 in the case of Fong Yue Ting v. United States (1893). In 1902, Congress extended the suspension of Chinese immigration once again, this time with no termination date. And in 1904, in the Chinese Exclusion Extension Act, the exclusion provisions were made permanent and extended to citizens of the Philippines.

The Chinese exclusion laws and the cases challenging them have had a lasting impact on immigration law and on the experiences of Chinese in the United States. First, the Chinese exclusion cases established the principle of extreme judicial deference to congressional and executive authority over immigration—a principle that, while often challenged, has never been explicitly revoked. Second, the Chinese exclusion laws set the stage for later race- and ethnicity-based immigration restrictions—for example, the exclusion of Japanese and Koreans in the early 1900s—and even the Japanese internments of the 1940s. With the Chinese exclusion laws, the federal government began regulating who could be an “American,” with a significant impact on nonwhite residents and citizens. Third, the implementation of the Chinese exclusion acts served as a model for the identity inspections and documentation requirements that continue to proliferate at the U. S. border. Finally, the Chinese exclusion laws had a significant impact on Chinese families, forcing long (and often permanent) separations. Indeed, the exclusion of Chinese remained part of U. S.

immigration policy until 1943 when, in an act of World War II diplomacy, the laws were repealed by the Magnuson Act and replaced with a strict entry quota for Chinese. Combined with earlier policies such as the Page Act that favored the migration of male laborers, these laws cast a long shadow on the experiences of Chinese Americans.

MARTHA F. DAVIS

References and Further Reading

- Chin, Gabriel J. "Chae Chan Ping and Fong Yue Ting: The Origins of Plenary Power." Immigration Stories 7, David A. Martin and Peter H. Schuck eds, Foundation Press, 2005.
- Gyory, Andrew. Closing the Gate: Race, Politics and the Chinese Exclusion Act, Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1998.
- Hing, Bill Ong. Making and Remaking Asian America Through Immigration Policy, 1850–1990. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 1993.
- Lee, Erika. At America's Gates: Chinese Immigration During the Exclusion Era, 1882–1943. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2003.
- McLain, Charles, Jr. In Search of Equality: The Chinese Struggle against Discrimination in Nineteenth Century America, Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1994.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Chinese Exclusion Act, Act of May 6, 1882, c. 126, 22 Stat. 58
- Chinese Exclusion Act, Act of July 5, 1884, c. 220, 23 Stat. 117
- Chinese Exclusion Act, Act of April 29, 1902, c. 641, 32 Stat. 176
- Chinese Exclusion Extension Act, April 27, 1904, c. 1630, 33 Stat. 394
- Fong Yue Ting v. United States*, 149 U.S. 698 (1893)
- Geary Act, Act of May 5, 1892, c. 60, 27 Stat. 25
- Magnuson Act (Chinese Exclusion Repeal Act), Act of Dec. 17, 1943, c. 344, 57 Stat. 600
- Page Act, Act of March 3, 1875, c. 141, 18 Stat. 477
- Scott (Chinese Exclusion) Act, Act of October 1, 1888, c. 1064, 25 Stat. 504

See also Due Process in Immigration; Noncitizens Civil Liberties; Race and Immigration; Sex and Immigration

CHAFEE, ZECHARIAH, JR. (1885–1957)

Zechariah Chafee Jr., attorney, professor, legal scholar and well-known champion of civil liberties, was born on December 7, 1885, in Providence, Rhode Island. The son of Zechariah Chafee, Brown University Trustee and president of Builders Iron Foundry, Chafee Jr. attended Brown for his undergraduate degree. Chafee was an excellent student, graduating Phi Beta Kappa in 1907. After graduation, Chafee worked at his father's business for several years. In 1910, after finding the work unsatisfying, Chafee entered Harvard Law School, receiving his law degree in 1913. On graduation, Chafee moved back to Providence to begin his legal career at Tillinghast and Collins. In 1916, Chafee returned to Harvard Law School to take a position as a professor. He would remain at Harvard until his retirement in July 1956. Less than a year after his retirement, Chafee died in Boston, Massachusetts, on February 8, 1957.

Chafee's law school interest in civil liberties crystallized into a focus on the First Amendment as a law professor. Chafee deeply opposed the treatment of anti-war protesters during World War I under the Espionage Act of 1917 and the Sedition Act of 1918, which made it a crime to interfere with the operation of the U.S. military, as well as to speak out against the government or the Constitution. Chafee criticized the statutes as being unconstitutional and laid out his philosophy in a 1919 Harvard Law Review article entitled "Freedom of Speech in Wartime." The article was criticized by a group of Harvard alums that accused Chafee of being a radical and unfit for teaching. They attempted to have Chafee removed from that law school faculty. Although Chafee survived dismissal by a slim one-vote margin, he did not temper his advocacy for the freedom of speech and press. A year later, Chafee published Freedom of Speech, which expanded on the views he expressed in the law review article by criticizing current notions of free speech while emphasizing his belief that certain forms of free speech were absolutely essential to a healthy democracy. Freedom of Speech would go on to influence First Amendment law for a generation. In 1941, on the eve of the United States' entry into World War II, Chafee republished an updated and revised version of his 1920 book under the new title Free Speech in the United States.

In addition to his personal writings, Chafee was an active member in the civil libertarian community. He defended the freedom of speech and civil liberties every chance he could get. In 1920, Chafee, along with future Supreme Court Justice Felix Frankfurter and other prominent attorneys published To the American People: A Report upon the Illegal Practices of the United States Department of Justice, which criticized the Justice Department's frequent violations of the Constitution during the Palmer Raids. Chafee also helped to prepare the 1931 Report on the Lawlessness in Law Enforcement for the Wickersham Commission, which looked into police misconduct in the administration of justice. Most importantly, however, Chafee had access to or influence on some of the most prominent jurists of the nation including Supreme Court Justices Louis Brandeis, William Cardozo, Hugo Black, and William O. Douglas. Chafee is widely credited with changing Justice Oliver Wendall Holmes' conception of free speech after his opinion in Schenck v. United States.

Chafee was not without his critics. In the 1950s during the House Committee on Un-American Activities' (HUAC) investigations of communist plots against the nation, his opponents often described him as a weak-minded liberal who actively aided communists at home and abroad. Moreover, Chafee's legal philosophy has been and continues to be criticized as inaccurate and placing too heavy an emphasis on the World War I Espionage and Sedition Act cases as the beginning of serious judicial consideration of free speech in America.

While Chafee was a noted authority in many areas of law including evidence, copyright law, and civil procedure, for which he drafted the Federal Interpleader Act of 1936, he is best known for his First Amendment analysis. Indeed, Chafee is frequently regarded as the individual most responsible for the modern constitutional interpretation of the freedom of speech.

Chafee's First Amendment theory was based on the idea that free speech served an essential role in a democracy. He believed that the Framers' purpose in passing the First Amendment was to abolish the law of seditious libel, or the defiant criticism of the government, that was commonly used in England. In addition, Chafee believed that the First Amendment not only protected the press from censorship but also allowed the press the ability to have unhindered discussion of public affairs.

Chafee argued that one of the most fundamental responsibilities of a democratic government is to investigate and spread truths that are of universal concern to the population at large. Accordingly, the best means to discover the truth or to learn what problems exist and therefore how to attempt change was to have open and unlimited debate. Chafee thought restrictions on free speech would cause greater damage to a society than any harm that might come as the result of open discussion. Contrary to many of his contemporaries, Chafee believed that open and unlimited discussion was most important during wartime, because it was during war when people are under the most pressure to conform to the majority. During wartime, society had the greatest need to learn both sides of the argument to determine the truth. Under Chafee's analysis, wartime restrictions on speech served only to produce empty, one-sided talk that was useless in determining the truth.

Chafee placed an equally important role for the protection of free speech on the average citizen. He argued that if the community itself didn't stand up for open speech, then laws protecting freedom of speech would be ineffective. Chafee believed that community customs against free speech had as destructive an effect on free speech as a restriction by statute.

Chafee believed that two forms of expression existed: expressions of individual interest, where people express themselves on matters that are important to them personally, and expressions of social interest, where people express words that convey ideas that are concerned with essential or socially valuable principles. Chafee wrote that since expressions of social interest focus on the search for truths that will help keep order in society and safeguard morality, they were more important than expressions of individual interest. As a consequence, Chafee argued that expressions of social interest must be afforded the greatest protection from censorship and should only be restricted when it is absolutely certain to incite or cause harm to public safety.

Chafee, however, did not believe that the Framers intended there to be an absolute right to freedom of speech under every circumstance. He thought that obscene, profane, indecent, and defamatory speech should not be protected. Chafee argued that these forms of speech were more like acts than words. Moreover, he said that since they offered little if any chance for a counter-argument, they could not convey any socially valuable ideas. Under Chafee's analysis, because of their ability to inflict immediate injury on the listener, incite unlawful acts, or disturb the important societal interests in peace of mind, order, and the training of the young, their expression could be censored, restricted, or punished. For Chafee, however, the scope of what was included in obscene, profane, indecent, and defamatory speech needed to be narrow to protect against the inclusion of unpopular ideas as expressions that cause or incite harm or injury.

Chafee also believed that the freedom of speech, or more specifically, the freedom of debate extended to members of Congress. Indeed, he believed that the right of members to be free to debate was so important to the Framers that they included it in the Constitution under Article 1, Section 6, rather than in the Bill of Rights. He held that there was an intimate connection between the freedom to debate in Congress and the freedom of speech of the private citizen, because the basis for limiting freedom of debate in government was similar to that used to limit freedom of speech in society at large. For Chafee, just as the freedom of speech in society helped in the attainment of truth, freedom of debate in Congress helped to bring about the most efficient management of the government affairs.

Similar to his theories on freedom of speech, Chafee also believed that freedom of debate was not unlimited. He believed that the freedom to debate extended only to what members did as part of the business of Congress. All debate outside of these parameters was open to punishment. The Constitution, however, made clear that only fellow members of Congress had the ability to punish abuses of the freedom of debate. Accordingly, Chafee believed that members had a positive duty to police themselves and ensure that the freedom of debate did not result in slanderous speech against private citizens or interests.

Chafee's arguments for the right of all people to speak their mind without fear of punishment continues to play an important role in American society.

MARCEL GREEN

References and Further Reading

- Chafee, Zechariah Jr., Freedom of Speech in Wartime, Harvard Law Review 32, (1919): 932.
 ———. Free Speech in the United States. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1948.
 Smith, Donald L. Zechariah Chafee, Jr., Defender of Liberty and Law. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1984.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919)

CHAIN GANGS

In the late 1860s, state legislatures authorized judges to sentence offenders to work on chain gangs. Traditionally, these gangs would spend ten to twelve hours a day breaking rocks with sledgehammers while they were bound together at the ankles with heavy chains and shackles. Members of the chain gang were allowed to change their clothes only once a week. They slept chained together and remained chained at all times even when defecating in a bucket—their only toilet.

Prison guards constantly threatened and physically abused chain gang members. Special forms of torture were also used to control the chain gangs. For example, the sweat-box treatment involved locking a prisoner into a wooden box that was too short to stand in but not deep enough to sit in. The prisoner would remain in the box for days while temperatures within the box exceeded 100 degrees.

Because the majority of chain gang members were African-American men, many citizens opposed the existence of chain gangs on the basis of racial discrimination. The brutal and inhumane treatment of chain gang members was also criticized. In addition, organized labor opposed chain gangs because they constituted a form of “slave” labor. As a result of this opposition, chain gangs were eventually eliminated from the United States’ landscape sometime around the 1930s.

In 1995, however, chain gangs reappeared in several states including Alabama, Arizona, Florida, Iowa, Kentucky, Oklahoma, Mississippi, Nevada, Tennessee, and Wisconsin. At least five of these states have enacted statutes that require inmates to spend a portion of their sentence working on chain gangs. In the other states, chain gangs participation is permitted but not required.

As a result of the new laws, several inmates have filed lawsuits challenging the use of chain gangs as cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment. In Austin v. James, a lawsuit filed by the Southern Poverty Law Center (SPLC), the state of Alabama agreed in a settlement to stop chaining inmates together.

The SPLC was also able to secure a finding by the Federal Court that the practice of handcuffing chain gang members to a metal rail (the “hitching post”) in the Alabama heat for several hours without water or bathroom breaks was a violation of the Eighth Amendment of the United States Constitution.

Other groups, such as Amnesty International, believe that chain gangs violate international laws such as Article 7 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and Article 33 of the United Nations Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners.

JUDITH A. M. SCULLY

References and Further Reading

- Oshinsky, David. Worse than Slavery: Parchman Farm and the Ordeal of Jim Crow Justice. Free Press Paperbacks, 1996.
 Southern Poverty Law Center—Austin v. James (Case Number 95 CV 637, U.S.D.C. Alabama 1995) available at <http://www.splcenter.org/legal/landmark/prison.jsp>.

CHAMBERS v. FLORIDA, 309 U.S. 227 (1940)

Torturing a man to confess a crime is an ancient evil. Subtler pressures can also break a man. Under the Fifth Amendment, Bram v. United States, and the Fourteenth Amendment, the Constitution outlaws the use of mental pressure or physical force to get a confession. “And they who have suffered most from secret and dictatorial proceedings have almost always been the poor, the ignorant, the numerically weak, the friendless, and the powerless.” Justice Black’s steel prose in Chambers v. Florida was extolled by Justice Frankfurter as “One of the enduring utterances in the history of the Supreme Court and in the annals of human freedom.”

The petitioners were four “ignorant young colored tenant farmers” arrested without a warrant on suspicion of having robbed and murdered an elderly white man. The community was outraged. The sheriff rounded up a group of blacks, locked them in jail, and subjected them to relentless questioning for a week on the fourth floor of the county jail. One was told “if I didn’t come across I would never see the sun rise.” After a concluding all-night session, Chambers and the other petitioners gave their “sunrise confessions.”

Justice Black reversed the Florida Supreme Court and petitioners’ death sentences. Chambers is half way between Hughes’s due process condemnation of coerced confessions in Brown v. Mississippi (1936) and Black’s later dissent in Adamson v. California (1947). Thus in Chambers Black speaks of “fundamental standards of procedure in criminal trials” and one of those fundamentals, according to Hugo Black, is the Fifth Amendment’s prohibition against self-incrimination. At the time of Chambers, the Supreme Court had not yet come around to Justice Black’s view; Twining v. New Jersey (1908) stood in the way. The “current of opinion” mentioned in a careful footnote in Chambers “—that the Fourteenth Amendment was intended to make secure against state invasion all the rights, privileges and immunities protected from federal invasion by the Bill of Rights”—was Hugo Black’s own.

Justice Black did something unprecedented in 1968, appearing on national television. With great emotion, Justice Black read from the closing part of his opinion in Chambers v. Florida:

Under our constitutional system, courts stand against any winds that blow as havens of refuge for those who might otherwise suffer because they are helpless, weak, outnumbered, or because they are non-conforming victims of prejudice and public excitement. Due process of law, preserved for all by our Constitution, commands that no such practice as that disclosed by this record shall send any accused to his death. No higher duty, no more solemn responsibility rests upon this Court, than that of translating into living law and maintaining this constitutional shield deliberately planned and inscribed for the benefit of every human being subject to our Constitution—of whatever race, creed or persuasion.

“And I think if it’s enforced that way, this can be and is bound to be the best Constitution in the world.”

PAUL R. BAIER

References and Further Reading

- Baier, Paul R. “Introduction to Hugo Black: A Memorial Portrait.” Yearbook Supreme Court Historical Society (1982): 72–73.
- Ball, Howard. Hugo L. Black: Cold Steel Warrior. New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1996.
- Black, Elizabeth S. “Hugo Black: A Memorial Portrait.” Yearbook Supreme Court Historical Society (1982): 73–94.
- Black, Hugo L., and Elizabeth Black. Mr. Justice and Mrs. Black. New York: Random House, 1986.
- Frank, John P. Mr. Justice Black: The Man and His Opinions. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1949.
- “Justice Black and the Bill of Rights,” Interview by Eric Sevarid and Martin Agronsky, CBS News Special, December 3, 1968 (Burton Benjamin producer), transcript published in Southwestern University Law Review 9, no. 4 (1977): 937–951.
- Newman, Roger K. Hugo Black: A Biography. New York: Pantheon, 1994; Second Edition, New York, Fordham University Press, 1997.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Adamson v. California*, 332 U.S. 46 (1947)
- Brown v. Mississippi*, 297 U.S. 278 (1936)
- Bram v. United States*, 168 U.S. 532 (1897)
- Malloy v. Hogan*, 378 U.S. 1 (1964)
- Twining v. New Jersey*, 211 U.S. 78 (1908)

See also Bill of Rights: Structure; Brown v. Mississippi, 279 U.S. 278 (1936); Coerced Confessions/Police Interrogation; Due Process; Fourteenth Amendment; Frankfurter, Felix; Hughes Court; Hughes, Charles Evans; Ku Klux Klan; Lincoln, Abraham; Self-incrimination (V): Historical Background; Self-incrimination: Miranda and Evolution

CHAMBERS v. MISSISSIPPI, 410 U.S. 284 (1973)

Unreasonable application of evidentiary principles against a criminal defendant may violate the U.S. Constitution on any number of grounds, including the Compulsory Process, Due Process, or Confrontation Clauses. Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284 (1973), stands for the proposition that the Due Process right to a fair trial is implicated when evidentiary rules deprive a criminal defendant of the right to present evidence critical to his defense.

Chambers involved the shooting of a police officer during a fracas in a Mississippi pool hall. While some evidence pointed to Leon Chambers as the perpetrator, another man—Gable McDonald—later confessed to the crime. McDonald, however, recanted one month after his confession. Unable to inquire fully into the nature of McDonald’s confession and recantation on cross-examination at trial due to state evidence rules, Chambers' defense team sought to introduce the testimony of three witnesses to whom McDonald had admitted participation in the shooting. Nevertheless, McDonald's statements to these witnesses were deemed inadmissible hearsay under state law, and Chambers was convicted of murder. In an 8–1 decision, the U. S. Supreme Court reversed Chambers' conviction, finding that state law prevented him from developing his defense and thereby interfered with his Due Process rights.

Although the Supreme Court opinion was crafted narrowly and linked to the facts of the case, Chambers has subsequently taken on significance as a landmark case for criminal defendants: a bulwark safeguarding a defendant's right to present exculpatory evidence in his own defense.

DANIEL S. MEDWED

References and Further Reading

- Fisher, George. Evidence (2002): 580–586.
 Hoeffel, Janet C., The Sixth Amendment's Lost Clause: Unearthing Compulsory Process, Wis. L. Rev. (2002): 1275.
 Nagareda, Richard A., Reconceiving the Right to Present Witnesses, 97 Mich. L. Rev. 1999: 1063.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- In re Oliver*, 333 U.S. 257 (1948)
Webb v. Texas, 409 U.S. 95 (1972)
Washington v. Texas, 388 U.S. 14 (1967)

See also Confrontation and Compulsory Process; Defense, Right to Present; Due Process

CHAMBERS, WHITTAKER (1901–1961)

Whittaker Chambers, born Jay Vivian Chambers in Brooklyn, New York, in 1901, was a central figure in one of the most sensational of the post-1945 Red Scare investigations conducted by the House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC). Educated at Columbia University in the 1920s and active in college literary and intellectual activities, Chambers became enamored with bolshevism, joining the U.S. Communist Party in 1925. An active member in Communist literary circles, he was recruited for the Communist underground in 1932 where he functioned as a courier, smuggling U.S. government documents to the Soviets. He became disillusioned with communism, however, and broke with the party in the late 1930s.

During his subsequent tenure as an editor for Time, Chambers became a more strident anticommunist. He was called before HUAC in 1948 during the Committee's very public investigation into the problem of communists in government. In his testimony, he identified former Communist colleagues, including a bright, well-respected diplomat and civil servant named Alger Hiss, who had traveled at high levels of the Franklin Roosevelt administration. The hearings became a well-publicized standoff between Chambers and Hiss, because Hiss emphatically maintained he had never been a member of the Communist Party. Ultimately, Chambers expanded his allegations to include an accusation that Hiss had also been involved in espionage for the Soviets. Amidst a series of charges and countercharges, as well as a well-publicized face-to-face confrontation with Hiss, Chambers summoned the Committee to his Maryland farm where he very dramatically extracted reels of microfilm from a hollowed out pumpkin, claiming these were classified documents reproduced on Hiss's personal typewriter. Although Hiss continued to maintain his innocence, a subsequent FBI investigation of the documents seemed to validate Chambers's charges. Hiss was ultimately convicted of perjury in 1951. The hearings, however, the first ever televised, contributed greatly to the public fear of the danger of domestic communism and its ability to penetrate American institutions.

Hiss continued to assert his innocence even until his death in 1996. Chambers's allegations, however, have received support in recent years as disclosures in the VENONA transcripts of messages sent by Soviet agents in the United States to Moscow during the early 1940s seem to identify Alger Hiss as a Soviet spy.

KAREN BRUNER

References and Further Reading

- Haynes, John Earl, and Harvey Klehr. VENONA: Decoding Soviet Espionage in America. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1999.
 Swan, Patrick A., ed. Alger Hiss, Whittaker Chambers, and the Schism in the American Soul. Wilmington, DE: Intercollegiate Studies Institute, 2003.
 Tanenhaus, Sam. Whittaker Chambers. New York: Random House, 1997.
 Weinstein, Allen. Perjury: The Hiss-Chambers Case. New York: Knopf, 1978.

See also Hiss, Alger; House Un-American Activities Committee

CHANDLER v. FLORIDA, 449 U.S. 560 (1981)

The Supreme Court ruled in Chandler v. Florida that the Constitution did not require an absolute ban on cameras in the courtroom, marking a significant change in its thinking on the issue. In 1965 in Estes v. Texas, the Court overturned a defendant's conviction based on its finding that the presence of television cameras had violated his right to a fair trial. Television technology was still fairly primitive at the time, however, and the Estes Court acknowledged that technological improvements that would make cameras more unobtrusive would require a reexamination of the issue. By the time of Chandler, many states had experimented with cameras in the courtroom, and at least ten states allowed them without the consent of the defendant. Florida was one of those states, and in 1981, the Supreme Court reexamined the camera issue when it heard the appeal of two Miami policemen convicted of burglary who claimed that the presence of cameras over their objections had denied them a fair trial. The Supreme Court unanimously disagreed, holding that the presence of television cameras does not inherently violate a criminal defendant's Sixth Amendment rights. While individual defendants retained the ability to show that the presence of cameras had prejudiced their fair trial rights in a specific case, the Court said, an absolute ban on cameras was not justified, given improvements in broadcasting technology. After Chandler, restrictions on cameras were eased in most states and today, all fifty states allow still or video camera coverage for some court proceedings.

KATHLEEN K. OLSON

References and Further Reading

- Barber, Susanna. News Cameras in the Courtroom: A Free Press-Fair Trial Debate. Norwood, NJ: Ablex Publishing, 1987.
- Cohn, Marjorie, and David Dow. Cameras in the Courtroom: Television and the Pursuit of Justice. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield, 2002.
- Radio-Television News Directors Association & Foundation. "Cameras in the Court: A State-by-State Guide," <http://www.rtndf.org/foi/sec.shtml>.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Estes v. Texas, 381 U.S. 532 (1965)

See also Cameras in the Courtroom; First Amendment and PACs

CHANDLER v. MILLER, 520 U.S. 305 (1997) (CANDIDATES)

In 1990, the Georgia legislature passed a law requiring that each candidate for state office certify that he or she had tested negative for illegal drugs. The statute limited qualification to those who had passed a urinalysis test administered by a state-approved laboratory. The tests sought to identify use of marijuana, cocaine, opiates, amphetamines, and phencyclidines. The statute covered such posts as the governor, the school superintendent, and justices of the state supreme court. Some candidates, including Walker L. Chandler, the Libertarian nominee for Lieutenant Governor, sued the state, arguing that the mandatory drug testing violated the Fourth Amendment.

When the case reached the U. S. Supreme Court, it raised the question of whether the Fourth Amendment allowed states to compel drug tests of candidates absent any showing of individualized suspicion. The Court recognized that the Fourth Amendment, in protecting "the right of the people to be secure in their persons . . . against unreasonable searches and seizures," usually required that searches of a citizen's own body only be permitted when the government had some level of information, such as probable cause, to believe it would find something illegal. The Court had crafted an exception to this general rule to apply only under certain limited circumstances, called "special needs." In these special needs cases, the government pursued information not for criminal prosecution, but for narrow goals beyond those of law enforcement. The Court had previously accepted drug testing as meeting a special need for only certain groups of people, such as student athletes (to protect the educational environment of schools), customs agents (to protect the security of the nation's borders), and railroad employees (to ensure the safety of trains).

To decide whether drug testing of candidates fell within special needs, the Court balanced the competing interests of the public and the individual. In this analysis, special needs were found when the privacy interest implicated by the government search was "minimal" whereas the government interest in the search was "substantial—important enough to override the individual's acknowledged privacy interest." In assessing the citizen's side of the scales, the Chandler Court deemed Georgia's testing method to be "relatively noninvasive." The Court, however, was troubled when it focused on the government's side of the equation. Since the state tests could be foiled by abstention before the testing date, Georgia's scheme would be ineffective in identifying illicit drug users. The only purpose remaining in testing candidates was to display the government "commitment to the struggle against drug abuse." Such a "symbolic" need was not enough to be "special," for "diminishing personal privacy for a symbol's sake" did not pass Fourth Amendment muster. The Court therefore held that Georgia's mandatory drug testing of candidates did not "fit within the closely guarded category of constitutionally permissible suspicionless searches."

The long-term impact of Chandler remains uncertain. Five years after Chandler, the Court reaffirmed drug testing as within special needs in Board of Education v. Earls, 536 U.S. 822 (2002). In Earls, the Court upheld urinalysis of students participating in extracurricular activities. The language of the Earls decision left in doubt whether Chandler represented a curtailment of the entire special needs doctrine or merely a refinement in the context of candidates for public office.

GEORGE M. DERY, III

References and Further Reading

Dery III, George M., Are Politicians More Deserving of Privacy than Schoolchildren? How Chandler v. Miller Exposed the Absurdities of Fourth Amendment "Special Needs" Balancing, Ariz. L. Rev. 40 (1998): 73.
United States Constitution, Amendment IV.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Board of Education v. Earls, 536 U.S. 822 (2002)
Chandler v. Miller, 520 U.S. 305 (1997)

CHAPLAINS: LEGISLATIVE

The practice of using a chaplain to offer a prayer at the beginning of each legislative session dates back to the first session of the first congress. Since then, state legislatures, the U. S. Congress, and the U. S. Supreme Court have opened sessions with prayers. Some have questioned, however, whether this tradition represents an unlawful entanglement of church and state, violating the Establishment Clause of the Constitution.

The Supreme Court addressed the constitutionality of legislative chaplains in 1983 with Marsh v. Chambers, 463 U.S. 783 (1983). Ernest Chambers, a member of the Nebraska legislature, challenged that legislature's practice of opening sessions with a prayer. Chief Justice Burger, writing the opinion for the 6-3 majority, looked at the history of legislative chaplains. He noted that the Continental Congress, whose membership included many framers of the Constitution, used legislative chaplains. Therefore, the Court concluded, the framers themselves did not view legislative chaplains as unconstitutional. Burger went on to say that the use of legislative chaplains is a "tolerable acknowledgement" of the role of religion in the United States and the beliefs held by many of its citizens. He claimed that the Establishment Clause is not necessarily violated when the actions of the government coincide with religious ends, and that the fact that legislatures have long used without a negative consequence shows that the practice is harmless.

Justice Brennan's lengthy dissent outlined some of the arguments against the constitutionality of legislative chaplains. He first noted that the majority failed to subject the issue to any legal tests.

One issue that the majority did not address was whether the use of legislative chaplains failed the Lemon test. When there is a question of whether a practice violates the Establishment Clause, the Supreme Court generally applies the Lemon test, developed in Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602 (1971). A government action does not violate the Lemon test when (1) the government's action has a legitimate secular purpose; (2) the primary effect of the action is not to either advance or inhibit religion; and (3) the action does not create an "excessive government entanglement" with religion. Brennan noted that a prayer has an inherently religious, rather than secular, purpose. He also notes that the goal of the prayer, to quiet legislators down and put them in a serious frame of mind, could be accomplished in a secular manner, so the use of a religious prayer to that end does not have a secular purpose. He also claimed that the primary effect of the prayer as to "explicitly link religious belief and observance to the power and prestige of the State" and thus to advance religion. He also claimed that by having the government choose a chaplain or chaplains for the invocation, an excessive government entanglement necessarily exists. There is also government entanglement because the issue of legislative chaplains is politically divisive and could cause voters to choose their legislators based on religion. Thus, in Brennan's opinion, the use of legislative chaplains violates all three prongs of the Lemon test, and thus violates the Establishment Clause.

The Lemon test aside, Brennan said that the use of legislative chaplains violates the Establishment Clause. He noted historically that the Establishment Clause has been regarded ensuring a separation of church and state and a neutrality of the government with regard to religion. This practice forces citizens to pay taxes to further Judeo-Christian prayer, when they may or may not believe in such traditions, involves government oversight and regulation of chaplains, and, according to Brennan, trivializes religion "by too close an attachment to the organs of government.” The Nebraska legislature was not being neutral toward religion, but was favoring religion over non-religion and Judeo-Christian traditions over others. Similarly, the Nebraska legislature failed to keep the government and religion separate by hiring, employing, and overseeing religious officials performing religious duties. Thus, Brennan stated, the employment of legislative chaplains is unconstitutional.

While it may be true that the framers of the Constitution did not see the use of legislative chaplains as an impermissible establishment of religion, that does not mean the debate ought to end there. There are instances in which we deliberately go against the intent of the framers. Our views on race and gender, for example, have evolved since the passage of the Constitution. Perhaps, even if the framers believed that the Establishment Clause did not apply to legislative chaplains, their employment might be considered no longer appropriate given the ever-increasing religious diversity of our nation.

Thus, despite the holding in Marsh v. Chambers, there are still Constitutional issues to examine regarding legislative chaplains.

FATHER ROBERT F. DRINAN, S. J.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602 (1971)

Marsh v. Chambers, 463 U.S. 783 (1983)

CHAPLAINS: MILITARY

Military chaplains originated in biblical times and have long been recognized as an important component of many armed forces. They have served in Western armies since at least the fourth century. From the earliest days of British settlement in the New World, chaplains were employed in American colonial militias. When the Continental Army was formed, chaplains attached to the militia of the thirteen colonies became part of the nation's first army. Military chaplaincy has continued ever since, with its size growing larger in proportion to the increase in the size of the armed forces.

The federal government has viewed chaplains as necessary to the well-being of the military. George Washington, as the first commander-in-chief, felt strongly that they were needed to bolster the morale of his troops. Moreover, before the invasion of predominantly Roman Catholic Canada in September 1775, he ordered his generals “to protect and support the free Exercise of Religion of the Country and the undisturbed Enjoyment of the rights of Conscience in religious Matters.”

The military chaplaincy was formally established in July 1775 and is the second oldest branch of the Army, preceded only by the infantry. The Continental Congress passed regulations governing the appointment and salaries of chaplains. The first Articles of War called on soldiers to attend religious services, which were performed twice daily.

Although their noncombatant status was recognized as early as the Council of Regensburg in 742 C. E., in colonial America chaplains fought alongside their comrades—as they did some during the Revolutionary War, the War of 1812, and the Civil War. Others played a more professional role by serving as intelligence gatherers and camp aides. In 1864, an international convention brought about the first treaty that recognized chaplains as noncombatant persons on the battlefield. From that point on, U. S. military chaplains did not fight in armed conflicts.

At first, American chaplains were mostly Protestant ministers, but by the Civil War Catholic priests and Jewish rabbis had also been admitted into the armed forces. Today military chaplains represent more than 200 denominations.

In modern times, the Department of Defense has continued to commission chaplains to accompany United States soldiers at every location they may be serving. Eleven chaplains were killed in World War I. Seventy-seven lost their lives in World War II—during which four became famous when a rabbi, a Catholic priest, and two Protestant ministers offered their life vests to young soldiers as their transport ship was sinking off the North Atlantic coast. The four died as a result of their sacrifice. Eleven chaplains lost their lives in Korea, and thirteen in Vietnam. More than 3,000 Army chaplains were decorated during the twentieth century. More recently, more than 500 chaplains were deployed in Iraq, many of them coming from reserve units.

Today, there are currently some 25,000 American military chaplains, serving primarily in the Army, Navy, and Air Force—on military bases, at front lines, and in medical units. The Chief of Chaplains determines their number and denominations on the basis of current needs of the military population. The Department of Defense recognizes a wide range of religious groups, from traditional faiths such as Christianity, Judaism, and Islam to nontraditional religions such as Wicca.

Chaplains must possess both bachelors and divinity degrees. Like regular military personnel, they are required to meet age and fitness requirements and to engage in military training (although they are exempt from weapons training). They are also subject to military discipline. Although all chaplains have been ordained by their denominational group, because they must be available any place soldiers are deployed, they must also be able to provide religious guidance to persons of other faiths. They are specifically prohibited from converting members of others faiths.

The most difficult responsibility of military chaplains is spiritually and morally to prepare troops to take life and to die, but they also serve as personal counselors. Many are trained in addressing the special concerns of young adults, such as family affairs and substance-abuse issues.

Military chaplains' commissions have come under fire from a Constitutional perspective. Although Congress has been required to provide troops with chaplains in distant parts of the world, their funding has been challenged as a violation of the establishment clause of the First Amendment. Similarly, limitations placed on specific religious observances while in the military have been challenged under the free-exercise clause.

The U. S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit addressed the first argument in Katcoff v. Marsh, holding that Congress does have the authority to commission chaplains. The court declared that the government's power is derived from Art. I, § 8 of the Constitution, which allows Congress to establish an army for the purpose of "preserving the peace and security, and providing for the defense, of the United States." It viewed the government's goal as one that does not include establishing a religion, but rather "maintain[ing] the efficiency of the Army by improving the morale of our military personnel."

The establishment clause and the statutes creating the military chaplaincy, said the court in Katcoff, must be viewed in light of their historical background. Congressional authorization of a military chaplaincy—both before and contemporaneous with the adoption of the First Amendment, and for two centuries thereafter—is "weighty evidence" that the establishment clause was not intended to restrict religious freedom in the military. The purpose of the Constitutional and legislative provisions "is to insure that no religion be sponsored or favored, none commanded, and none inhibited."

Moreover, said the court, the free exercise clause obligates Congress to accommodate the religious practices of military personnel who have been moved to areas outside the United States.

In fact, although free exercise has long been viewed as subordinate to military necessity, chaplains have nevertheless been successful in overcoming various restrictions placed on them by their superiors. For example, the Persian Gulf War presented special dilemmas for Jewish and Christian troops, many of whom found it difficult to practice their religion for fear of offending the predominantly Moslem host countries. Chaplains themselves were ordered to remove religious insignia from their uniforms. Christmas and Passover observances had to be muted or celebrated on ships offshore. By the end of the war, however, chaplains were allowed to wear their insignia and were able to hold both Christian and Jewish services in their encampments and beyond.

KENNETH LASSON

References and Further Reading

- 10 U.S.C. §§ 3293, 3581 (2000).
- Annan, Kent. Chaplains Who Serve the US Armed Forces, 6 For God & Country 3 (2002), http://www.pstem.edu/read/inspire/6.3/feature_1/.
- Brown, Michael. "Military Chaplains Role in War, History." Air Combat Command News Service, April 25, 2003, <http://www2.acc.af.mil/accnews/apr03/03147.html>.
- Department of Defense, Directive 1304.19 §§ 3,5 (Sept. 18, 1993).
- Diamond, Mark. Deployed Chaplains: Faith on the Front Lines, U.S. Military Art Prints, April 21, 2003, <http://www.globalsecurity.org/military/library/2003/04/mil-030421-afpn04.htm>.
- Drazin, Israel, and Cecil B. Currey. For God and Country: The History of a Constitutional Challenge to the Army Chaplaincy, 1995.
- Jewish U.S. Marine, <http://www.kolot.com/FS1999/rick0004.shtml>.
- Lasson, Kenneth, Religious Liberty in the Military: The First Amendment Under 'Friendly Fire,' Journal of Law & Religion 471 (1992): 9:493.
- Malin, Don. Military Chaplains and Religious Pluralism, http://www.wfial.org/Articles/Military_chaplains.htm (April 2003).
- Odom, Jonathan G., Beyond Arm Bands and Arms Banned: Chaplains, Armed Conflict, and the Law, Naval Law Review 1 (2002): 49:5.
- Separation: Military Chaplains—Government Chaplains and the Separation of Church and State*, http://atheism.about.com/library/FAQs/cs/blcsm_gov_chapmilit.htm.
- Sweet, Michael. "Rabbi Brings Torah to Marines in Babylon." Marine Corps News June 28, 2003, <http://www.usmc.mil/marine.unk/nch2000.nsf/0/DE75471AF9EF7-BE185256D550004E024>.
- War Over, Some Clergy Still Away on Duty*. Christian Century, June 28, 2003, http://www.findarticles.com/cf_dls/m1058/13_120/104681891/print.jhtml. Forty percent of the chaplains in the army were from reserves and sixty percent were from active duty.

Case and Statutes Cited

Katcoff v. Marsh, 755 F.2d 223, 225 (2nd Cir. 1985)

See also Religious Freedom in the Military

CHARITABLE CHOICE

Charitable Choice is a set of statutory parameters attached to a social service program with the purpose of making the government more welcoming to all faith-based social service providers. The provision first appeared in the federal comprehensive welfare reform act of 1996. A year later Charitable Choice was extended to welfare-to-work assistance, was next incorporated into the Community Services Block Grant Act of 1998, and finally was made part of the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services drug treatment programs reauthorized in late 2000. Before the adoption of this provision, it was widely believed that faith-based charities could receive government aid only if the funds were administered by a separately incorporated nonprofit that was secular in its program operations.

When George W. Bush assumed the Presidency in January 2001, he incorporated Charitable Choice as an integral part of a much broader and more ambitious White House Faith-Based & Community Initiatives. By executive order issued December 12, 2002, the President directed that several federal departments ensure nondiscriminatory treatment toward faith-based charities in all the welfare programs they administered.

Charitable Choice interweaves three fundamental principles. First, it imposes on government the duty to refrain from discriminating on the basis of religion with respect to the eligibility of providers seeking to deliver services under one of the government's welfare programs. Rather than examining the nature of the service provider with an eye to excluding those thought overly religious, Charitable Choice requires officials to focus on the nature of the services and the means by which they are provided. The relevant inquiry is not "Who are you?" but "What can you do?" Faith-based providers are not to be preferred, merely allowed to compete on the same basis as all other providers.

Second, the provision imposes on government the duty to refrain from intruding into the religious autonomy of faith-based organizations (FBOs). Charitable Choice extends a guarantee that in religious matters each FBO that competes for funding "shall retain its independence" including "control over the definition, development, practice, and expression of its religious beliefs." Government-funded FBOs continue to be subject to general regulation, of course, and must provide an accounting for public monies received. The guarantee, rather, is that FBOs retain their religious independence from regulations imposed solely as a consequence of receiving the government assistance. There are also specific safeguards from demands to remove religious symbols at an FBO's facility and from regulations requiring FBOs to adjust the makeup of their governing board. A private right of action vests in FBOs to enforce these guarantees.

Third, Charitable Choice imposes on both government and participating FBOs the duty to refrain from abridging certain religious rights of the ultimate beneficiaries of these welfare programs. When the form of the funding is direct to the social service provider, each beneficiary is empowered with a choice. Beneficiaries who want to receive their services from an FBO may do so—assuming, that is, that an FBO has qualified for a grant. On the other hand, if a beneficiary has religious objections to receiving services from an FBO, then the government is required to provide equivalent alternative services. This is the "choice" in Charitable Choice. When a beneficiary selects an FBO receiving direct funding, the provider cannot discriminate against the beneficiary on the basis of religion.

Charitable Choice is based on an Establishment Clause that accords with the principle of "neutrality." In such a view, when government secures social services without regard to religion, then neither provider nor beneficiary has to alter their religious behavior to do business with the government. Thus the Establishment Clause is understood as minimizing the government's influence over the religious choices made by individuals. Because many beneficiaries freely choose to receive their services from an FBO, it is religion-neutral for the government to provide aid to FBOs on the same basis as other providers. When beneficiaries elect an FBO and receive the secular benefit of the service for which the welfare program is designed, the government is not advancing religion but merely responding to the choices freely made by its citizens. That other voluntarily activities, including religious activities, occur at the FBO is not properly a governmental concern.

Charitable Choice contemplates funding that is structured to be either direct (that is, where the government awards grants to charities who in turn provide services to qualifying beneficiaries) or indirect (that is, where the provider which ultimately receives the government's aid is selected by the beneficiary, such as with vouchers). When the form of the assistance is indirect, the regulations promulgated under Charitable Choice incorporate the Supreme Court's approach to school vouchers and the case of Zelman v. Simmons-Harris. Conversely, when the form of the assistance is direct, then the regulations follow the approach upheld in Mitchell v. Helms. Consistent with Mitchell, the regulations require that no inherently religious activities such as worship or proselytizing take place within the funded program. If any such activities are conducted on a voluntary basis by a participating FBO, then the activities must be separated, by time or location, from the funded program. By following the Court's guidance in Zelman and Mitchell, the regulations are calculated to rebuff critics who argue that Charitable Choice violates the Establishment Clause.

To reduce regulatory entanglement, Charitable Choice safeguards the freedom of FBOs to employ staff of like-minded faith. The ability to restrict employees and volunteers to those of shared faith is said to be central to maintaining the organization's essential religious character. As Justice William Brennan wrote in his concurring opinion in Corporation of Presiding Bishop v. Amos, "Determining that certain activities are in furtherance of an organization's religious mission, and that only those committed to that mission should conduct them, is thus a means by which a religious community defines itself."

The ability of FBOs to consider religion when hiring, a right set out in § 702(a) of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, is cross-referenced in Charitable Choice. It was initially assumed that the guarantee of religious "independence" in Charitable Choice overrides conflicting nondiscrimination procurement rules at the state and local level. The latter becomes important if the federal welfare funds involved are administered through the states. That Charitable Choice enables FBOs to compete for funding, whereas retaining the right to staff on a religious basis has become controversial and is largely the reason that attempts to further expand Charitable Choice have stalled in the U. S. Senate. The question of overriding state and local procurement rules is debated in the literature, but as of this writing no court has been asked to pass on the issue.

CARL H. ESBECK

References and Further Reading

- Ackerman, David M. Public Aid to Faith-Based Organizations (Charitable Choice) in the 107th Congress: Background and Selected Legal Issues. Library of Congress, Congressional Research Service, Report RL31043, August 19, 2003.
- Esbeck, Carl H., Stanley W. Carlson-Thies, and Ronald J. Sider. The Freedom of Faith-Based Organizations to Staff on a Religious Basis. Wash., DC: Center for Public Justice, 2004, available at <http://www.cpjustice.org/publications/charitable_choice/resources.pdf>.
- Laycock, Douglas. The Constitutional Role of Faith-Based Organizations in Competitions for Federal Social Service Funds. Testimony Before the House Subcommittee on the Constitution, Committee on the Judiciary, 107th Cong., June 7, 2001, available at <<http://www.house.gov/judiciary/72981.pdf>>.
- Lupu, Ira C., and Robert W. Tuttle. Government Partnerships with Faith-Based Service Providers: The State of the Law. Wash., DC: Roundtable on Religion and Social Welfare Policy, December 2002, available at <http://www.religiousandsocialpolicy.org/docs/legal/reports/12-4-2002_state_of_the_law.pdf>.

White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives. Protecting the Civil Rights and Religious Liberty of Faith-Based Organizations: Why Religious Hiring Rights Must Be Preserved, June 23, 2003, available at <<http://www.whitehouse.gov/government/fbci/booklet.pdf>>.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Corporation of Presiding Bishop v. Amos*, 483 U.S. 327 (1987)
- Mitchell v. Helms*, 530 U.S. 793 (2000) (plurality opinion)
- Zelman v. Simmons-Harris*, 536 U.S. 639 (2002)
- Charitable Choice as applicable to the Temporary Assistance for Needy Families (TANF) Program, 42 U.S.C. § 604a, and regulations thereto, 68 Fed. Reg. 56449 (Sept. 30, 2003), codified at 45 C.F.R. pt. 260
- Charitable Choice as applicable to the Community Service Block Grant (CSBG) Act, 42 U.S.C. § 9920, and regulations thereto, 68 Fed. Reg. 56466 (Sept. 30, 2003), codified at 45 C.F.R. pt. 1050
- Charitable Choice as applicable to THE Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration (SAMHSA) Drug Treatment Programs, 42 U.S.C. § 300x-65 and 42 U.S.C. § 290kk, and regulations thereto, 68 Fed. Reg. 56429 (Sept. 30, 2003), codified at 42 C.F.R. pts. 54 and 54a
- Executive Order 13279, issued December 12, 2002, Equal Protection of the Laws for Faith-Based and Community Organizations and Permitting Religious Staffing by Faith-Based Federal Contractors, 67 Fed. Reg. 77141 (Dec. 16, 2002)
- The Civil Rights Act of 1964, § 702(a) of Title VII, 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-1(e)

See also Discrimination by Religious Entities that Receive Government Funds; Establishment Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence; Title VII and Religious Exemptions

CHASE COURT (1864–1873)

The Chase Court combined powerful rhetoric in favor of civil liberties with very little protection for civil liberties. The justices in Ex parte Milligan (1866) asserted that "the Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people, equally in war and peace." Nevertheless, the Chase Court did not challenge any Civil War measure before Appomattox and found procedural reasons to avoid reaching the merits of several important constitutional challenges to Reconstruction measures. The judicial majority in the Slaughter-House Cases (1872) asserted that the primary purpose of the constitutional amendments ratified after the Civil War was to secure, "the freedom of the slave race, the security and firm establishment of that freedom, and the protection of the newly-named free-men and citizen from the oppression's of those who have normally exercised on them and dominion over him." Nevertheless, the actual decision the court made sharply limited to protect any rights. In no case did the Chase Court protect the constitutional rights of a person of color. The passivity of the Chase Court in civil rights and the these cases is partly explained in procedural issues that prevented justices from handing down more libertarian rulings. Still, the Chase Court left future libertarians with very quotable phrases, but few workable precedents.

Ex parte Milligan highlights both the passivity and aggressiveness of Chase Court responses to claims of constitutional right. The precise issue in that case was whether President Abraham Lincoln had the legal or constitutional authority to declare martial law and order military trials during the Civil War. When Confederate armies were in the field, both the Taney Chase Courts found various reasons not to adjudicate the constitutionality of those policies. After the shooting was over, a unanimous Chase Court ruled that Lincoln acted unconstitutionally when he tried northern civilians in military courts. Five justices insisted that neither the president nor Congress could declare martial law in localities far from the front lines where ordinary trials had not been disrupted by the war. "Military jurisdiction," Justice David Davis declared, "can never be applied to citizens in states which have upheld the authority of the government, and where the courts are open and the process unobstructed." Four justices, in an opinion written by Chief Justice Salmon Chase, insisted that Congress had broad powers to declare martial law, but that Lampkin Milligan's trial was inconsistent with the rules for trying civilians accused of aiding the Confederacy that Congress had previously set out. The actual result in Milligan was relatively uncontroversial, because suspensions of habeas corpus in the north had troubled many Americans during the Civil War and could not be justified after Lee's surrender. The crucial question was whether the justices would use Milligan as a precedent for striking down Northern imposition of martial law in the South after the Civil War.

The first Reconstruction cases heard by the Chase Court suggested that the justices would police civil rights violations in the South as aggressively as the justices policed civil rights violations in the North after the Civil War. In Cummings v. Missouri (1866), a five to four judicial majority ruled that states could not require certain state employees is where that they had been loyal to the Union during the Civil War. Such demands, Justice Stephen Field declared, violated both the ex post facto clause and the constitutional prohibition on bills of attainder. A federal law insisting that attorneys practicing in federal courts take a similar oath was declared unconstitutional on the same grounds in Ex parte Garland (1866).

Partisan fears or hopes that these cases where the beginning of a full-scale assault on military rule in the Reconstruction South were never realized. The Chase Court was given three opportunities to strike down martial law on the authority of Ex parte Milligan but declined to reach the merits of the constitutional issues in each instance. The justices in Mississippi v. Johnson (1866) rejected the constitutional attack on martial law by unanimously ruling that federal courts could not issue an injunction to the president that forbade him from executing what state attorneys claimed was an unconstitutional law. The next year, in Georgia v. Stanton (1867), the justices unanimously ruled that a state had no standing to challenge a law that state attorneys claimed violated the constitutional rights of state citizens. The justices did, however, initially take jurisdiction to determine whether William McCardle was unconstitutionally imprisoned for publishing anti-Reconstruction editorials in the Vicksburg Times. While oral argument was taking place on the merits, Congress first debated then passed a bill stripping the court of jurisdiction necessary to adjudicate that case. After some debate, the Chase Court majority elected to delay issuing a decision until that bill became law over President Johnson's veto. The justices then ruled that they jurisdiction to decide McCardle's appeal.

These judicial refusals to reach the merits of various constitutional attacks on Reconstruction may have been good faith judging and not a strategic retreat in the face of congressional opposition. The Johnson administration, no friend of martial law in the South, vigorously argued for and supported the result in Johnson v. Mississippi and Stanton v. Georgia. Most contemporary commentators agree these cases were rightly decided. The judicial decision to delay announcing the result in Ex parte McCardle (1868) was consistent with previous Marshall, Taney, and Chase Court practice in cases of no political significance. Almost immediately after denying jurisdiction in McCardle, the justices announced they would decide Ex parte Yerger (1869), another case raising the constitutionality of martial law in the South. Rather than risk an adverse decision, the Grant administration settled the case.

Chase Court decisions on the rights of former slaves also provided civil libertarians with good language but little law. Justice Miller's majority opinion in The Slaughter-house Cases highlighted how the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Amendments were designed to protect the rights of persons of color. Several Chase Court justices while on circuit broadly interpreted this new national commitment to racial equality. Chief Justice

Chase in In re Turner (1867) interpreted the Thirteenth Amendment that outlawing certain onerous apprenticeship agreements. Nevertheless, in no case did the Chase Court protect the rights of former slaves, thus failing to establish any precedent that might promote egalitarian rulings in the future.

The Slaughter-house Cases contain the Chase Court's best-known statements on civil rights and liberties. At issue was the constitutionality of a New Orleans law granting a monopoly to certain butchers, butchers who probably bribed the local legislature. Former Justice John Campbell sought to use those cases as a vehicle for making the post-Civil War Constitution an instrument for economic rights rather than for racial equality. In a powerful argument, he asserted that the right to practice common callings was protected by the privileges and immunities clause of the newly minted Fourteenth Amendment and that the denial of such a right was a form of enslavement prohibited by the Thirteenth Amendment. The five to four judicial majority rejected that invitation to expand the post-Civil War Constitution beyond race. Justice Miller asserted that ordinary health regulations were not enslavements and that the privileges and immunities clause protected only such rights of national citizenship as the right to travel to the national capital and the right to be protected when abroad. In his view, a broader interpretation of the Fourteenth Amendment "would constitute this court a perpetual censor upon all legislation of the states." Due process, he continued, had nothing to do with this case and equal protection was largely limited to laws discriminating against persons of color. Four justices dissented. Justice Field insisted that the privileges and immunities clause "refers to the natural and inalienable rights which belong to all citizens." This theme would greatly influence later Supreme Court decisions, but under due process rather than privileges and immunities.

The judicial opinions in The Slaughter-house Cases structured the judicial responses to the claim in Bradwell v. Illinois (182) that women had a constitutional right to become lawyers. Justice Miller's majority opinion simply repeated his previous claim that no one had a federal constitutional right to practice a common calling. Justice Bradley, who had joined Justice Field's dissent in Slaughter-House, insisted that past practice and divine law provided better grounds for rejecting Ms. Bradwell's appeal. "The natural and proper timidity and delicacy which belongs to the female gender," he infamously declared "evidently unfit for many of the occupations of civil life." In Justice Bradley's view, the "paramount destiny and mission of women are to fill the noble and the nine offices of wife and mother. This is the law of the Creator." Chief Justice Chase, who was dying at the time, dissented without opinion.

This lack of justification may be fitting. The Chase Court is best known for issuing bold statements in favor of protecting rights without actually handing down challenging live violations of rights. The vote that most challenged contemporary understanding of rights, Chief Justice Chase's dissent in Bradwell, by comparison, was given without any justification or bold quotation at all.

MARK A. GRABER

References and Further Reading

- Hyman, Harold M. The Reconstruction Justice of Salmon P. Chase: In re Turner and Texas v. White. Lawrence, KS: University Press of Kansas, 1997.
- Kutler, Stanley I. Judicial Power and Reconstruction Politics. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1968.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Bradwell v. Illinois*, 83 U.S. 130 (1872)
- Cummings v. Missouri*, 71 U.S. 277 (1866)
- Ex parte Garland*, 71 U.S. 333 (1866)
- Ex parte McCardle*, 74 U.S. 506 (1868)
- Ex parte Milligan*, 71 U.S. 2 (1866)
- Ex parte Yerger*, 75 U.S. 85 (1868)
- Georgia v. Stanton*, 73 U.S. 50 (1867)
- In re Turner*, 24 F. Cas. 333 (C.C.D. Maryland, 1867)
- Mississippi v. Johnson*, 71 U.S. 475 (1866)
- Slaughter-House Cases*, 83 U.S. 36 (1872)

CHASE, SAMUEL (1744–1811)

Although an ardent patriot, a signer of the Declaration of Independence, and an associate justice of the U. S. Supreme Court who made a significant contribution to nineteenth-century American jurisprudence, Samuel Chase is best known for his interpretation of the Sedition Act of 1798 and his impeachment trial in 1804. Chase was born on April 17, 1744. His mother, Matilda Walker, died at his birth and he was raised by his father, Thomas Chase, an Episcopalian minister renowned for his tenacity, impulsiveness, and tendency to live beyond his means, which led to his imprisonment in 1746 for unpaid debts. The elder Chase passed on these characteristics to his son but also provided him with a sound classical education.

At eighteen, Chase began studying law in the offices of John Hammond and John Hall in Annapolis. Admitted to the bar in 1761, he was appointed prosecutor in the mayor's court, a position that provided him with a meager salary but permitted him to represent clients in civil suits for debt. In May 1762, he married Ann (Nancy) Baldwin of Anne Arundel County. The couple had seven children, three of whom died in infancy. In 1763, Chase commenced legal practice in Frederick County, Maryland, and became politically active, aligning himself with the country party against the elite-controlled court party. In the following year, he obtained a seat in the assembly. During the Stamp Act crisis, Chase mobilized the “middling sort,” participated in the drafting of Maryland’s resolutions to the Stamp Act Congress, and helped to organize the Sons of Liberty in Annapolis.

In the early 1770s, Chase assumed a leading role in the movement to lower clerical salaries and tobacco inspection fees, which he regarded as oppressive. He became a member of the nonimportation committee of Annapolis in 1770 and a vigorous supporter of colonial resistance after Britain’s imposition of the Intolerable Acts. Selected as a delegate to the First and Second Continental Congresses, Chase embraced the principle of “no taxation without representation,” assailed British suppression of colonial trade, and denounced the royal navy’s seizure of American ships. He emerged as one of Maryland’s leading advocates of Independence, but distanced himself from the colony’s radical faction led by John Hall, Matthias Hammond, and Charles Ridgely, whose policies he believed threatened the colony’s internal stability and social order. Chase joined Charles Carroll and Benjamin Franklin on the commission sent to Canada to request support for resistance to the imperial authorities.

In the late 1770s, Chase advocated that large states cede their western lands to the union. He also supported the confiscation of British property and the expansion of paper money. His views reflected his speculative interests and difficulty in repaying debts. In 1778, he was accused of having breached public trust by using for speculative purposes confidential information on wheat and flour shortages provided to Congress. Although absolved of these charges, he became the central figure in the infamous flour scandal and was defeated in the 1778 elections for Congress. The scandal plagued him throughout his public life.

Fearing the domination of national affairs by elites, identifying state legislatures as bastions of popular liberties, and regarding the participants in the Constitutional Convention as having exceeded their mandate to amend the Articles of Confederation, Chase initially supported the Antifederalist cause. The adoption of the Bill of Rights, his affinity for English traditions and fear of the radicalism of the French Revolution, and his heightened concern about social unrest after the Whiskey Rebellion and the Fell’s Point Riot led to his Federalist conversion.

Presiding over the Court of Oyer and Terminer in Baltimore, Chase sought to distinguish between the freedom and licentiousness of the press in 1794.

Appointed to the Supreme Court in 1796, Chase quickly distinguished himself and contributed to the development of American jurisprudence. In the British debt case, Ware v. Hylton (1796), he ruled on the supremacy of national treaties over state law. In Hylton v. United States (1796), he recognized the power of the Supreme Court to void congressional legislation deemed to be unconstitutional and declared the federal excise tax on carriages to be a duty. In United States v. Worrall (1798), Chase refused arguments to prosecute a crime on the basis of common law, noting that federal courts could not “punish a man for any act, before it is declared by law of the United States to be criminal.” In Calder v. Bull (1798), he laid foundations for the doctrine of “substantive due process” by acknowledging the importance of fundamental principles not specifically set out in the Constitution.

Chase’s interpretation of the Sedition Act of 1798 precipitated strong Republican criticism and culminated in the call for his impeachment in 1804. Alleging irregularities in his handling of John Fries’s trial for treason and James Callender’s prosecution for seditious libel, as well as judicial indiscretion before a grand jury in Newcastle, Delaware, in 1803 when he denounced President Jefferson’s repeal of the Judiciary Act of 1801, John Randolph tabled seven articles of impeachment in the House of Representatives. Although none received the Senate’s two-thirds majority required for Chase’s removal from the Court, the impeachment trial enshrined him as a symbol of Federalist political partisanship. Samuel Chase died in Baltimore on June 19, 1811.

GORDON S. BARKER

References and Further Reading

- Elsmere, Jane Shaffer. Justice Samuel Chase. Muncie, IN: Janevar Publishing, 1980.
- Haw, James, et al. Stormy Patriot: The Life of Samuel Chase. Baltimore: Maryland Historical Society, 1980.
- Sharp, James Roger. American Politics in the Early Republic: The New Nation in Crisis. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1993.

CHAVEZ, CESAR (1927–1993)

Cesar Chavez, farm worker, civil rights activist, and union leader, was born near Yuma, Arizona, to Librado Chavez and Juana Estrada, who owned a farm and several small businesses. In 1938, the Chavez family lost their property and became migrant farm workers. Chavez's childhood was wrought with racial discrimination and hard work, which severely limited his school attendance.

Chavez enlisted in the U.S. Navy during World War II but returned to migrant farming in 1946. Shortly after, Chavez joined the National Agricultural Workers' Union (NAWU). This started a lifetime dedication to social change and fair treatment for Mexican Americans, particularly migrant farmers. In 1948, Chavez married Helen Fabela and resided in Delano, California, where he was a migrant laborer.

In 1952, Chavez volunteered for the Community Services Organization (CSO) and later became a paid organizer. The CSO, a body devoted to promoting political and civil rights for Mexican Americans, committed itself to the formation of new CSO chapters, voter registration drives, citizenship campaigns, educational improvements, urban developments, and other issues important to improving Mexican Americans' quality of life. Chavez eventually held the position of General Director for the CSO and remained active until 1962, when he left to form a union dedicated to migrant farmers.

Chavez started the National Farm Workers Association (NFWA), which became the United Farm Workers (UFW) in 1973. Inspired by Mahatma Gandhi and Martin Luther King Jr., Chavez became known as a natural leader, dedicated to a militant, yet racially unbiased, nonviolent, grass roots movement. To Chavez, the organization was more than a union; it was a social movement aimed at fixing the restricted civil liberties most members faced. He demonstrated his dedication by fasting and involving union members in masses, boycotts, pilgrimages, and processions. In doing so, he appealed to the Mexican-American culture of the farm workers. This heritage included Catholicism and a belief in the merits of sacrifice to fight injustice. Chavez also influenced and actively supported the Chicano civil rights movement until some of the reformers advocated violence.

Chavez's union struck numerous times, the first in May 1965. The most notable strike began in September 1965. Another union, the Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee (AWOC) struck and realized it needed the support of the NFWA. Although reluctant, the NFWA leadership voted to strike as well. Eventually, the two unions merged and formed the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee (UFWOC). The strikers used nonviolent tactics such as fasts, pilgrimages, demonstrations, an international grape boycott, and political campaigning amid violence from opposition. In 1970, the five-year long strike ended triumphantly for the union. Most of its demands were met, and many grape growers signed contracts with the strikers.

The UFW had subsequent strikes, but none had the longevity of the Delano grape strike.

Later, California farm workers achieved government-regulated collective bargaining through the instatement of the Agricultural Labor Relations Board. Unfortunately for the UFW, the elections of President Ronald Reagan and California Governor George Deukmejian, both agribusiness allies, slowed union achievements nationwide. Some claimed the UFW had lost its power and criticized Chavez. The reformer and union leader died in his sleep at the age of sixty-six and inadvertently rejuvenated the farm workers' resolve. In 1994, President William Clinton posthumously awarded Chavez the nation's highest civilian honor, the Medal of Freedom.

HEIDI SCOTT GIUSTO

References and Further Reading

- Dalton, Frederick John. The Moral Vision of Cesar Chavez. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 2003.
- Dunne, John Gregory. Delano: The Story of the California Grape Strike. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1967.
- Etulain, Richard W., ed. Cesar Chavez: A Brief Biography with Documents. Boston: Bedford/St. Martins, 2002.
- Hammerback, John C., and Richard J. Jensen. The Rhetorical Career of Cesar Chavez. College Station: Texas A&M University Press, 1998.
- Jensen, Richard J., and John C. Hammerback, eds. The Words of Cesar Chavez. College Station: Texas A & M University Press, 2002.
- Levy, Jacques E. Cesar Chavez: Autobiography of La Causa. New York: W.W. Norton & Company, Inc., 1975.
- Taylor, Ronald B. Chavez and the Farm Workers. Boston: Beacon Press, 1975.

CHECKPOINTS (ROADBLOCKS)

If police set up a checkpoint (also known as a roadblock) on the highway, requiring all drivers to stop and answer some questions, is that constitutional? The answer is yes if certain conditions are met.

To assess the constitutionality of police conduct, traditional Fourth Amendment analysis provides that the police cannot search a person unless they have both probable cause to believe evidence of crime is located with that person and a warrant authorizing the search. Since the 1960s, however, two lines of cases deviating from this traditional approach have developed to give law enforcement more flexibility. One is stop and frisk law. The other is a series of cases referred to as "special needs" cases. The Fourth Amendment analysis developed in these "special needs" cases governs the constitutionality of highway checkpoints.

The types of cases referred to as “special needs” cases today were originally described as administrative inspection cases. These cases generally involved police activity that focused on goals other than the traditional investigation of crime. Examples include government agents conducting workplace inspections for compliance with occupational health and safety laws and government agents inspecting housing for compliance with local codes. In these cases, police were not required to meet the usual probable cause and warrant requirements. Rather, the Fourth Amendment requirements were relaxed, so that warrants were frequently not required, and the grounds necessary to justify the police conduct were reduced from probable cause to a lesser standard, reasonable suspicion, or eliminated altogether. The Supreme Court defined the reasonableness of government conduct in these cases by using a balancing analysis, balancing the government’s need to search against the extent of the invasion to the citizen. One line of cases in this category is the roadblock cases.

The question of whether roadblocks are constitutional was first raised in the mid-1970s in cases where the police stopped cars near the border looking for illegal aliens. After concluding that police could search the cars only with probable cause, the Court authorized police to stop the cars and briefly question the occupants. If the stops were roving stops, that is, if the police were driving around to select which cars to stop, the police had to justify the stop and questioning by showing reasonable suspicion that led them to that car. This was the holding of United States v. Brignoni-Ponce. On the other hand, if the stops were fixed checkpoint stops, police could briefly question car occupants with no grounds whatsoever. The distinction was based on the idea that a fixed checkpoint necessarily limits police discretion, because they cannot pick the cars they stop, they have to take what comes their way. This limit on discretion minimizes the chance of abuse. In contrast, a roving stop allows police to cruise around and select which cars they approach, so in that situation, police have to provide reasons for stopping the cars they did. In combination, these cases indicated that whether grounds were required to stop a car depended to two variables: the intrusiveness of the police activity (search of the car as opposed to brief questioning of the occupants) and the amount of police discretion used (fixed checkpoints as opposed to roving stops).

The law was eventually refined in other types of investigations. When the police in Delaware made roving stops of cars for license and registration checks, and they made the stops randomly—that is, with no grounds to justify why the particular cars were chosen—the Supreme Court in Delaware v.

Prouse declared it unconstitutional. But in a significant case decided in 1990, the Supreme Court found it constitutional when Michigan used checkpoint stops to look for persons driving under the influence of alcohol. The Michigan authorities had no grounds for stopping the particular cars, but because their discretion was limited by the fixed character of the checkpoint, the Court approved it. And, the Supreme Court relied on the fact that the purpose of the checkpoint was not so much to investigate crime but to work toward the goal of highway safety. The highway death toll from drunk drivers indicated a special need for police to make the highways safer.

Two more Supreme Court cases complete the law on roadblocks. In 2000, the city of Indianapolis set up fixed checkpoints to briefly question occupants of cars about possession of street drugs. Police articulated no grounds for stopping the cars. In addition, the police had drug-detection dogs present at the roadblock to sniff the cars. The Court held this practice to be unconstitutional on the basis that the primary purpose was to detect evidence of ordinary criminal wrongdoing, so the case fell outside of the special needs category, and the checkpoint stops with no grounds were struck down. Most recently, in 2004, the Court held that a checkpoint set up to question car occupants about a recent hit-and-run case was constitutional. Like the drug checkpoint struck down, the police questioned each car without having any grounds for picking that car. However, the Court determined that asking for information about a recent hit-and-run did qualify as a special need situation, and the checkpoint was not set up merely to do the usual criminal investigation. Thus the checkpoint was constitutional.

In summary, the law today is that under the Fourth Amendment, police can use fixed checkpoints or roadblocks to briefly question occupants of the stopped cars without articulating any individualized reason for stopping that car, if the police purpose is focused on a special need rather than the traditional purpose of detecting evidence of crime. This is significant, because traditional Fourth Amendment law would not allow police to stop or question persons without articulating individualized grounds for selecting that person. However, based on the evolution described previously, the Supreme Court has now authorized police to use roadblocks under the conditions described.

SARAH N. WELLING

Cases and Statutes Cited

Camara v. Municipal Court, 387 U.S. 523 (1967)
City of Indianapolis v. Edmond, 531 U.S. 32 (2001)
Delaware v. Prouse, 440 U.S. 648 (1979)

Fourth Amendment

Illinois v. Lidster, 540 U.S. 419 (2004)

Marshall v. Barlow's, Inc., 436 U.S. 307 (1978)

Michigan Department of State Police v. Sitz, 496 U.S. 444 (1990)

U.S. v. Brignoni-Ponce, 422 U.S. 873 (1975)

See also Delaware v. Prouse, 440 U.S. 648 (1979); Search (General Definition); Seizures; United States v. Brignoni-Ponce, 422 U.S. 873 (1975)

CHEMERINSKY, ERWIN (1953–)

Erwin Chemerinsky was born May 14, 1953, in Chicago, Illinois. He grew up on the south side of Chicago in a working class family and was the first member of his family to go to college. He attended Northwestern University and received his Bachelors of Science degree in 1975 with highest distinction. He then earned his Juris Doctorate in 1978, graduating cum laude from Harvard Law School.

After graduating from law school, he began working as an attorney for the U. S. Department of Justice. At the Justice Department, he worked in the Fraud Section of the Civil Division. In 1980, he decided to pursue an academic career and returned to his native Chicago to begin teaching at De Paul University School of Law. Three years later, Professor Chemerinsky began teaching at University of Southern California (USC) Law School, where he continues to teach. He currently is the Sydney M. Irmas Professor of Public Interest Law, Ethics, and Political Science and teaches courses on Constitutional Law and Federal Courts. He has published numerous articles and books including two major treaties on constitutional law and federal jurisdiction.

Professor Chemerinsky has been influential in establishing civil liberties legislation in the state of California. He was instrumental in drafting the California Privacy Protection Act. Moreover, in April 2000, he was selected to investigate civil liberties violations in the Rampart scandal. In this scandal, police officers in the Los Angeles Police Department (LAPD) were accused of making false arrests, framing innocent people, and offering false testimony at trials. Chemerinsky's analysis indicated that civil liberties violations occurred because of flaws and oversights in the police and justice systems. He, therefore, recommended significant changes in both the police and justice systems, which ultimately were instated.

Chemerinsky also has argued a number of civil liberties cases in the federal courts. His most notable work challenged the constitutionality of California's controversial "three strikes" legislation. This legislation requires a person with two prior "serious" or "violent" felony convictions (or "strikes"), who is convicted of a third felony, to be sentenced to twenty-five years to life for the crime. Chemerinsky challenged the constitutionality of this law in Bray v. Ylst, arguing the law violated the Constitution's Eighth Amendment prohibition on "cruel and unusual" punishment. The U. S. Court of Appeals agreed. While the Bray decision did not invalidate the "three strikes" law generally, it did determine that circumstances exist in which an indeterminate life sentence is "grossly disproportionate" for the crime, and therefore, is unconstitutional.

Professor Chemerinsky continued his challenge of California's "three strikes" law in the U. S. Supreme Court. In Lockyer v. Andrade, he argued that, like Bray, Andrade's punishment for petty theft under "three strikes" was unconstitutional. The U.S. Supreme Court, however, ruled that the California Court of Appeals decision, which upheld Andrade's twenty-five year to life sentence, was constitutional. This is because the California court's decision was not contrary to "established federal law."

FRANCENE M. ENGEL

References and Further Reading

Chemerinsky, Erwin. Federal Jurisdiction. 4th ed. New York: Aspen Publishers, 2003.

———. Constitutional Law: Principles and Policies. 2nd ed. New York: Aspen Law and Business, 2002.

———. Interpreting the Constitution. Westport, CT: Praeger, 1987.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Andrade v. Lockyer, 270 F. 3d 743 (2001)

Bray v. Ylst, 283 F. 3d 1019 (2002)

Lockyer v. Andrade, 538 U.S. 63 (2003)

CHESSMAN, CARYL (1921–1960)

Caryl Chessman, born in St. Joseph, Michigan, in 1921, grew up in Glendale, California. During the Depression, Chessman began stealing food to provide for his family. In the late 1930s and early 1940s, Chessman was in and out of jail for auto theft. In January 1948, the state of California charged Caryl Chessman with eighteen counts of robbery, sexual assault, and kidnapping. Two female victims identified Chessman as the "red light bandit," a rapist who used a red light to impersonate police officers. Because Chessman had forcibly removed his victims from their vehicles, he was charged under California's "Little Lindbergh Law" that carried the death penalty. Chessman's capital conviction and unprecedented twelve-year stay on death row fundamentally shaped public opinion and legal precedents on the death penalty nationwide.

At trial Chessman rebuffed the services of a defense attorney and defended himself. Chessman's defense, however, failed for several reasons: He was inexperienced with courtroom procedure, both the judge and prosecuting attorney had strong capital conviction records, and the jury was composed of eleven women and only one man. Death in the gas chamber seemed imminent until the court reporter died two days before Chessman's official sentencing. Sensing an opportunity, Chessman moved for a new trial stating that new trial transcripts would be inaccurate. Although the judge refused his motion, higher court judges repeatedly stayed Chessman's execution citing potential transcription errors.

By early 1952, the California Supreme Court decreed that new trial transcripts were accurate. Chessman's new execution date was set for March 1952; however, over the next eight years, Chessman convinced several California judges, federal judges, and even governor Pat Brown that the new transcripts were flawed. The transcription issue never evaporated, because Chessman took his case to the public in 1954 when he smuggled his autobiography, Cell 2455 Death Row, out of San Quentin. Once the book was published, politicians, prison officials, criminologists, and psychiatrists, committed to the ideals of prisoner rehabilitation, claimed that Chessman's literary attainments proved that he had reformed and deserved to live. Chessman continued to demonstrate his rehabilitation by publishing two more books. As public discussion on Chessman's case increased, Americans questioned the efficacy of the death penalty. Many citizens wrote to California Governors Knight and Brown pleading for clemency in Chessman's case. For many, Chessman's legal and public appeals provided proof that the death penalty had no place in modern society.

In the late 1950s, however, increasing crime rates prompted many Americans to conclude that prisoner rehabilitation did not work. American public opinion on capital punishment reversed direction. A 1960 opinion poll indicated a strong approval trend. In 1995, approval of the death penalty reached an unprecedented eighty percent.

In 1962, after exhausting all of his legal and public appeals, Chessman died in the gas chamber. Even though he had lost his personal battle, Chessman ultimately pressed Americans to agree or disagree with the death penalty. Legally speaking, he forced the higher courts to consider new standards of fairness in capital cases.

GARRY D. WICKERD

References and Further Reading

- Hamm, Theodore. Rebel and a Cause: Caryl Chessman and the Politics of the Death Penalty in Postwar California, 1948–1974. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2001.
- Kunstler, William. Beyond a Reasonable Doubt? The Original Trial of Caryl Chessman. New York: Morrow Press, 1961.
- Parker, Frank J. Caryl Chessman: The Red Light Bandit. Nelson Hall, 1975.

See also Capital Punishment

CHICAGO SEVEN TRIAL

The 1968 Democratic convention was held in one of the most tumultuous times in recent history. Martin Luther King, Jr., and Bobby Kennedy had been assassinated, racial tensions exploded into riots in cities across the country, and student protests paralyzed college campuses. It felt like the country was coming apart at the seams, and Chicago's law-and-order mayor, Richard Daley, was not about to allow this chaos to engulf his city. The convention turned into a fiasco as police attempted to control massive crowds of civil rights and anti-war protesters who had converged on the convention.

Federal prosecutors indicted eight alleged leaders of the protests for conspiring to violate an anti-riot statute. Defendants included Youth International Party leaders Abbie Hoffman and Jerry Rubin, Students for a Democratic Society national director Rennie Davis, pacifist David Dellinger, and Tom Hayden, the author of the 1962 Port Huron Statement. (The trial of Bobby Seale was severed from the others, resulting in the Chicago Seven.) The strategy of defense lawyers William Kunstler and Leonard Weinglass was to politicize the trial, attempt to win public support, and in effect to continue the protests using the trial as another medium. The trial occasionally degenerated into a circus-like atmosphere, with outbursts from the defendants and repeated citations for contempt of court issued by the presiding judge. Five of the seven defendants were convicted of conspiracy. All of the convictions, along with the contempt citations, were reversed on appeal.

W. BRADLEY WENDEL

References and Further Reading

- Lukas, J. Anthony. The Barnyard Epithet and Other Obscenities: Notes on the Chicago Conspiracy Trial. New York: Harper & Row, 1970.
- Schultz, John. The Chicago Conspiracy Trial. New York: Da Capo Press, rev'd ed., 1993.

See also Kunstler, William M.

CHICAGO v. MORALES, 527 U.S. 41 (1999)

The City of Chicago passed an ordinance that was aimed at reducing gang presence in Chicago neighborhoods. The ordinance provided that when a police officer saw "a criminal street gang member loitering . . . with one or more persons," the officer "shall order all such persons to disperse." Loitering was defined as remaining in "any one place with no apparent purpose." Anyone failing to obey the dispersal order was subject to arrest.

In City of Chicago v. Morales, the Supreme Court found the ordinance facially invalid. The Court reaffirmed its earlier holding of Kolender v. Lawson: a penal law is void for vagueness if ordinary people cannot understand what conduct is prohibited, or if it fails to prevent arbitrary and discriminatory enforcement by the police. In Morales, the definition of loitering was the principal source of the constitutional problem because it failed to establish minimal guidelines to govern law enforcement. Whether a purpose is "apparent" is an inherently subjective inquiry. Furthermore, too much innocent conduct fell within the ordinance because it did not require a harmful purpose and both gang members and non-gang members could be ordered to disperse.

The ordinance was based on the "broken windows" theory of policing, which posits that officers prevent more serious crime when they eliminate small, visible signs of public disorder. While Morales was sympathetic to this approach, the Court was unwilling to uphold an ordinance that effectively allowed police to determine what constituted "disorder" within a particular community.

SARAH E. WALDECK

References and Further Reading

- Alschuler, Albert W., and Stephen J. Schulhofer, Antiquated Procedures or Bedrock Rights? A Response to Professors Meares and Kahan, University of Chicago Legal Forum (1998): 215–244.
- Meares, Tracey L., and Dan M. Kahan, Wages of Antiquated Procedural Thinking: A Critique of Chicago v.

Morales, University of Chicago Legal Forum (1998): 197–214.

- Rosenthal, Lawrence, Policing and Equal Protection, Yale Law and Policy Review 21 (2003): 53–103.
- Strosnider, Kim, Anti-Gang Ordinances After City of Chicago v. Morales: The Intersection of Race, Vagueness Doctrine, and Equal Protection in the Criminal Law, American Criminal Law Review 39 (2002): 101–146.
- Waldeck, Sarah E., Cops, Community Policing and the Social Norms Approach to Crime Control: Should One Make Us More Comfortable With the Others? Georgia Law Review 34 (2000): 1253–1310.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Kolender v. Lawson, 461 U.S. 352 (1983)

See also Equal Protection of Law (XIV); Gang Ordinances; Kolender v. Lawson, 461 U.S. 352 (1983); Papachristou v. City of Jacksonville 405 U.S. 156 (1972); Vagueness and Overbreadth in Criminal Statutes; Vagueness Doctrine

CHILD CUSTODY AND ADOPTION

In the area of adoption, the interest that takes center stage is that of the biological parents. As the Supreme Court pointed out in Troxel v. Granville, it is well accepted that a biological parent has a fundamental liberty interest in the care, custody, and control of his or her child. Thus, a state generally may not take a child from the custody of his or her biological parent simply because it believes that another parent would do a better job of raising the child. In the case of adoption, this means that prior to handing down an adoption decree, the state must either have the voluntary consent of the parents or the state must have involuntarily terminated the rights of the parents.

One of the most common scenarios in the adoption arena is that of a mother putting her nonmarital child up for adoption, with or without the knowledge and/or consent of the father. Consonant with the constitutional precepts outlined previously, all of the states require that, prior to an adoption, the State must obtain the biological mother's consent and this consent must be informed and free from fraud, coercion, or undue influence. If the consent was not freely given, then the adoption decree is subject to being overturned. In addition, many states allow the mother to revoke her consent within a specified period of time and thus stop the adoption proceeding.

The question of notice to and consent of the biological father for the adoption of a nonmarital child is considerably more complicated. Unlike in the case of a mother, the question of who the father is of a nonmarital child is at times difficult to answer. Given this reality, the states have had to determine how much effort must be expended in giving notice of the adoption proceedings to the putative father(s) and whether the consent of the putative father is necessary. The issue then arises as to whether the resultant state statutory schemes violate the constitutional rights of the putative father.

Prior to 1972, the fathers of nonmarital children were generally afforded little constitutional protection. This changed somewhat in 1972 with Stanley v. Illinois where the Supreme Court held that the private interest here, that of a man in the children he has sired and raised, undeniably warrants deference and, absent a powerful countervailing interest, protection. Stanley v. Illinois, 405 U.S. at 651.

Because Stanley was a custody case, the question remained as to what rights a father had in the adoption arena. The Supreme Court gave partial answers in two cases, Quilloin v. Walcott (1978) and Caban v. Mohammed (1979). In these cases the Supreme Court found that if a father has established a substantial relationship with his child and has admitted paternity, then he has a constitutional right to consent to or veto an adoption. Thus, in Quilloin the father was not entitled to veto the adoption even though, in the eleven years of the child's life, he had made some support payments and had visited the child on numerous occasions. He had never had or sought custody and he had not legitimated the child. Conversely, in Caban the father was entitled to veto the adoption. He had lived with the mother for five years, during which time the two children were born, he continued to see the children frequently after he and the mother ceased living together, and at one point he had custody of the children.

Caban and Quilloin concerned the question of consent. The Supreme Court in Lehr v. Robertson addressed the issue of when a putative father is entitled to receive notice of the adoption proceedings. There the Court reiterated that when a putative father has a developed parent-child relationship with his nonmarital child, then his interest in continued contact with the child has substantial constitutional protection. A mere biological link does not merit equal constitutional protection, but it does afford the father the opportunity to form a parent-child relationship. Thus, if there is a biological link, yet the putative father has not developed a parent-child relationship, then the question facing the Court is whether the statutory scheme at issue adequately protected the putative father's opportunity to form such a relationship. In Lehr the Court found that New York State's statutory scheme adequately protected the father's opportunity. The statute required that notice of the adoption proceeding be given to seven categories of putative fathers (the categories encompassed situations where the mother and/or the father had somehow acknowledged the father's paternity) and the categories were not likely to omit many responsible fathers. Furthermore, qualification for notice was within the putative father's control. The father in Lehr did not register his name with the state and did not fit within the other six categories, thus the state was not required to notify him of the adoption proceedings.

None of the preceding cases addressed the question of what rights a putative father has to veto an adoption when the child is placed for adoption as a newborn and/or the mother hides the child's birth from him. Several state Supreme Court cases have, however, found that a putative father's consent to the adoption may be necessary even if the father does not yet have a parent-child relationship. In such a case, the father's consent is necessary if, once the father learns of the birth of his child, he does all he can to assert his interest in the child and to assume the responsibilities of parenthood. According to these states, this right to veto the adoption can only be overcome if the father is unfit such that the state has the right to terminate his parental rights. It should be noted that these courts, in the process of protecting the right of the natural father, often find themselves in the position of failing to protect the interest of the child in staying with her or his adoptive parents and/or the interest of the adoptive parents in retaining custody of the child.

Other state supreme courts have not, however, afforded putative fathers this same level of protection. For example, in the case of In re Baby Boy C., the D.C. Court of Appeals held that the best interests of the child could trump the father's rights to custody even where the father had grasped his opportunity to form a relationship with the child. Thus, the court granted the adoption without the consent of the father and without a finding that the father was unfit, because granting custody to the father would be detrimental to the child's best interests.

As mentioned earlier, in certain circumstances the state can terminate the parental rights of parents to their child, thus making the child eligible for adoption. However, because, of the nature of the parent's constitutional rights, it is generally held that the state may only terminate the parent's rights if the state can prove that the parent is unfit. Furthermore, the Supreme Court in the Santosky v. Kramer case held that the state must prove this lack of fitness with clear and convincing evidence.

As previously noted, traditionally in the area of adoption, the rights of the biological mother of a nonmarital child were often paramount. In the 1970s, the Court began to recognize that the biological father's interest was also worthy of recognition. The question remains, however, regarding the rights of the child and the adoptive parents.

JANET W. STEVERSON

References and Further Reading

- Hollinger, Joan Heifetz. "Adoption Law." The Future of Children, vol. 3, no. 1, (1993): 43–61.
- Kessel v. Leavitt*, 204 W.Va. 95, 511 S.E.2d 720 (1988). West Virginia Supreme Court does a very good job of summarizing the current state of the law regarding when the consent of the putative father of a nonmarital child is necessary.
- Mnookin, Weisberg. Child, Family, and State: Problems and Materials on Children and the Law. 4th Ed. New York: Aspen, 2000.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Caban v. Mohammed*, 441 U.S. 380 (1979)
- In re Baby Boy C.*, 630 A.2d 670 (D.C. 1993), cert. denied sub nom. H.R. v. E.O., 513 U.S. 809 (1994)
- Lehr v. Robertson*, 463 U.S. 248 (1983)
- Quilloin v. Walcott*, 434 U.S. 246 (1978)
- Santosky v. Kramer*, 455 U.S. 745 (1982)
- Stanley v. Illinois*, 405 U.S. 645 (1972)
- Troxel v. Granville*, 530 U.S. 57 (2000)

CHILD CUSTODY AND FOSTER CARE

In America, the family serves as both the primary vehicle for the care and rearing of children and as a private realm of intimate association and moral autonomy. This tradition of family privacy is rooted in early American common law, inherited in part from England, and in principles of political and personal autonomy on which the United States was founded. Family privacy remains a fundamental principle, but since colonial times and escalating beginning in the Progressive era, the patriarch's power over children has diminished whereas maternal, state, and children's power have increased (Appell 2004; Mason).

Prior to the abolition of slavery, family privacy generally did not extend to slaves, because children born to female slaves legally belonged to the slave master. Indeed, it was not until decades after adoption of the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Amendments that the U. S. Supreme Court began to recognize a zone of family privacy and its attendant parental rights doctrine. The constitutional source of this fundamental family liberty is contested but is found in, or in the penumbra of, constitutional amendments relating to freedom of religion and association, freedom from unreasonable searches and seizures, due process, equal protection, and the natural liberties retained by the people (Stanley v. Illinois).

Children and parents share a liberty interest in family integrity and against state intervention (Santosky v. Kramer), but children have few liberty interests in opposition to their parents. This imbalance between adult and child rights in the custodial context has become a growing source of controversy since the last half of the twentieth century as children are increasingly viewed as rights-holders, family forms become more fluid, and lawyers and other professionals work directly with, or on behalf of, children (Appell 2004).

Parental Custodial Liberties

The parent-child relationship is so fundamental that the U. S. Supreme Court has extended special protections to parents for custodial decisions regarding child rearing, visitation, health care, education, and religion, for example, Meyer v. Nebraska; Parham v. J.R.; Pierce v. Society of Sisters; Prince v. Massachusetts; Troxel v. Granville; Wisconsin v. Yoder. Parents have a superior right to custody of their children unless the parent is unfit or has abdicated all or part of the parental role (Stanley v. Illinois) even when others believe that the child's best interests lay elsewhere (Santosky v. Kramer). Furthermore, courts may not base custodial decisions on racial prejudice (Palmore v. Sidoti).

States cannot coercively remove a child from parental custody without a hearing (Stanley v. Illinois). In termination of parental rights proceedings, parents receive heightened procedural protections not normally available to civil litigants. For example, a court may not terminate parental rights unless the parent has been shown to be unfit or otherwise unable to parent under a heightened standard of proof known as clear and convincing evidence (Santosky v. Kramer). Moreover, indigent parents may be entitled to a court-appointed attorney when the termination of parental rights proceedings are complex (Lassiter v. Dept. Soc. Services); like criminal defendants, indigent parents are entitled to free transcripts on appeal of termination of parental rights decisions (M.L.B. v. S.L.J.).

There are, however, limits to parental freedom to make decisions regarding their children's care and upbringing. These limitations generally arise from other constitutional principles that outweigh parental liberties. Thus parents do not have the right to send their children to a segregated school (Runyon v. McCrary) or to abuse or neglect their children (Stanley v. Illinois). Moreover, a daughter's reproductive health rights can trump the parent's right to make medical decisions regarding birth control (Carey v. Pop. Services International) and abortion (Bellotti v. Baird).

State law, within constitutional parameters, normally determines who the mother and father are, and it is those mothers and fathers so defined whose liberties the Supreme Court protects. Generally, the law considers the birth mother and biological or marital father to be parents (Lehr v. Robertson; Michael H. v. Gerald D.; Quilloin v. Walcott). States have, however, recognized custodial rights of stepparents and same sex partners of legal parents by establishing special rules for second-parent adoption and for visitation rights after the adult relationship terminates (Appell 2001).

Foster parents do not have the same liberty interest, if any, in their foster children as parents have in their children (Smith v. Organization of Foster Families for Equality and Reform). Similarly, grandparents do not have special liberties regarding their grandchildren on par with the rights of parents (Troxel v. Granville), but certain constitutional family privacy protections may be extended to grandparents living with grandchildren (Moore v. City of East Cleveland) (plurality).

Children's Custodial Liberties

Children do not have many liberty interests in the custodial context because the Supreme Court views children as always in the custody of another (Schall v. Martin). Although children and parents share a liberty interest in their relationship, parents hold most of the rights within that relationship. Thus, although parents have the right to make major decisions about their children's care, education, and custody, children have only limited rights to oppose those decisions.

Children do not have many rights against the state as custodian or protector either. For example, although parents are not entitled to abuse their children, children do not have a right to state protection from that abuse (DeShaney v. Winnebago County Dept. of Social Services; City of Castle Rock v. Gonzalez). Children also have few liberties when in protective state custody, such as foster care, although presumably they have the right to be free from avoidable harm (See Reno v. Flores; Youngberg v. Romeo).

Children do, however, have slightly greater liberty interests in other custodial contexts such as school (Goss v. Lopez; New Jersey v. T.L.O.; Tinker v. Des Moines; West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette) and the threat of juvenile or penal incarceration (In re Gault; In re Winship).

Native American Children

Special rules apply to certain custody and foster care proceedings regarding Native American children. These rules both enhance and limit parental and children's liberties and provide special rights for tribes (Indian Child Welfare Act; Appell, 2004).

ANNETTE R. APPEL

References and Further Reading

- Appell, Annette R., Uneasy Tensions Between Children's Rights and Civil Rights, Nevada Law Journal 5 (2004): 1:141–171.
- , Virtual Mothers and the Meaning of Parenthood, University of Michigan Journal of Law Reform 34 (2001): 4:683–790.
- Davis, Peggy Cooper. Neglected Stories: The Constitution and Family Values, New York: Hill and Wang, 1997.
- Guggenheim, Martin. What's Wrong with Children's Rights, Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2005
- Lindsey, Duncan. The Welfare of Children, 2nd ed., New York: Oxford University Press, 2004.
- Mason, Mary Ann. From Father's Property to Children's Rights, New York: Columbia University Press, 1994.
- Mnookin, Robert H. In the Interest of Children: Advocacy, Law Reform, and Public Policy, New York: W.H. Freeman & Co., 1985.
- Woodhouse, Barbara Bennett, Who Owns the Child?: Meyer and Pierce and the Child as Property, William & Mary Law Review 33 (1992): 4:995–1122.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Bellotti v. Baird*, 443 U.S. 622 (1979)
- Carey v. Pop. Services International*, 431 US 678 (1977)
- City of Castle Rock v. Gonzalez*, 125 S. Ct. 2796 (2005)
- DeShaney v. Winnebago County*, 489 U.S. 189 (1989)
- Goss v. Lopez*, 419 U.S. 565 (1975)
- In re Gault*, 387 U.S. 1 (1967)
- In re Winship*, 397 U.S. 358 (1970)
- Lassiter v. DSS*, 452 U.S. 18 (1981)
- Lehr v. Robertson*, 463 U.S. 248 (1983)
- Meyer v. Nebraska*, 262 U.S. 390 (1923)
- Michael H. v. Gerald D.*, 491 U.S. 110 (1989)
- M.L.B. v. S.L.J.*, 519 U.S. 102 (1996)
- Moore v. City of East Cleveland*, 431 U.S. 494 (1977)
- New Jersey v. T.L.O.*, 469 U.S. 325 (1985)
- Palmore v. Sidoti*, 466 U.S. 429 (1984)
- Parham v. J.R.*, 442 U.S. 584 (1979)
- Pierce v. Society of Sisters*, 268 U.S. 510 (1925)
- Prince v. Massachusetts*, 321 US 158 (1944)
- Quilloin v. Walcott*, 434 U.S. 246 (1978)
- Reno v. Flores*, 507 U.S. 292 (1993)
- Runyon v. McCrary*, 427 U.S. 160 (1976)
- Santosky v. Kramer*, 455 U.S. 745 (1982)

Schall v. Martin, 467 U.S. 253, 268 (1984)
Smith v. Organization of Foster Families for Equality and Reform, 431 U.S. 816 (1977)
Stanley v. Illinois, 405 U.S. 645 (1972)
Tinker v. Des Moines, 393 U.S. 503 (1969)
Troxel v. Granville, 530 U.S. 57 (2000)
West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943)
Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205 (1972)
Youngberg v. Romeo, 457 U.S. 307 (1982)
 Indian Child Welfare Act, 25 USC 1901–1963

See also Child Custody and Adoption

CHILD PORNOGRAPHY

In 1982, in New York v. Ferber, the Court held that production and dissemination of child pornography—“depictions of sexual activity involving children”—is unprotected by the First Amendment. The Court acknowledged that the Amendment protects nonobscene depictions of sexual activity between adults, but granted states “greater leeway” in regulating child pornography because of its effect on the child performers themselves, without regard for its effect on viewers.

Ferber concluded that states have a compelling interest in “safeguarding the physical and psychological well-being of a minor” and in “prevention of sexual exploitation and abuse of children.” The Court also found that “the use of children as subjects of pornographic materials is harmful to the physiological, emotional and mental health of the child” because “the materials produced are a permanent record of the children’s participation.”

Ferber, decided before the age of computer-generated images, thus took the extraordinary step of removing child pornography from First Amendment protection because of its harmful effects on actual child performers. In dictum, the Court stated that “distribution of descriptions or other depictions of sexual conduct, not otherwise obscene, which do not involve live performance or photographic or other visual reproduction of live performances, retains First Amendment protection.” The computer age, however, soon made “virtual” child pornography a pressing national issue. Computers can manipulate, or “morph,” an innocent picture of an actual child to create a picture showing the child engaged in sexual activity. An obscene or nonobscene picture of an adult can be transformed into the image of a child. Computer graphics can even generate the realistic image of a nonexistent child.

The federal Child Pornography Prevention Act of 1996 legislated against nonobscene virtual child pornography. The Act reached “any visual depiction, including . . . any . . . computer or computer-generated image[s] or picture[s], whether made or produced by electronic, mechanical or other means . . . where such visual description is, or appears to be, of a minor engaging in sexually explicit conduct.” (emphasis added). Congress based the 1996 act squarely on virtual child pornography’s effect on viewers. The lawmakers found that pedophiles might use virtual images to encourage children to participate in sexual activity and might whet their own sexual appetites with the pornographic images. Congress also found that the existence of computer-generated images could complicate prosecutions of pornographers who do use actual children by making it more difficult to prove that a particular picture used actual children.

In 2002, in Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, the Court struck down provisions of the 1996 act relating to materials that appear to depict minors but are produced without using actual children. The plaintiffs did not challenge the provision criminalizing morphing, which (like the materials at issue in Ferber) implicates the interests of actual children. Ashcroft also left undisturbed the provision criminalizing child pornography using actual children, Ferber’s target. But Ashcroft held that the provisions relating to non-existent children violated the First Amendment for prohibiting speech that “records no crime and creates no victims by its production.” The Court found any causal link between virtual images and actual incidents of child abuse only “contingent and indirect.”

The Supreme Court has not decided whether photographs or films of nude or partially nude children, without sexual activity, constitute punishable child pornography or First Amendment-protected expression. Ferber stated that “nudity, without more is protected expression,” but the statement was dictum because the Court was not reviewing a statute that presented the nudity issue. Most lower courts have regarded photographs and films of nude children, without more, as constitutionally protected expression, but have upheld convictions under statutes that prohibit such depictions made for sexual gratification. As thus limited, the depictions become child pornography proscribable under Ferber.

In Osborne v. Ohio, the Court upheld a statute that prohibited private possession and viewing of nonobscene child pornography (including private possession and viewing in one’s own home), even without proof that the possessor intended to distribute the material. The Court found that because “much of the child pornography market has been driven underground” since Ferber, “it is now difficult, if not impossible, to solve the child pornography problem by only attacking production and distribution.”

The Child Pornography Prevention Act followed nearly two decades of congressional legislation against child pornography. The Protection of Children Against Sexual Exploitation Act of 1977 added two substantive sections that remain in the federal criminal code. The first section, now 18 U.S.C. § 2251, prohibits the use of children in “sexually explicit” productions and prohibits parents and guardians from allowing such use of their children. The second section, now 18 U.S.C. § 2252, makes it a federal crime to transport, ship, or receive in interstate commerce for the purpose of selling, any “obscene visual or print medium” if its production involved the use of a minor engaging in sexually explicit conduct.

Because the 1977 act required proof that the materials were obscene and that the defendant had a profit motive, the act yielded only a handful of prosecutions in its first five years of operation. Relying on Ferber, the Child Protection Act of 1984 prohibited distribution of nonobscene material depicting sexual activity by children and eliminated the “pecuniary profit” element. The 1984 act also legislated against possession by criminalizing the receipt in interstate or foreign commerce of materials showing minors engaged in sexually explicit conduct.

In 1986, Congress prohibited production and use of advertisements for child pornography and created a private civil remedy in favor of persons who suffer personal injury resulting from the production of child pornography. To help effect the proscriptive authority approved in Ferber, Congress and a number of states also require photo processors to report customers’ sexual depictions of children on film. These statutes typically extend beyond films made by commercial customers, and parents and guardians who do nothing more than film their toddlers on bear skin rugs and the like are sometimes reported. Processors are typically granted immunity from civil or criminal liability arising from filing a required report in good faith.

DOUGLAS E. ABRAMS

References and Further Reading

- Abrams, Douglas E., and Sarah H. Ramsey, Children and the Law—Doctrine, Policy and Practice. 643–656, 2nd ed., St. Paul, MN: Thomson West, 2003.
Nowak, John E., and Ronald D. Rotunda. Constitutional Law, 1395–1396, 7th ed, St. Paul, MN: Thomson West, 2004.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition*, 535 U.S. 234 (2002)
New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747 (1982)
Osborne v. Ohio, 495 U.S. 103 (1990)
18 U.S.C. § 2251

18 U.S.C. § 2252

18 U.S.C. § 2256

See also Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, 535 U.S. 234 (2002); Children and the First Amendment; Child Pornography; New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747 (1982); Osborne v. Ohio, 495 U.S. 103 (1990); Unprotected Speech

CHILDREN AND THE FIRST AMENDMENT

Children hold rights under the First Amendment Speech Clause, but these rights may provide less protection than adults hold. Leading Supreme Court decisions have arisen in the public schools. Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District (1969) held that “[s]tudents in school as well as out of school are ‘persons’ under our Constitution,” and do not “shed their constitutional rights to freedom of speech or expression at the schoolhouse gate.” Bethel School District v. Fraser (1986), however, stated that “the constitutional rights of students in public school are not automatically coextensive with the rights of adults in other settings.” Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier (1988) stated that students’ constitutional rights “must be applied in light of the special characteristics of the school environment.”

The Speech Clause may also protect children more than adults. Ginsberg v. New York (1968) upheld a statute that prohibited sale to minors of material defined as obscene based on its appeal to children, even where the material would not be obscene for adults. New York v. Ferber (1982) held that the Clause does not protect production and dissemination of nonobscene child pornography—“depictions of sexual activity involving children.” Osborne v. Ohio (1990) held that states may prohibit private possession and viewing of child pornography (even in one’s own home), without proof that the possessor intended to distribute the material. Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition (2002), however, invalidated legislation relating to computer-generated materials that seem to depict minors but are produced without using actual children.

DOUGLAS E. ABRAMS

References and Further Reading

- Abrams, Douglas E., and Sarah H. Ramsey. Children and the Law—Doctrine, Policy and Practice. 36–52, 643–655, 2nd ed., St. Paul, MN: Thomson West, 2003.
Sullivan, Kathleen M., and Gerald Gunther. Constitutional Law. 1114–1120, 1294–1303, 15th ed., New York: Foundation Press, 2004.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, 535 U.S. 234 (2002)
Bethel School District v. Fraser, 478 U.S. 675 (1986)
Ginsberg v. New York, 390 U.S. 629 (1968)
Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier, 484 U.S. 260 (1988)
New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747 (1982)
Osborne v. Ohio, 495 U.S. 103 (1990)
Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District, 393 U.S. 503 (1969)

See also Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition*, 535 U.S. 234 (2002); Balancing Approach to Free Speech; Child Pornography; Freedom of the Press: Modern Period (1917–Present); Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier, 484 U.S. 260 (1988); In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1 (1967); New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747 (1982); Osborne v. Ohio, 495 U.S. 103 (1990); Prior Restraints; Public Forum Doctrines; Public/Nonpublic Forums Distinction

CHIMEL v. CALIFORNIA, 395 U.S. 752 (1969)

In Chimel v. California, the Supreme Court addressed the permissible scope of a search incident to a lawful arrest under the Fourth Amendment. After the issuance of an arrest warrant for burglary of a coin shop, police officers arrested Chimel in his home. Over his objection, the police conducted a detailed search of Chimel's residence, entering every room, opening drawers, and recovering coins and other suspected stolen items. The trial court found that the search was justified because it was incident to a lawful arrest.

The Supreme Court reversed and found this search unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment, holding that a search incident to arrest is limited to the arrestee's person and the area "within his immediate control." Justice Stewart's majority opinion includes a history of the evolving search incident to arrest doctrine, beginning with its apparent inception in Weeks v. United States in 1914. In arriving at the "immediate control" rule, the Court focused on the dual rationale behind allowing police to search in conjunction with an arrest: (1) to ensure officer safety and (2) to prevent the destruction or concealment of evidence. The Court also emphasized the heightened level of intrusion involved in the search of a home.

Justices White and Black dissented, criticizing the "remarkable instability" of this shifting area of law. The dissent argued in favor of the case-by-case "reasonableness" approach previously used by the Court, citing the likelihood of destruction of evidence by a third party while the police obtain a search warrant.

STEPHANIE ROBERTS HARTUNG

References and Further Reading

Katz, Lewis R., The Automobile Exception Transformed: The Rise of a Public Place Exemption to the Warrant Requirement, Case W. Res. 36 (1986): 375.
 Moskovitz, Myron, A Rule in Search of a Reason: An Empirical Reexamination of Chimel and Belton, Wis. L. Rev. 2002 (2002): 657.
 Rigg, Robert, The Objective Mind and "Search Incident to Citation", B.U. Pub. Int. L.J. 8 (1999): 281.
 Salken, Barbara C., Balancing Exigency and Privacy in Warrantless Searches to Prevent Destruction of Evidence: The Need for a Rule, Hastings L. J. 39 (1988): 282.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Agnello v. United States, 269 U.S. 20 (1925)
Carroll v. United States, 267 U.S. 132 (1925)
Preston v. United States, 376 U.S. 364 (1964)
Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968)
United States v. Lefkowitz, 285 U.S. 452 (1932)
Weeks v. United States, 232 U.S. 383 (1914)

See also Arrest; Exclusionary Rule; New York v. Belton 453 U.S. 454 (1981); Search (General Definition); Seizures; Warrantless Searches

CHINESE EXCLUSION ACT

See Chae Chan Ping v. U.S., 130 U.S. 581 (1889) and Chinese Exclusion Act

CHRISTIAN COALITION

The Christian Coalition is a Washington, D.C.-based national advocacy group that supports conservative political and religious ideals. The Christian Coalition lobbies Congress, state legislatures, city councils, and school boards on a range of issues, including abortion regulation, religious expression in public schools, social welfare policy, and tax-relief. The Christian Coalition maintains an extensive grassroots network of volunteers and distributes candidate voters' guides prior to elections that describe candidate positions on religious, social, and economic issues. The Coalition maintains its activities concentrate on "traditional family values" and are nonpartisan, but liberal advocacy groups, such as People for the American Way and Americans United for Separation of Church and State, have claimed the Coalition policies and voters' guides favor Republican Party issues and candidates. Despite its disclaimers, the Coalition has become a powerful force in the Republican Party, influencing the latter's position on many social issues.

The Christian Coalition was founded in 1989 by Rev. Marion G. (Pat) Robertson, a television evangelist (host of the “700 Club”) and founder of the Christian Broadcasting Network. Robertson created the Christian Coalition after his failed bid for the Republican Party nomination for President in 1988. Early promotional literature stated the group’s purpose as to “mobilize and train [theologically conservative] Christians for effective political action.” The Coalition’s inaugural event was a $500,000 campaign to defund the National Endowment for Humanities. The bulk of Coalition efforts, however, have involved election-related activities such as voter registration, “get-out-the-vote” campaigns, and distributing candidate voters guides. The Coalition experienced initial political success by recruiting unknown conservative candidates for lower level political offices, a strategy described by Coalition Executive Director Ralph Reed as supporting “stealth candidates.” By 1995, the Coalition claimed a dominant or substantial role in the Republican parties of thirty-one states. In the 2000 general election, the Coalition distributed 70 million candidate voters’ guides, primarily to conservative Christians. The Coalition claimed responsibility for the conservative Republican takeover of Congress in the 1994 election and for securing the election of George W. Bush as President in 2000.

Although the Coalition’s agenda concentrated initially on religious and moral issues, Reed expanded the organization’s focus to include support for conservative economic policies, health care reform, and increased defense spending. In 1995, the Coalition announced its “Contract with the American Family,” which outlined ten legislative or policy goals, including school prayer, regulation of pornography and abortion, the adoption of a flat tax rate, and the abolition of the Department of Education, the National Endowment for the Humanities, and the Corporation for Public Broadcasting. The Republican controlled Congress embraced several of the Coalition’s proposals, resulting in legislation authorizing federal funding of religious charities (Charitable Choice) and regulating sexually explicit material on the internet. Criticism of the Coalition’s political activity and voters’ guides led the Internal Revenue Service to deny the organization’s charitable tax-exempt status in 1999. The Coalition reorganized through one of its state affiliates.

An organization related to the Christian Coalition is the American Center for Law and Justice (ACLJ). Pat Robertson founded the ACLJ in 1990 as a legal advocacy group “dedicated to defending and advancing religious liberty, the sanctity of human life, and the two-parent, marriage-bound family.” Modeled after the American Civil Liberties Union, the ACLJ represents religiously conservative litigants in controversies involving public school student religious activities and abortion clinic protests, among others. Through its general counsel, Jay Sekulow, the ACLJ has argued several leading free speech and religion clause cases before the U.S. Supreme Court, including Board of Education of Westside Community Schools v. Mergens (1990), Lamb’s Chapel v. Center Moriches School District (1993), Madsen v. Women’s Health Center (1994), and Santa Fe Independent School District v. Doe (2000). ACLJ also maintains an active amicus practice before the Supreme Court. ACLJ has been effective in encouraging the Supreme Court to adopt a First Amendment jurisprudence that provides equal access to public facilities and funding for religiously motivated expression and conduct.

STEVEN K. GREEN

References and Further Reading

- Boston, Robert. The Most Dangerous Man in America? Pat Robertson and the Rise of the Christian Coalition. Amherst, NY: Prometheus Books, 1996.
- Brown, Ruth Murry. For a “Christian America”: A History of the Religious Right. Amherst, NY: Prometheus Books, 2002.
- Diamond, Sara. Roads to Dominion: Right-Wing Movements and Political Power in the United States. New York: The Guilford Press, 1995.
- Green, John C., et al. Religion and the Culture Wars. Lanham, Maryland: Rowman & Littlefield Pub., 1996.
- Watson, Justin. The Christian Coalition: Dreams of Restoration, Demands for Recognition. New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1997.
- Wilcox, Clyde. Onward Christian Soldiers? The Religious Right in American Politics. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1996.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Board of Education of Westside Community Schools v. Mergens*, 496 U.S. 226 (1990)
- Lamb’s Chapel v. Center Moriches School District*, 508 U.S. 384 (1993)
- Madsen v. Women’s Health Center*, 512 U.S. 753 (1994)
- Santa Fe Independent School District v. Doe*, 530 U.S. 290 (2000)

CHURCH OF SCIENTOLOGY AND RELIGIOUS LIBERTY

The Church of Scientology is a religious–scientific movement that has been at the center of several legal controversies regarding the government’s treatment and regulation of new religious movements.

Since its founding in the early 1950s, the Church has had to struggle for legal recognition as a religion and to counter critics who have claimed the Church's religious and financial practices are a sham. These controversies have engendered a significant amount of litigation in the United States and foreign courts, resulting in mixed successes for the Church. Viewed cumulatively, however, the court decisions reveal the difficulties associated with applying the religious liberty principle to nontraditional religious movements.

The Church of Scientology was founded in the early 1950s by L. Ron Hubbard, best known as a science-fiction writer during the 1930s and 1940s. The religion of Scientology came out of an earlier body of Hubbard's work called Dianetics, which proposes an alternative approach to psychology and psychiatry for treating mental disease and dysfunctioning (See Dianetics: The Modern Science of Mental Health [1950]). The premise of Dianetics is that the human brain has indefinite power but is hampered by painful memories ("engrams") that inhibit its proper functioning and full potential. Through a process called "auditing"—a practice similar to abreaction therapy or the uncovering of repressed memories—an individual can restore his or her mind to its full capacity. Hubbard developed a device used in auditing, called an "electropsychometer" ("E-meter")—similar to a skin galvanometer or lie detector—for measuring and treating engrams. After Hubbard adapted his secular theory of Dianetics into the religious philosophy of Scientology, auditing became the latter's central religious practice. Scientology also claims to have elements of spirituality and cosmology, with kinships to Eastern religious traditions, and has developed religious doctrines, rituals, and ceremonies governing matters such as marriage, christenings, and the ordination of clergy.

Legal controversies concerning Scientology have involved whether Scientology is a bona fide religion, thus deserving of First Amendment protections, and whether its practices should be entitled to the same tax privileges as afforded other faiths. The absence of spirituality in Hubbard's earlier science fiction and psychological writings and the parallels in Scientology doctrines led critics to claim that Hubbard created Scientology for financial gain and to retain control over the growing Dianetics movement. In particular, allegations have centered on the Church's graduated fee for auditing sessions, which can run into the thousands of dollars. The Internal Revenue Service initially denied the Church's application for nonprofit tax status, claiming the Church was a commercial operation. In the early 1960s, agents of the Food and Drug Administration conducted a raid on Scientology's Washington, D. C., church to confiscate E-meters, based on government claims the Church was engaged in false and misleading practices through its auditing. In 1969, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia ruled, however, that Scientology is a bona fide religion and the use of the E-meter, being part of a central religious practice, did not constitute false labeling under the federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act. In 1973, the Internal Revenue Service relented by awarding the Church tax-exempt status.

The Church of Scientology's attaining status as a religion has not blunted controversy or litigation. In 1979, Hubbard's wife and several church officials were charged with conspiracy to burglarize federal government offices and steal official documents related to government investigations of Scientology. The Church has also faced civil lawsuits by former members alleging that church officials have engaged in fraud, kidnapping, and severe emotional injury associated with the recruiting and auditing of members.

The most significant legal controversy involved the Internal Revenue Service's refusal to allow individual Scientologists to deduct the costs associated with auditing sessions from their tax liability. In Hernandez v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue (1989), the Supreme Court upheld the IRS determination that auditing fees were not deductible contributions. Although acknowledging Scientology is a recognized church and that auditing is a central religious practice of the religion, the Court agreed with the IRS that the "fixed donation" or fee was not equivalent to a tithe or gift to a church but was payment for a quid pro quo exchange of an identifiable benefit. Furthermore, the Court rejected the Church's claim that this interpretation of the Internal Revenue Code violated the Church's establishment and free exercise clause rights. Distinguishing the auditing fees from pew rents and other religious assessments recognized as deductions, the Court stated that the relevant inquiry is "not whether the payment secures religious benefits or access to religious services, but whether the transaction . . . is structured as a quid pro quo exchange." The Court also found no substantial burden on Scientologists' religious practice arising from the fact that the IRS interpretation imposed a greater financial cost to engage in auditing.

Despite its legal setbacks, Scientology has achieved full legal recognition as a religious denomination in the United States. Scientology has had greater difficulty attaining similar recognition and protection outside the United States, particularly in Germany and Great Britain, where government officials have maintained that Scientology is more a philosophy or commercial enterprise than a religion.

STEVEN K. GREEN

References and Further Reading

- Friedman, Jerold A., Constitutional Issues in Revoking Religious Tax Exemptions: Church of Scientology of California v. Commissioner, University of Florida Law Review 37 (1985): 565–589.
- Horwitz, Paul, Scientology in Court: A Comparative Analysis and Some Thoughts on Selected Issues in Law and Religion, DePaul Law Review 47 (1997): 86–154.
- Hubbard, L. Ron. Dianetics: The Modern Science of Mental Health. New York: Hermitage Press, 1950.
- Jentzsch, Herber C. “Scientology: Separating Truth from Fiction.” In New Religious Movements and Religious Liberty in America, edited by Derek H. Davis and Barry Hankins, 141–161. Waco, TX: J.M. Dawson Institute of Church-State Studies, 2002.
- Lamont, Stewart. Religions Inc. London: Harrap, 1986.
- Melton, J. Gordon. The Church of Scientology. Torino, Italy: Signature Books, 2000.
- . “Scientology in Europe: Testing the Faith of a New Religion.” In International Perspectives on Freedom and Equality of Religious Belief, edited by Derek H. Davis and Gerhard Besier, 57–68. Waco, TX: J.M. Dawson Institute of Church-State Studies, 2002.
- Miller, Russell. Bare-Faced Messiah. New York: Henry Holt, 1987.
- . Scientology: Theology and Practice of a Contemporary Religion. Los Angeles: Bridge Publications, 1998.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Christofferson v. Church of Scientology of Portland*, 644 P.2d 577 (Or. Ct. App. 1981)
- Church of Scientology of California v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue*, 823 F.2d 1310 (9th Cir. 1987)
- Founding Church of Scientology of Washington, D.C. v. United States*, 409 U.S. 1146 (D.C. Cir. 1969)
- Hernandez v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue*, 490 U.S. 680 (1989)
- Van Schaick v. Church of Scientology of California*, 535 F. Supp. 1125 (D. Mass. 1982)
- Wollersheim v. Church of Scientology*, 260 Cal. Rptr. 331 (Cal. Ct. App. 1989)

CHURCH OF THE HOLY TRINITY v. UNITED STATES, 143 U.S. 457 (1892)

Church of the Holy Trinity v. United States shocks supporters of a complete separation of church and state because of Justice David J. Brewer’s statement for a unanimous Supreme Court that the United States is a Christian nation. In support of this idea, Brewer even invoked the Establishment of Religion and Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment that barred Congress from establishing a religion or interfering with the free exercise of religion. Holy Trinity reflects the widespread understanding of nineteenth-century Protestant jurists and lay people that the prohibition on an established church in no way undermined the religiosity of the nation itself.

The case began when the Collector of U.S. Customs at the port of New York levied a $1,000 fine against the Church of the Holy Trinity in New York for violating Alien Contract Labor Act of 1885 by hiring the Rev. E. Walpole Warren, an Englishman. The act’s broad language made it “unlawful for any person, company, partnership, or corporation . . . to prepay the transportation, or in any way assist or encourage the importation or migration of any alien . . . under contract . . . to perform labor or service of any kind in the United States . . .” The action against Holy Trinity was taken at the behest John Stewart Kennedy, a wealthy Scottish immigrant, who reasoned that the courts would balk at enforcing the act against a clergyman. Kennedy wanted to bring the act into disrepute and paid the fine and the costs of defense.

Holy Trinity’s attorney, Seaman Miller, sought to recover the fine by filing a demurrer raising the question of whether the act applied to a clergyman. Stephen A. Walker, the U. S. District Attorney, did not think much of the drafting skills of the act’s writers, but he dutifully argued in 1888 that the law applied. The statute excepted only actors, artists, lecturers, singers, or personal servants. Miller responded that that Congress had targeted cheap, manual labor only. He also invoked briefly the First Amendment’s free exercise clause, but this argument was ignored by the circuit court judge. The decision in United States v. Rector, Etc., of the Church of the Holy Trinity in 1888 limited the question to whether Congress intended to prohibit the entry of an immigrant who came under contract with a religious society to perform the functions of a minister of the gospel. The judge held that the language of the statute clearly applied, although he believed that no legislative body in this country would have purposefully enacted a law framed so as to cover the case before him.

During Miller’s oral argument before the U.S. Supreme Court in January 1892, the justices’ questions made clear that they agreed that the only statutory exceptions were actors, lecturers, etc. The assistant attorney general became convinced that his oral argument was unnecessary to success, so merely submitted his brief. He learned the next month that he had lost the case. Justice Brewer insisted that the literal construction of a statute must not result in an absurdity. Congressional debate revealed that the act targeting the immigration of large numbers of laborers willing to work for low pay. Yet Brewer was not done. He then declared that a literal construction was also an absurdity because not legislature, state, or national would act against religion because of the religious character of the American people and their society. Brewer included a list of pronouncements drawn from political and legal documents—including the First Amendment clauses—to prove this. In addition, American laws, customs, and society demonstrated that this is a Christian nation.

Modern liberal church/state scholars have dismissed, too eagerly, the Christian nation statement as mere dictum unnecessary to the reasoning of the decision. In a dissent from Lynch v. Donnelly in 1984 where the Court approved of a nativity display on city property, Justice William J. Brennan denounced Brewer for his sectarian arrogance. Today, legal writers are more likely to examine Holy Trinity as part of the debate on the appropriateness of examining legislative history when interpreting statutes. Of course, some were appalled in 1892 by Brewer's statement, but this reaction was not widespread as many Americans shared Brewer's belief in the religious character of their country. In fact, Brewer had made a similar statement for a unanimous Kansas Supreme Court in Board of Commissioners of Wyndotte Co. v. The First Presbyterian Church of Wyandotte in 1883. Holy Trinity thus exemplifies an evangelical Protestant theory of church-state relations as opposed to a liberal theory.

LINDA PRZYBYSZEWSKI

References and Further Reading

- Alien Contract Labor Act, Act of February 26, 1885, 23 Stat. 332.
 Hylton, Joseph Gordon, David Josiah Brewer and the Christian Constitution, Marquette Law Review 91 (1998): 417–425.
 Przybyszewski, Linda. "The Secularization of the Law and the Persistence of Religious Faith: The Case of Justice David J. Brewer." Journal of American History 90 (2004).
 Vermeule, Adrian, Legislative History and the Limits of Judicial Competence: the Untold Story of Holy Trinity Church, Stanford Law Review 50 (1998): 1833–1896.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Board of Commissioners of Wyndotte Co. v. The First Presbyterian Church of Wyandotte*, 30 Kan, 620, 637 (1883)
Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668 (1984)
United States v. Rector, Etc., of the Church of the Holy Trinity, C.C. S.D. N.Y. 36 F. 303, 303 (1888)

See also Establishment of Religion and Free Exercise Clauses; Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668 (1984)

CHURCH OF THE LUKUMI BABALU AYE v. CITY OF HIALEAH, 508 U.S. 520 (1993)

A central theme of the U. S. Constitution, particularly in the balance of powers between the various branches of government and in the federal system itself, is protecting the rights of minorities against the unchecked power of majorities. Alexander Hamilton, writing in Federalist 78, saw an independent judiciary as "an essential safeguard against the effects of occasional ill humors in society" and "the injury of the private rights of particular classes of citizens, by unjust and partial laws" (Federalist 78).

As unwilling to place fundamental rights at the mercy of democratic but sometimes ephemeral and unjust decisions as under the autocratic whims of a monarch, the Founders sought to further enshrine them in the Constitution itself. The decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Church of the Lukumi Babalu Aye exemplifies the wisdom of amending the Constitution to include a Bill of Rights, particularly the clauses of the First Amendment that promote religious liberty.

The petitioners practiced Santeria ("the way of the saints"), a religion that developed in the crucible of the African slave trade in the New World and fused elements of the Yoruba traditions with those of Roman Catholicism. A central tenet of Santeria involves the invocation of the assistance of orishas (spirits), particularly through the use of animal sacrifice. In 1987 the Church leased land in the City of Hialeah, Florida, and announced plans to build a complex that included a house of worship, school, cultural center, and museum.

The Church's announcement caused an upheaval in the community. The City Council convened an emergency meeting and unanimously passed not only a resolution expressing concern "that certain religions may propose to engage in practices that are inconsistent with public morals, peace or safety," but also a series of ordinances banning certain ritual killings of animals and their use in sacrifices.

The Church responded by suing the City and various officials pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983, claiming that the ordinances violated their rights under the Free Exercise Clause of the Constitution. Federal district and appellate courts upheld the laws, and the Church appealed.

The Supreme Court of the United States held that all of the ordinances were unconstitutional. Writing for a unanimous but conflicted Court, Justice Anthony Kennedy first acknowledged that, under the holding in a 1990 case, Employment Div'n, Dept. of Human Resources of Ore. v. Smith, a law that had the incidental effect of burdening a particular religious practice may be constitutional even in the absence of a compelling state interest as long as it was neutral and of general applicability.

The Court found, however, that the City ordinances at issue failed the neutrality test both textually and in their operation. Therefore, the precedent in Smith did not apply, and the Court was obliged to evaluate the ordinances under a standard of strict scrutiny, that is, that they had to be justified by a compelling governmental interest and were narrowly tailored to advance that interest.

The Court observed that the legislative history of the ordinances, their wording, and their application all amply demonstrated that their purpose was to suppress animal sacrifice, a central element of Sante-ria. Because they were overbroad in some respects and underinclusive in others, the Court found that the ordinances constituted a “religious gerrymander . . . an impermissible attempt to target petitioners and their religious practices.”

For example, the Court found that an ordinance’s definition of “sacrifice” was drafted in such a way to permit all forms of killing animals except for religious sacrifice. At the same time, it found that other challenged ordinances were written more broadly than necessary to achieve the City’s preferred secular purposes of protecting public health and preventing cruelty to animals. The Court concluded: “The Free Exercise Clause commits government itself to exercise religious tolerance, and upon even slight suspicion that proposals for state intervention stem from animosity to religion or distrust of its practices, all officials must pause to remember their own high duty to the Constitution and to the rights it secures.”

In a sense, this case represented little more than an adherence to a line of precedents protecting the rights of religious minorities under both religion clauses of the First Amendment. See, for example Fowler v. Rhode Island (municipal ordinance violated Free Exercise Clause where interpreted to ban preaching in a public park by Jehovah’s Witnesses but permit preaching at Roman Catholic Mass or Protestant service) and Larson v. Valente (state law that excepted some, but not all, religious organizations from registration and reporting requirements for charitable solicitations violated Establishment Clause). At the same time, it provided the Court with an opportunity, one particularly evident in the array of concurrences to the Court’s judgment, to revisit the decision in Smith and to ask whether it may have given the government too much power to inhibit or otherwise burden religious practices.

JOHN S. CELICHOWSKI

References and Further Reading

- Goldberg, Steven B. Seduced by Science: How American Religion Has Lost Its Way. New York: New York University Press, 2000, 68–83.
 Loewy, Arthur H. Religion and the Constitution: Cases and Materials. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 1999.
 Sullivan, Kathleen. Constitutional Law (13th Ed.). Westbury, NY: The Foundation Press, 1997, 1461–1500.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Employment Div’n, Dept. of Human Resources of Ore. v. Smith*, 494 U.S. 872 (1990)
Fowler v. Rhode Island, 345 U.S. 67 (1953)
Larson v. Valente, 456 U.S. 228 (1982)

See also Amish and Religious Liberty; Application of First Amendment to States; Balancing Approach to Free Speech; Bill of Rights: Structure; Bob Jones University v. United States, 461 U.S. 574 (1983); Bowen v. Roy, 476 U.S. 693 (1986); Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296 (1940); Catholics and Religious Liberty; City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507 (1997); Compelling State Interest; Defining Religion; Employment Division, Department of Human Resources v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872 (1990); Engel v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421 (1962); English Toleration Act; Equal Protection Clause and Religious Freedom; Equal Protection of Law (XIV); Establishment of Religion and Free Exercise Clauses; Everson v. Board of Education, 330 U.S. 1 (1947); Free Exercise Clause (I): History, Background, Framing; Free Exercise Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence; Goldman v. Weinberger, 475 U.S. 503 (1986); Good News Club v. Milford Central School, 533 U.S. 98 (2001); Hernandez v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, 490 U.S. 680 (1989); Jehovah’s Witnesses and Religious Liberty; Jews and Religious Liberty; Kennedy, Anthony McLeod; Lamb’s Chapel v. Center Moriches Union Free School District, 508 U.S. 384 (1993); Lyng v. Northwest Indian Cemetery Protective Association, 485 U.S. 439 (1988); McDaniel v. Paty, 435 U.S. 618 (1978); Mormons and Religious Liberty; Muslims and Religious Liberty; NLRB v. Catholic Bishop of Chicago, 440 U.S. 490 (1979); O’Lone v. Estate of Shabazz, 482 U.S. 342 (1987); Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925); Prisoners and Free Exercise Clause Rights; Private Religious Speech on Public Property; Quakers and Religious Liberty; Religious Freedom Restoration Act; Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act; Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145 (1878); Seventh Day Adventists and Religious Liberty; Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398 (1963); State Religious Freedom Statutes; Theories of Civil Liberties; United States v. Lee, 455 U.S. 252 (1982); Walz v. Tax Commission of City of New York, 397 U.S. 664 (1970); Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205 (1972)

CHURCH OF THE NEW SONG AND RELIGIOUS LIBERTY

The Church of the New Song (CNS) is an entity created within the federal correctional system. It has engaged in significant litigation in the federal courts over the past thirty years to gain recognition as a "religion" for purposes of establishing the right of its adherents to practice their religion while incarcerated. Interestingly, the federal courts have split in their response to arguments advanced by CNS. The Eighth Circuit recognized the sect as a religious entity entitled to First Amendment protection in Remmers v. Brewer, 494 F.2d 1277 (8th Circuit 1974). In contrast, CNS failed to gain recognition in the Fifth Circuit, which dismissed the CNS appeal from adverse findings by the trial court in Theriault v. Silber, 453 F.Supp. 254, 260 (W.D. Tex. 1978), appeal dismissed, 579 F.2d 302 (5th Cir. 1978). The district court concluded:

The Church of the New Song appears not to be a religion, but rather as a masquerade designed to obtain First Amendment protection for acts which otherwise would be unlawful and/or reasonably disallowed by the various prison authorities but for the attempts which have been and are being made to classify them as 'religious' and, therefore, presumably protected by the First Amendment.

The conflicting findings concerning the legitimacy of CNS's claim to First Amendment protection lie, in part, in the tactics of the entity's founder and leader, Dr. Harry Theriault, a federal inmate with a record of prison escape, violence, and threatened violence. Theriault admittedly created the entity's underlying doctrine, the "Eclatarian faith" while incarcerated and a critical finding of some courts has been that a central tenet of the faith is rebellion against the prison system, judiciary, and government, in general. Theriault v. Carlson, 494 F.2d 390, 394 (5th Cir. 1974).

The difficulty in assessing the legitimacy of CNS's claim to constitutional protection is complicated by the recognition of many other nontraditional or non-Western sects whose theological precepts or practices have been accorded protection under the Free Exercise Clause. As the Supreme Court observed in United States v. Ballard:

It embraces the right to maintain theories of life and of death and of the hereafter which are rank heresy to followers of the orthodox faiths. Heresy trials are foreign to our Constitution. Men may believe what they cannot prove. They may not be put to the proof of their religious doctrines or beliefs. Religious experiences that are as real as life to some may be incomprehensible to others. Yet the fact that they may be beyond the ken of mortals does not mean that they can be made suspect before the law. 322 U.S. 78, 87 (1944) (defendant accused of fraud claimed religious leadership of the "I Am" movement).

Federal courts have routinely permitted practitioners of minority sects to assert claims for constitutional protection, typically in actions brought by inmates. See for example, Cruz v. Beto, 405 U.S. 319, 322 (1972) (Buddhist inmate); Cooper v. Pate, 378 U.S. 546 (1964) (Black Muslim inmate); Teterud v. Gillman, 385 F.Supp. 153, 160 (S.D. Iowa 1974) (Native American hair length protected against claim of institutional disruption); and Kennedy v. Meacham, 540 F.2d 1057 (10th Cir. 1976) (remanding for evidentiary hearing on claims of professed Satanists). The proper resolution of such claims requires conscientious analysis of the purported system of belief and, typically, in the context of inmate litigation, its potential burden or disruption for the institution, as demonstrated by the excellent analysis in Childs v. Duckworth, 509 F.Supp. 1254 (D. Ind. 1982). There, the court rejected the claim of a practitioner of the Church of Satan/Fraternity of the Goat that his need to burn incense and candles in his cell was entitled to First Amendment protection.

A similarly thorough analysis was applied by the Iowa court in reviewing the status of CNS as a recognized religion in the Eighth Circuit, with the conclusion being drawn that CNS functioned much as many other religious sects, had a body of beliefs or theology, and did not exist as a sham or to disrupt the institution. Loney v. Scurr, 474 F.Supp. 1186, 1193-94 (S.D. Iowa 1979). These findings contrast sharply with those entered by the district court in Texas that contributed to a rather hostile view of the CNS and its founder in the Fifth Circuit, evidenced by its explanation for dismissal of the appeal in Theriault v. Silber.

The CNS litigation demonstrates the difficulty in determining when a particular claim of faith is sufficiently well grounded to be accorded protection under the First Amendment. Even when the claim of faith is recognized, that recognition does not necessarily lead to unfettered practice, particular in the context of penal institutions. As the court observed in Loney v. Scurr, 474 F.Supp. at 1196: "... the free exercise of religion has two aspects the freedom to believe, which is absolute, and the freedom to practice, which is not."

J. THOMAS SULLIVAN

Cases and Statutes Cited

Childs v. Duckworth, 509 F.Supp. 1254 (D. Ind. 1982)
Cooper v. Pate, 378 U.S. 546 (1964) (Black Muslim inmate)
Cruz v. Beto, 405 U.S. 319, 322 (1972)

Kennedy v. Meacham, 540 F.2d 1057 (10th Cir. 1976)
Loney v. Scurr, 474 F.Supp. 1186, 1193-94 (S.D. Iowa 1979)
Remmers v. Brewer, 494 F.2d 1277 (8th Circuit 1974)
Teterud v. Gillman, 385 F.Supp. 153, 160 (S.D. Iowa 1974)
Theriault v. Carlson, 494 F.2d 390, 394 (5th Cir. 1974)
Theriault v. Silber, 453 F.Supp. 254, 260 (W.D. Tex. 1978)
United States v. Ballard

CHURCH PROPERTY AFTER THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION

The American Revolution brought about the dissolution of ties between many religious bodies in America, necessitating separate organizations.

Prior to the American revolution, religious corporations were created either by royal charter or by provincial authority derived from the crown. In this period the Catholic Church was without civil rights in the colonies, and title to its property was held in the name of individuals. With the establishment of the United States, religious orders and organizations began to incorporate: the Augustinian Fathers at Philadelphia in 1796, the Sulpicians at Baltimore in 1805, the Jesuits at Georgetown in 1815, and a few years later the Dominicans by legislative act in Ohio. Also, the Methodists formed in 1784, the Anglicans in 1789, the Baptists in 1784, the Presbyterians in 1785, the Dutch Reformed in 1792, and the Lutherans in 1795.

After the revolution, churches were incorporated either by special acts of state legislatures or under the provisions of general statutes. The religious corporation in the United States belongs to the class of civil corporations, not for profit, which are organized and controlled according to the principles of common law and equity as administered by the civil courts. The church is a spiritual and ecclesiastical body, and as such does not receive incorporation. It is from the membership of the religious society that the corporation is formed. The general statutes under which religious corporations can now be formed in most of the American states contain provisions authorizing the legislature to alter, amend, or repeal any charter granted. The life of a religious corporation dates in law from its organization, not from the time it began to exercise its corporate powers. But a mere use of corporate powers limited to the maintenance of religious observances is not sufficient to establish a corporation de facto. The primary object of religious incorporation in the United States is the core of real property devoted to the purposes of religion. American courts have consistently recognized that the terms "church" and "incorporated religious society" are not identical. "Church" encompasses objects and purposes that are moral and religious, whereas "church corporation" deals chiefly with care and control of temporalities.

A religious corporation may not engage in business transactions for profit. It may, however, hold revenue-producing property not used by the church, as investment in the form of an endowment. The mortgaging of real property by a religious corporation generally requires the consent of some superior ecclesiastical authority, as well as an order of the court. Because of the objects of religious incorporation is to give a legal person standing in court, such corporations have the right to sue and be sued. It is in civil courts and not in the ecclesiastical courts that the religious corporation has standing. It is from the civil courts that orders or wants will issue, directing or restraining corporate action. Unlike private corporations, the religious corporation can neither merge nor dissolve without the consent of local church body and higher church authorities.

G. L. TYLER

References and Further Reading

Arnold, Jack L. Church History, American Christianity: 18th Century.

CICENIA v. LAGAY, 357 U.S. 504 (1958)

Newark police asked Cicienia to report for questioning in a murder case. Cicienia went to the police at 9:00 the next morning. Cicienia's attorney visited the station and asked to see Cicienia throughout the afternoon and evening. Meanwhile, Cicienia was asking to see his lawyer. The two were not permitted to confer until 9:30 PM, when Cicienia had already signed a confession.

The lower courts decided New Jersey's refusal to permit Cicienia counsel during the inquiry did not deprive him of due process.

A five-member majority affirmed, relying on Crooker v. California, which allowed police to refuse to honor a general request to consult with a lawyer. The majority acknowledged that, unlike Crooker, Cicienia had already retained a lawyer, but ultimately reached the same conclusion. They admitted a "strong distaste" for New Jersey's tactics, but found no constitutional violation.

The Court acknowledged the right to counsel is critical, but only "one pertinent element in determining from all the circumstances whether a conviction was attended by fundamental unfairness." Because requiring the police to permit accused persons to see an attorney "might impair [their] ability to solve difficult cases,” the Court refrained from “laying down any such inflexible rule.”

The dissent argued the right to counsel is “fundamental and absolute.” Citing Crooker’s dissent, they lamented, we “regret that we have not taken this case . . . as the occasion to bring our decisions into tune with the constitutional requirement for fair criminal proceedings against the citizen.”

Miranda expressly overruled Cicenia.

SARA FAHERTY

Cases and Statutes Cited

Crooker v. California, 357 U.S. 433 (1958)

Miranda v. Arizona, 384 US 436 (1966)

See also Coerced Confession/Police Interrogation

CINCINNATI v. DISCOVERY NETWORK, INC. 507 U.S. 14 (1993)

The question before the U.S. Supreme Court in Cincinnati v. Discovery Network was whether commercial speech should be entitled to the same First Amendment protections as private speech. The defendant was a publishing company that provided educational services to adults in the Cincinnati area and advertised these services in free magazines distributed from newspaper racks on city sidewalks. The city of Cincinnati had granted Discovery Network, Inc. permission to place its distribution racks on public property in 1989, but the following year the city Commissioner of Public Works revoked their permit and a similar permit granted to real estate advertiser Harmon Publishing, claiming that the racks were eyesores and that their placement posed a threat to public safety. The free magazines, the city argued, were “commercial handbills” to which the free press protections of the First Amendment did not apply. The decision affected only sixty-two of the more than 1,500 news racks placed on city property and did not place restrictions on the similar distribution of conventional newspapers.

Discovery Network and Harmon Publishing unsuccessfully challenged the decision in federal court on the grounds that it violated the First Amendment rights of the two companies. The case was appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court, which reversed the federal court’s decision by a 6–3 majority on March 24, 1993. The Court held that commercial speech, while enjoying less constitutional protections than noncommercial speech, cannot be restricted without adequate, demonstrable cause. Writing for the majority, Justice John Paul Stevens stated that disseminators of commercial speech are not entitled to unlimited rights to distribute materials on public property, but that a public entity must be able to justify restricting their activities by demonstrating a “reasonable fit” between the restriction and the stated goals of the restrictions, especially if the restrictions are based in part on the content of the speech. The Court held that the city’s decision to ban free magazine racks did not reasonably fit its stated goals of ensuring public safety and aesthetics, as evidenced by the fact that the ban only applied to less than one percent of the city’s news racks. These goals, the Court opined, could just as easily be achieved by less restrictive means, such as regulating the size, shape, and appearance of the boxes. Justices William Rhenquist, Byron White, and Clarence Thomas dissented, arguing that commercial speech is subordinate to private speech and thus subject to a greater degree of government regulation.

In reaffirming previous decisions in cases such as Central Hudson Gas and Electric v. Public Service Commission, which prohibited government interference in commercial speech without demonstrable cause, the Supreme Court in Cincinnati v. Discovery Network clarified, if only partially, the place of commercial speech in American public discourse. The Court’s decision validated what at the time was a growing medium for the distribution of free information for commercial purposes by implication extending greater constitutional protections to other media for commercial speech such as telemarketing and infomercials.

MICHAEL H. BURCHETT

References and Further Reading

- Belsky, Martin H. The Rhenquist Court: A Retrospective. New York: Oxford University Press, 2002.
- Cain, Rita Marie, Call Someone Up and Just Say ‘Buy’ – Telemarketing and the Regulatory Environment, American Business Law Journal 31 (February 1994): 4:641–698.
- Denniston, Lyle. “A Major Victory for Commercial Speech.” American Journalism Review 15 (May 1993): 46.
- Stewart, David O. “Commercial Break: Supreme Court Bolsters Constitutional Protections for Commercial Speech.” ABA Journal 79 (June 1993): 42.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Central Hudson Gas and Electric v. Public Service Commission, 447 U.S. 557 (1980)

See also Bill of Rights: Structure; Content-based Regulation of Speech; 44 Liquormart v. Rhode Island, 517 U.S. 484 (1997); Freedom of Speech and Press: Nineteenth Century; Free Speech in Private Corporations; Freedom of Speech Extended to Corporations; Prior Restraints; Public/Nonpublic Forums Distinction

CITIZENSHIP

Citizenship comprises the legal status conferring full membership in the national political community. In the absence of any other definitive marker of membership, citizenship has been central to the American experience. Citizenship has been an equalizing force among those afforded the status. It has been exclusionary to the extent that race, ideology, and other criteria have been deployed as qualifications.

The two primary routes to citizenship are by birth and by naturalization. The Framers adopted no constitutional provision for citizenship at birth, unable to resolve the citizenship status of blacks. In Dred Scott v. Sanford, the Supreme Court held that even free blacks could not qualify as U.S. citizens. The Dred Scott ruling was reversed by the Citizenship Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, which extends citizenship at birth to all persons born in the territory of the United States and “subject to the jurisdiction thereof.” In the Wong Kim Ark decision, the Supreme Court found the clause to apply to the children of Asian parents who were themselves ineligible to naturalize.

Although the Citizenship Clause does not apply to members of Native American tribes and those born in unincorporated territories, most notably Puerto Rico, those groups have been extended birth citizenship by statute. By constitutional practice, territorial birthright citizenship is extended without regard to parental immigration status. Proposed constitutional amendments introduced in the 1990s to deny birthright citizenship to the children of undocumented aliens and temporary immigrants were repulsed. Given the growing population of undocumented aliens in the United States (estimated to be as large as 10 million individuals), the strict rule of territorial birthright citizenship has avoided the difficulties of intergenerational caste.

Citizenship is also extended at birth to the children of U.S. citizens born outside the United States, so long as the citizen parent has resided in the United States prior to the child’s birth. Citizenship by descent is extended by statute rather than under the Fourteenth Amendment, as highlighted in Rogers v. Bellei. The condition precedent of parental residence limits the possibility of a nonterritorially connected American diaspora.

The Constitution allocates to Congress the power to establish “an Uniform Rule of Naturalization.” Eligibility to naturalize was long qualified on the basis of race. The original naturalization statute, enacted in 1790, provided only for the naturalization of “free white persons.” Blacks were made eligible to naturalize by statute in 1868. Asian immigrants, however, were long barred from acquiring citizenship. It was not until 1952 that the last race-based criteria for naturalization were repealed.

Racial exclusions aside, conventional wisdom has characterized naturalization requirements as minimal. While this is true in comparative perspective—the thresholds to naturalization have historically been much higher in the European context, for instance—other barriers to naturalization have been and continue to be formidable. From the early twentieth century, naturalization has not been open to those advocating anarchism, communism, and other such doctrines, activity that would otherwise enjoy core First Amendment protection. Naturalization also continues to be statutorily contingent on facility in the English language and a demonstrated understanding of “the fundamentals of the history, and of the principles and form of government, of the United States.” Naturalization applicants must pass a test by way of satisfying these requirements. Thousands fail each year, and many others are deterred from applying at all. Naturalization applicants must also pay a nontrivial application fee.

Finally, naturalization has been contingent on a durational residency requirement, first set at two years, briefly raised to fourteen under the Alien and Sedition Acts, reduced to five years in 1802 where it has stood since. Under current law, qualified residency must be as a permanent resident alien. Aliens in other status are thus ineligible to naturalize. Unlike other naturalization requirements, including the oath of naturalization, the durational residency requirement is not waivable.

Whether by birth or naturalization (at least where not procured by fraud), citizenship cannot be terminated without an individual’s consent under Supreme Court decisions severely limiting the government’s power of expatriation.

As a determinant of constitutional rights, citizenship status has been of declining significance. Some rights have long been extended to aliens, such as the rights of the accused and to equal protection, which the Constitution extends to all “persons.” Discrimination against aliens under state law has been restricted to political functions, in the wake of the Court’s designation of aliens as a “suspect classification” in Graham v. Richardson. Although the federal 1996 welfare reform act deprived noncitizens of important public benefits, many have since been restored. Noncitizens do remain subject to immigration control, including the possibility of removal, and they are also deprived of the franchise, although permanent resident aliens may make campaign contributions. As for the obligations of citizenship, aliens must pay taxes and are subject to conscription. They are exempted only from jury service. Consistent with a constitutional account in which citizenship status is subordinated, Alexander Bickel found “it gratifying that we live under a Constitution to which the concept of citizenship matters very little, that prescribes decencies and wise modalities of government without regard to the concept of citizenship.”

As a constitutional value, citizenship may be enjoying a resurgence. Building on Charles Black’s interpretation of the Citizenship Clause to include a substantive component in the context of racial equality, scholars have deployed citizenship as the basis for economic, gay, and multicultural rights. Linda Bosniak has argued that the Citizenship Clause is sufficiently expansive to protect the rights of noncitizens. With the Supreme Court’s rediscovery in Saenz v. Roe of the Privileges and Immunities Clause, which by its terms is citizenship dependent, such theorizing may have jurisprudential consequences. On the other hand, citizenship remains an exclusionary institution insofar as otherwise willing individuals are barred from membership. Although liberal theorists, notably Michael Walzer, argue that justice requires low thresholds to naturalization, most maintain the necessity of residency, language, and other naturalization requirements. The increasing density of transnational interactivity highlights the inherently illiberal aspects of citizenship. Globalization may also challenge the correlation of citizenship status to individual identity, as associational ties fragment and multiply. The increased incidence of dual citizenship and the rise of social movements, on both domestic and global levels, point to the possible dilution of national citizenship as a primary vehicle for community attachment.

PETER J. SPIRO

References and Further Reading

- Aleinikoff, T. Alexander. Semblances of Sovereignty: The Constitution, The State, and American Citizenship. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 2002.
- Bosniak, Linda. Constitutional Citizenship Through the Prism of Alienage, Ohio State Law Journal 63 (2002): 1285.
- Black, Charles L., Jr. Structure and Relationship in Constitutional Law. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1969.
- Eskridge, William N., The Relationship Between Obligations and Rights of Citizens, Fordham Law Review 69 (2001): 1721.
- Forbath, William E., Caste, Class, and Equal Citizenship, Michigan Law Review 98 (1999): 1.
- Haney-Lopez, Ian. White By Law: The Legal Construction of Race. New York: New York University Press, 1996.
- Neuman, Gerald L. Strangers to the Constitution. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1997.
- Schachar, Ayelet. “Children of a Lesser State: Sustaining Global Inequality through Citizenship Laws.” In NOMOS XLVI: Child, Family, State, Iris Marion Young and Stephen J. Macedo, eds. New York: NYU Press, 2003.
- Smith, Rogers. Civic Ideals: Conflicting Visions of Citizenship in U.S. History. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1997.
- Spiro, Peter J., Questioning Barriers to Naturalization, Georgetown Immigration Law Journal 13 (1999):479.
- Walzer, Michael. Spheres of Justice. New York: Basic Books, 1984.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Elk v. Wilkins*, 112 U.S. 94 (1884)
- Graham v. Richardson*, 403 U.S. 365 (1971)
- Saenz v. Roe*, 526 U.S. 489 (1999)
- Scott v. Sanford*, 60 U.S. 393 (1857)
- Wong Kim Ark v. United States*, 169 U.S. 649 (1898)

See also Aliens, Civil Liberties of; Alien and Sedition Acts (1798); Dual Citizenship; Equal Protection of Law (XIV); Expatriation; State and Federal Regulation of Immigration

CIVIL ASSET FORFEITURE

Civil asset forfeiture has been part of the federal government’s law enforcement arsenal since the founding of the Republic and now exists in all state jurisdictions as well. Civil forfeiture laws establish a legal process by which title to “tainted assets”—including contraband and other assets related to specified criminal activity—is transferred to the government. Although civil forfeiture is generally triggered by criminal conduct, it is accomplished through civil or administrative proceedings and to be distinguished from criminal forfeiture, which can only be imposed after criminal conviction.

Colonial and early federal courts forfeited ships and cargos when used in violation of customs or revenue laws, and subsequent forfeiture laws applied to other categories of contraband and instrumentalities. But modern civil forfeiture laws, initially enacted as part of the War on Drugs in the 1970s, reach much further. Under 21 USC § 881(a) and expansive legislation since, the government is authorized to seize and forfeit drugs; drug manufacturing equipment; cars, houses, and other property used to facilitate drug crimes; and proceeds traceable to drug transactions. Other modern civil forfeiture laws target assets connected to alien smuggling, money laundering, customs offenses, and, under the 2001 Patriot Act, terrorism. State forfeiture laws have also proliferated.

Forfeiture is designed to strip criminals of their undeserved, ill-gotten gains. In theory, forfeitures also can terminate criminal enterprises in a way criminal penalties cannot. Jailing a drug dealer, for example, may simply allow a subordinate to take his place, but seizing the means of production and other capital may shut down a trafficking business for good. In practice, however, forfeiture seems to have done little to incapacitate or deter the multibillion dollar drug trade, because forfeiture losses inflict so small a loss on drug profits.

Whatever their merits as crime-control mechanisms, modern forfeiture laws provide law enforcement with important procedural and financial advantages that, beginning in the mid-1980s, generated greater government reliance on forfeiture and a good deal of concern on the part of legislators, courts, and civil libertarians. Procedurally, a number of benefits accrue to federal and state prosecutors from an ancient legal fiction that dominates all civil forfeiture proceedings: that the property is guilty and on trial. This means, first, that forfeiture can be used even when there is insufficient evidence for a criminal case, when the defendant is a fugitive, or even when the defendant has been acquitted. Second, as a “civil action” against the property itself, few constitutional safeguards imposed on criminal prosecutions apply. Courts have found that the claimant has no constitutional presumption of innocence, no right to an appointed attorney, and no right to confront witnesses. The constitution imposes no burden of proof on the government, permitting most states (and the federal government until reform legislation in 2000) to require the claimant to establish the property’s “innocence.” There is also no constitutional requirement that the property owner be at fault or be prosecuted for the underlying criminal activity. The “disregard for due process” in forfeiture law, as a Second Circuit opinion described it, has deterred property owners from even challenging the government in the vast majority of cases.

However, the government’s largely unchecked forfeiture power began to encounter resistance beginning in the 1990s, first from the courts and then from Congress. In 1993, the Supreme Court decided four forfeiture cases against the government. The most significant, Austin v. United States, 509 U.S. 602, held that forfeiture constitutes punishment regardless of whether it is labeled civil or criminal and, therefore, is subject to the Eighth Amendment’s prohibition on excessive fines. The Austin holding should provide recourse for a homeowner whose house is seized because his daughter sold “nickel bags” in her bedroom, for example. Subsequently, a coalition of conservative and liberal lawmakers excised some of the more draconian provisions from most federal forfeiture laws by passing the Civil Asset Forfeiture Reform Act of 2000. This law filled part of the constitutional void by affording a number of due process rights to the claimant in federal proceedings, including requirements that the government provide adequate notice, prove its case by a preponderance of the evidence, provide counsel to the claimant when the property is his or her primary residence and in limited other circumstances, and temporarily return the property if the claimant would otherwise suffer a substantial hardship. 18 U.S.C. sec. 983. CAFRA also eliminated the short deadline and the ten percent bond federal law had required to challenge a forfeiture, which had effectively denied access to the courts for many claimants. Substantively, CAFRA expanded the number of offenses subject to both civil and criminal forfeiture; unified and refined the defense for innocent owners that had been afforded by earlier federal statutes; and defined the “facilitation” of an offense to require that a “substantial connection” between the asset’s use and the criminal conduct (rather than mere incidental involvement, as some courts had permitted). Similar protections do not yet apply in most state proceedings, although CAFRA will likely prompt reform legislation in some states.

Neither CAFRA nor the Supreme Court has addressed another aspect of forfeiture law that is perhaps most responsible for fueling overzealous, sometimes lawless, use of the forfeiture power: since 1984, federal law has authorized law enforcement agencies to retain the drug-related assets they seize for their own use. States have largely followed suit, but even when a state’s law earmarks forfeited assets to education or other non-law enforcement purposes, the federal scheme allows a local police force to “federalize” its seizure and receive back eighty percent of the assets for its own budget. Under this arrangement, some local police forces have managed to double or triple their appropriated budgets through forfeitures.

This financial incentive scheme has aroused a number of civil libertarian concerns. First, with facilities, salaries, and positions sometimes dependent on how much money can be generated by their own seizures, police and prosecution agencies may pursue their economic self-interest at the expense of both crime control and due process. This financial incentive may also skew plea bargains in favor of drug kingpins and against “mules” without assets to trade, or, as one federal district court has warned, create “an unduly dangerous propensity to encourage unreasonable searches and detentions.” Buritica v. United States. Arguably, this prosecutorial conflict of interest is substantial enough to abridge due process under the Supreme Court’s dicta in Marshall v. Jerrico (1980), although only one lower court decision, in New Jersey, has so held to date. Another concern is that these forfeiture rewards could ultimately produce self-financing, unaccountable law enforcement agencies divorced from legislative oversight. Here too, the issue implicates constitutional protections, and the Supreme Court may one day have to decide whether providing federal executive agencies with the power to finance themselves violates the Appropriations Clause and the separation of powers it was designed to protect. Meanwhile, a few states have passed laws that redirect forfeited funds into education, drug treatment, or other non-law enforcement uses.

ERIC D. BLUMENSON

References and Further Reading

- Blumenson and Nilsen, Policing for Profit: The Drug War's Hidden Economic Agenda, U. Chi. L. Rev. 35 (1998): 65.
 Department of Justice. Asset Forfeiture Law and Practice Manual, June, 1998.
 General Accounting Office. Asset Forfeiture: Historical Perspective on Asset Forfeiture Issues, GAO/T-GGD-96-40, March 19, 1996.
 Hyde, Henry. Forfeiting our Property Rights: Is Your Property Safe From Seizure?, Washington, DC: Cato Institute, 1995.
 Kessler, Steven L. Civil and Criminal Forfeiture: Federal and State Practice § 6.01, 1993.
 Levy, Leonard. A License to Steal: The Forfeiture of Property, Chapel Hill: Univ. of North Carolina Press, 1996.
 Smith, David B. Prosecution and Defense of Forfeiture Cases, Matthew Bender.
 Stahl, Marc B., Asset Forfeiture, Burdens of Proof and the War on Drugs, J. Crim. L. & Criminology 274 (1992): 83.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Buritica v. United States*, 8 F.Supp.2d 1188 (N. D. Cal., 1998)
Marshall v. Jerrico, 446 U.S. 238, 242 (1980)
State of New Jersey v. One 1990 Ford Thunderbird, No. CUM-L-000720-99 (Cumberland County Sup. Ct., Dec. 11, 2002)
 Thompson, Sandra Guerra, Congressional Reform of Civil Forfeiture: Punishing Criminals Yet Protecting Property Owners, 14 Fed. Sentencing Repr. No. 2, pp. 71-75, Sept.-Oct. 2001

See also Calero-Toledo v. Pearson Yacht Leasing Co., 416 U.S. 663 (1974); Due Process; United States v. 92 Buena Vista Avenue, 507 U.S. 111 (1993)

CIVIL DEATH

While there is disagreement about the origin of "civil death," its definition is undisputed. Civil death ends a person's legal capacity and renders him legally dead. The individual loses his property and can no longer perform any legal functions.

In ancient Athens, an "infamous" offender could be precluded from participating in the functions of citizenship. Through the Roman Empire, civil death was later exported to Germanic tribes and England where the practice came to be known as "outlawry." It developed into a penal sanction referred to as "attainder," which triggered the forfeiture of all civil and property rights. The concept ultimately took hold in the United States, albeit in an attenuated way, even though the Constitution prohibits Corruption of Blood and Bills of Attainder. Civil death applied only to those incarcerated for life or a term of years. Courts held that civil death required a statutory mandate. Until the middle of the twentieth century, consequences of criminal convictions, many of which continued after release from incarceration, included the automatic dissolution of marriage, the denial of licenses, and the inability to enter into contracts or to engage in civil litigation.

By the 1960s, however, civil death had largely disappeared from Europe and North America. Most of the rights of felons were restored, at least on their release from confinement. However, remnants of civil death remain in the United States to this day. Large-scale disenfranchisement after criminal convictions is a consequence of former civil death statutes, as are the denial of the right to hold public office and to serve on a jury.

NORA V. DEMLEITNER

References and Further Reading

- Damaska, Mirjan R. "Adverse Legal Consequences of Conviction and Their Removal: A Comparative Study." J. Crim. L., Criminology & Police Sci. 59 (1968): 347.
History and Theory of Civil Disabilities, Vand. L. Rev. 23 (1970): 941-1241.

See also Bill of Attainder; Collateral Consequences; Corruption of Blood

CIVIL RELIGION

Although the phrase "civil religion" was coined by Jean-Jacques Rousseau, it was the American sociologist Robert Bellah who launched the term into widespread use with his 1967 essay, "Civil Religion in America." The term refers to a coherent body of beliefs that many would argue could give transcendent meaning to a nation's sense of purpose.

Unlike other religious belief systems, which correspond to identifiable religious groups, civil religion is unique in that it does not correspond to any particular religious group or institution in the conventional sense. Rather, civil religion is observed within the public sphere. For example, presidents refer to God during their inaugural addresses, proclaim Thanksgiving Day holidays, and close their speeches with “God Bless America”; Congress has a chaplain; coins bear the nation’s motto, “In God We Trust”; and the Supreme Court begins each session with the words, “God save the United States and this honorable Court.”

Despite the constitutional separation of church and state in the United States, according to Bellah, Americans like any people inevitably generate for themselves a shared set of beliefs, symbols, and rituals. Together, these may be seen to provide a religious dimension for the whole of America’s common life, including the political sphere. There may, however, be situations in which certain manifestations of civil religion, such as the governmental display of a religious symbol, violate the First Amendment’s Establishment Clause. While the outcomes of these cases are notoriously difficult to predict, in part because the Supreme Court has not settled on a single test to be applied in all such cases, the Court has on several occasions expressed concern that governmental expression of civil religion may create the perception that government endorses or disapproves of individual religious choices; for example, County of Allegheny v. ACLU (1989) (display of crèche in public building unconstitutional); McCreary County v. ACLU (2005) (O’Connor, J., concurring) (display of Ten Commandments on county courthouse walls unconstitutional).

American civil religion displays certain Christian influences, but this does not mean that it is itself a form of Christianity. To illustrate, American civil religion includes a wide variety of references to God, whereas references to Christ and other sectarian beliefs are extremely rare. This, according to Bellah, is because there is a clear division of function between conventional religion, to which the spheres of personal piety and voluntary social action are allocated, and civil religion, which lies within the realm of a nation’s public self-understanding.

The genesis of American civil religion lies in the Puritan leader John Winthrop’s 1630 sermon, “A Model of Christian Charity,” which set the purpose of the Massachusetts Bay Colony according to a God-given standard: “Thus stands the cause between God and us. We are entered into covenant with Him for this work. We have taken out a commission For we must consider that we that we shall be as a city upon a hill. The eyes of all people are upon us.” Winthrop and the Puritan founders of the Massachusetts Bay Colony believed that they had a duty to God to create a community that all could respect and admire. In keeping with the Puritans’ understanding that political communities were to be held to divine standards, from the colonial period through the years of the early Republic days of thanksgiving were proclaimed not only to express gratitude to God but also to call for the nation to engage in a collective act of soul-searching—rigorous inquiry into whether the nation was fulfilling the expectations that God was understood to have established for it.

Although in its original form civil religion was understood to offer a critical vantage point on the nation’s conduct, civil religion can be used, as Bellah concedes, to fuse God, country, and flag into a form of nation worship that would permit no place for dissent or for questioning the acts of those in positions of political leadership. Civil religion’s original emphasis, however, entailed the sense that national goals and accomplishments should be measured according to transcendent standards, rather than the self-justifying assumption that God is always on the side of one’s own nation or that out of respect for God all persons should support their country, right or wrong.

To those who have criticized civil religion as the shallow worship of the “American Way of Life,” Bellah counters that American civil religion contains profound religious insights that compare favorably to those of the more conventional forms of religion. Civil religion “is a genuine apprehension of universal and transcendent religious reality . . . as revealed through the experience of the American people,” Bellah claims. To make his point, Bellah comments that he is “not at all convinced that the leaders of the churches have consistently represented a higher level of religious insight than the spokesmen of the civil religion.” The theologian Reinhold Niebuhr contends, “Lincoln’s religious convictions were superior in depth and purity to those, not only of the political leaders of his day, but of the religious leaders of the era.”

A brief description of Lincoln’s Gettysburg Address can serve to illustrate how civil religion can function within the nation’s public discourse. On that occasion, Lincoln sought to inspire a nation overwhelmed by the horrible loss of life to rededicate themselves to the Union’s cause. On one level, Lincoln began a ceremony to dedicate a battlefield cemetery was “altogether fitting and proper.” “In a larger sense,” however, according to Lincoln, “we can not dedicate—we can not consecrate—we can not hallow—this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here, have consecrated it, far above our poor power to add or detract.” Those who had come to dedicate the cemetery could only, from Lincoln’s perspective, truly dedicate themselves, by devoting themselves to the cause for which so many Union soldiers had died: “that this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom—and that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth.” Though it may be said that Lincoln here was using civil religion simply to advance the nation’s interests, many have concluded with Bellah that civil religion, as practiced by Lincoln and others, is significant to the extent that it offers a deeper perspective, beyond the mere worship of a nation’s way of life, or the advancement of national self-interest, which might otherwise be absent from American public discourse.

References and Further Reading

- Bellah, Robert N. Broken Covenant: American Civil Religion in Time of Trial. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1992.
- . “Civil Religion in America.” In Beyond Belief: Essays on Religion in a Post-Traditional World, 168–189. New York: Harper & Row, 1970.
- Lincoln, Abraham. “Address Delivered at the Dedication of the Cemetery at Gettysburg” (1863). In The American Intellectual Tradition: A Sourcebook, 1630–1865, vol. 1, edited by David A. Hollinger and Charles Capper, 527. Fourth edition. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Marty, Martin E. A Nation of Behavers. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1976.
- Niebuhr, Reinhold. “The Religion of Abraham Lincoln.” In Lincoln and the Gettysburg Address, edited by Allan Nevins, 39. Urbana, IL: University of Illinois Press, 1964.
- Winthrop, John. “A Modell of Christian Charity” (1630). In The American Intellectual Tradition: A Sourcebook, 1630–1865, vol. 1, edited by David A. Hollinger and Charles Capper, 7–15. Fourth edition. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- County of Allegheny v. ACLU*, 492 U.S. 573 (1989)
- McCreary County v. American Civil Liberties Union*, U.S. 125 S.Ct. 2722 (2005)

CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1866

The Civil Rights Act of 1866 became law on April 9, 1866, by a two-thirds majority overriding President Andrew Johnson’s veto. The first aim of the Act was to provide federal protection to emancipated African Americans, giving practical effect to the Thirteenth Amendment. It was the first in a series of Reconstruction-era Civil Rights Acts.

An immediate concern of the Thirty-Ninth Congress was to invalidate the Black Codes emerging from southern legislatures after the Civil War.

Promulgated first in 1865, these laws limited the civil rights of freedmen to own real and personal property, to freely seek employment or redress in the courts on terms equal to whites, and established harsher criminal penalties for blacks than for whites, among other depredations.

Although early Black Codes were invalidated by the Act, oppressive elements of them were renewed and survived the Act, such as vagrancy laws that put blacks without employment in jeopardy of being jailed, fined, or forced into compulsory labor. Together with terrorizing effects of the Ku Klux Klan and similar organizations, the purposes of the Act were substantially undermined.

Sections 1 and 2 of the Act have proved most important in the history of civil rights. Section 1 declared all persons born in the United States, excepting Indians not taxed, as citizens of the United States, contrary to the decision of Dred Scott v. Sandford. It granted to all citizens the right “to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, and give evidence, to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property, and to full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and property, as is enjoyed by white citizens.” Section 2 provided a criminal penalty for persons who, under color of state law, deprived any citizen of the rights granted on account of race. This was a significant expansion of basic rights and liberties to former slaves. While not specifically protecting freedom of expression, the law was designed to guarantee minimum due process protections for former slaves, and many of the law-makers believed this would help protect their rights to speech, petition, and assembly. The act would also lead to the Fourteenth Amendment, which ultimately made most of the Bill of Rights applicable to the states.

James Wilson sponsored the Act in the House of Representatives; Lyman Trumbull in the Senate. The latter captured its spirit with the statement that “any statute which is not equal to all, and which deprives any citizen of civil rights which are secured to other citizens, is an unjust encroachment upon his liberty; and is, in fact, a badge of servitude which, by the Constitution, is prohibited.”

Whether the Act was within the Constitutional authority of the federal government, however, was a controversial point in Congress. Representative John Bingham, a framer of the Fourteenth Amendment, strongly supported the aims of the Act but believed it beyond constitutional authority. This cloud was a substantial motivation for the ratification of the Amendment, which eliminated any uncertainty.

CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1866

The Act was reenacted in full by the Enforcement Act of 1870. Sections 1 and 2 of the Act are perpetuated in 42 U.S.C. §§ 1981-82, which is the form in which it has remained relevant to modern controversies.

Jones v. Alfred H. Mayer Co., decided by the Court in 1968, addressed a complaint by Jones and his wife that a housing developer refused to sell them a residence on account of their race. The Court held on the basis of its reading of the legislative history of the Civil Rights Act of 1866 that 42 U.S.C. § 1982 prohibited “all racial discrimination, private as well as public, in the sale or rental of property, and that the statute, thus construed, is a valid exercise of the power of Congress to enforce the Thirteenth Amendment.”

A dissent took strong objection to the majority’s account of the legislative history, declaring it “ill considered and ill-advised” to apply the Act to private discrimination, rather than solely to state action. It had been clear to the Court in 1883 in the Civil Rights Cases, for instance, that the Act “was intended to counteract State laws and proceedings, and customs having the force of law” and not the actions of individuals without color of state law. The Civil Rights Cases invalidated the Civil Rights Act of 1875, however, and as to the 1866 Act its discussion was dicta.

The majority interpretation was extended to section 42 U.S.C. § 1981 in Runyon v. McCrary, which held that the Civil Rights Act of 1866, as codified the United States Code, prohibits racial discrimination generally in the making and enforcement of private contracts.

Regardless of the merits of dissenting opinions, the principle that the 1866 Civil Rights Act prohibits private racial discrimination was expressly reaffirmed in Patterson v. McClean Credit Union, after the Court invited arguments to reconsider the issue and has not since been in jeopardy of reversal.

LAWRENCE G. SALZMAN

References and Further Reading

- Bernstein, David E. Only One Place of Redress: African Americans, Labor Regulations and the Courts from Reconstruction to the New Deal. Duke University Press, 2001.
- Bickel, Alexander M., The Original Understanding and the Segregation Decision, Harvard L. Rev. 1 (1955): 69.
- Fairman, Charles. 7 History of the Supreme Court of the United States: Reconstruction and Reunion 1864–1868, 1207–1300, MacMillan Co., 1971.
- Foner, Eric. Reconstruction: America’s Unfinished Revolution 1863–1877. New York: Harper & Row, 1988.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Civil Rights Act of 1875, 18 Stat. 335 (1875)

- Civil Rights Cases*, 109 U.S. 3 (1883)
- Dred Scott v. Sandford*, 60 U.S. (19 How.) 393 (1856)
- Enforcement Act of 1870*, 16 Stat. 141 (1870)
- 42 U.S.C. §§ 1981–82
- Jones et ux. v. Alfred H. Mayer Co., et al.*, 392 U.S. 409 (1968)
- Patterson v. McClean Credit Union*, 491 U.S. 164 (1989)
- Runyon v. McCrary*, 427 U.S. 160 (1976)

See also Bingham, John Armor; Civil Rights Act of 1875; Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. 3 (1883); Dred Scott v. Sandford, 60 U.S. 393 (1857); Fourteenth Amendment; Ku Klux Klan; Slavery and Civil Liberties; Thirteenth Amendment; Vagrancy Laws

CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1875

One of the major and last pieces of civil rights legislation passed during the era of Reconstruction, the Civil Rights Act of 1875 sought to ensure that all citizens, regardless of race, were protected against discriminatory acts in both public and private venues.

Passed during a lame-duck session of a Republican-controlled Congress, the act sought to ensure the freedom of access to the “full and equal enjoyment of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, and privileges” of many public venues, including inns, hotels, railroad cars, theaters, and other “places of public amusement” regardless of race. The act was passed under the authority of both the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution. Led by Republican U.S. Senator Charles Sumner, the act’s intent was to ensure that freedoms and rights were guaranteed to blacks and that private individuals could not discriminate based on race. If an individual violated the act, they were subject to fines of no less than $500 or thirty days in prison.

The act was rarely enforced, however, and in 1883, the U.S. Supreme Court struck down the law as unconstitutional (the Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. 3). The Court’s majority held that Congress had overstepped its authority to regulate private behavior. It would be eighty-two years before Congress passed another act dealing with civil rights, following the imposition of state-sanctioned segregation and Jim Crow laws, most notably in the South.

J. MICHAEL BITZER

References and Further Reading

- Foner, Eric. 2002. Reconstruction: America’s Unfinished Revolution, 1863–1877. New York: HarperCollins.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. 3 (1883)

CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964

With the twentieth century civil rights movement well underway, Congress passed one of the two major acts focused on prohibiting and providing remedies for discrimination against blacks. The 1964 Civil Rights Act, along with the Voting Rights Act of 1965, is a comprehensive piece of legislation designed to attack racial segregation, as well as discrimination based on gender, in public accommodations, employment, and by any private individual or organization that receives federal funding.

The 1964 act came after the passage of the 1957 and 1960 civil rights acts, which sought to protect voting and provide federal protection to ensure voting by blacks. However, racial discrimination in voting and other facets of American society, particularly in the South, prompted President John F. Kennedy to push for a civil rights act. However, it was after Kennedy's assassination that the bill gained major moment in Congress, due in large part to President Lyndon B. Johnson's call for equal rights for all Americans, regardless of race.

The first section of the act focused on voting and barred discriminatory techniques to voter registration; however, the use of such discrimination techniques as the literacy test, which were used to deny voting privileges to blacks and poor whites, would be dealt with major reforms protecting the right to vote would come a year later with the Voting Rights Act. The second section (Title II) prohibits discrimination in any public accommodations (inns, hotels, restaurants, and theaters for example), even though they may be privately owned. This section was based on the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce and was subsequently upheld (unlike the Civil Rights Act of 1875) by the U.S. Supreme Court in Heart of Atlanta Motel v. United States and Katzbach v. McClung. Title III of the act promoted the concept of desegregation of public schools, begun with the 1954 and 1955 U.S. Supreme Court decisions in Brown v. Board of Education. Title VI prohibits discrimination to any public or private organization that receives federal funding. Finally, Title VII outlaws discrimination based on race, national origin, gender, or religion in employment practices. This section was upheld as constitutional in the 1971 case of Griggs v. Duke Power Co., which also held that the act prohibited both intentional discriminatory practices and those practices that had a "disparate impact" on minorities. In addition, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that Title VII sanctioned the use of hiring and promotion practices to counter historical discrimination in employment. This has led to the controversy of affirmative action as a policy to alleviate past discrimination in present-day situations. Finally, by outlawing discrimination based on gender, the Civil Rights Act extends beyond racial discrimination also to areas of "sexual harassment."

In conjunction with the Voting Rights Act of 1965, the Civil Rights Act of 1964 has provided the impetus for major societal changes in regard to all kinds of discrimination and to protect and ensure civil liberties for all Americans.

J. MICHAEL BITZER

References and Further Reading

- Graham, Hugh Davis. The Civil Rights Era: Origins and Development of National Policy 1960–1972. New York: Oxford University Press, 1990.
- Klarman, Michael J. From Jim Crow to Civil Rights: the Supreme Court and the Struggle for Civil Rights. New York: Oxford University Press, 2004.
- Kotz, Nick. Judgment Days: Lyndon Baines Johnson, Martin Luther King, Jr., and the Laws that Changed America. New York: Houghton-Mifflin, 2005.
- Lawson, Stephen F. Black Ballots: Voting Rights in the South, 1944–1969. New York: Columbia University Press, 1976.
- Mann, Robert. The Walls of Jericho: Lyndon Johnson, Hubert Humphrey, Richard Russell and the Struggle for Civil Rights. New York: Harcourt Brace, 1996.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, KS*, 347 U.S. 483 (1954)
- Griggs v. Duke Power Co.*, 401 U.S. 424 (1971)
- Heart of Atlanta Motel v. United States*, 379 U.S. 241 (1964)
- Katzbach v. McClung*, 379 U.S. 294 (1964)

CIVIL RIGHTS CASES, 109 U.S. 3 (1883)

A U.S. Supreme Court case striking down as unconstitutional the last of the Reconstruction-era acts designed to protect against discrimination based on race, the Civil Rights Act of 1875 sought to outlaw racial discrimination on both public and private acts.

The decision focused on five different instances in which whites denied blacks admission to various venues like inns, theaters, and a railroad car. Through a narrow interpretation of the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution, an eight-justice majority found that Congress overstepped its constitutional authority in passing the 1875 act. In their attempt to bar discrimination in public accommodations, Congress used the Civil War amendments to affect both public and private acts of inequality based on race. However, the justices interpreted the amendments narrowly as prohibitions against state governments, and not against private individuals who operated public inns, hotels, and other public accommodations. The act of refusing individuals the right to stay at a private inn, due to a person's race, did not amount to "a badge or incident of slavery," Justice Bradley wrote, echoing a legal theme that would serve as the foundation for Jim Crow laws in a segregated South.

In his dissent, Justice John Marshall Harlan, a Southerner and former slaveholder, attacked the narrow interpretation of the Civil War amendments and instead argued that Congress had the broad power to protect the rights of blacks against all "badges of slavery." This case, along with Plessy v. Ferguson, effectively removed the federal government from civil rights enforcement for more than eighty years, allowing states to impose segregation and Jim Crow laws that discriminated on the basis of race.

J. MICHAEL BITZER

References and Future Reading

Klarman, Michael J. From Jim Crow to Civil Rights: the Supreme Court and the Struggle for Civil Rights. New York: Oxford University Press, 2004.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537 (1896)

See also Equal Protection of Law (XIV)

CIVIL RIGHTS LAWS AND FREEDOM OF SPEECH

The goal of civil rights is to achieve equality, itself definable in various ways, in place of discrimination. Free speech can powerfully advance that goal, and hence is often linked historically with it. Yet free speech can also mean the expression of ideas or attitudes that are at odds with civil rights, and hence there are times when the two are in conflict or at least in tension with one another.

The civil rights movement, and civil rights laws in the United States, center first and foremost on the idea of racial equality, especially in opposition to the pervasive discrimination that was long directed against Black Americans. Free speech, and freedoms of association and assembly which have close practical links to free speech, in turn have a long and positive association with the cause of civil rights, dating back to the movement for the abolition of slavery before the American Civil War. Freedom of speech was uncertain at best for many opponents of slavery. The abolitionist editor Elijah Lovejoy was shot dead and his press destroyed by a mob in Alton, Illinois, in 1837. Southern opponents of slavery, like Angelina and Sarah Grimké of South Carolina, fled or were driven out of the South. Southern postmasters would not deliver anti-slavery literature, and Congress for some years during the 1830s and 1840s even adopted a "gag rule" against anti-slavery petitions.

For a century after the Civil War, segregation and discrimination ("Jim Crow") made for a racial caste system in the American South. Protest against Jim Crow was often perilous, just as protest against slavery had been. In the 1890s the offices of several black newspapers were destroyed by mobs, including—after it printed an editorial against lynching—the offices of the Memphis, Tennessee, "Free Speech." Throughout the South, there were many decades of violence, both official and unofficial, against opponents of segregation. As protest against Jim Crow gathered force in the 1950s and early 1960s, civil rights rallies and marches were broken up by force. Civil rights demonstrators, including Dr Martin Luther King, were arrested, and there were notorious incidents of police dogs and fire hoses being turned on marchers. Three civil rights workers were murdered in Mississippi in 1964 with the apparent connivance of the police, and churches where civil rights meetings took place were attacked, including the Baptist church in Birmingham, Alabama, where four children were killed by a bomb in 1963.

With advocacy of civil rights under threat, civil rights and free speech became intertwined as causes: support for the one seemed easily interchangeable with support for the other. Constitutional law reflected this. In the 1950s and 1960s, the U.S. Supreme Court quashed disorderly conduct convictions of civil rights marchers, for example, and struck down parade permit laws as applied against civil rights demonstrations. The hostility of Southern officials, courts, and juries against civil rights advocates provoked a series of Supreme Court decisions safeguarding free speech and freedom of association, in some cases perhaps extending those concepts further than they might have been extended were it not for the struggle over civil rights. Thus, in NAACP v. Alabama, when the state of Alabama sought the local membership lists of a national civil rights organization in the course of a civil lawsuit, the Supreme Court held that freedom of association, with its "close nexus" to freedom of speech, precluded the disclosure, despite otherwise liberal "discovery" rules in litigation, since rank-and-file members would be open to local reprisals if their identity were revealed. In NAACP v. Claiborne Hardware, the Supreme Court also upheld, on free speech grounds, a business boycott organized by civil rights groups in Mississippi, although in addition to peaceful picketing and urgings to support the boycott, there had admittedly been threatening speeches and publications by the organizers against those in the local Black community who failed to observe the boycott. And the law of libel took a new constitutional direction in New York Times v. Sullivan, when an Alabama police commissioner sued the New York Times and was awarded $1.25 million in damages by a local jury over an advertisement criticizing law enforcement for a “reign of terror” against peaceful civil rights groups in the South. The Supreme Court not only quashed the verdict, it laid down very narrow conditions under which a “public figure” could successfully sue for libel, so that statements that would readily be deemed libelous in many other countries and, at common law, are now immune from lawsuits in the United States. It is at least imaginable that these cases, with their liberal view of what should be protected as free speech and freedom of association—even at the expense of other values or interests—might have been decided differently had they not arisen in the civil rights context.

By the mid-1960s, the social and legal revolution associated with the civil rights movement brought an end to the old regime of racial segregation and discrimination in the South. With the end of Jim Crow, the climate of threat and violence against opponents of segregation, once so pervasive in the South, also came to an end. Campaigns for civil rights certainly continued, aimed at achieving racial justice, defined in various ways. The success of the civil rights movement in the South also inspired others to frame their causes in civil rights terms: ethnic advocates, feminists, sexual minorities, and many others put their claims in this framework. These civil rights advocates, like advocates of any cause, have an obvious interest in freedom of speech and of assembly and association. In this sense, there continues to be important common ground between civil rights and free speech. But with the disappearance of the sort of hostility to free speech that typified the Jim Crow South, various tensions between civil rights and free speech have also come to the surface.

The tension was implicit, in a sense, even in landmark legislation like the Civil Rights Act of 1964. By forbidding employment discrimination, for example, the law inevitably diminished freedom of association for employers who wished to discriminate. It also amounted to a direct ban on certain sorts of “speech,” such as “Whites only” or “No Irish need apply” in employment advertisements. It can plausibly be said that freedom of association is always subject to a variety of limitations, especially in economic life, and that discriminatory want ads are “verbal acts” and hence should not be protected as free speech. In any event, the national interest in banning discrimination was great. Yet the fact remains that prohibiting discrimination does affect freedom of association; as for “verbal acts,” the distinction between “expressive speech” and “verbal acts” is a notoriously slippery one. Even here, then, there was some inevitable tradeoff, however fully justified the Civil Rights Act was.

In the decades that followed, a variety of civil rights laws, regulations, and policies have been directed at least in part at the expression of insulting or otherwise unwelcome attitudes or opinions, revealing more sharply and perhaps more troubling how civil rights and free speech interests can sometimes diverge.

Hate Speech

Criminal penalties for racial insults, and commonly for sexual or religious insults as well, have been adopted in several states. The courts have generally struck down these laws on free speech grounds, although in R.A.V. v. City of St Paul, four Justices of the Supreme Court indicated that they would uphold such laws if they were restricted to “fighting words” and did not seek to punish a broader range of insults such as those which (merely) “arouse anger” or “resentment.”

Hate Crimes

The federal sentencing guidelines, and many state laws, punish various crimes—such as assault and vandalism—more severely if the crime was committed because of the race, ethnicity, gender, or sexual orientation of the victim. Unlike “hate speech” laws, the Supreme Court has upheld “hate crime” legislation, on the theory that punishment often takes motive into account; that the culprit has been convicted of a crime, not an opinion; and that the law may consider “bias” crimes to be especially dangerous to society, by terrorizing particular groups for example, and hence may punish the crimes more severely. From a free speech point of view, the trouble is that the extra punishment is for the culprit’s attitude or opinion, not for the crime itself. In that sense, “hate crimes” smack of the old criminal syndicalism laws, which punished ordinary crimes more severely if they were committed with socialist or anarchist motivations.

Speech Codes

Many colleges and universities, public and private, have adopted “speech codes,” which, typically, prohibit speech that “stigmatizes” anyone on the basis of race, ethnicity, gender, sexuality, or on any number of other bases. Supporters urge that these codes are necessary to ensure that members of groups who might otherwise be stigmatized should feel welcome on campus. Critics say that these codes contribute to enforcing a climate of political conformity on campus, since any expression of unwelcome intellectual or political views can easily be alleged to stigmatize one or another group. When adopted by public institutions, the courts have mostly struck down these codes as content based, vague, and likely to chill free expression. The state of California, by statute, also forbids private colleges to impose limits on free speech that would be unconstitutional on a public campus. But many private colleges and universities elsewhere maintain such speech codes.

Harassment in the Workplace

Federal and state employment discrimination laws have been interpreted to forbid speech in the workplace that creates a “hostile environment” on the basis of race, gender, ethnicity, or various other characteristics. Speech by employers or fellow employees that might be deemed harassment, if “pervasive” enough, can range from racial or ethnic slurs and sexual propositions to religious proselytizing, posting sexually suggestive pictures (including reproductions of works of art), and statements about political or social questions felt to be offensive. If an employee is harassed by fellow employees, it can be the basis for a discrimination suit against the employer. Hence employers have a strong incentive to forbid any workplace speech that could arouse complaint; and an employer might not give much weight to free speech concerns where it is a question of controlling the speech of employees, not the employer’s own speech. The tension between civil rights and free speech interests may be particularly stark here, because there is surely a danger to the effectiveness of equal employment laws if employees can be driven from their jobs by systematic verbal abuse. Yet most people spend a large part of their waking lives at work. Employers, pressured by federal and state civil rights enforcement agencies, and under threat of civil lawsuits, may seek to avoid harassment claims by closely policing what employees say, what topics they discuss, what views they express, and how they express them: even during mealtimes and work breaks, and with little regard for the chill on free expression.

Freedom of Association

Speech and advocacy by an organized group will usually get a better hearing than speech from an isolated individual: hence the obvious link between freedom of association and freedom of speech. But a group promoting a particular cause may “speak” with more unity and more effectiveness if membership is restricted to those likely to support the cause. To what extent can such groups lawfully discriminate in their membership? For example, may an organization promoting the advancement of an ethnic group restrict itself to members of that ethnicity? In 1984, the Supreme Court in Roberts v. U.S. Jaycees held that Minnesota civil rights laws could require the Jaycees to admit women as members, although the Jaycees’ stated purpose was “promoting the interests of young men.” In 2000, in Boy Scouts of America v. Dale, the Supreme Court apparently reversed itself by deciding, on free speech grounds, that the Boy Scouts could exclude adult gay volunteers, despite a New Jersey law forbidding discrimination against gays, because opposition to homosexual activity was one of the principles advocated by the Scouts. In recent decades, civil rights advocates have mostly favored a narrow right of “expressive association” and a robust enforcement of nondiscrimination laws, even as against noncommercial groups, and especially—as with the Jaycees and the Scouts—where advocacy is not the main or the only purpose of the group.

Feminism and Pornography

Many feminist activists and academics support bans on pornography, and a few cities and towns have enacted such bans on the theory that pornography is degrading to women and hence is discriminatory. Pornography in this context is typically defined as “sexually explicit subordination of women,” whether in words or pictures. This definition is much broader than the constitutional definition of obscenity: its ban would extend to works that have literary or artistic value, for example. Even some proponents of such laws are troubled when the law is enforced against homosexual or avant-garde literature, as has happened in Canada and other jurisdictions with feminist-inspired bans. Proponents of banning pornography do not deny the conflict with free speech: some deny that free speech is very valuable, but most urge that feminist civil rights concerns should weigh more heavily because pornography is “low value” speech. But celebrated twentieth-century campaigns against censorship involved works like James Joyce’s Ulysses, which had been banned as pornographic, and which might well fall under the feminist ordinances as well. When cities and towns in recent years passed “civil rights” laws against nonobscene pornography—and when Congress enacted restrictions on internet pornography—the courts struck down these laws on free speech grounds. Feminists and their supporters continue to debate, however, whether pornography should be banned and, if so, with what limits and definitions.

Inasmuch as civil rights are about equality, there is always a potential for conflict with free speech, especially when civil rights are thought to be threatened by inimical attitudes, insults, or ideas. Yet if the equality sought by civil rights is an equality of rights, few if any political rights are more fundamental than freedom of speech. Both as a matter of prudence and of principle, therefore, civil rights advocates might do well to respect and to defend free speech. It would be difficult to achieve civil rights, or any social change, without freedom to speak, to persuade, and to organize. And erosions of free speech compromise the goal of civil rights by eroding one of the fundamental rights which it is, or ought to be, the very purpose of civil rights to guarantee, equally, to all.

MAIMON SCHWARZSCHILD

References and Further Reading

- Bernstein, David E. You Can't Say That! The Growing Threat to Civil Liberties from Antidiscrimination Laws. Washington DC: Cato Institute, 2003.
- Miller, William Lee. Arguing About Slavery. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1996.
- Rauch, Jonathan. Kindly Inquisitors: The New Attacks on Free Thought. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1993.
- Schauer, Frederick. Free Speech: A Philosophical Inquiry. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1982.
- Strossen, Nadine. Defending Pornography: Free Speech, Sex, and the Fight for Women's Rights. New York: Scribner, 1995.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Boy Scouts of America v. Dale, 530 U.S. 640 (2000)

NAACP v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 449 (1958)
NAACP v. Claiborne Hardware, 458 U.S. 886 (1982)
New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964)
R.A.V. v. City of St Paul, 505 U.S. 377 (1992)
Roberts v. United States Jaycees, 468 U.S. 609 (1984)
 Civil Rights Act of 1964, Public Law 82-352 (78 Stat. 241)

CIVILIAN COMPLAINT REVIEW BOARDS

A civilian review board is a group of citizens who are given responsibility for investigating or reviewing complaints of misconduct by police officers. These groups are responsible for holding police officers accountable to the public.

In most instances civilian review board members are appointed by local government officials. The boards are established through municipal ordinances, state statutes, orders from municipal mayors, popular vote, or less often, by request from police chiefs. Each board is unique in terms of the amount of investigatory power it possesses. Some boards are given the power to subpoena witnesses, to discipline officers, and to access police files. Some of these boards also have the power to conduct evidentiary hearings and investigate allegations of racial profiling. Most civilian review boards, however, do not have investigation powers, and they are restricted to reviewing the internal police investigation. These boards do not have any power to discipline police officers, and they merely make recommendations to police administrators who have the power to reject these recommendations without consequence. In some jurisdictions boards are composed entirely of citizens, whereas others have both police and citizen members.

Many police officers oppose the formulation of civilian review boards, because they believe they are capable of policing themselves. Police officers also oppose civilian review, because they fear that their authority will be reduced, and they believe that they need a veil of secrecy to effectively operate. In addition, many police officers believe that civilians generally lack an understanding of the pressures of law enforcement and should, therefore, not be empowered to second guess the actions of police officers.

Thirty of the fifty largest communities, as well as many smaller cities in the United States, have instituted civilian review boards.

JUDITH A. M. SCULLY

References and Further Reading

Best Practices in Police Accountability. A web site dedicated to information and resources on civilian review, www.policeaccountability.org.

Civilian Review Sample Model. Available at www.aclufl.org/take_action/download_resources/civilian_review.model.cfm.

Shielded from Justice: Police Brutality and Accountability in the United States, a Human Rights Watch Report (1998) available at <http://hrw.org/reports98/police/usp92.htm>.

CLARK, RAMSEY (1927–)

One of the most controversial figures in the field of civil liberties litigation, Ramsey Clark is many things to many people. Perhaps to everyone he is a test case for the fundamental principle of the adversary system of justice that all defendants, regardless of the charge lodged against them and no matter how odious their conduct may have been, are innocent until proven guilty and entitled to a zealous defense at law. As familiar as the principle has become, in the annals of American legal history and culture, as well as on prime-time evening television programs, like Law & Order, it has surely been honored more in the breach than in the observance.

William Ramsey Clark, born in Dallas, Texas, in 1927, is the son of U.S. Supreme Court Justice Tom Clark. After serving in the U.S. Marine Corps and graduating from the University of Texas, Clark received a law degree from the University of Chicago and was admitted to the Texas bar in 1951. Clark was a member of the Clark, Reed, and Clark law firm from 1951 to 1961 and was an Assistant Attorney General, then Deputy Attorney General in the Kennedy and Johnson Administrations, 1961 to 1966. In March of 1967, when Tom Clark stepped down from his position on the U.S. Supreme Court, President Lyndon Johnson named Clark's son, Ramsey, Attorney General of the United States.

Contemporary critics of Clark from the left of the American political spectrum look back on his two years as Attorney General as a time when the radical lawyer showed his true colors. He admired J. Edgar Hoover, they allege, instructed the F. B. I. to look for conspiratorial designs in the 1967 race riots in Watts and Newark, and in 1968 was still a sufficient supporter of the Vietnam War to be willing to prosecute Dr. Benjamin Spock and Yale's Rev. William Sloan Coffin, Jr., for conspiring to promote illegal resistance to the draft. But Clark's prosecution of the case may not have reflected his deepest political values and commitments. After all, the attorney for Coffin, Hale and Door's James St. Clair, later represented a cornered President Richard Nixon and was himself criticized by Yale's chaplain for being, in the draft resistance litigation, "all case and no cause." The Boston Globe heralded St. Clair for "accepting clients from across the ideological spectrum." If Clark's legal career is assessed as a whole, the same could easily be said of him, and in praise rather than criticism, so long as one buys into the central claims of an adversary legal process.

At the same time, some of Clark's supporters point out that he supervised U.S. Marshals when they were sent to Oxford, Mississippi, ensuring the enrollment of James Meredith at the University, helped write and secure passage of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 and the Civil Rights Act of 1968, and famously sought to block J. Edgar Hoover's wiretaps of the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. Assuming one regards the civil rights movement of the 1960s as part of the legacy of progressive politics, it is hard to understand Salon writer Ian Williams claim that Clark's "long march leftward only began afterward," after, that is, Clark's tenure as Attorney General.

Generally omitted from Clark balance sheets drawn up by friends, as well as enemies, would be an entry for one of his most interesting confrontations as Attorney General—with none other than the infamous Howard Hughes. As part of an elaborate scheme to take over the gaming industry in Las Vegas, Hughes had presented his chief aid, Robert Maheu, with a blueprint for further acquisition of land, hotels, casinos, and so forth. After closing its casino and operating the Bonanza exclusively as a hotel, thus obviating the need to secure a gaming license, Hughes would then purchase the Silver Slipper and the Stardust, all the while retaining an option to buy the Silver Nugget. With public support from Las Vegas newspaperman and power broker, H. M. 'Hank' Greenspun, Hughes and Maheu were confident they could win gambling licenses from Nevada authorities for the Stardust and Silver Slipper. But Hughes' scheme went awry when U.S. Justice Department lawyers intervened and threatened to initiate antitrust litigation against Hughes if he persisted in his plan to buy the Stardust.

While an assistant attorney general in charge of the Justice Department's Criminal Division sent Clark a memo stating that Hughes would drive undesirable elements out of Las Vegas and suggested that F.B.I. Director Hoover looked favorably on Hughes' expansion in Nevada, the Antitrust Division would not budge and their boss, Attorney General Clark, backed them up. Maheu then appealed to Nevada's two U.S. Senators and then-Governor Laxalt who promptly wrote Clark a letter warning of "permanent damage" to Nevada's economy if Hughes' acquisition plans were frustrated. But it was "to no avail," according to Hughes biographers Donald L. Barlett and James B. Steele. Ramsey Clark, they report, "stood firm. When Hughes realized that the federal government fully intended to sue him, he caved in and withdrew his offer for the Stardust.” Barlett and Steele go so far as to assert that this “was one of the very few times in a career distinguished by harmonious relations with government agencies that Howard Hughes had been thwarted.” Things would soon change, they observe wryly, with the inauguration of President Richard Nixon.

With the Republicans back in power, Clark joined the antiwar movement and would make a controversial visit to North Vietnam in 1972. Two years later, he ran unsuccessfully as the Democratic Party’s candidate for the U.S. Senate from New York (losing out to antiwar Republican, Jacob Javits) and has subsequently devoted himself to providing legal advice to a wide range of public figures and organizations. His clients have included David Koresh of the ill-starred Branch Davidian Church; Native-American political activist and federal penitentiary resident, Leonard Peltier; right-wing conspiracy theorist and demagogue, Lyndon LaRouche; a leader of the Rwandan genocide; former Yugoslavian President Slobodan Milosevic; the Palestine Liberation Organization; Father Philip Berrigan and the Harrisburg Six (prosecuted for allegedly planning to kidnap Henry Kissinger and try him for war crimes); Sheik Omar Abd El-Rahman, the “Blind” Sheik, convicted of participating in the first World Trade Center bombing; and Lori Berenson, an American woman jailed in Peru for alleged contacts with the Tupac Amaru radical movement.

It would be interesting to compare the hostility with which Ramsey Clark’s representation of unpopular clients has occasionally been greeted with that directed, for example, toward Harvard professor, Alan Dershowitz, for his representation of O. J. Simpson, Leona Helmsley, and Klaus von Bulow; or William Kunstler, whose clients included H. Rap Brown, Angela Davis, El Sayyid Nosair, and Malcolm X. Indeed, with respect to the American Indian Movement and Islamic fundamentalists accused of terrorism in the U.S., Kunstler and Clark shared some of the same clients. Kunstler, it will be recalled, “was respected for his belief in justice and his commitment to the rights of the defendant,” as ABC’s Peter Jennings put it in his on-air report of Kunstler’s death; the courageous defender of the “underdog” had even been granted a starring role in one episode of Law & Order, with a script written virtually to marquee Kunstler’s view of the Constitution. Perhaps unlike Kunstler, however, Ramsey Clark’s politics, his choice of clients, something, seem to have placed him beyond the pale for many commentators on the legal scene.

In one of the sharpest interrogations of Clark’s conduct, Ian Williams argues that in 1998, “Clark attended a human rights conference in Baghdad, Iraq, where in his keynote speech he pointed out how ‘the governments of the rich nations’ . . . dominated the wording of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which showed ‘little concern for economic, social, and cultural rights.’” Williams may feel he has thus demonstrated with this example the hypocritical relationship between Clark and his presumed “Kunstleresque” stature as a defender of individual rights and civil liberties. But unless Clark is dishonest for saying what he said where he said it, then it is a statement with which it is hard to disagree.

First, consider Harold Laski’s observation that the gap between liberalism’s promises and performance has always been wide. Any hopeful promises “governments of the rich nations” have made to the rest of the countries of the world have rarely been kept; certainly not kept in a way that would change significantly the quality of life for the world’s poor. From promises of safety against tyrannical regimes and marauding armies, guarantees against the ravages of hunger and disease, to promises of debt reduction or curtailment of agricultural subsidies to developed economies, the rich nations have generally turned a blind eye to the human catastrophe endured day in and day out by the wretched of the earth.

Second, one need only recall Anatole France’s famous aphorism about the law, which in its majesty, prohibits the rich as well as the poor from sleeping beneath the bridges of Paris. Human rights proclaimed by middle class revolution and Western cultural tradition are often of little use to the great mass of people living on earth today, and this sad irony has become so well worn that by now it seems almost pointless to repeat it. That Ramsey Clark is willing to do so, in Baghdad or anywhere else, seems less evidence of devious character or fatal inconsistency than an almost Pollyannaish willingness to maintain faith in the prospect of real social change. How can anyone have confidence in the future, with so little accomplished, these many years after France’s skewering of a purely formal equality before the law? In Dickens’ Hard Times, a working class school-girl is asked if she is not pleased to be living in such a thriving and prosperous state as Britain. Her instructor is horrified when she responds she would have to know, first, who had got the money and whether or not any of it was hers. Again, Dickens was writing in the middle of the nineteenth century. Comments along these same lines by Ramsey Clark are long overdue, and criticizing him for making them in Baghdad is as silly as castigating Bill Clinton, not for having protested the Vietnam but for having done so at Oxford.

No criticism of Ramsey Clark is heard more frequently than that he does not simply provide legal representation for his clients but, goes further, and offers support for their politics and apologies for their alleged misdeeds. He cannot seem to separate out the legal value of zealous advocacy, central to the system, from the dangerous assault on liberal values many of his clients perpetrate, on the very margins or fringes of the system. Nevertheless, in the summer of 2005, Clark was the target of a very different kind of attack. The Associated Press reported that “Saddam Hussein’s chief lawyer quit the Iraqi dictator’s Jordan-based legal team” because “some of the team’s American members were trying to control the defense and tone down his criticism of the U.S. presence in Iraq.” The attorney specifically rejected Ramsey Clark’s defense strategy, saying that Clark “had often asked me to refrain from criticizing the American occupation of Iraq and the U.S.-backed Iraqi government.” No one would claim that Ramsey Clark “is all case and no cause.” But, perhaps Clark simply appreciates that different degrees of identification with clients can be appropriate depending upon the circumstances of individual cases. Unlike his politics, Clark, like most lawyers, is unlikely to share his defense strategy with reporters.

Ariah Naier, once the leader and, arguably, moral conscience of the American Civil Liberties Union, defended the constitutional rights of bedraggled remnants of wartime fascism and obnoxious new Nazi skin heads who demonstrated publicly in Skokie, Illinois, despite the offense thus given to many in the Chicago Jewish community, including some survivors of the Holocaust and many more relatives of those who did not survive. What could protecting the rights of thugs whose hatred for rights is notorious have to do with civil liberty? Naier was often asked this question by deeply perplexed supporters of his values and his organization. It is a hard question, appropriately directed at Ariah Naier and his comrades in the cause of civil liberty, as well as at Ramsey Clark and his colleagues in the legal profession. When prominent Massachusetts attorney John Adams was asked to provide legal representation for soldiers who fired on unruly citizen-rebels in what was called the “Boston Massacre,” Adams did not hesitate. What, he wondered, could be more important to the citizen of a democracy than the right to a lawyer? For better or for worse, Ramsey Clark continues to answer that question in ways not very different from early American patriot John Adams of Boston.

ANTHONY CHASE

References and Further Reading

- Barlett, Donald L., and Steele, James B. Empire: The Life, Legend, and Madness of Howard Hughes. New York: W.W. Norton, 1979.
- “Top Hussein Lawyer Quits, Chides U.S.” USA Today, July 7, 2005.
- Williams, Ian. “Ramsey Clark: The War Criminal’s Best Friend” (Salon.com, June 21, 1999).

CLARK, TOM CAMPBELL (1899–1977)

Tom C. Clark was one of the more controversial justices of the twentieth century Supreme Court. His 18 years on the Court were filled with controversies and shifts among the justices as they decided issues. Clark himself took the unusual step of resigning from the Court in 1967. He did this to avoid any question of conflict of interest when his son, Ramsey Clark, took the position of U.S. Attorney General. Knowing that Ramsey himself or his subordinates would argue cases before the Court that could be interpreted as at least a violation of propriety in court, led the father to resign.

Tom Clark was born in Dallas, Texas, on September 23, 1899. Having been born and raised in a family of lawyers, Clark followed in the family profession, graduated from the University of Texas law school in 1922. After some years of practice in the family firm and a stint as a district attorney of Dallas, Clark moved to Washington, D. C., where he worked for the government during World War II.

Clark’s support in 1944 of Harry S. Truman’s bid for Franklin D. Roosevelt’s vice-president at the Democratic Party convention led Truman when president to nominate Clark as Attorney General.

An opening on the Supreme Court followed four years later. Some amount of controversy followed Clark’s nomination by President Truman; nevertheless, the vote in the Senate was seventy-three to eight in favor of Clark taking the vacancy on the Court.

As Attorney General, Clark had to deal with the growing Red Scare that gripped the nation after the breakdown of the alliance that had won World War II. On the international scene, the concept of a Cold War dominated that breakdown. At home, the Red Scare had significant political overtones for the Truman administration as the accusation of being “soft on communism” was leveled against the Democratic administration.

Clark was at the center of the maelstrom surrounding the Red Scare; even in Clark’s own administration of the justice department, there was pressure on him to take action against communists, their party, and those accused of being disloyal, if not guilty of, espionage. The main call for action was from J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the FBI who, although ostensibly subordinate to Clark nevertheless, put pressure on the Justice Department in his crusade to destroy the Communist Party and all those he believed were the enemies of this nation. Behind Senator Joseph McCarthy (Rep. Wisc.) was Hoover. During the years 1950 to 1954, Hoover supplied McCarthy and the House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC) with information surreptitiously given to these fellow crusaders. Hoover also placed FBI men on the staffs of McCarthy and HUAC.

In an attempt to counterattack charges of “soft on communism” and recover from the losses in the 1946 election, in 1947 Clark following Truman’s Executive Order 9335, created the nation’s first peacetime loyalty program.

The next year, 1948, Clark issued a list of 123 allegedly subversive organizations. It was compiled for use of the Federal Loyalty Review Board. Again, the purpose was to demonstrate how vigorous Truman was in exposing true “subversives.” In fact, however, the list was used by many individuals, as well as public loyalty boards. The “list” was used to discredit anyone who might, for any reason, have joined any of these organizations.

The creation and use of this “subversive list” was more than a political tool. It indicated just how far the nation and its leaders would go to show vigor in searching for Reds under the beds; the result was crippling to the civil rights of all citizens.

In 1951, the Supreme Court found the Clark listing process unconstitutional. It was the only major victory won by those opposing the Red Scare until 1957. Justice Clark did not take part in the decision, since he had partaken in the creation of the loyalty system and was responsible for the “subversive organizations list.”

To some extent, Clark typified a type of New Dealer: one who would give the widest latitude possible to Congress and the executive branch on economic issues but was very narrow on civil rights. The terrible Great Depression seems to have sent the message that only the widest interpretation of the law would restore the economy. The civil rights of individuals and groups were of less consequence and required less concern or protection. Had Clark been able to vote to support the “subversive organization list” in 1951, there is little doubt he would have voted to sustain the loyalty program.

Another case that Clark was not able to participate in was the appeal of the eleven (the twelfth was too ill to be tried) national leaders of the Communist Party, in Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 643 (1961). The government prosecutors did not need his vote to confirm the guilt of the communists (six to affirm; two against; Clark not participating). This time and for some years thereafter, the government’s prosecutions of communists and others trapped in the Red Scare resulted, almost invariably, in confirmation of guilt by the Supreme Court.

A change of the Supreme Court’s makeup began in 1953, following the death of Chief Justice Frederick M. Vinson; Earl Warren was appointed Chief Judge; John M. Harlan II and William J. Brennan, Jr., were appointed as associate justices. The result was a new majority ready to recognize the importance of the First Amendment and place curbs on the use of the Red Scare to justify guilty verdicts. The holdouts from joining this new majority (now dissenters) included Justice Clark.

With these changes in the makeup of the Supreme court, the Justice Department, Hoover, and his FBI lost the ability to punish citizens with jail and fines because of what they believed, what organizations they belonged to, and even what they read. Beyond the change in personnel, the change in the Court can be attributed to not only the changed makeup in the Court but also to the dissipation of the Red Scare throughout the nation.

Two developments signify the importance of what was happening: the 1954 televised Army–McCarthy Hearings and the 1957 decision by the Supreme Court in the Yates v. United States, 354 U.S. 298 (1957). Justice Clark led the battle to sustain the guilt of the Yates defendants, but he failed to convince his brethren. The defendants were all from the California branch of the Communist Party. Following the track laid out in the prosecution of the Dennis case defendants, all nineteen of them were found guilty, fined, and were to serve prison terms. In Yates, the new Court majority stated that only when the government could show that any defendant did some act or took some action (beyond believing) could a citizen be found guilty of the Smith Act. More was required to meet the higher standard imposed by the Court majority.

In 1949, when Clark joined the Court, it seems that Chief Justice Vinson was the colleague whose views Clark followed. This changed, however, as the years passed; the influence of Chief Justice Warren can be seen, particularly in 1954, when Warren led the battle for attacking the race issue (Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 [1954]). Clark joined with the other eight justices in the unanimous decision.

During his mature years on the bench, Clark wrote many excellent and important decisions. A review of his participation confirms that Clark, particularly in those later years on the Court, was with the majority in most decisions; one list of majority vs. minority positions taken by Clark counts forty-six majority listing and only sixteen minority positions by him.

He also moved from being the leading dissenter on First Amendment issues during the period 1955 and forward to a more flexible view of such issues. He was not implacable; he moved from majority to minorities as he felt the case deserved.

Clark is perhaps best known as the author of the Court's controversial decision on Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961). In this decision, the Court held that in state criminal trials, the use of evidence obtained in violation of the Fourth Amendment must be excluded. The roots of Mapp took hold, albeit in the face of a continuing controversy, down to this day.

Two areas where Clark wrote for a majority reflected his abiding interest in religious issues that came before the Court, as Mapp showed his strong interest in criminal law. In Abington School District v. Schemm, 374 U.S. 203 (1963), the Court banned the recitation of bible reading in public school classrooms. In the 1965 case of U.S. v. Seeger, 380 U.S. 163 (1965), Clark again used his formidable writing skills to obtain a majority opinion that broadened that right of a citizen called to army service, to ask for conscientious objector status on the grounds of what that person's religion stated about killing and war.

To study the Supreme Court career of Tom C. Clark is to open a significant window on the difficult years that followed World War II. In the latter years, he was still the major voice in opposing any weakening of the government's use of the courts to attack those he thought posed a threat to the country's security. Justice Clark also demonstrated his independence as a justice who could move between minority and majority sides, particularly where issues of criminal conduct and religious issues were before the Court.

ARTHUR J. SABIN

References and Further Reading

- Ferrell, Robert H. Harry S. Truman: A Life. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1994.
- Friedman, Leon, and Fred L. Israel. The Justices of the United States Supreme Court 1789–1969 Their Lives and Major Opinions: Volume IV. New York: Chelsea House Publishers, 1969.
- Hall, Kermit L. The Oxford Companion to the Supreme Court of the United States. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.
- Klingman, William K. Encyclopedia of the McCarthy Era. New York: Facts on File, Inc., 1969.
- Marcus, Maeva. Truman and the Steel Seizure Case: The Limits of Presidential Power. New York: Columbia University Press, 1977.
- McCoy, Donald R. The Presidency of Harry S. Truman. Lawrence: University of Kansas, 1984.
- Sabin, Arthur J. In Calmer Times: The Supreme Court and Red Monday. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1999.

CLASSIFIED INFORMATION

Classified information is information held by executive agencies of government that only persons with special permission ("clearance") are allowed to see. While the term "classified" is of fairly recent origin, executive efforts to withhold information from the general public, the press, Congress, and the courts go back to the earliest days of the Republic.

The constitutional basis, if any, for such efforts has been equally long disputed. Accountability of government to the people is a fundamental principle, and secrecy inherently compromises it, since one cannot judge or modify policies one does not know of. The Constitution addresses government control of information in several different provisions. One is the requirement that the President shall—not may—inform Congress from time to time of the state of the union.

The only provision aimed explicitly at secrecy is Article I, section 5, which provides that "Each House shall keep a Journal of its Proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, excepting such Parts as may in their Judgment require Secrecy (emphasis added)." Obviously, this is not a grant of power to the executive branch.

The separation of powers system entails numerous types of interbranch communication. Practices dating back to Washington's presidency include congressional requests for information from the President or his department heads and presidential transmittals that asked Congress to keep certain information confidential. Over time, the President realized that the two Houses would not invariably abide by his requests and that individual members might sometimes leak information on their own. This led to the confrontation over Jay's Treaty, in which Washington refused outright to honor a call for papers by the House of Representatives. This episode is sometimes invoked as precedent for "executive privilege" to withhold information. Yet, in actuality, the House adopted resolutions of protest, declaring the President's act unconstitutional.

Similar conflicts would recur from time to time, with varying results depending on the political situation. Appeals for secrecy were often effectively pressed when national defense and foreign policy concerns were at stake, but Congress never formally relinquished its role as "grand inquest of the nation."

A formalized system for protecting these types of information awaited America's rise to great power status and the coinciding expansion of the executive bureaucracy, both of which massively increased the quantity of potentially sensitive official documents. Today's classification system originated in 1951, when President Truman, without a legislative mandate, issued an executive order authorizing officials in both military and civilian agencies to designate information as “confidential,” “secret,” or “top secret.” Over time additional, even more restrictive, designations have evolved. The power to classify is wielded by thousands of officials in many different agencies. The criteria are rather permissive: classification is permitted if release “could reasonably be expected to cause damage to the national security.” Because control of information confers power, both high-level policy makers and ordinary officials have incentives to err on the side of secrecy. Currently, the government produces millions of classified documents each year.

Details of the guidelines have been repeatedly revised, but the constant is that classification limits access to those cleared by the executive branch, after careful background checks, to receive a specific category of information. Most members of Congress, the judiciary, the media, and the public are excluded, and disclosure to such persons or possession by them could perhaps be criminally prosecuted. Since provisions for automatic declassification after a period of years have not been effectively implemented, the system obstructs historical research, as well as debate on current policy issues.

The courts have had very limited involvement with the growth, administration, and regulation of the secrecy system. Since 1967, anyone may file a request for any identifiable document under the Freedom of Information Act, but there is an exception for information that is properly classified. Under a 1974 amendment, such a request may lead to court review of whether the document can safely be declassified, in whole or in part. This procedure is protracted and costly and is, of course, unavailable where the very existence of the information is unknown.

A few cases seem to acknowledge a power of the President, whether “inherent” or arguably implied by legislation, to withhold information sought by parties in litigation. Courts have sometimes been reluctant even to examine the requested documents to balance the requesting party’s need against the alleged need for secrecy. The executive action complained of is then unreviewable. See Totten v. United States, 92 U.S. 105 (1876), United States v. Curtiss-Wright Corp., 299 U.S. 304 (1936), Chicago and Southern Airlines v. Waterman Steamship Corp., 333 U.S. 103 (1948), Knauff v. Shaughnessy, 338 U.S. 537 (1950), United States v. Reynolds, 345 U.S. 1 (1953), Haig v. Agee, 453 U.S. 280 (1981), Department of the Navy v. Egan, 484 U.S. 518 (1988).

The Court has also upheld the oaths of secrecy required of certain officials given access to classified information and enforced them with life-long prepublication clearance requirements and confiscation of profits—even where no classified information was disclosed. Snepp v. United States, 444 U.S. 507 (1980).

On the other hand, in New York Times Co. v. United States, 403 U.S. 713 (1971), the Court declined to enjoin publication of the Pentagon Papers, despite an insistent claim of danger to national security. In United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683 (1974), the President was ordered to surrender his Oval Office tapes to the Special Prosecutor. Nixon had considered invoking national security in this case but for some reason did not do so, relying instead on a distinct privilege for confidential advice.

In sum, the courts are scarcely an effective check on executive secrecy in the domain of national security information. Since Congress and the media have usually shown an equal timidity, it seems that the needed institutional check does not exist. The implications for civil liberties are potentially grave: first, the rights to speak, publish, and participate in debate are hampered by withholding of crucial information. Second, individuals may be subject to loss of employment, denial of redress for damages, revocation of passports, deportation (for aliens), even (for “unlawful combatants”) indefinite detention, based on classified information they are not allowed to see.

DANIEL N. HOFFMAN

References and Further Reading

Hoffman, Daniel N. Governmental Secrecy and the Founding Fathers: A Study in Constitutional Controls. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1981.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Chicago and Southern Airlines v. Waterman Steamship Corp., 333 U.S. 103 (1948)
Department of the Navy v. Egan, 484 U.S. 518 (1988)
Haig v. Agee, 453 U.S. 280 (1981)
Knauff v. Shaughnessy, 338 U.S. 537 (1950)
New York Times Co. v. United States, 403 U.S. 713 (1971)
Snepp v. United States, 444 U.S. 507 (1980)
Totten v. United States, 92 U.S. 105 (1876)
United States v. Curtiss-Wright Corp., 299 U.S. 304 (1936)
United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683 (1974)
United States v. Reynolds, 345 U.S. 1 (1953)

CLEAR AND PRESENT DANGER TEST

The phrase “clear and present danger,” as a criterion for determining when the government can constitutionally punish individuals for their speech, appeared for the first time in the opinion for the U.S. Supreme Court by Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., in the case of Schenck v. United States (1919). In Schenck and two companion cases, the Court considered the constitutionality of convictions obtained under the federal Espionage Act against various pamphleteers and public speakers for speaking out against World War I and thus allegedly impeding military recruitment. In upholding their convictions, Holmes wrote:

The most stringent protection of free speech would not protect a man in falsely shouting fire in a theatre and causing a panic The question in every case is whether the words used are used in such circumstances and are of such a nature as to create a clear and present danger that they will bring about the substantive evils that Congress has a right to prevent. It is a question of proximity and degree.

The “clear and present danger” concept eschewed consideration of the speaker’s “bad” intentions or motivations and focused on the likelihood that an utterance would have consequences dangerous to the country, such as interference with military recruitment. This disinclination to probe into a speaker’s private beliefs or intentions was, in a general sense, protective of civil liberty. But it also seemed to authorize criminal punishment for speech even when the speaker had little control over, or even knowledge of, its consequences. Moreover, these “consequences” of a speech or pamphlet were little more than speculations made by courts and prosecutors, who in times of war were unlikely to err on the side of the speaker.

That Holmes had applied the clear and present danger test to uphold convictions in Schenck and its companion cases convinced contemporary liberals that the test offered little protection for unpopular speech. But Professor Zechariah Chafee of Harvard Law School argued in the New Republic that Holmes’s “clear and present danger” phrase was actually libertarian in spirit, because it established that the government must meet a high standard before it could punish speech consistently with the First Amendment. Both Chafee and U.S. District Court Judge Learned Hand, who had suggested a more speech-protective “incitement to violence” First Amendment test in a 1917 case, communicated with Holmes after the Schenck decision in a tactful effort to move Holmes toward a greater appreciation of the free speech values at stake.

These efforts proved partly successful when, only a few months after Schenck, Holmes dissented in United States v. Abrams. In Abrams, the Court upheld the convictions of several anarchists for distributing literature condemning the U.S. government’s postwar military policy in the Soviet Union. Holmes (joined by Justice Louis D. Brandeis) now condemned any government “attempts to check the expression of opinions that we loathe and believe to be fraught with death, unless they so imminently threaten immediate interference with the lawful and pressing purposes of the law that an immediate check is required to save the country.” His dissent became a rallying point for supporters of free speech and remains one of the most stirring statements in the free speech literature.

During the 1920s, the Court upheld a number of state-court convictions for subversive advocacy, always over a dissent by Holmes and/or Brandeis. In the best-known of these cases, Whitney v. California (1927), Brandeis wrote a separate opinion in which he sought to put more “teeth” into the “clear and present danger” formula: “[N]o danger flowing from speech can be deemed clear and present, unless the incidence of the evil apprehended is so imminent that it may befall before there is opportunity for full discussion . . . [and] even imminent danger cannot justify resort to prohibition of these functions essential to effective democracy, unless the evil apprehended is relatively serious.” Like Holmes’s dissent in Abrams, Brandeis’s Whitney opinion inspired civil libertarians. But it was not until the late 1930s and 1940s that a more liberal Court gradually transformed the free speech opinions of Holmes and Brandeis from lonely dissents into the law of the Constitution.

By 1937, a majority of the Court had seized hold of the “clear and present danger” test and adopted the libertarian gloss Brandeis had placed on it in his separate opinion in Whitney. Over the next few years the Court expanded the test’s application to circumstances far removed from the “seditious speech” situation for which it had been devised; it used the test to reverse convictions under state law for house-to-house soliciting, for picketing, and for criminal contempt in publicly criticizing a judge during a pending case. Some, notably Justice Felix Frankfurter, deprecated this unsystematic application of the “clear and present danger” test, arguing that the Court was using it as a substitute for discriminating, case-by-case analysis of free speech problems.

The Court’s hospitality to civil liberties arguments diminished in the years after World War II. The clear and present danger test, as a meaningful protection of free speech, disintegrated in the Dennis case (1951), in which the Court upheld the convictions of American Communist Party leaders under the Smith Act, which prohibited the organizing of a group for the purpose of teaching the advisability of violently overthrowing the government. Several justices suggested that the assumptions underlying the “clear and present danger” concept were poorly adapted to a new and dangerous world. Courts could not engage in nice calculations of how clear, present, or grave a danger must be before the government could act to preempt the subversive activities of secret organizations presumably under the direction of a foreign dictator. In Dennis and ensuing cases, the Court largely disclaimed the authority to second-guess the legislative and executive branches in their determinations that those with radical political views or affiliations were subject to a variety of criminal and civil disabilities.

The Court returned to a more speech-protective jurisprudence in the 1960s, especially after political protest became associated more with the civil rights movement than with left-wing radicalism. Ironically, the Court gave perhaps its final nod to the clear and present danger test in 1969, when it specifically overruled Whitney while overturning the convictions of Ku Klux Klan members under an Ohio criminal syndicalism statute for organizing a rally. The “clear and present danger” test has long since departed the legal scene, partly because the problem of seditious speech that gave birth to it is no longer at the center of the First Amendment docket. But with the War on Terrorism and legislation like the Patriot Act, this situation may soon change.

CLYDE SPILLINGER

References and Further Reading

- Gunther, Gerald. Learned Hand and the Origins of Modern First Amendment Doctrine: Some Fragments of History. Stanford Law Review 27 (February 1975), 719–773.
- Kalven, Harry. A Worthy Tradition: Freedom of Speech in America. New York: Harper & Row, 1988.
- Rabban, David M. Free Speech in Its Forgotten Years. Cambridge University Press, 1997.
- Stone, Geoffrey. Perilous Times: Free Speech in Wartime from the Sedition Act of 1798 to the War on Terrorism. New York: W.W. Norton, 2004.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Abrams v. United States*, 250 U.S. 616 (1919)
- Brandenburg v. Ohio*, 395 U.S. 444 (1969)
- Dennis v. United States*, 341 U.S. 494 (1951)
- Schenck v. United States*, 249 U.S. 47 (1919)
- Whitney v. California*, 274 U.S. 357 (1927)

CLONING

The right to reproduce is generally deemed to be a fundamental right in American law. Reproductive cloning is an extension of that right. The scientific and then legal construct of reproductive cloning will be explored. (Therapeutic cloning is no different from any other medical treatment and is dealt with elsewhere.)

Cloning: The Scientific Background

Cloning, until now the subject of the fictional analysis of the type found in the novel The Boys from Brazil (1976), has become a medical reality with the recent cloning of a sheep, a horse, a cat, and a dog. Indeed, there is no doubt that in a very short number of years, it will be medically possible to clone human beings, and there is already extensive discussion about whether such conduct should be permissible.

To discuss cloning, one must understand exactly what cloning is. Every human being currently in the world is the product of a genetic mixture: One's father provides half of one's nucleic genetic material, and one's mother contributes the other half; this genetic material is united in the process that we call fertilization, which normally happens after intercourse but can also happen in a petri dish after in vitro fertilization (IVF). A child bears a genetic similarity to his mother and father but cannot be genetically identical to either one of them, because each has only contributed half of their genetic materials. Every person has, along with his or her nucleic DNA, mitochondrial DNA that is not located in the nucleus of the cell but in the cytoplasm. This mitochondrial DNA is inherited solely from one's mother through the egg that she provides and is identical to hers; mitochondrial DNA creates certain proteins needed to function (particularly for respiration—energy metabolism on the cellular level). A father contributes no mitochondrial DNA to his children. As noted in an editorial in Nature, a woman with a mitochondrial disease might be able to produce children free of the disease by having the nucleus of her egg implanted in a donor's oocyte, thus providing the same chromosomal genetic code, but with disease-free mitochondrial DNA.

Siblings who are not identical twins share some of the genetic materials of their parents; however, since each sperm and each egg take a different (sub)set of material from the parents, each sibling has a unique genetic makeup based on a combination of portions of their parents' genes different from that found in their siblings. Identical twins, though, are the product of a single fertilized egg of a unique genetic makeup that splits in half after fertilization, leaving two fully formed zygotes that develop into two fully formed—but genetically identical—siblings. (Both the nucleic and the non-nucleic DNA are the same.) These two children share an absolutely identical genetic makeup and until recently represented the only case in which two people could have an identical genetic makeup.

In the current state of cloning technology, genetic material is isolated from cells taken from a donor. This genetic material is then introduced into the nucleus of an egg/ovum whose own nucleic genetic material has been destroyed, so as to produce an egg/ovum that contains a full set of genetic material identical to the nucleic genetic material of the donor. If the genetic material is taken from one person, and the egg is taken from another, the non-nucleic genetic material of the clone will be that of the egg donor, and not the gene donor, whereas the nucleic genetic material will be from the gene donor. A woman could avoid this “problem” and produce a “full clone” by using her own genetic material and one of her own eggs/ova in the cloning process; that clone will have the exact same DNA makeup as its clonor.

Through stimulation, the egg/ovum with transplanted nucleic genetic material is induced to behave like a fertilized egg, and it then starts the process of cellular division and development as if it is a newly fertilized diploid with genetic materials from a mother and a father. It divides and reproduces, and when implanted into the uterus of a gestational mother, the zygote will grow and develop into a fully formed fetus that will eventually be born from the uterus of its gestational mother. In the current state of technology, all fertilized eggs—including cloned ones—are implanted in a uterus and are carried to term like all normal pregnancies.

The child who is born from this gestational mother is genetically identical to the donor(s) of the genetic material and bears no genetic relationship to the gestational mother. It is not a combination of the genetic material of two people (the mother and father). It is, instead, genetically identical to the one who donated the DNA (or perhaps the two women who donated the nuclear DNA and mitochondrial DNA). It is as if, on a genetic level, this person produced an identical twin, many years after the first person was born. It is impossible to genetically distinguish cells of the clone from cells of the clonor, because their genetic makeup remains absolutely identical. Indeed, there is no reason why this process could not be done from the cells of a person who is deceased.

American Law

To date, there is no case law addressing cloning and no statutes prohibiting cloning. As a general proposition, the guiding principles found in American law governing assisted reproduction are predicated on two concepts: The first is that reproduction is a protected right in American Law, and the second is the desire of American law to assign “parenthood”—both maternal and paternal identity—to the individuals who are expected to function in loco parentis of the child when it is born. Thus, contractual regulation of the terms of surrogacy is permitted so as to ensure that the one who “wants” the child is the parent. Sperm donors can “waive” their paternal rights, and adoption can end the parental rights of natural parents. Generally speaking, unlike the common law tradition, modern American law views status issues (such as parenthood) as something that law determines, rather than something that law discovers. Law can change the natural order of relationships in this view.

Cloning will undoubtedly be yet another such area. While there is a popular sentiment and considerable scholarship to categorically prohibit such activity, one suspects that, in reality, there is no likelihood that human cloning will be banned in all fifty states. Statutes will be passed that regulate cloning and regulate the “market” to ensure that the wishes of the parties—as to status, paternity, and a host of other issues—are met. Indeed, one can already see such a consensus developing. Professor Laurence Tribe, a well-known constitutional law scholar, endorsed the free market approach to cloning. A recent New York Times article accurately captures the spirit of modern medical ethics in America in the reproductive area by noting:

In the hubbub that ensued [after the first sheep, ‘Dolly’ was cloned], scientist after scientist and ethicist after ethicist declared that Dolly should not conjure up fears of a Brave New World. There would be no interest in using the technology to clone people, they said. They are already being proved wrong. There has been an enormous change in attitudes in just a few months; scientists have become sanguine about the notion of cloning and, in particular, cloning a human being The fact is that, in America, cloning may be bad but telling people how they should reproduce is worse

In America, freedom to choose one’s own reproductive method, and market forces that make such choices profitable, will determine who the parent is and what the law should permit. America is not ruled by ethics. It is ruled by law. While there well might be restrictions on embryo research, legal restrictions on reproductive cloning are fraught with constitutional issues, because they impact on the basic right to reproduce.

MICHAEL J. BROYDE

References and Further Reading

- Amer, Mona S., Breaking the Mold: Human Embryo Cloning and its Implications for a Right to Individuality, UCLA L. Rev. 1659 (1996): 43.

- Broyde, Michael, Cloning People: A Jewish View, Connecticut Law Review 30 (1998): 2503–2535.
- Katz, Sanford N., Re-writing the Adoption Story, Fam. Advoc. 5 (1982): 9.
- Kolata, Gina. “Human Cloning: Yesterday’s Never Is Today’s Why Not?” N.Y. Times, Dec. 2, 1997.
- Stumpf, Andrea, Redefining Mother: A Legal Matrix for New Reproductive Technologies, Yale L. J. 96 (1986): 187.
- The Science of Cloning: Sheep: see I. Wilmut et al. “Viable Offspring Derived from Fetal and Adult Mammalian Cells.” (Letters) 385 Nature (27 February 1997) at page 810; Horse: see Cesare Galli et al. “Pregnancy: A Cloned Horse Born to its Dam Twin.” (Brief Communications) 424 Nature (07 August 2003) at page 635; Cat: see Taeyoung Shin et al. “A Cat Cloned by Nuclear Transplantation.” (Brief Communications) 415 Nature (21 February 2002) at page 859; Dog: see Byeong Chun Lee et al. “Dogs Cloned from Adult Somatic Cells.” (Brief communications) 436 Nature (04 August 2005), at page 641.
- Tribe, Laurence. “Second Thoughts on Cloning.” N.Y. Times, Dec. 5, 1997.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Johnson v. Calvert*, 851 P.2d 776 (Cal. 1993)
- Zablocki v. Redhail*, 434 U.S. 374 (1978)

See also Reproductive Freedom

COERCED CONFESSIONS/POLICE INTERROGATIONS

Confessions are deemed the “gold standard” that assure convictions. The majority of confessions are garnered through an interrogation process. Detainees rarely spontaneously confess. Promises, inducements, and sometimes coercion are used by law enforcement officers to obtain confessions. For confessions to withstand legal scrutiny, they must be trustworthy and free and voluntary in nature. However, trustworthiness was the lynchpin for determining whether a confession would be excluded. In the first reported case challenging a coerced confession, Commonwealth v. Dillon, the court’s major concern was not the fact that the twelve-year-old defendant was deprived of food or clothing for three days but that he voluntarily made his confession. At the time of Commonwealth v. Dillon (1792), no constitutional basis existed to challenge a coerced confession. The Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments would give the federal government greater power to review state actions.

Law enforcement has developed sophisticated methods of interrogation that disarm or put at ease detainees. Different levels of coercion exist to induce detainees to confess. The law does allow for coercive tactics but draws the line at such tactics as physical and psychological torture. The 1930s saw the development of the modern doctrine of coerced confessions. Brown v. Mississippi was the seminal case that raised the question of coerced confessions to a constitutional level. The U.S. Supreme Court determined that law enforcement would not be able to use torture as a coercive tactic to garner confessions.

Three black men—Henry Shield, Yank Ellington and case namesake Ed Brown—were accused of the murder of a white farmer, Raymond Stewart. A white mob seized Ellington from his home and hung him by a rope from a tree. Despite being nearly lynched twice by the mob, Ellington continued to protest his innocence. The mob eventually released him and allowed Ellington to return to his home. Kemper County sheriff deputies decided to arrest Ellington and administered a beating to him until he finally confessed to the murder. The sheriff deputies later arrested Brown and Shields and proceeded to torture them. They were bent over chairs and beaten with buckled leather straps until their backs were cut to pieces. The whipping continued until they confessed. A grand jury indicted Brown, Ellington, and Shields the next day for murder.

Defense attorneys for Brown, Ellington, and Shields did not challenge the admissibility of their confessions. The trial court found the “free and voluntary” confessions admissible. The Mississippi jury convicted Brown, Ellington, and Shields of murder, and the court sentenced them to die. The Mississippi Supreme Court upheld the convictions. The court set an execution date for Brown, Ellington, and Shields. However, the United States Supreme Court agreed to review the case.

The Brown defense team raised the then novel argument that the convictions should be overturned due to the violation of the Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination. The tortured confessions of Brown, Ellington, and Shields were not “free and voluntary.”

The Supreme Court in the era of Brown v. Mississippi did not recognize self-incrimination as a constitutional issue. The Fifth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution says no one “shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself.” The language is directed at the use of the legal process to compel testimony in a criminal trial. The Kemper County deputies did not compel Brown, Ellington, or Shields to testify against themselves in the courtroom. They tortured the defendants in the station house. Prior to Brown v. Mississippi, the Supreme Court found on numerous occasions that individual state courts were not subject to the Fifth Amendment.

The Bill of Rights directed what the federal government could do to its citizens, not to state courts. Defense counsel for Brown, Ellington, and Shields had to use a new constitutional standard to get the Supreme Court to review the case.

The Fourteenth Amendment Due Process Clause prevents states from depriving "... any person of life, liberty or property without due process of the law." Defense counsel for Brown, Ellington, and Shields asserted that the actions of torturing the defendants to garner confessions violated their due process rights. The Supreme Court was generally reluctant to intervene into state actions. However, the Court acknowledged that the state of Mississippi had gone too far. Justice Hughes in writing the opinion remarked, "The state is free to regulate the procedure of its courts in accordance with its own conceptions of policy, unless in so doing it offends some principle of justice so rooted in the traditions and conscience of our people as to be ranked as fundamental." Mississippi was free to govern as it chose but it could not violate the basic principle of justice in doing so. The Court stated, "the freedom of the state in establishing its policy is the freedom of constitutional government and is limited by the requirement of due process of law."

Justice Hughes found that the constitution prohibited coercive tactics in obtaining confessions. "Coercing the supposed state's criminals into confessions and using such confessions so coerced from them against them in trials has been the curse of all countries . . . the Constitution recognized the evils that lay behind these practices and prohibited them in this country." The trial court knew Brown, Ellington, and Shields confessed after being tortured yet declined to act. The Mississippi Supreme Court declined to address the due process violations when Brown, Ellington, and Shields appealed their convictions. The Supreme Court had to enforce constitutional rights the state of Mississippi refused to do. The Supreme Court unanimously overturned the convictions and developed a new doctrine that would allow federal review of state actions in criminal cases if constitutional violations existed.

Coercion after Brown

Subsequent to the Brown ruling, trial judges had to apply not only state laws for admissibility of confessions but also had to adhere to a new federal due process standard. The South became the predominant source for coerced confessions. The tactics used by southern law enforcement officers became typified by the use of torture of numerous blacks until they induced confessions.

In Chambers v. Florida, the Supreme Court held that confessions could be coerced psychologically as well as physically. The robbery and murder of an elderly white man prompted Florida law enforcement to detain twenty-five to forty black men without a warrant for a week. After interrogators used sleep deprivation and hunger as manipulation tools, four detainees confessed.

Texas Rangers took an illiterate plantation worker into the woods for a week and beat him until he confessed to a rape. At trial, the defendant steadfastly refused to admit that he confessed. The trial court convicted the plantation worker and sentenced him to death. In White v. Texas, the issue was the singular coerced confession but the state of Texas proffered a novel argument before the Supreme Court. Texas argued that since the defendant denied ever making or signing the confession, White should be denied the right to argue the state of Texas violated his due process rights. The Court rejected the argument and overturned White's conviction. The Court found that since the state insisted on publishing the confession to the jury, the confession was subject to constitutional review.

The Supreme Court struck down convictions in a series of southern cases that each had the theme of a tortured confession. In Ward v. Texas, Justice Byrnes stated,

This Court has set aside convictions based upon confessions extorted from ignorant persons who have been subjected to persistent and protracted questioning, or who have been threatened with mob violence, or who have been unlawfully held incommunicado without advice of friends or counsel, or who have been taken at night to lonely and isolated places for questioning. Any one of these grounds would be sufficient cause for reversal. All of them are to be found in this case.

The Court set due process standards that states continued to flout. In McNabb v. United States, the Court reversed the homicide convictions of two brothers with fourth grade educations from an isolated rural area who confessed after two continuous days of interrogation. The holding spawned what came to be known as the McNabb Rule. Police were to show "with reasonable promptness" some legal cause for holding persons. The Court would not allow convictions to stand where the police failed to promptly allow defendants a preliminary hearing. The Court did not, however, apply a per se blanket exclusion rule to coerced confessions.

The Court extended the McNabb Rule in Mallory v. United States. Washington D.C. police arrested a nineteen-year-old black janitor for the rape of a white woman. Mallory was not told of his right to counsel or to a preliminary examination before a magistrate, nor was he warned he could be silent and that any statement made by him could be used against him. The police interrogated him for several hours, and he then confessed. The police used a court stenographer to record the confession and the deputy coroner to certify that no evidence of physical or psychological coercion existed. Mallory went before court the next day. Mallory's trial was delayed a year to determine whether he was competent to stand trial. The trial proceeded with the strongest evidence being Mallory's confession. Mallory was found guilty. The court sentenced Mallory to death for rape. The Supreme Court reversed the conviction and found the confession inadmissible. The Court held that the D.C. violated federal law that required Mallory be brought before a magistrate "without unnecessary delay."

The McNabb-Mallory Rule put law enforcement on notice that a statement obtained from a defendant during a period of unnecessary delay in having a probable cause determination should be excluded. Federal law dictates that law enforcement delays in taking a defendant before a judicial officer greater than six hours makes any confession gotten inadmissible.

In Lisenba v. California, the Court acknowledged the police illegally detained the defendant for a two-week period before he confessed to murdering his wife, yet the court found Lisenba to be an intelligent man who minimized his own culpability. The Court gave inconsistent holdings. Just two years after Lisenba, the Court reversed a conviction based on a confession garnered from thirty-six hours in detention. In Ashcraft v. Tennessee, the Court began to liken the standards for confessions induced from long detentions to those held up to the constitutional scrutiny of a confession used in a public trial. The Court used the same rationale in Watts v. Indiana. Police interrogations began to be held to strict courtroom standards.

In Malinski v. New York, a police officer killing led to overzealous police interrogation tactics. New York police had no suspects in the killing of Officer Leon Fox. Malinski and his brother-in-law, Spielfogel, ran a "protection racket" and promised each other if one became imprisoned, the other was to care for his family. Spielfogel went to prison, but Malinski breached his end of the agreement. Spielfogel became upset and had contact with the police. The police picked up Malinski but did not bring him to a police station. The police brought Malinski to a Brooklyn hotel and had him strip naked for three hours. They continuously questioned Malinski in the nude and dressed only in a blanket and socks. Spielfogel was brought to the hotel and left alone with Malinski. He confessed soon thereafter. The police drove Malinski to scenes of the crime where he again confessed. Malinski stayed at the hotel three more days before being brought before a magistrate. Malinski signed a written confession while in custody. Malinski confessed a total of four times. Malinski was tried and convicted of Fox's murder.

Malinski challenged the admission of the first oral confession. The trial judge found the confession specious but he allowed it for issues of voluntariness of the written confession. However, the trial judge instructed the jury to disregard the statement unless it was voluntarily given beyond a reasonable doubt. While the judge instructed the jury to potentially disregard the confession, the prosecutor made several references during the trial to the oral confession. The Supreme Court found that one coerced confession corrupted the use of the other three and reversed Malinski's conviction.

The due process doctrine for coerced confessions reached its zenith.

Due Process Limitations

The Supreme Court began to refine the due process doctrine. In Stein v. State, the New York police arrested the codefendants, Cooper and Stein, and interrogated them for robbery and murder. Four defendants were arrested in total. The police initially detained Cooper's father to persuade him to confess. Cooper refused. The Parole Department detained Cooper's brother and threatened his freedom. In total, the police interrogated Cooper for more than thirty-six hours. He eventually confessed. The police confined Stein in the basement of an army barracks. An army officer initially interrogated Stein. Over the course of twenty-four hours, police interrogated Stein, and he eventually confessed after being told about the Cooper confession.

Cooper and Stein had bruises and injuries at their arraignment, but their defense counsel did not raise the issue at trial. However, defense counsel did challenge the use of the confessions. One of the codefendants, Dorfman, testified against Cooper and Stein at trial. The trial court also admitted their confessions, and Cooper and Stein were convicted. Cooper and Stein appealed to the Supreme Court. They claimed the police use of physical and psychological coercion induced them to confess.

The Supreme Court examined the trial court and was critical of the claims of Cooper and Stein. They chose not to testify, and the Court theorized that was due to their prior records. The Court found it could not state what prompted the jury to find the defendants guilty. Was it the coerced confessions or was it the testimony and other State evidence? The Court refused to attempt to second-guess the jury. The Court had to examine whether the confessions were obtained in violation of Cooper and Stein's due process rights.

The Court examined the intelligence and character of Cooper and Stein. Justice Jackson stated, "these men were not young, soft, ignorant or timid . . . they were not inexperienced in the ways of crime or its detection, nor were they dumb as to their rights." Justice Jackson also noted the fact that Cooper negotiated the terms under which he would confess undermined his argument of coercion.

The Court set new standards with Stein. Due process rights would not attach to cases in which the doctrine was meant to protect the innocent not be used as a loophole to protect the guilty. Station house confessions would not be held to the same standard as courtroom testimony. On a case-by-case basis, the personality of the accused would be examined along with other relevant circumstances. The admission of confessions would be examined by the totality of the circumstances.

The Warren Court

President Dwight Eisenhower nominated former California Governor Earl Warren Chief Justice to the U.S. Supreme Court in 1953. Justice Warren created a revolution in criminal law and criminal procedure that culminated in Miranda v. Arizona. The Warren Court reviewed cases with greater scrutiny and held law enforcement accountable by reversing several convictions on technical grounds. Confessions became a central component.

Justice Warren began carve out fundamental rights for defendants and challenge conventional law enforcement procedures. In Gideon v. Wainwright, Florida state court charged Gideon with breaking and entering a poolroom with intent to commit a felony under Florida law. Appearing in court without funds and without a lawyer, Gideon asked the court to appoint him counsel. The court refused, and Gideon represented himself. The jury found him guilty and he received a five-year prison sentence. Justice Black succinctly stated, "The right of one charged with crime to counsel may not be deemed fundamental and essential to fair trials in some countries, but it is in ours."

The Court began to give a nuanced definition of what it meant to have counsel. A Mexican immigrant and murder suspect continued to request his attorney while being interrogated, but the police refused his request. The Supreme Court held that once a suspect becomes the target of an investigation and was not warned about his constitutional rights, he is entitled to representation under the Sixth and Fourteenth Amendments. Escobedo v. Illinois gave suspects the right to counsel during the interrogation phase. The Court began to grant constitutional guarantees at the critical interrogation phase for defendants.

What prompted the Court was the police interrogation of Ernesto Miranda. He was a Mexican immigrant of limited intelligence who confessed to a kidnapping and rape after a two-hour detention. While the police detained and interrogated Miranda, they never informed him of his right to counsel or of his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination. The trial court convicted Miranda and sentenced him to sixty years in prison. The Arizona Supreme Court affirmed the conviction. Miranda appealed to the Supreme Court.

The Supreme Court gave defendants the most clearly detailed and defined rights and created a firestorm in the law enforcement community that still reverberates. Miranda v. Arizona was the first of four combined cases appealed before the Supreme Court to clarify issues of the right of defendants while in custody and under interrogation. Justice Warren held the prosecution may not use statements, whether exculpatory or inculpatory, stemming from custodial interrogation of the defendant unless it demonstrates the use of procedural safeguards effective to secure the privilege against self-incrimination. Justice Warren's opinion became the verbatim Miranda Warnings that are so well known today: (1) an individual held for interrogation must be clearly informed that he has the right to consult with a lawyer and to have the lawyer with him during interrogation; (2) an individual indicates that he wishes the assistance of counsel before any interrogation occurs, the authorities cannot rationally ignore or deny his request on the basis that the individual does not have or cannot afford a retained attorney; and (3) it is necessary to warn him not only that he has the right to consult with an attorney, but also that if he is indigent a lawyer will be appointed to represent him.

Law enforcement feared that Miranda warnings would have a chilling effect on their interrogation procedures. Justice Warren acknowledges that fear in the Miranda opinion:

In dealing with statements obtained through interrogation, we do not purport to find all confessions inadmissible. Confessions remain a proper element in law enforcement. Any statement given freely and voluntarily without any compelling influences is, of course, admissible in evidence. The fundamental import of the privilege while an individual is in custody is not whether he is allowed to talk to the police without the benefit of warnings and counsel, but whether he can be interrogated. There is no requirement that police stop a person who enters a police station and states that he wishes to confess to a crime, or a person who calls the police to offer a confession or any other statement he desires to make. Volunteered statements of any kind are not barred by the Fifth Amendment and their admissibility is not affected by our holding today.

Justice Warren makes it clear that interrogations are still allowed to be a key investigation strategy. However, the Court demanded higher standards from law enforcement in the interrogation room.

Permissible Coercion

The legal prerequisite for a confession is voluntariness, but to some degree coercion is used in police interrogations. As the Supreme Court stated in Oregon v. Mathiason, “Any interview of one suspected of crime by a police officer will have coercive aspects to it, simply by virtue of the fact that the police officer is part of the law enforcement system which may ultimately cause the suspect to be charged with a crime.” No legal test exists that will provide complete freedom from a suspect’s perceived coercion during the course of a police interrogation. To prohibit coercion would mean prohibiting all police interrogations—something society would not contemplate.

Although judges determine whether a confession is admissible, some state legislatures have attempted to establish their own tests. Most of the tests proved to be unsatisfactory, and some have only confused the issue. New York was the exception in drafting legislation that clearly defined a confession “involuntarily made”:

(a) By any person by the use or threatened use of physical force upon the defendant or another person, or by means of any other improper conduct or undue pressure which impaired the defendant’s physical or mental condition to the extent of undermining his ability to make a choice whether or not to make a statement; or

(b) By a public servant engaged in law enforcement activity or by a person acting under his direction or in cooperation with him;

(c) By means of any promise or statement of fact, which promise or statement creates a substantial risk that the defendant might falsely incriminate himself; or

(d) In violation of such rights as the defendant may derive from the constitution of this state or the United States.

Courts quickly resolve cases in which the issue on confession voluntariness hinges on the infliction of direct physical harm on the suspect. Confessions that involve such occurrences are patently rejected. The general rationale for the blanket exclusion centers on the realization that an innocent person may confess, and admission of such a confession would be an affront to the integrity of the judicial system.

Ambiguity does exist with confessions obtained through indirect coercion such as a lengthy interrogation by two or more interrogators or the deprivation of food, water, sleep, or toilet facilities. Many variables are present regarding the suspect’s tolerability or sensitivity to what occurred and to the degree and extent of the deprivations. The Supreme Court found any interrogation inherently coercive, but as in Oregon v. Mathiason (where the defendant was free to leave after confessing) the coercive effects did not rise to a due process violation.

The presence of multiple interrogators during a lengthy interrogation time period is one of the most blatant uses of indirect force. For the prosecution to prove their case, they must present as witnesses all officers involved in the interrogation process. The Illinois Supreme Court ruled in People v. Ardenarczyk that when a defendant in criminal prosecution objects to confession as being result of threats and violence, the burden is on the people to show that confession was made voluntarily, and evidence must show all circumstances under which confession was made. Courts have also held that the number of interrogators and the length of interrogation do not automatically render a confession inadmissible.

The threat factor of coercion does invalidate confessions. When an interrogator led a suspect to believe that unless he confessed he would face great bodily harm or death, the court in People v. Flores found coercion. A mother being threatened with the loss of her children invalidated the confession in Lynum v. Illinois.

Threatening behavior in an interrogation is distinguished from outright threats. An interrogator is allowed to question roughly, to question suspects assuming guilt, express impatience with a potentially lying suspect, or bluff a suspect into believing that evidence was secured to ensure a conviction. The “good cop – bad cop” interrogation scenario is allowed as long as the “bad cop” does not taint the interrogation with force or the threat of force. The comments must be limited to derogatory remarks and expressions of impatience.

The semantics of an interrogator's phraseology can be perceived as coercive. The interrogator's use of the word "better" in trying to persuade a suspect to confess can be construed as coercive if it is interpreted as "you had better confess" versus "it would be better for you to confess." In Edwards v. State, the court found a confession inadmissible based on the coercive effects of a letter. Just before the defendant confessed, a police officer urged the defendant to tell the truth and showed the defendant a letter supposedly written to the officer by an inmate of the state penitentiary (which contained statements amounting to a recommendation that it was better for a person accused of a crime to do what officers told him to do what the police officers urged). The confession, supported by the letter, constituted an inducement to the defendant and made the confession inadmissible in the murder prosecution.

Promises

When an interrogator uses language that leads a detainee to believe that confessing could lead to leniency, the confession becomes questionable. The mere promise of a lighter sentence does not vitiate a confession. A promise of leniency that may induce a false confession is what courts abhor.

Exhorting a detainee to tell the truth is permissible, because it is considered free from inducing false confessions. However, when an interrogator attempts to make specific promises, courts consider such language coercive. In Hillard v. State, the interrogating officer promised Hillard that he would "go to bat" for him. The court found that such a promise was an inducement that provoked an involuntary confession. An interrogator may report that a detainee has been cooperative as long as there is no specific promise of a lesser sentence. Detainees are without counsel during interrogations, and such promises or plea bargains are the purview of attorneys.

An interrogator can make limited promises such as keeping incriminating statements from family members, reduced bail recommendations, or assisting with psychiatric treatment after incarceration. A more explicit promise such as putting a homosexual detainee in the "gay cell" was found in State v. Greene to invalidate the confession.

Trickery and Deceit

The Supreme Court has given leeway to interrogators to use trickery and deceit during the interrogation process. In Frazier v. Cupp, the Court upheld the conviction of Frazier—dismissing his argument that his confession was involuntary and induced by the deceit of his interrogator. Oregon law enforcement officers detained Frazier as a murder suspect along with his cousin Rawls. An officer deliberately lied to Frazier and told him that Rawls confessed. Frazier then confessed. On appeal, Frazier claimed coercion. Justice Marshall rejected Frazier's claim and found he was a man of normal intelligence who knowingly waived his right to silence. Justice Marshall surmised that under the totality of the circumstance, none of Frazier's constitutional rights were violated.

Interrogators are given latitude by the courts to use aggressive and deceitful tactics in questioning detainees. Interrogators can lie about having positive fingerprint identification placing a detainee at a crime scene. One suspect can be pitted against another in seeking to obtain a confession. Even lying about victims is not considered sacrosanct. Interrogators have condemned and maligned victims hoping the suspects would confess. One officer blatantly told a murder suspect that the victim was still alive. However, in the Illinois Supreme Court a detective crossed the line when he lied to a suspect by falsely claiming that they obtained his fingerprints from the burgled residence and that the victim positively identified him. The court found that in determining whether a confession was voluntarily made, the defendant's confession was made freely, voluntarily, and without compulsion or inducement of any sort.

Present Day: Harmless Error

The Supreme Court began a retreat from the Warren Court's judicial activism. The case that signaled the greatest retreat was Fulminate v. Arizona (1991). The Supreme Court overruled prior cases and found coerced confessions could be deemed harmless error. Harmless error means that coerced confessions could be used in a trial if the prosecutor can prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the coercive actions did not violate due process rights.

Oreste Fulminate was in an Arizona detention center for a gun violation when another inmate befriended him. The inmate, Anotho Sarivola, began to question Fulminate about the murder of his stepdaughter. Sarivola worked for Arizona law enforcement and was given the specific task of befriending Fulminate hoping he would confess to Sarivola. Fulminate began to get threats from other detainees. Sarivola promised to protect Fulminate if he told Sarivola the truth about the murder. Fulminate admitted to the charge. Fulminate was released from prison and later confessed to Sarivola's fiancé.

The State of Arizona prosecuted Fulminate for murder. During the trial, Fulminate attempted to have the confessions deemed inadmissible. The trial court disagreed. The confessions were admitted into evidence, and the court found Fulminate guilty and sentenced him to death. Fulminate appealed his conviction claiming violations of the Fifth and Fourteenth amendments.

Fulminate's appellate history became complicated. The Arizona Supreme Court disagreed with Fulminate's initial appeal but allowed the case to be heard again. On rehearing, the court did reverse Fulminate's conviction. The Supreme Court decided to hear the case. The Supreme Court broke from the history of prior cases that held there is no such thing as a coerced confession being harmless error. Many in the criminal justice system feared that the Supreme Court would begin to retreat on the well-established doctrine of coerced confessions.

The Future

In the post September 11th world, the U.S. government has used unprecedented power in its war against terrorism. The government has the power to suspend the civil liberties of its citizens by incurring the enemy combatant status. Once the status is invoked, the person is placed outside the purview of American law and jurisprudence. An enemy combatant is not allowed to have regular contact with an attorney, has no judicial review, and may be detained indefinitely. The unchecked power that is granted to federal law enforcement without review could lead to circumstance similar to Brown v. Mississippi.

Enemy combatants are not entitled to general court trials. Military tribunals are established to try cases due to national security issues. The tribunal does not have a court of higher review. Once the tribunal decides the case, the defendants have no appellate rights. Coercive tactics can arise in cases where there exists no governing body to review federal agents' actions. Coercive tactics include physical and psychological interrogations techniques that render detainees/enemy combatants with no legal recourse. Legal challenges to the enemy combatant status are underway that present fundamental constitutional questions to the Supreme Court: (1) do they have a right to remain silent; (2) can they be compelled to be a witness against themselves; (3) can a "free and voluntary" confession be given or used in court when a detainee has been deprived of his fundamental constitutional rights?

GENEVA BROWN

References and Further Reading

- Nasheri, Hedieh, and Victor J. DeMarco, True Confessions?: A Critique of Arizona v. Fulminate, Am. J. Crim. L. 273, 21.
- Raddack, Jesselyn, United States Citizens Detained As Enemy Combatants: The Right to Counsel as a Matter of Ethics, William and Mary Bill of Rights Journal 12 (2003): 221.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Brown v. Mississippi*, 279 U.S. 278 (1936)
- Chambers v. Florida*, 309 U.S. 227 (1940)
- Frazier v. Cupp*
- Fulminate v. Arizona*
- Malinski v. New York*
- Miranda v. Arizona*, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)
- Ward v. Texas*
- Padilla ex rel. Newman v. Bush, 233 F. Supp. 2d 564, 599 (S.D.N.Y. 2002)
- Supreme Court Historical Society
www.supremecourthistory.org/02_history/subs_timeline/images_chiefs/014.html
 Title 18 of the United States Code Section 3501(c)

See also Due Process; Race and Criminal Justice

COHEN v. CALIFORNIA, 403 U.S. 15 (1971)

In 1968, Paul Cohen peaceably entered the Los Angeles County Courthouse wearing a jacket visibly bearing the words "Fuck the Draft," deliberately denouncing American involvement in Vietnam. He was convicted and sentenced to thirty days in jail under California Penal Code §415 that prohibited conduct that "maliciously or willfully disturbs the peace." The California Court of Appeal upheld the conviction, ruling Cohen's attire had "a tendency to provoke others" to violence or to disrupt the peace.

U.S. Supreme Court Justice John Marshall Harlan II ruled that because Cohen's conviction relied on the offending words, his actions amounted to speech—not conduct—and were, therefore, protected under the First and Fourteenth Amendments. The rest of the opinion addressed state limits in restricting speech. Noting that Cohen neither showed intent to incite actual draft resistance, nor aimed any fighting words at bystanders, nor was there was a crowd "standing ready to strike out" against his words, Harlan maintained the government had no authority to censor speech for fear that violence or disruption could break out. He reminded the bench that the right to free expression was “powerful medicine” in a diverse population, because it cultivates “a more capable citizenry and more perfect polity”—products especially important to a nation divided by war. Nor was Harlan persuaded that “Fuck” was a particularly inflammatory word requiring government regulation. He warned against sanitizing free speech without clear standards for measuring appropriateness because “one man’s vulgarity is another’s lyric.” Furthermore, such cleansing could cripple the emotive function of communication; often “grammatically palatable” words fail to express the emotions and ideas underlying expressive speech adequately. Harlan also rejected the state’s claim that Cohen’s jacket was especially egregious in the “decorous atmosphere” of the courthouse, because the penal code did not put Californians on notice that certain words or conduct were impermissible in specified circumstances. The speech also did not fall within the state’s police powers to prohibit obscenity where there was no intent to stimulate an erotic response from the people in the courthouse. Finally, Cohen’s words did not engage California’s authority to protect privacy and shield people from vulgarities, because those in the courthouse were neither captive nor powerless to avoid his jacket—they could simply look away. In a five to four split, Harlan reversed Cohen’s conviction.

Cohen is frequently cited in free speech cases, especially if matters of taste, audience captivity, or the suppression of ideas are at issue. Its legacy in First Amendment litigation, however, is cloudy because it is rarely central to Supreme Court rationale. The Court often sidesteps the ruling by distinguishing it as peculiar to the California courthouse circumstances. On its face, Cohen places most profanity under First Amendment protections by separating it from obscenity considerations. The opinion also invalidates state laws prohibiting all profanity in public, unless they define factors such as audience or location. In all, it seems that Harlan rescued profanity’s emotive function from state efforts to restrict expression to preserve social and moral order.

DOMINIC DEBRINCAT

References and Further Reading

- Cohen, William, A Look Back at Cohen v. California, UCLA Law Review 34 (1987): 1575–1614.
 Krotoszynski, Ronald J., Jr., Cohen v. California: “Inconsequential” Cases and Larger Principles, Texas Law Review 74 (1996): 1251–1256.

Cases and Statutes Cited

California Penal Code §415

See also Application of First Amendment to States; Fighting Words and Free Speech; Freedom of Speech: Modern Period (1917–Present); Harlan, John Marshall II; Obscenity; Police Power of the State; Public Vulgarity and Free Speech; Speech and its Relation to Violence

COHEN v. COWLES MEDIA COMPANY, 501 U.S. 663 (1991)

Journalists often promise confidentiality to news sources; in Cohen v. Cowles Media Co., the U.S. Supreme Court ruled the First Amendment does not protect journalists who break promises of confidentiality.

Dan Cohen, a spokesperson for a 1982 gubernatorial candidate in Minnesota, offered reporters documents damaging to an opposing candidate. Reporters for two newspapers agreed to protect Cohen’s identity, but their editors decided to publish Cohen’s name to show that one candidate’s campaign was leaking damaging information about an opponent on the eve of the election. After publication of these stories, Cohen lost his job and sued the newspapers. A jury awarded Cohen damages; the Minnesota Supreme Court set the jury verdict aside, ruling that enforcing promises between reporters and sources would chill debate about political campaigns.

By a five to four vote, the U.S. Supreme Court overruled the state supreme court and held that promissory estoppel, a legal doctrine protecting people who rely on promises, could be applied to the press. Drawing on a well-established line of cases, the Court emphasized that the press has no special immunity from laws that apply to everyone. Reporters cannot break into a home to gather news, nor can reporters break promises to sources with impunity. The Court rejected claims that promissory estoppel would harm freedom of the press, stating that the law “simply requires those who make promises to keep them.”

Cohen reiterates the doctrine that enforcement of generally applicable laws against the press is “constitutionally insignificant” and does not trigger heightened judicial review.

WILLIAM E. LEE

References and Further Reading

- Easton, Eric B., Two Wrongs Mock a Right: Overcoming the Cohen Maledicta That Bar First Amendment Protection for News-gathering, Ohio State Law Journal 58 (1997): 1135–1216.

Richards, Jeffrey A., Note: Confidentially Speaking: Protecting the Press from Liability for Broken Confidentiality Promises, Washington Law Review 67 (1992): 501–519.

Rothenberg, Eliot C. The Taming of the Press: Cohen v. Cowles Media Company. Westport, CT: Praeger, 1999.

See also Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665 (1972); Journalism and Sources; Subpoenas to Reporters

COHN, ROY (1927–1986)

Roy M. Cohn, a young ambitious attorney, gained fame in the 1950s for the intense pursuit of communist sympathizers during his tenure as chief counsel for Senator Joseph McCarthy's (R-WI) Subcommittee on Investigations of the Government Operations Committee. Cohn was born in 1927 in New York City, the son of Al Cohn, a New York State judge and Democratic Party functionary and Dora Cohn, the daughter of a wealthy banker.

Cohn's legal career became linked very early to anticommunism. A graduate of Columbia College and Columbia Law School, Cohn was admitted to the New York bar in 1948 and immediately became an assistant U.S. attorney in New York City. In this capacity he participated in the Smith Act prosecution of the eleven top Communist party leaders in the country of that same year and also played an active part in the espionage prosecution of Julius and Ethel Rosenberg in 1951. In 1952 Cohn landed in Washington, D. C. as special assistant to U.S. Attorney General James McGranery. Cohn's first assignment was running a grand jury searching out communist sympathizers on the U.S. staff at the United Nations Secretariat. He soon went on to prosecute Johns Hopkins professor Owen Lattimore for perjury. Lattimore, a sometime State Department advisor on China, had been on the board of the left wing journal Amerasia, in the office of which federal agents had found stolen classified State Department documents in 1945. Senator Joseph McCarthy had denounced Lattimore in 1951 as the top Soviet espionage agent in the United States. The charges were eventually dismissed, but Cohn's role as prosecutor and the efforts of several right wing admirers brought Cohn to the attention of McCarthy, who selected the young attorney to be chief counsel of his investigating subcommittee in 1953.

Intelligent, although intense and often abrasive, Cohn became McCarthy's most trusted aide. Cohn drew headlines almost immediately on his appointment when he and his young millionaire friend,

G. David Shine, took off on a well-publicized trip through Europe checking for pro-Communist literature in U.S. Information Agency libraries overseas. The boondoggle highlighted the arrogant naiveté of the two young men who spent much time enjoying, at State Department expense, the food and lodgings of the continent. Their crusade also brought the frenzied removal of hundreds of books from the American embassy libraries including works of Mark Twain, Dashiell Hammett, and Langston Hughes.

Cohn's fortunes, however, became inextricably linked with McCarthy's during the Army–McCarthy hearings of 1954. In fact, it was Cohn's actions in seeking favorable treatment by the military for his friend, Shine, which instigated those proceedings and set in motion the events that resulted in McCarthy's downfall. When McCarthy leveled charges against the U.S. Army of harboring and even promoting communists and called General Ralph Zwicker "not fit to wear the uniform," the Army retaliated with its own charges, producing a chronology of Cohn's efforts to keep Shine, who had just been drafted, out of the Army. The chronology also documented subsequent demands from Cohn that resulted in preferential treatment for Army Private Shine, including suspension of rigorous training activities and extraordinarily frequent weekend passes. The televised hearings regarding the charges and countercharges gave audience to McCarthy's brutish behavior, ultimately producing the Senator's humiliation at the hands of Army counsel Robert Welsh and Cohn's eventual resignation.

Not one to creep quietly away into the night, Roy Cohn returned to New York and private practice, embarking on what would become a controversial legal career. Until his death, Cohn represented dozens of high-profile clients, including several Mafia bosses, gaining a reputation as a skillful powerbroker. He hobnobbed with the rich and famous at New York's celebrity gathering spots and was well connected to the media. He encountered his own legal difficulties during the 1960s and 1970s when he was tried, although never convicted, of bribery and fraud, as well as jury tampering. His refusal to pay income taxes brought prosecution for tax evasion.

Cohn's high-energy lifestyle included the company of numbers of young men, and it was widely assumed that Cohn was homosexual. He never acknowledged it, however, nor did he admit to his subsequent infection with AIDS. He died of the disease in 1986.

KAREN BRUNER

References and Further Reading

Oshinsky, David. A Conspiracy So Immense: The World of Joe McCarthy. New York: The Free Press, 1983.

Reeves, Thomas C. The Life and Times of Joe McCarthy. New York: Stein and Day, Publishers, 1982.
von Hoffman, Nicholas. Citizen Cohn. New York: Doubleday and Co., 1988.

See also Communist Party

COKER v. GEORGIA, 433 U.S. 584 (1977)

Rape was punishable by death in many ancient and medieval cultures, as well as in colonial and modern American criminal law. But shortly after it revived state death penalty schemes in Gregg v. Georgia (1976), the U.S. Supreme Court was asked to determine whether the Eighth Amendment's ban on cruel and unusual punishments prohibited the death penalty for rape.

In 1974, Ehrlich Anthony Coker escaped from a Georgia prison and entered the home of Allen and Elnita Carver. Coker bound Mr. Carver, then raped Mrs. Carver at knifepoint before kidnapping her. The Carvers survived the attack. Coker was sentenced to death under Georgia law for the rape.

Justice Byron White's plurality opinion for the Supreme Court reversed the sentence, finding the death penalty disproportionate to the crime of raping an adult woman. The plurality first looked to objective factors, citing the rarity of both capital rape statutes in modern America and of jury-imposed death sentences for rape in those few jurisdictions that authorized it. In addition, the plurality concluded that rape did not compare with murder in terms of moral depravity or injury to the victim. Justice Lewis Powell wrote an important separate concurrence arguing that some rapes could be so brutal as to warrant capital punishment, but that Coker's crime did not involve serious or lasting injury.

Coker remains controversial and potentially far-reaching. Notably, the Court left open the possibility that capital punishment for many non-homicide crimes—including child rape, aggravated kidnapping, treason, and espionage—might be unconstitutional.

J. RICHARD BROUGHTON

References and Further Reading

Bedau, Hugo Adam, ed. The Death Penalty in America. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153 (1976)
Coker v. Georgia, 433 U.S. 584 (1977)

See also Capital Punishment; Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972); Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153 (1976); Rape: Naming Victim

COLAUTTI v. FRANKLIN, 439 U.S. 379 (1979)

In the wake of the Supreme Court's recognition in Roe v. Wade that the constitutional right to privacy included the right to choose an abortion, the states, no longer able to outlaw abortion, made several attempts to regulate it. In Colautti v. Franklin, the Supreme Court considered the constitutionality of a Pennsylvania law providing that physicians performing abortions must attempt to preserve the life and health of an aborted fetus that is viable or may be viable. Without deciding whether a more clearly drafted law requiring such a standard of care would be constitutional, the Court struck the law as unconstitutionally vague.

The Pennsylvania law stated that a physician performing an abortion involving a fetus that is viable or may be viable must exercise the same care to preserve the life and health of the fetus as if the physician intended the fetus to be born alive and to use the abortion method most likely to preserve the life and health of the fetus, so long as another method was not necessary to preserve the life and health of the mother.

The Supreme Court decided the law was void for vagueness. Specifically, the Court held that it was unclear what was meant by the phrase "may be viable" and how this was different from the phrase "is viable." It was unclear whether the phrase "may be viable" referred to a point in time prior to actual viability. If the statute was an attempt by the state to define viability differently from how it had been defined in Roe v. Wade, the Court explained, it would be unconstitutional. Drawing on its decision in Doe v. Bolton, the Supreme Court emphasized that the physician must be given broad discretion to determine viability, defined as the point at which, in the physician's reasonable medical judgment, the fetus had a reasonable likelihood of survival outside the womb.

An additional reason for the statute's vagueness was that it held the physician criminally liable regardless of fault or intent. The Court noted that criminal statutes that do not require intent on the part of the wrongdoer are often constitutionally problematic, since they have a tendency to create a trap for the unwary individual who may be acting in good faith.

Finally, the law was vague, because it did not make clear whether the woman's health and life must always take precedence over the fetus's health and life, or whether the law required the physician in some circumstances to sacrifice the woman's health for the fetus's survival. Seven years later, in Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, the Supreme Court decided that a state may not force a tradeoff between a woman's health and that of her fetus; the woman's health and life must always be paramount.

Colautti is primarily a case about abortion regulation and about unconstitutional vagueness. Colautti's statement that the physician must be given wide discretion to determine important issues such as viability, however, may have been undermined by the Supreme Court's subsequent, less deferential approach in Webster v. Reproductive Health Services and Planned Parenthood v. Casey.

B. JESSIE HILL

References and Further Reading

- Daly, Erin, Reconsidering Abortion Law: Liberty, Equality, and the New Rhetoric of Planned Parenthood v. Casey, American University Law Review 45 (1995): 1:77–150.
 Garrow, David J. Liberty and Sexuality: The Right to Privacy and the Making of Roe v. Wade, 600–704, New York: Macmillan, 1994.
 Tribe, Laurence H. American Constitutional Law, 2nd ed., Mineola, NY: Foundation, 1988.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Doe v. Bolton*, 410 U.S. 179 (1973)
Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)
Planned Parenthood v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833 (1992)
Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747 (1986)
Webster v. Reproductive Health Services, 492 U.S. 490 (1989)
See also Abortion; Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. 179 (1973); Privacy; Planned Parenthood v. Casey, 112 S.Ct. 2791 (1992); Right of Privacy; Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973); Substantive Due Process; Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747 (1986); Vagueness Doctrine; Void for Vagueness

COLEMAN v. THOMPSON, 501 U.S. 722 (1991)

In 1982, a Virginia jury found Roger Coleman guilty of the rape and murder of his sister-in-law. The trial judge sentenced Coleman to death. During his subsequent efforts to persuade Virginia's courts to overturn his conviction, Coleman narrowly missed the deadline for filing an appeal with the Virginia Supreme Court—the papers arrived at the courthouse one day late. Because Coleman had violated the state's procedural rules, the Virginia Supreme Court ordered Coleman's appeal dismissed.

Coleman then filed a habeas corpus lawsuit in federal court, arguing that Virginia officials had violated his constitutional rights. By this time, the case was beginning to draw national attention, because Coleman's attorneys were amassing evidence that indicated, in their judgment, that Coleman was innocent. When Coleman's case reached the U.S. Supreme Court, however, the Court refused to consider Coleman's legal claims. Overruling the Warren Court's ruling in Fay v. Noia (1963), and building on rulings by the Burger Court in Francis v. Henderson (1976) and Wainwright v. Sykes (1977), the Rehnquist Court held that, ordinarily, a federal court must dismiss a state prisoner's habeas lawsuit if that prisoner previously failed to follow all of the state's procedural rules. Because Coleman had failed to meet one of Virginia's filing deadlines, the Court dismissed his federal lawsuit. Coleman was executed on May 20, 1992, only days after appearing on the cover of Time magazine under the headline "This Man Might Be Innocent." The legal rule announced in Coleman v. Thompson remains the rule today.

TODD E. PETTYS

References and Further Reading

- Hertz, Randy, and James S. Liebman. Federal Habeas Corpus Practice and Procedure. Charlottesville: LexisNexis, 4th ed., 2001.
 Tucker, John C. May God Have Mercy: A True Story of Crime and Punishment. New York: Dell Publishing, 1997.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Fay v. Noia*, 372 U.S. 391 (1963)
Francis v. Henderson, 425 U.S. 536 (1976)
Wainwright v. Sykes, 433 U.S. 72 (1977)

See also Capital Punishment; Capital Punishment: Execution of Innocents; Habeas Corpus: Modern History

COLLATERAL CONSEQUENCES

Collateral consequences, often also called collateral sanctions, civil disabilities, or civil penalties, are the indirect legal effects of a criminal conviction. In contrast to the penalties imposed at trial, such as incarceration, probation, or a fine, they flow either automatically from the fact of a criminal conviction or may be administratively imposed on conviction. They may be based on state or federal law. Collateral consequences differ from private discrimination based on a criminal conviction, because they result from state action.

The distinction between collateral sanctions and primary penalties remains ambiguous. Courts generally consider all indirect sanctions—those not imposed directly by the court even though they result from a subsequent state action—collateral, and therefore not punishment. Constitutional protections otherwise extended to criminal offenders at sentencing, such as the Ex Post Facto Clause, do not apply to indirect sanctions. The accused usually has no right to be informed about collateral sanctions at the plea colloquy.

Some jurisdictions have established rules requiring courts to inform criminal defendants of potential immigration consequences. Lack of such information has led to the reversal of convictions. Courts have required such advance information only for a few other drastic collateral sanctions, such as civil commitment for sex offenders.

Criminal defendants are rarely informed of the panoply of collateral consequences that may befall them, largely because none of the players in the criminal justice system have easy access to such information. Collateral sanctions may be grouped into three categories: restrictions on an ex-offenders' participation in the political life (among them disenfranchisement, ban on holding public office, exclusion from serving on a jury; deportation); limitations on employment opportunities (among them a host of licensing restrictions, denial of gun licenses, restrictions on participation in government programs, suspension of driver's license); limitations on governmental benefits (among them denials of public housing and food stamps; denial of student loans). While some collateral sanctions are based on a direct connection between the criminal conduct and the collateral sanction—pedophiles are barred from employment in schools or day-care centers—many others lack such a connection. The former serve an incapacitative function; the latter remain largely unjustified.

Because of their scope, collateral consequences frequently hinder the rehabilitation or re-entry of ex-offenders. They limit their ability to obtain employment and to obtain transitional housing and welfare benefits. Violations of collateral sanctions lead to criminal sanctions, many with substantial penalties attached. Collateral penalties also have a dilatory impact on the ex-offenders' families, especially their children and their communities.

While collateral sanctions have long existed in U.S. law, they have dramatically expanded in number and scope during the 1980s and 1990s. Automatic sanctions have impacted drug and sex offenders most dramatically, in many cases without a specific link between the crime of conviction and the collateral sanction.

Ex-offenders may encounter substantial difficulties in removing collateral sanctions. Some states provide relief that is awarded almost automatically and leads to the full restoration of rights; others require gubernatorial pardons to allow ex-offenders to regain at least some rights.

NORA V. DEMLEITNER

References and Further Reading

- ABA Standards for Criminal Justice. 3rd Ed. Collateral Sanctions and Discretionary Disqualification of Convicted Persons, 2004.
- Chin, Gabriel J. and Richard W. Holmes, Jr., Effective Assistance of Counsel and the Consequences of Guilty Pleas, Cornell L. Rev. 697 (2002): 87.
- Demleitner, Nora V., Preventing Internal Exile: The Need for Restrictions on Collateral Sentencing Consequences, Stan. L. & Pol'y Rev. 153 (1999): 11.
- , 'Collateral Damage': No Re-entry for Drug Offenders, Vill. L. Rev. 1027 (2002): 47.
- Mauer, Marc, and Meda Chesney-Linds, eds. Invisible Punishment: The Collateral Consequences of Mass Imprisonment. The New Press, 2002.
- Mele, Christopher, and Teresa A. Miller, eds. Civil Penalties, Social Consequences. Routledge, 2005.
- Office of the Pardon Attorney. U.S. Dep't of Justice, Federal Statutes Imposing Collateral Consequences Upon Conviction.
- Petersilia, Joan. When Prisoners Come Home: Parole and Prisoner Reentry, 2003.

See also Civil Death; Corruption of Blood; Criminalization of Civil Wrongs; Sentencing Guidelines

COLONIAL CHARTERS AND CODES

The early colonial charters, compacts, patents, agreements, and codes were generally not very sympathetic to civil liberties, because they would be understood today. Neither the Virginia Company Charter of 1606 nor the Massachusetts Bay Charter of 1629 contained anything that would have protected civil liberties. The 1609 Charter of Virginia empowered the Virginia Company to "ordain, and establish all Manner of Orders, Laws, Directions, Instructions, Forms and Ceremonies of Government and Magistracy, fit and necessary for and concerning the Government of the said Colony and Plantation; And the same, at all Times hereafter, to abrogate, revoke, or change, not only within the Precincts of the said Colony, but also upon the Seas, in going and coming to and from the said Colony, as they in their good Discretion, shall think to be fittest for the Good of the Adventurers and inhabitants there." Another section of the Charter required that laws Virginia's "Statutes, Ordinances and Proceedings as near as conveniently may be, be agreeable to the Laws, Statutes, Government, and Policy of this our Realm of England." But the two provisions and the rest of the charter allowed for arbitrary and harsh rule that denied basic liberties to most settlers in the colony. This second Virginia charter made it clear that religious dissent would not be tolerated. The charter declared that the Company would not allow settlers who accepted "the Superstitions of the Church of Rome," and further provided that on one could enter the colony who had not "taken the Oath of Supremacy."

The Maryland charter of 1632 merely proclaimed that the law of England would be the basis of the laws of the colonies. The charter allowed the proprietor to impose martial law to suppress rebellions or sedition. While founded as a haven for English Catholics, the Maryland charter authorized religious worship according to the "Ecclesiastical laws of our Kingdom of England." Thus, the Maryland settlers did not get any new rights of expression or protection from the sometimes arbitrary criminal justice of England and were perhaps subject to even harsher and more arbitrary law. Even the Pennsylvania charter of 1781 contained nothing at all that connected to civil liberties. The settlers of New Hampshire, for example, agreed in 1639 to the following declaration when creating a government: "We his loyal Subjects Brethern of the Church in Exeter situate and lying upon the River Pascataqua with other Inhabitants there, considering with ourselves the holy Will of God and o'er own Necessity that we should not live without wholesome Lawes and Civil Government among us of which we are altogether destitute; in the name of Christ and in the sight of God combine ourselves together to erect and set up among us such Government as shall be to our best discerning agreeable to the Will of God professing ourselves Subjects to our Sovereign Lord King Charles according to the Liberties of our English Colony of Massachusetts, and binding of ourselves solemnly by the Grace and Help of Christ and in His Name and fear to submit ourselves to such Godly and Christian Lawes as are established in the realm of England to our best Knowledge, and to all other such Lawes which shall upon good grounds be made and enacted among us according to God that we may live quietly and peaceably together in all godliness and honesty." Similarly, when the colonies in Massachusetts and Connecticut joined together in 1639 under "The Articles of Confederation of the United Colonies of New England," they provided no protection for due process, freedom of expression, or religious liberty. The document proclaimed that one of the purposes of settlement was to "advance the Kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ and to enjoy the liberties of the Gospel in purity with peace," but this did not imply that all people—even all Christians—would have religious freedom in these colonies.

By the end of the Seventeenth Century the newer colonies began with a greater sense of civil liberties. The Carolina charter of 1663 noted that "it may happen that some of the people and inhabitants of the said province, cannot in their private opinions, conform to the publick exercise of religion, according to the liturgy, form and ceremonies of the church of England, or take and subscribe the oaths and articles, made and established in that behalf." Taking this into consideration, the charter allowed the proprietors to give "indulgencies and dispensations" to such persons. This was a major step toward religious toleration. This move toward greater protections for liberty in the charters can be seen most clearly in Rhode Island. The "Patent for Providence Plantations," granted by Parliament in 1643, contained no protections of civil liberties or religious freedom, even though the founder of the colony, Roger Williams, established Rhode Island as a haven for people of all faiths. However, the Rhode Island charter of 1663 was even more expansive in its support for religious liberty, providing that "noe person within the sayd colonye, at any tyme hereafter, shall bee any wise molested, punished, disquieted, or called in question, for any differences in opinione in matters of religion, and doe not actually disturb the civill peace of our sayd colony; but that all and everye person and persons may, from tyme to tyme, and at all tymes hereafter, freelye and fullye have and enjoye his and their owne judgments and consciences, in matters of religious concernments, throughout the tract of lence hereafter mentioned; they behaving themselves peaceable and quietlie, and not using this libertie to lycentiousnesse and profanenesse, nor to the civill injurie or outward disturbance of others; any lawe, statute, or clause, therein containned, or to bee containned, usage or custome of this realme, to the contrary hereof, in any wise, notwithstanding." The 1691 Massachusetts allowed "liberty of Conscience allowed in the Worshipp of God to all Christians (Except Papists)," which was an improvement over the earlier regime in Massachusetts, which had been hostile to all non-Puritans, but was hardly civil libertarian.

This notion appeared more emphatically in the two charters granted to settlers in 1701 by William Penn: the Delaware Charter of 1701 and the Pennsylvania Charter of 1701. These are among the earliest formal documents in American history to use the term "civil liberties" as it is understood today. These charters did not come from the King or Parliament. Instead they were granted to the settlers of both places by William Penn, who was the proprietor of Pennsylvania, which until 1701 included present-day Delaware. Penn's charters noted that: "no People can be truly happy, though under the greatest Enjoyment of Civil Liberties, if abridged of the Freedom of their Consciences, as to their Religious Profession and Worship." Thus, the charter provided that "no Person or Persons, inhabiting In this Province or Territories, who shall confess and acknowledge One almighty God, the Creator, Upholder and Ruler of the World; and professes him or themselves obliged to live quietly under the Civil Government, shall be in any Case molested or prejudiced, in his or their Person or Estate, because of his or their conscientious Persuasion or Practice, nor be compelled to frequent or maintain any religious Worship, Place or Ministry, contrary to his or their Mind, or to do or suffer any other Act or Thing, contrary to their religious Persuasion." This was an enormously expansive grant of religious toleration, although the charter did not grant full religious freedom to all people. The next clause provided that "all Persons who also profess to believe in Jesus Christ, the Saviour of the World, shall be capable (notwithstanding their other Persuasions and Practices in Point of Conscience and Religion) to serve this Government in any Capacity, both legislatively and executively." This provision allowed all Christians to hold office, which made Pennsylvania and Delaware far more progressive than Britain, even if it was protective of liberty by modern standards.

In a subsequent part of the charter, Penn provided that "the First Article of this Charter relating to Liberty of Conscience, and every Part and Clause therein, according to the true Intent and Meaning thereof, shall be kept and remain, without any Alteration, inviolably for ever."

In criminal law the Pennsylvania and Delaware charter contained a major recognition of the rights of the accused that was unknown in England. Penn provided that "all Criminals shall have the same Privileges of Witnesses and Council as their Prosecutors." This simple statement would later lead to the confrontation clause and assistance of counsel clause in the Sixth Amendment. The charter also abolished the English practice of denying inheritance to the heirs of anyone who committed suicide. This provision reflected Penn's generally humane view of law while it also protected property.

The last charter of the colonial period, granted to Georgia, in 1732 adopted the general support for Protestant religious freedom and anti-Catholicism. The charter provided that:

And for the greater ease and encouragement of our loving subjects and such others as shall come to inhabit in our said colony, we do by these presents, for us, our heirs and successors, grant, establish and ordain, that forever hereafter, there shall be a liberty of conscience allowed in the worship of God, to all persons inhabiting, or which shall inhabit or be resident within our said provinces and that all such persons, except papists, shall have a free exercise of their religion, so they be contented with the quiet and peaceable enjoyment of the same, not giving offence or scandal to the government.

In general, the colonial charters did little to expand existing English liberty, except in the area of religious toleration, where a few colonies, like Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, and Delaware, set a new standard for religious liberty. Granted by the King or Parliament, the charters reflected the need of the mother country to govern the colonies. There was little idealism in these charters and thus few innovations in civil liberties. The great exception was the two charters granted by William Penn.

PAUL FINKELMAN

References and Further Reading

Thorpe, Francis N. The Federal and State Constitutions Colonial Charters, and Other Organic Laws of the States, Territories, and Colonies Now or Heretofore Forming the United States of America. Washington, DC: Government Printing Office, 1909.

COLORADO REPUBLICAN FEDERAL CAMPAIGN COMMITTEE v. FEDERAL ELECTION COMMISSION, 518 U.S. 604 (1996)

Should political parties on their own be able to spend unlimited amounts of money on behalf of their candidates? The Supreme Court stated yes, upholding on First Amendment free speech grounds the right of political parties to make independent expenditures.

In Buckley v. Valeo, the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of limits on political contributions to candidates and political parties, even though money spent implicated free speech-like issues. In Buckley the Court also stated that money spent by third-party groups independently of campaigns was protected by the First Amendment and could not be limited, but that money spent in coordination with a candidate would be counted against the latter's contribution limits. However, unresolved was whether money spent independently by political parties on behalf of candidates could be limited? This was the subject of Colorado Republican Federal Campaign Committee.

In this case the Colorado Republican Party spent money to attack Tim Wirth, the likely Democratic Party U.S. Senate candidate in 1986. At the time of the ads, the Republicans did not have a candidate. The issue in the case was whether the ads were coordinated and subject to limits, or an independent expenditure, free from limits.

In a divided seven to two opinion, Justice Breyer wrote the plurality opinion ruling that these contributions were independent expenditures. The First Amendment protects the right of political parties to make them without limit on behalf of candidates, so long as spending is not coordinated with candidates. The Court reached this conclusion by simply drawing on its arguments in Buckley that independent expenditures are protected by the First Amendment, whether made by political parties or other entities.

DAVID SCHULTZ

References and Further Reading

Hasen, Richard L. The Supreme Court and Election Law. New York: New York University Press, 2003.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1 (1976)

See also First Amendment and PACs; Campaign Finance Reform

COLORADO v. CONNELLY, 479 U.S. 157 (1986)

In Colorado v. Connelly, the Supreme Court explicitly held that police coercion was an indispensable element to a finding that a confession was “involuntary” under the Due Process Clause. The Court further held that the government need only establish waiver of Miranda rights under a preponderance of the evidence standard.

Defendant Connelly had approached a police officer and, without prompting, confessed to murdering someone. After receiving Miranda rights, the defendant elaborated on his confession, stating that he had killed a particular young woman in November of 1982. Police records confirmed that the body of an unidentified woman had been found several months later. The defendant then directed police officers to the crime scene.

The following day, while meeting with the public defender’s office, the defendant became confused and disoriented, stating that “voices” had driven him to confess. At a suppression hearing, a psychiatrist testified that the defendant was suffering from “command hallucinations” that interfered with his ability to make free choices. The state courts suppressed defendant’s statements on the basis that they were involuntary.

The Court reversed in an opinion authored by Chief Justice Rehnquist, holding that there could be no due process violation without some element of police overreaching. Because the police had nothing to cause the defendant’s confession, his statements should have been admitted. Justices Brennan and Marshall dissented, finding that the majority opinion denied the defendant the right to make an important choice with a “sane mind.”

M. K. B. DARMER

References and Further Reading

Benner, Laurence A., Requiem for Miranda The Rehnquist Court’s Voluntariness Doctrine in Historical Perspective, Washington University Law Quarterly 67 (1989): 59.

Darmer, M. K. B., Beyond Bin Laden and Lindh: Confessions Law in an Age of Terrorism, Cornell Journal of Law and Public Policy 12 (2003): 319–364.

Dix, George E., Federal Constitutional Confession Law: The 1986 and 1987 Supreme Court Terms, Texas Law Review 67 (1988): 231; 244–246, 276.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)

See also Coerced Confessions/Police Interrogations; Miranda Warning

COMMERCIAL SPEECH

Commercial speech is a subset of speech that is protected by the First Amendment. Its status as protected speech is of relatively recent vintage. It was only in 1976 that the Supreme Court announced that “commercial speech” was entitled to some, limited First Amendment protection in Virginia Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens’ Council. Prior to that case most observers thought commercial speech clearly unprotected on the basis of the Court’s decision in 1942 in Valentine v. Chrestensen. There the Court had thought it self-evident that the First Amendment offered no “restraint [analogous to that imposed on political speech] on government as respects purely commercial advertising.” Almost a decade later, in 1951, the Court had again rebuffed the First Amendment argument of a door-to-door magazine salesman in Breard v. Alexandria.

So Virginia Pharmacy represented a new turn in the Court’s treatment of commercial speech. Nevertheless, Virginia Pharmacy did not clearly define what constituted “commercial speech.” One definition proposed in the case was that commercial speech was speech that “does no more than propose a commercial transaction.” However, this does not do much more to define the boundaries than the term “commercial speech itself.” And although the Court in Virginia Pharmacy used the terms “commercial advertising” and “commercial speech” interchangeably, it was not clear it meant to suggest that “commercial speech” and “commercial advertising” were synonymous, and thus that the boundaries of the new doctrine would be confined to advertising. Subsequent decisions of the Court have suggested that the two terms are not synonymous and that the category of commercial speech is broader than simply advertising. Nevertheless, as several commentators have noted, the definition of commercial speech remains unclear, and the ambiguities in the Court’s decisions in this area have laid the foundation for future struggles over the boundaries of protection for this type of speech.

The turn to protection for commercial speech, although somewhat abrupt from the perspective of the Court’s decisions, was nevertheless presaged in the academic literature. Despite the brevity of the Court’s dismissal of the notion of protection for commercial speech in Valentine v. Chrestensen in 1942, the social and economic conditions that would later generate arguments for the protection of commercial speech were well under way in the 1940s. Advertising and public relations were twentieth century outgrowths of the industrial revolution, and the accompanying technological developments that enhanced the speed of communications allowed for the mass production of an ever-larger proliferation of products—many of which were relatively indistinguishable from one another. The competition for custom led manufacturers to rely on increasingly large-scale advertising and promotional efforts—from package design, print ads and billboards, to radio and then television ads and sponsorship of particular shows. As the twentieth century progressed, the role advertising played in generating and maintaining sales seemed, to many observers, as crucial as the manufacturing process itself, despite always having somewhat mixed empirical support for the cause-and-effect relationship between advertising and sales. Lagging behind somewhat, but developing along similar lines, was the public relations business and the practice of promoting a product or service by issuing press releases and trying to get the media to report on it. By the late twentieth century this practice had become well established, threatening in some ways to swamp traditional advertising, because the advantage of the public relations approach is that if the media picks up information from a press release and reports on it, the item has greater credibility than an ad and at less cost since there is no charge for news coverage.

Parallel to these developments in the markets were other social developments—an increased focus on civil rights for women, blacks, and other historically disadvantaged groups, an increased degree of respectability for protest and dissent, perhaps growing out of the antiwar movement and protest against the war in Vietnam, loosening of restrictions on women’s reproductive choices to turn over more control to the individual and increased visibility for certain types of nonconformity and what might be viewed as a return to the relatively greater sexual permissiveness of the 1930s and 1940s. All these changes, and perhaps many others, involved an increased focus on the individual as rights holder. During this same period, roughly after the trajectory of the industrial revolution was a shift in the theory of the corporation away from the charter and the contractarian theories to an entity theory that proposed that a corporation was a “person” for purposes of the law. These various developments converged in the 1970s and played a part in the development of what became known as the commercial speech doctrine.

The first hint of new attitude on the part of the Court came in New York Times v. Sullivan in 1964. Although the case is often not thought of as a commercial speech case, it, like Chrestensen, involved an ad. But this time it was the civil rights struggle and defamation law that stood in the spotlight. Sullivan involved an ad paid for by various supporters of Dr. Martin Luther King who sought donations from the public to raise money for Dr. King’s defense. The ad described clashes between police and civil rights marchers and specific instances of violence that had been perpetrated by, or ignored by, law enforcement. Sullivan, a police commissioner, although unnamed in the text of the ad, felt sufficiently implicated in what he deemed were illegal police practices that he alleged he had been libeled because the ad contained some inaccuracies. The question presented was whether the First Amendment protected defendants’ from liability, for their statements and the publisher for running the ad, despite those inaccuracies.

The Court concluded that it did even though the vehicle for their statements was a paid advertisement and even though the publisher published the ad in exchange for money. The Court asserted that neither of these facts necessarily disqualified the speech from First Amendment protection. The Court distinguished Chrestensen as dealing with “purely commercial advertising.” In contrast, in the Sullivan case the Court found that the speech in question was the sort of key political speech that the First Amendment was intended to protect. Nevertheless, since a broader ruling might have swept away defamation law altogether, the Court held that absent evidence of malice speech about public figures on matters of public concern was fully protected.

A few years later, in 1973, this observation, that merely appearing in an ad does not make something “commercial,” was repeated in Pittsburgh Press v. Human Relations Commission. There the Court upheld a cease and desist order to a newspaper requiring it to stop the practice of listing the help wanted ads by gender, a practice that was arguably rendered illegal by Title VII. But it still did not announce a fully articulated theory of what constituted “commercial speech” and what level of protection such speech should receive. Only two years later another case came before the Court that again arguably involved commercial speech but that also implicated other protected rights. The case, Bigelow v. Virginia, involved the criminal prosecution of a newspaper publisher for printing ads announcing the availability of abortions in New York, under a statute criminalizing the sale or circulation of material encouraging abortions. Because the statute itself was clearly unconstitutional with respect to noncommercial expression, particularly in light of the Court’s decision in Roe v. Wade, it was unclear whether the fact that the expression took the form of an ad was of any significance. Arguably, it might have been had the Court been operating under the old Chrestensen schema. But Sullivan and Pittsburgh Press seemed to point in the other direction and, indeed, the Court felt constrained to add that it was not the case that if speech was related to commerce it was of no value to “the marketplace of ideas.”

Finally, in 1976, the Court rendered a decision in a case that squarely presented a question that seemed to involve purely commercial speech without any of the overtones of civil rights issues intertwined in the previous cases. In Virginia Board of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens’ Consumer Council, a consumer group challenged the State’s prohibition on the advertising of drug prices. Virginia asserted that the ban on the advertising of price information was intended to promote professionalism by deterring a decline into a price war by pharmacists, a result that was liable to undercut the quality of their services. The Court did not find this argument convincing and concluded that there was no legitimate state interest in keeping consumers ignorant of truthful information. Any other conclusion, the Court held, would be unduly paternalistic where consumers’ interest in the information was keen and relevant to their decision-making process.

Despite the protection afforded commercial speech in this case, the Court held protected the publishing of price information on the grounds of the listeners’ right to receive the information rather than on any notion of the speakers right to speak. Moreover, the Court did not elevate the protection announced in this new doctrine to the level of the full protection afforded political speech. Commercial speech would only be protected, the Court held, to the extent that it was truthful and not misleading or illegal and where the regulation in question was not supported by a legitimate public interest by legislation reasonably calculated to address that interest. Protection of the public’s right to receive information did not, the Court felt, prevent the government from seeing that the information stream ran “cleanly.”

At last a doctrine had been announced. And a definition of sorts had even emerged. In Virginia Pharmacy the Court referred to speech that “does no more than propose a commercial transaction.” And at first, even to the Court to the extent that in later parts of the opinion it seemed to use the terms “commercial speech” and “commercial advertising” interchangeably, this definition seemed to mean “advertising”—want ads, print ads, television ads, but apparently the term seemed sufficiently self-explanatory that no other definitional clarification was offered. However, the test for the assessment of governmental regulation was further refined in Central Hudson Gas & Electric Service v. Public Service Commission. In Central Hudson the Court announced the four-part test that, despite some criticisms, has survived up to the present day as the test for commercial speech.

According to the Court in Central Hudson, for commercial speech to be protected it must first be (1) truthful and involve a legal activity. If the speech in question meets that prong, it is entitled to intermediate scrutiny. So for governmental regulation of such speech to be acceptable it must (2) reflect a substantial governmental interest (3), and actually advance that substantial interest but do so (4) in a way that is no more extensive than necessary to advance the government’s legitimate interest. These last two portions of the test are often referred to as testing “the fit” between the interest to be protected or advanced and the implementing regulation.

While initially the Court seemed to address the “fit” question with a fair amount of deference to governmental judgments in cases such as Posadas de Puerto Rico Associates v. Tourism Co. of Puerto Rico and Board of Trustees v. Fox, in recent years the Court has become increasingly more inclined to strictly construe the test against the government and to strike down governmental restrictions where it finds the “fit” is not very tight. Examples of this trend are City of Cincinnati v. Discovery Network, Inc. and Edenfield v. Fane. Indeed, as Professor David Vladeck noted in a law review article in 2003, “The Court has not upheld a single restraint [against commercial speech] in the past decade.”

What has occurred in the past decade is ever-greater pressure to consider the definition of commercial speech and what is or is not included in its ambit. As noted previously, initially it seemed that “commercial speech” was coextensive with “commercial advertising.” But subsequent cases made clear that this could not be the case. In Bolger v. Youngs Drugs the Court confronted the attempt to prevent the distribution of informational pamphlets about condoms. The bulk of the text was informative only, but the brochure included product identification and thus presented a case of “mixed” speech. The Court concluded that the pamphlet could not be suppressed simply because it contained some elements that were commercial. In deciding whether speech was commercial, the Court proposed that a fact-intensive review of the context was required, and it found three elements of particular relevance: (1) the use of the advertising form, (2) a reference to a specific product, and (3) an underlying economic motive on the part of the speaker. The presence of all three characteristics was a strong indication that the speech in question was “commercial.” But even with all three factors present, as they were in Bolger, this did not preclude protection for the speech. Any regulation of such speech would still need to meet the requirements of the Central Hudson test.

Such discussions have only raised more questions rather than settling them. And as marketing forms have proliferated, the variety of ways in which commercial expression occurs, many of which seem far away from directly “propos[ing]” a commercial transaction, the doctrine seems to cover less and less. Does corporate image advertising, that is, advertising intended to address the corporation’s image, as, for example, in Wal-Mart’s ads addressing its labor practices or BP’s advertising regarding its environmental practices, count as “commercial speech” since they don’t explicitly propose a commercial transaction. Indeed, much traditional advertising does not propose a commercial transaction either, at least not directly. Do the marketing practices of pharmaceutical representatives to doctors on, for example, off-label uses of drugs, count as commercial speech, despite occurring outside of the media? What about speech by nonprofit corporations operated as research or public relations arms of for-profit corporations? Can their speech be designated as “commercial” because of the connection with a for-profit enterprise? Does format matter? If something appears in the form of a press release, does this necessarily mean it is not commercial speech? And if it is not commercial, does that mean it is fully protected? These and many other questions with very important ramifications for marketing practices, as well as social and governmental regulatory power, remain unanswered.

Moreover, the very first prong of the Central Hudson test, the requirement that the speech be truthful and not misleading and involve a legal activity has revealed more ambiguity over time than appeared at first blush. Of course the first prong is one that in other First Amendment contexts would be seen as problematic, since typically the argument in favor of protection of a multiplicity of opinions is that it is only through airing all sides of a debate that truth is best arrived at. Nevertheless, because Virginia Pharmacy and many of the subsequent cases involved concrete information that was verifiable, in that case prices, the problems raised by the first prong have not been deeply probed. Some of the other cases that fall into this category are Rubin v. Coors Brewing Co. (alcohol content on labels) and 44 Liquormart v. Rhode Island (price). When the ad deals less with concrete information and more with just product visuals or announcements, the Court has, to date, shown little willingness to engage in a more nuanced parsing of what constitutes “misleading,” such as where cigarette advertising makes smoking look glamorous or life enhancing. There is some argument that to the extent that smoking raises serious health risks such advertising is misleading.

However, far from indicating a greater willingness to regulate commercial speech in the absence of a specific claim, the weight of opinion seems to be inclining for greater protection for commercial speech. Indeed, some commentators have urged that the ambiguities in the commercial speech doctrine and the uncertainties of the boundaries be clarified by elevating commercial speech to the same status as political speech. In fact, the extent that promotion of consumption arguably also promotes a particular social and political agenda, an argument exists that commercial speech is political.

No case underscored the weight of this trend more clearly than the 2003 case of Nike v. Kasky. The Nike case involved a claim by a California activist, Kasky, that Nike’s public statements and public relations campaign aimed at defending its labor practices in response to criticism of those practices, contained numerous false statements that amounted to false advertising, unfair competition, and fraud and deceit. Kasky was suing under a provision of California law that allowed any citizen, acting as a “private attorney general,” to bring such claims on behalf of the citizens of the state. Nike responded to the complaint with a demurrer, claiming that all of its statements were completely protected by the First Amendment. Despite Kasky’s claim that these statements were motivated by the desire to promote sales and boost the company's image and thus were "commercial" in nature, Nike maintained that its statements were offered in self-defense and represented a contribution to the debate on globalization. Such statements were, it claimed, fully protected and thus the First Amendment represented a complete bar to Kaksy's lawsuit.

The California trial and appellate courts agreed with Nike and dismissed the case with prejudice. A divided California Supreme Court disagreed and reversed, finding that at least some of the statements could constitute commercial speech and thus remanding the case back to the trial court for further proceedings. Nike petitioned the Supreme Court for review, and it was granted. Although both sides had several amici filing briefs in support of their position, Nike had the bulk of them, including one from the AFL-CIO, which, while explicitly disclaiming support for either party, nevertheless supported Nike's claim that its speech was not commercial. News media coverage also was, by and large, supporting Nike.

In the end, the Court decided that review had been improvidently granted, because reversal of a motion to dismiss did not represent a sufficiently final judgment to confer jurisdiction on the Court. Still, the concurring and dissenting opinions written in connection with the dismissal suggested that a majority of the Court found Nike's claim to protection compelling. This in turn suggests that a major overhaul of the commercial speech doctrine may occur if another case comes before the Court soon. And although the Nike can be seen as a harbinger of greater protection for commercial speech, a case presenting significantly different facts might shift the momentum, since it was clear from the briefs submitted in support of Kaksy by several states and by members of Congress, that significant expansion of the protection for commercial speech might imperil other governmental regulatory efforts that the Court may not have considered—for example, in the areas of corporate governance such as Sarbanes-Oxley, or with respect to the regulation of the sale of pharmaceuticals. At present, all definitional questions remain unanswered, and with the recent change in the makeup of the Court, the Court's future direction may be relatively difficult to predict. Still, the commercial speech area promises to be one of the most interesting, active, and far-reaching areas of the Court's Constitutional jurisprudence to come.

TAMARA R. PIETY

References and Further Reading

Baker, C. Edwin. Human Liberty and Freedom of Speech. Oxford University Press, 1989.

- Chemerinsky, Erwin, and Catherine Fisk, What is Commercial Speech? The Issue not Decided in Nike v. Kasky, Case Wes. Res. L. Rev. 1143 (2004): 54.
- Collins, Ronald K. L., and David M. Skover. The Death of Discourse. Westview Press, 1996.
- Greenwood, Daniel J.H., Essential Speech: Why Corporate Speech is Not Free, Iowa L. Rev. 995 (1998): 83.
- Horwitz, Morton J. The Transformation of American Law: 1870–1960. Oxford University Press, 1992.
- Kosinski, Alex, and Stuart Banner, The Anti-History and the Pre-History of Commercial Speech, Tex. L. Rev. 627 (1990): 71.
- Langvardt, Arlen W., and Eric L. Richards, The Death of Posadas and the Birth of Change in Commercial Speech Doctrine, Am. Bus. L. J. 483 (1997): 34.
- Morrison, Alan B., How We Got the Commercial Speech Doctrine: An Originalist's Recollections, Case Wes. Res. L. Rev. 1189 (2003): 54.
- Neuborne, Burt, A Rationale for Protecting and Regulating Commercial Speech, Brook. L. Rev. 437 (1980): 46.
- Redish, Martin H., The First Amendment in the Marketplace: Commercial Speech and the Value of Free Expression, Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 429 (1971): 39.
- Schauer, Frederick F., Commercial Speech and the Architecture of the First Amendment, U. Cinn. L. Rev. 1181 (1988): 56.
- Shiner, Roger A. Freedom of Commercial Expression. Oxford University Press, 2003.
- Vladeck, David C., Lesson From a Story Untold: Nike v. Kasky Reconsidered, Case Wes. Res. L. Rev. 1049 (2003): 54.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- 44 Liquormart, Inc. v. Rhode Island, 517 U.S. 484 (1996)
- Bigelow v. Virginia*, 421 U.S. 809 (1975)
- Board of Trustees v. Fox*, 492 U.S. 469 (1989)
- Bolger v. Youngs Drug Prods. Corp.*, 463 U.S. 60 (1983)
- Breard v. Alexandria*, 341 U.S. 622 (1951)
- Central Hudson Gas & Electric Corp. v. Public Serv. Comm'n of New York*, 447 U.S. 557 (1980)
- Lorillard Tobacco Co. v. Reilly*, 533 U.S. 525 (2001)
- New York Times v. Sullivan*, 376 U.S. 254 (1964)
- Nike v. Kasky*, 539 U.S. 654 (2003)
- Posadas de Puerto Rico Assoc. v. Tourism Co. of Puerto Rico*, 478 U.S. 328 (1986)
- Rubin v. Coors Brewing Co.*, 514 U.S. 476 (1995)
- Virginia State Bd. of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council*, 425 U.S. 748 (1976)
- Valentine v. Chrestensen*, 316 U.S. 52 (1942)

See also First Amendment and PACs

COMMITTEE FOR PUBLIC EDUCATION AND RELIGIOUS LIBERTY v. NYQUIST, 413 U.S. 756 (1973)

One of the more controversial issues confronting the U.S. Supreme Court in the church-state area has been the question of the constitutionality of government aid to religious schools. The Court's jurisprudence in this area has ebbed and flowed during the past half century. During the early 1970s, the Court was particularly skeptical of such financial assistance, consistently rejecting government efforts to provide aid to private sectarian schools. One of the more important of the Court's decisions during that time period was Committee for Public Education and Religious Liberty v. Nyquist in which the Court declared unconstitutional a New York statute that provided for (1) "maintenance and repair" grants to private schools serving children from low-income families, (2) tuition reimbursement grants for low-income parents whose children attended private schools, and (3) tax relief (in the form of a tax deduction) for parents whose children attended private schools but who did not qualify for a tuition reimbursement grant. The Court, with Justice Lewis Powell writing for a six to three majority, concluded that all aspects of the New York statute had the primary effect of advancing religion in violation of the Establishment Clause. The importance of the Nyquist decision lies particularly in the Court's ruling on the tuition grants and tax deduction provisions that benefitted parents directly and religious schools only indirectly.

During the early 1970s, private schools educated a significant portion of New York's schoolchildren—approximately twenty percent. The New York state legislature expressed concern that the "fiscal crisis in nonpublic education . . . has caused a diminution of proper maintenance and repair programs, threatening the health, welfare and safety of nonpublic school children" in low-income urban schools. The legislature thus established the maintenance and repair grant program to "ensure the health, welfare and safety" of children attending such schools. The legislature also worried that any "precipitous decline in the number of nonpublic school pupils would cause a massive increase in public school enrollment and costs" and would "aggravate an already serious fiscal crisis in public education." Accordingly, it enacted the tuition grant and tax benefit programs to relieve private school parents of some of the costs of their children's education. In so doing, the legislature observed that a "healthy competitive and diverse alternative to public education is not only desirable but indeed vital to a state and nation that have continually reaffirmed the value of individual differences."

Although the legislation encompassed both religious and nonreligious private schools, eighty-five percent of the nonpublic schoolchildren in New York attended a church-affiliated school. Moreover, virtually all of the schools eligible for the maintenance and repair grants were operated by the Catholic Church. A private organization, known as the Committee for Public Education and Religious Liberty, challenged all aspects of the New York statute as violative of the Establishment Clause. The Supreme Court concluded that to pass constitutional muster, "the law in question must first reflect a clearly secular legislative purpose, second, must have a primary effect that neither advances nor inhibits religion, and, third, must avoid excessive entanglement with religion."

The Court concluded that the New York law had a secular purpose but that all aspects of the program had the primary effect of advancing religion. With respect to the maintenance and repair grants, the Court noted that the program did not limit the grants to the "upkeep of facilities used exclusively for secular purposes," and hence the monies could be used to support directly the religious mission of the school. With respect to the tuition reimbursement grants, the Court noted that "there can be no question that these grants could not, consistently with the Establishment Clause, be given directly to sectarian schools." The Court then concluded that the fact that the tuition reimbursement monies were given to the parents, rather than directly to the school, was not constitutionally significant—either way, "the effect of the aid is unmistakably to provide desired financial support for nonpublic, sectarian institutions." Finally, the Court concluded that the tax deductions had the same impermissible effect, even though the tax benefits accrued directly to the parents, not the religious schools.

Three justices—Warren Burger, William Rehnquist, and Byron White—dissented on the tuition reimbursement and tax deduction aspect of the state's plan (they joined the majority with respect to the repair and maintenance grants). In dissenting, they relied on the Court's recent decision in Walz v. Tax Commission (1970) in which the Court had upheld property tax exemptions for religious institutions noting that "the grant of a tax exemption is not sponsorship since the government does not transfer part of its revenue to churches but simply abstains from demanding that the church support the state There is no genuine nexus between tax exemption and establishment of religion." The majority had distinguished Walz in part by arguing that exempting religious property from the taxing power of the state was different from providing a tuition grant or tax deduction to private citizens who choose a private sectarian school for their children's education. The dissenters rejected that distinction.

The Court would revisit Nyquist almost thirty years later in Zelman v. Simmons-Harris (2002), a case in which the Court considered the constitutionality of the government providing vouchers to parents for use at public or private schools (including private sectarian schools). The Nyquist decision posed a constitutional problem for the voucher plan. The Court distinguished Nyquist in part on the grounds that the voucher program in Zelman encompassed both public and private schools, whereas the tax benefits at issue in Nyquist benefitted only private school parents. Under the Court's more recent doctrine, tax benefits, so long as they are neutral with respect to all schools (religious and nonreligious, public and private), are likely constitutional.

DAVISON M. DOUGLAS

References and Further Reading

Lawrence, Rebecca, Comment. The Future of School Vouchers in Light of the Past Chaos of the Establishment Clause Jurisprudence, University of Miami Law Review 55 (2001): 419–452.

Note, State Aid to Private Schools: Reinforcing the Wall of Supervision, Albany Law Review 38 (1974): 611–631.

Zelinsky, Edward, Are Tax 'Benefits' Constitutionally Equivalent to Direct Expenditures? Harvard Law Review 112 (1998): 379–433.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Walz v. Tax Commission, 397 U.S. 664 (1970)

Zelman v. Simmons-Harris, 536 U.S. 639 (2002)

See also State Aid to Religious Schools

COMMITTEE FOR PUBLIC EDUCATION AND RELIGIOUS LIBERTY v. REGAN, 444 U.S. 646 (1980)

During the 1970s and early 1980s, the U.S. Supreme Court considered a large number of constitutional challenges to various forms of government aid to religious schools. In each of these cases, plaintiffs argued that the aid in question violated the Establishment Clause of the Constitution. In Committee for Public Education and Religious Liberty v. Regan (1980), the Court considered the constitutionality of a New York statute that authorized the use of public funds to reimburse both secular and religious private schools for costs incurred in “the administration, grading, and . . . reporting of the results of [state-prepared and state-mandated] tests and examinations.” The legislation was part of a state effort to make sure that private schools maintained minimal secular educational standards—an important goal given the significant percentage of the state's children who attended private schools. In a five-to-four decision, the Court sustained the constitutionality of the law.

Seven years earlier, the Supreme Court in Levitt v. Committee for Public Education (1973) struck down an earlier version of the New York law that provided reimbursement for tests prepared by private school teachers, noting that it was impossible to determine whether such tests involved religious instruction. The Court concluded that “the State is constitutionally compelled to assure that the state-supported activity is not being used for religious indoctrination” and that the New York law failed to provide that assurance. In response, the New York legislature amended its statute to provide reimbursement only for the personnel costs incurred in grading and reporting the results of tests prepared by the state. The amended statute also imposed tight controls to make sure that state reimbursements did not exceed the value of the actual grading services provided by the private school teachers.

In assessing the constitutionality of the amended New York law, the Court applied the familiar “Lemon” test (from the Court's 1971 decision in Lemon v. Kurtzman) pursuant to which a law is constitutional “if it has a secular legislative purpose, if its principal or primary effect neither advances nor inhibits religion, and if it does not foster an excessive government entanglement with religion.” The Court, with Justice Byron White writing, concluded that the amended law satisfied that test: “grading the secular tests furnished by the State . . . is a function that has a secular purpose and primarily a secular effect” since both the purpose and effect of the tests was to ensure that schoolchildren are being provided “an adequate secular education.” Moreover, the amended New York law also provided for “ample safeguards against excessive or misdirected reimbursement,” a feature absent from the original statute. In upholding the constitutionality of the New York statute, the Court relied on Wolman v. Walter (1977), a case in which the Court had upheld an Ohio statute whereby the state provided, among other things, state-prepared standardized tests and grading services to children attending sectarian schools.

Four justices—Harry Blackmun, William Brennan, Thurgood Marshall, and John Stevens—dissented. They emphasized that in Wolman, the statutory scheme “did not involve direct cash assistance” to any private school. In fact, the Ohio law at issue in Wolman involved only the provision of state-prepared tests to children attending sectarian schools, which were then graded by an independent commercial service, whereas the New York law reimbursed private schools for the cost of grading the tests and reporting the scores. For the dissenters, secular aid, like a standardized test, could be provided to children attending religious schools so long as no cash payments were made to the schools. The majority had found that feature constitutionally insignificant: “[The dissenters] insist on drawing a constitutional distinction between paying the nonpublic school to do the grading and paying . . . some independent service to perform that task, even though the grading function is the same regardless of who performs it In either event, the nonpublic school is being relieved of the cost of grading state-required, state-furnished examinations None of our cases require us to invalidate these reimbursements simply because they involve payments in cash.”

By upholding the payment of monies to sectarian schools, the Court made a slight move in the direction of permitting greater government aid to religious schools—signaling the direction the Court would take over the course of the next quarter century.

DAVISON M. DOUGLAS

References and Further Reading

- Avitabile, Alex S., Comment. P.E.A.R.L. v. Regan: Permitting Direct State Aid to Parochial Schools, Brooklyn Law Review 47 (1981): 469–515.
- Pryor, Elizabeth Scott, Comment. Permissible State Aid to Parochial Schools: A Plea for Neutrality, Emory Law Journal 33 (1984): 487.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Lemon v. Kurtzman*, 403 U.S. 602 (1971)
- Levitt v. Committee for Public Education*, 413 U.S. 472 (1973)
- Wolman v. Walter*, 433 U.S. 229 (1977)

See also State Aid to Religious Schools

COMMON LAW OR STATUTE

Common law is law that evolves over time based on custom, practice, and precedent from judicial decisions—it often is called judge-made law—and is found in cases and opinions. Statutory law, by comparison, represents law created by legislative bodies at the federal, state, and local level, ranging from the U.S. Congress to city councils and is found in compilations called codes, such as the U.S. Code embodying federal laws, or ordinances.

Although constitutional law is a primary source of civil liberties, both common law and statutory law directly affect and, sometimes, embody civil liberties. For instance, the common law developed and recognized a right to privacy long before the U.S. Supreme Court discovered a constitutional right to privacy in Griswold v. Connecticut (1965). Sometimes, however, the common law conflicts with civil liberties. For example, the common law of defamation that protects individuals’ reputations restricts the civil liberty of free speech embodied in the First Amendment. In that area, the Supreme Court was forced in New York Times v. Sullivan (1964) to adopt the actual malice standard to balance the common law’s protection of reputation with the U.S. Constitution’s protection of free expression.

Like the common law, statutory law can have both positive and negative effects on civil liberties. For instance, federal statutes have been enacted to protect voting rights and to prevent discrimination. Conversely, recently enacted federal statutes like the USA Patriot Act and the Homeland Security Act restrict the liberties of speech and privacy.

CLAY CALVERT

References and Further Reading

- Holmes, Jr., Oliver Wendell. The Common Law. Boston: Little, Brown, & Co., 1881.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Griswold v. Connecticut*, 381 U.S. 479 (1965)
- Homeland Security Act, Public Law No. 107-296
- New York Times v. Sullivan*, 376 U.S. 254 (1964)
- USA Patriot Act, Public Law No. 107-56

See also Balancing Approach to Free Speech; Defamation and Free Speech; Freedom of Speech: Modern Period (1917–Present)

COMMUNICATIONS DECENCY ACT (1996)

The Communications Decency Act (CDA) of 1996, an amendment to the Telecommunications Reform Act of 1996, aimed to protect children by regulating the content of the Internet. The legislation, introduced by Senator James Exon (D-Nebraska), could theoretically have led to the fining and imprisonment of anyone who used an offensive word in an electronic communication. It had the potential to smother both free expression and the infant Internet. The Supreme Court ruled this effort at censorship to be unconstitutionally broad in June 1997.

The CDA formed part of an effort to update laws relating to the telecommunications industry in light of dramatic technological advancements. While the other parts of the telecommunications bill removed barriers that restricted the growth of media business, Congress also decided to regulate the content of the material distributed by these companies. Previous communications law banned the deliberate telephone transmission of obscene material. The new CDA covered all methods of telecommunication. In addition, existing federal laws against importing obscene material or transporting such material across state lines for sale or distribution were now applicable to computer-transmitted materials.

The CDA prohibited the display of sexual and excretory material deemed “patently offensive” in “a manner available to a person under 18 years of age.” It targeted both text and images in public areas of the Internet. In a revision of the CDA by the House, the indecency provision of the amendment was changed to update the 1873 Comstock Act. This amendment, introduced by longtime abortion opponent Representative Henry Hyde (R-Illinois), banned electronic dissemination of information “designed, adapted, or intended for producing abortion or for any indecent or immoral use or any . . . notice of any kind giving information, directly or indirectly, where, how, or of whom, or by what means any such mentioned article, matter, or things may be obtained or made . . .” Violation of the CDA brought a penalty of up to two years in prison and a maximum fine of $250,000. The Senate approved the Telecommunications Reform Act by a vote of ninety-one to five with the House supporting it by a vote of 414 to sixteen. President Bill Clinton signed the bill into law on February 8, 1996.

Part of the problem with the legislation lay with Congress’s lack of knowledge about electronic communication. Senator Patrick Leahy, an opponent of the CDA, estimated that only six other senators had used the Internet. Unfamiliar with the technology, they did not understand how the Internet worked. They apparently thought that it was like cable television, with channels that could easily be regulated. Senators were also unaware that much of the available pornography came from foreign sources that would not be affected by American laws.

The new law met with immediate opposition. The online community condemned the CDA as state-sanctioned censorship. The American Civil Liberties Union, along with twenty-five anticensorship organizations, filed a lawsuit against the Justice Department challenging the constitutionality of the law on the day that it went into effect. On February 26, 1996, a coalition of thirty-five groups, including the American Library Association, the Recording Industry Association of America, the National Writers Union, and commercial online providers America Online, CompuServe, Microsoft, and Prodigy, filed a second lawsuit against the CDA. Lawyers for the opponents of the CDA argued both that the law banned certain speech that was suitable for adults and that such a ban would be unenforceable. It would not be possible for online service providers to verify the identity and age of each person browsing the Internet.

On June 12, 1996, the U.S. District Court in Philadelphia imposed a preliminary injunction against enforcement of the CDA. The judges ruled that the CDA violated First Amendment guarantees of free speech and Fifth Amendment protections against vaguely defined criminal conduct. The judges stated that the government had provided no compelling reason to restrict speech. The availability of software that enabled parents to regulate the Internet use of their children led the judges to further conclude that the government had not met its obligation to use the least restrictive means to regulate speech.

The Justice Department, under Attorney General Janet Reno, appealed the decision. The Supreme Court ruled on June 26, 1997, in Reno v. American Civil Liberties Union, that the CDA was unconstitutional, because it was so broad that it would have banned material about breast cancer and AIDS awareness, as well as such art as Michelangelo’s nude David. Seven justices supported the decision, with Justices Sandra Day O’Connor and William Rehnquist agreeing in part and dissenting in part. Congress has made subsequent efforts to restrict Internet content, but no bill was made into law.

CARYN E. NEUMANN

References and Further Reading

- Drucker, Susan J., and Gary Gumpert, eds. Real law @ Virtual Space: Communication Regulation in Cyberspace. Cresskill, NJ: Hampton Press, 2005.
 Godwin, Mike. Cyber Rights: Defending Free Speech in the Digital Age. Boston: MIT Press, 2003.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Telecommunications Act of 1996, Pub. LA. No. 104-104, 110 Stat. 56 (1996)

See also Abortion; American Civil Liberties Union; Comstock, Anthony; Obscenity; Reno v. ACLU, 521 U.S. 844 (1997)

COMMUNISM AND THE COLD WAR

Formed in 1919, the Communist Party of the United States (CPUSA) grew to approximately 60,000 members during The Great Depression as it worked to eliminate poverty, racial inequality, and exploitation of workers. However, during the escalating Cold War of the late 1940s and 1950s, membership plummeted as many Americans took CPUSA members to be spying for the Soviet Union and, more generally, undermining American institutions and government. This perception became especially widespread after the victory of the Communists in the Chinese civil war and the Soviet Union's development of nuclear weapons, both in 1949. Private organizations and branches of the state and national governments expelled, investigated, and punished CPUSA members, suspected members, individual Communists, and fellow travelers. Many of these undertakings rode roughshod over Communists' civil liberties, but individuals and organizations defended their actions by underscoring the security concerns of the Cold War.

The most important private organizations to strike out against Communists were universities, labor unions, and the movie industry. Many universities dismissed faculty members, librarians, and research scientists because of real or merely suspected Communist sympathies. In the union movement the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO) had during the 1930s and 1940s come to include Communist-led unions, but in 1949 the CIO leadership expelled the electrical workers' union for supposed Communist leanings. Nine other leftist unions were subsequently expelled, and when the CIO merged with the American Federation of Labor (AFL) in 1955, the new AFL-CIO was avowedly anti-Communist. In Hollywood, after the House Committee on Un-American Activities (HUAC) investigated Communist infiltration of the movie industry, the industry began black-listing Communists and suspected Communists, thereby ruining the careers of dozens of writers, actors, and technicians and indirectly reducing the social commentary included in movie fare.

Most large cities and states also contributed to the persecution of Communists during the Cold War. Southern cities were especially aggressive in attempting to drive out Communists, even though fewer Communists lived in the South than in any other region. Birmingham, Alabama, for example, passed an ordinance imposing a fine and six-month jail sentence for each day a Communist remained in Birmingham. Thirteen states had legislative committees or commissions comparable to HUAC. In 1953, Massachusetts' Special Commission to Study and Investigate Communism and Subversive Activities and Related Matters in the Commonwealth questioned eighty-five individuals regarding the CPUSA membership. Boston newspapers published their names and addresses, and many lost jobs and friends as a result. Many states enacted laws requiring state employees to sign loyalty oaths. Some states required members of the CPUSA and other Communist organizations to register, and a few states banned membership in organizations thought to be subversive. These laws' obviously impaired Communists' freedoms of speech, assembly, and association.

The most powerful threats to civil liberties came on the federal level, and all three branches of the federal government attempted to restrict and root out Communists. Congress passed the Smith Act (1940), which made advocating the overthrow of the U.S. government or belonging to an organization that did so a criminal offense; the Taft-Hartley Act (1947), which required union leaders to sign affidavits swearing they were not Communists; and the McCarran Act (1950), which required the CPUSA, members of CPUSA, and members of Communist front organizations to register with the federal government. Congress used HUAC and other committees in both the Senate and the House to investigate supposed Communists and Communist activities. Joseph McCarthy, a Senator from Wisconsin, was the most rabid of the red-baiters, and the term "McCarthyism" came to be used for assigning guilt by association, tarnishing reputations by innuendo, and manipulating public opinion. Congressional investigations by McCarthy and others discouraged Communists from exercising their rights to say and publish what they wished and from belonging to clubs, groups, and organizations of their choosing.

The executive branch did not stand in the way of this legislation but rather in some instances attempted an anti-Communist one-upmanship. President Harry S. Truman, for example, in 1947, established the Federal Loyalty Program by executive order. The Program led to the reprimand and termination of federal employees with Communist ties. J. Edgar Hoover's Federal Bureau of Investigation was an eager tracker of Communists, and attorneys in the Justice Department of course prosecuted supposed offenders under the new federal statutes and other existing laws. The most important prosecution was that of Eugene Dennis, General Secretary of the CPUSA, and ten other CPUSA leaders for violation of the Smith Act. The trial took place in 1949 in the federal courthouse in New York City's Foley Square and devolved into a government expose of the CPUSA. In the midst of Cold War hysteria it seemed not to matter that many of the broadsides and pamphlets the prosecution used as evidence were published before the enactment of the Smith Act.

When statutes and prosecutions were challenged in appeals to the Supreme Court, the nation's highest tribunal also proved susceptible to political paranoia. In American Communications Association v. Dowds (1950) the Court refused to toss out a federal law requiring union leaders to disavow the CPUSA. The Court also upheld the Smith Act conviction of CPUSA officials in Dennis v. United States (1951), rejecting in the process the argument that the law violated the First Amendment's guarantee of freedom of speech. A strong connection existed between the Soviet Union and the CPUSA, the Court said, and Congress had the duty and power to prevent the CPUSA from advancing the Soviet Union's interest in the overthrow of the United States. The Smith Act did not impede free discussion but rather guarded against the advocacy of violence. Indeed, the Court maintained, the CPUSA's expressed intent to overthrow the United States presented a clear and present danger to the government.

Only in the 1960s did the government begin to acknowledge forcefully the rights and liberties of Communists. In 1964, for example, the Supreme Court ruled in Aptheker v. Secretary of State, that the revocation of Communist Party officials' passports under the Subversive Activities Control Act unconstitutionally denied the plaintiff's liberty to travel. More generally, the intolerance and stigmatizing that had so marked the late 1940s and 1950s abated. Even though the Vietnam War was fought in the 1960s and early 1970s in part to stop the successive fall of Southeast Asian governments to Communists, few blamed the unsuccessful war effort on domestic Communists. At the peak of the Cold War, by contrast, a fear was present in many circles of the Communists in our midst. Communists and suspected Communists saw their civil liberties ignored and were harmed in other ways as well. Intolerance and witch-hunting were part of American life, and the national mood was often repressed, suspicious, and paranoid.

DAVID RAY PAPKE

References and Further Reading

- Belknap, Michael R. Cold War Political Justice: The Smith Act, the Communist Party, and American Civil Liberties. Westport: Greenwood Press, 1977.
- Caute, David. The Great Fear: The Anti-Communist Purge under Truman and Eisenhower. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1978.
- Haynes, John Earl. Red Scare or Red Menace? American Communism and Anticommunism in the Cold War Era. Chicago: Ivan R. Dee, 1996.
- Kutler, Stanley I. The American Inquisition: Justice and Injustice in the Cold War. New York: Hill & Wang, 1982.
- Selcraig, James Truett. The Red Scare in the Midwest, 1945–1955. Ann Arbor: UMI Research Press, 1982.
- Steinberg, Peter L. The Great "Red Menace": United States Prosecution of American Communists, 1947–1952. Westport: Greenwood Press, 1984.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Aptheker v. Secretary of State*, 378 U.S. 500 (1964)
- American Communications Association v. Dowds*, 339 U.S. 382 (1950)
- Dennis v. United States*, 341 U.S. 494 (1951)

See also Blacklisting; Communist Party; Due Process; Extremist Groups and Civil Liberties; Hiss, Alger; McCarthy, Joseph; Rosenberg, Julius and Ethel; State Constitutions and Civil Liberties; Vinson Court; Warren Court

COMMUNIST PARTY

One of the most significant developments during the First World War in 1917 was the overthrow of the despotic government controlled by Nicholas II, Czar of all of the Russians, on March 12, 1917.

On November 7, 1917, another revolution took place in Russia, this time led and controlled by the Bolshevi (Russian for "majority"). Like the leadership in the first revolution, they were influenced by the writings of Karl Marx. But the Bolshevi took Marx further under the leadership of V. I. Lenin, who called for a sudden and violent revolution, aimed at the creation of the "dictatorship of the proletariat."

The success of the communists led by Lenin preached a system of collective ownership of property. Given these goals (which would destroy capitalism) and the Soviet exit from World War I, it is understandable that nations coming out of the devastating war would see a significant threat to their political and economic way of life in the Russian Revolution of November 1917.

Indeed, within a matter of two years, Communist parties were organized throughout Western and Southern Europe and in Latin America. The Communist Party of the United States (CPUSA) was organized in 1919.

This nation and the world were rocked to the core by the devastating Great Depression of the 1930s. The Great Depression opened up the "Great Opportunity" for the Communist Party.

The Party worked mainly through unions (especially the Congress of Industrial Organizations—the C.I.O.) as the spearhead of its drive against capitalism, racism, and exploitation of the working class. Regardless of the terrible deprivations suffered by millions during the Great Depression, there was a deep-rooted antagonism against radicals and their solutions; the hope engendered by Franklin D. Roosevelt leading the nation in the "war" against the Great Depression showed the willingness to wait and give the economy a chance to recover. The "jump start" came in the form of World War II (1939–1945) in Europe and then in America. The Communist Party supported the war once Russia was attacked by Nazi Germany in June 1941; until then, the Party called for isolation from another capitalist war.

Through the 1930s, the CPUSA claimed the hearts and minds of a number of persons (including intellectuals, stage and movie stars) who approved of the announced program of the Party.

With the end of World War II, the alliance that won the war began to break apart. Instead of alliance, the world was introduced to the concept of a Cold War between the United States and its allies and Russia with Joseph Stalin as its communist leader. The domestic result of the Cold War between these countries was a Red Scare in the United States—a fear of communists, their Party, and those who followed in the path of their beliefs.

The Red Scare came as a result of a push to demonize all who were in the Party and those who agreed with the party line. The main figure was J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI). His aim was to destroy the Communist Party and all those who followed the Party program. He viewed the Party as a cancer on the nation's body. Hoover carried on his anticommunist crusade, even during those years when, with great energy, the CPUSA supported the war.

Using materials such as CPUSA internal meeting minutes, the FBI gathered information in clear violation of the Fourth Amendment. Illegal wiretaps, surreptitiously obtained letters, breaking into Party offices (Black Bag jobs), and a number of other quite illegal methods were used. Ultimately a criminal suit was filed against twelve national Party leaders.

The case, Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 497 (1951), was designed to break the back of the CPUSA and it did effectively do so, sending all defendants to jail, including all attorneys representing the defendants. All of the defendants were charged with violation of the Smith Act (1940), which made it a federal offense to advocate the forceful overthrow of the government. The times dictated the guilty verdicts for these defendants and for a parade of secondary CP functionaries.

At its height of membership during the 1930s, there were probably 80,000 CPUSA card-carrying members. By the end of the Dennis case (and those that followed), there were probably only 15,000–20,000 left.

Reeling from serious body blows in the American court system, from a Red Scare mentality that looked for “Reds under the beds,” and the belief that all major problems in the nation and in the world were the result of the Communist Party and their followers, further reduced the number of members.

Even the charged attitude of the Supreme Court expressed in four cases decided in 1957 came too little and too late to pump blood into the dying veins of the CPUSA.

The Communist Party was never outlawed as such, but that made no pragmatic difference. Some will argue that the Party killed itself with its slavish attachment to the Soviet Communist Party line. In all, it was a terrible time for liberalism, Communism, the CPUSA, and for the American justice system. It was also a time of harm to the body of civil, political, and economic freedoms in our nation.

ARTHUR J. SABIN

References and Further Reading

- Buhle, Mari Jo, et al., eds. Encyclopedia of the American Left. New York and London: Garland Publishing, Inc., 1980.
- Clifford, Clark, and Richard Holbrooke. Counsel to the President: a Memoir. New York: Random House, 1991.
- Howe, Irving, and Lewis Closser. The American Communist Party a Critical History. New York: Fredrick A. Praeger, 1962.
- Klingaman, William K. Encyclopedia of the McCarthy Era. New York: Facts on File, Inc., 1996.
- Sabin, Arthur J. In Calmer Times: The Supreme Court and Red Monday. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1999.
- Schrecker, Ellen. “McCarthyism and the Decline of American Communism, 1945–1960” In Michael E. Brown, et al., eds. New Studies in the Politics and Culture of U.S. Communism, 123–140. New York: Monthly Review Press, 1993.
- . Many are the Crimes: McCarthyism in America. New York: Little, Brown, and Company, 1998.

COMPANY TOWNS AND FREEDOM OF SPEECH

With industrial development in the United States in the first half of the twentieth century, some companies found that it was more practical to provide housing for employees near the factory, mine, etc. They would buy a substantial amount of land, build homes, pave roads, and lay sewers. The resulting “company town” was like any other town in almost every respect, except that title rested in the companies’ private hands. As large percentages of workers in many industries lived in company towns, the question arose as to whether individual liberties were protected.

In 1946, the Supreme Court held that on such land, while held in private hands, individuals still maintained constitutional rights. In Marsh v. Alabama the Court overturned the trespassing conviction of a Jehovah’s Witness who had attempted to distribute literature in the company town Chickasaw, Alabama. The Court wrote, “The more an owner, for his advantage, opens up his property for use by the public in general, the more do his rights become circumscribed by the rights of those who use it." Chickasaw had been sufficiently opened to the public to mandate that First Amendment activity be allowed. The function to which the property was placed was tantamount, not where title to the land rested.

Company towns faded away, but the basic conflict did not. Analysis of individual rights on private property remains influenced by Marsh, such as in modern shopping centers, with proponents of greater individual liberties seeking protection under Marsh but private property owners often resisting.

MARK C. ALEXANDER

Cases and Statutes Cited

Marsh v. Alabama, 326 U.S. 501 (1946)

COMPELLING STATE INTEREST

Judicial review of government restrictions of individual rights takes different forms depending on the nature of the right and the infringement. The most stringent form, "strict scrutiny," requires that the restriction be necessary to serve a compelling state interest.

The modern Supreme Court demands a compelling state interest in essentially two circumstances. First, some (although not all) infringements on fundamental rights receive strict scrutiny. Fundamental rights include textually specified rights such as the protections of speech and religion found in the Bill of Rights, and also some unenumerated rights, such as the right to travel interstate or the right of access to the courts. Second, discrimination either with respect to a fundamental right or on the basis of a "suspect classification" will receive strict scrutiny under Equal Protection doctrine. Suspect classifications include race, national origin, religion, and alienage.

In essence, the demand for a compelling state interest is the codification of a balancing test that weighs the governmental regulatory interest against the individual's liberty. The specific demand for a "compelling" interest dates back to Justice Felix Frankfurter's 1957 concurring opinion in Sweezy v. New Hampshire and was adopted by the Court one year later in NAACP v. Alabama.

While there has been much debate over how and whether the Court should go about identifying unenumerated fundamental rights, the process of deeming an interest compelling has received much less attention. The Court has never clearly explained how it assesses the importance of an interest, and relatively few scholars have addressed the subject.

KERMIT ROOSEVELT, III

References and Further Reading

Gottlieb, Stephen, Compelling Governmental Interests: An Essential but Unanalyzed Term in Constitutional Adjudication, B.U. L. Rev. 68 (1988): 917.

Symposium, Conference on Compelling Governmental Interests: The Mystery of Constitutional Analysis, Alb. L. Rev. 55 (1992): 535.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Sweezy v. New Hampshire, 354 U.S. 234, 265 (1957)

NAACP v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 449, 463 (1958)

See also Balancing Test

COMPULSORY VACCINATION

The question of whether or not one can be forced to submit to a medical vaccination against a contagious disease pits the police power of the states found in Amendment X against the rights of the individual to due process in Amendment XIV. The police power is generally understood to include the requisite powers to secure the health, safety, and general welfare of the population. The question of compulsory vaccination reached the U.S. Supreme Court in the 1905 case of Jacobson v. Massachusetts. Because of the potential for deadly outbreaks of smallpox, the State of Massachusetts enacted a law that permitted cities to require residents to be vaccinated against the disease and provided for a fine of five dollars for failure to obtain the vaccination. Jacobson argued that he could not be compelled to submit to vaccination, because it would violate his constitutional rights under the Preamble and Amendment XIV. The requirement was, he asserted, unreasonable, arbitrary, and oppressive and interfered with his right to care for his own body and his own health. The Supreme Court quickly dismissed the allegation that the Preamble to the Constitution was the "source of any substantive power," but considered the question of whether the Massachusetts law violated the due process clause of Amendment XIV. Justice Harlan, writing for the majority, noted that many restraints are placed on an individual's liberties, but that these are necessary to protect the health of the larger community; a person or minority of people cannot dominate the greater good. The state could constitutionally require individuals to be vaccinated.

MARY L. VOLCANSEK

Cases and Statutes Cited

Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 197 U.S. 11 (1905)

COMSTOCK, ANTHONY (1844–1915)

Vice crusader Anthony Comstock was born in Connecticut in 1844. His father was Thomas Anthony Comstock, a farmer and sawmill owner, and his mother was Polly Lockwood. Comstock's mother died when he was ten, and he attended public schools in his youth in New Canaan and New Britain. During the Civil War, he served in the Union army for two years. After the war, he held a variety of jobs across New England and the South before settling in New York City. In 1871, he married Margaret Hamilton, and after their only child died in infancy, they adopted a daughter.

Comstock was deeply impressed, and even obsessed, with the disparities he saw between the moral "values" he believed most Americans possessed and the behavior that the government, meant to "protect" the people, would tolerate. Particularly concerned by growing urban centers that seemed large, impersonal, amoral, and indifferent to the "innocents" moving into them, Comstock set out to change governmental response to such immorality. Comstock won the support of influential persons who helped him organize a special committee of the Young Men's Christian Association to conduct a war on vice and, in essence, entrap criminals. When some YMCA members balked at such action, Comstock and friends formed the autonomous committee known as the New York Society for the Suppression of Vice. For the rest of his life, Comstock would serve as the society's secretary and principal agent with his friends providing him money, respectability, and influence. In 1873, together they persuaded Congress to strengthen the law against sending obscene material through the U.S. mail. Congress appointed Comstock as special agent of the U.S. Post Office with broad responsibilities for prosecuting the law's violators. Comstock held this position until his death.

In 1880, Comstock published a memoir of his ten-year crusade against vice entitled Frauds Exposed; or, How the People are Deceived and Robbed, and Youth Corrupted, being a Full Disclosure of Various Schemes Operated through the Mails, and Unearthed by the Author. In the book, he attacked lotteries, bogus banks, jewelry frauds, real estate scams, and false plans for medical aid to the poor. In all his work, Comstock consistently upheld his often-deviant means of entrapping violators, making strong-armed arrests, and his merciless persecution of violators in the courts. Some findings suggest that Comstock enjoyed somewhat widespread support. A special committee of the New York legislature not only absolved him of wrongdoing but also concluded that his work was vital and essential to the community's safety and decency, despite a petition circulating at the time signed by fifty thousand citizens calling for the repeal of all Comstock laws.

Later in his life, Comstock became obsessed with what he thought was a rising tide of obscenity. He managed to remove tons of pamphlets and paraphernalia from the U.S. mails pertaining to birth control and abortion. He prosecuted abortionist and contraceptionist Ann Trow Lohman (also known as Madame Restell) and rejoiced when she chose suicide over facing trial. Comstock also prosecuted Victoria Woodhull and her sister Tennessee Claflin for publishing an account in their newsletter Weekly of Henry Ward Beecher's extramarital affairs. Comstock also increasingly prosecuted artists and critics. In 1887, he raided a reproduction of French paintings, including many nudes, at Knoedler's Gallery in New York City. In response, the Society of American Artists condemned Comstock's interference. Comstock countered by publishing a pamphlet, Morals vs. Art, in which he delineated that morality overrode all other considerations, and art was only desirable if it promoted, or at least did not counter, morality.

Comstock also attacked books, including the popular turn-of-the-century dime novels that he believed led youths down a path of crime and asserted that even many literary classics should only be read by mature scholars. He also protested against exotic dancers, plays, and many other public amusements that he felt corrupted morality. Aware that his crusades actually drew much more attention to these "immoral" acts than would have otherwise with no such publicity, Comstock seemed to care little, deriving satisfaction from the many convictions he won, fines collected, and in general, vice suppressed. Comstock continued his crusade for moral absolutism until his death, influencing the federal government and many states to pass more stringent antiobscenity laws. He helped form other vice societies such as the New England Watch and Ward Society, and the Society for the Suppression of Vice remained in existence long after his death. He died in New Jersey in 1915.

MELISSA OOTEN

References and Further Reading

- Beisel, Nicola Kay. Imperiled Innocents: Anthony Comstock and Family Reproduction in Victorian America. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1997.
- Broun, Heywood. Anthony Comstock, Roundsman of the Lord. Literary Guild of America, 1927.
- Pivar, David. Purity Crusade: Sexual Morality and Social Control, 1868–1900. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1973.

See also Obscenity

CONCEPT OF "CHRISTIAN NATION" IN AMERICAN JURISPRUDENCE

For much of American history, the U.S. Supreme Court and various state courts have characterized the United States as a "Christian nation." In recent years, however, courts have generally stopped making such references, and some justices and judges have expressly sought to distance themselves from these earlier proclamations.

During the nineteenth century, the Supreme Court issued several opinions in which it referred to the United States as a Christian nation. In Vidal v. Girard's Executors (1844), for example, a case involving a challenge to a will on the grounds that it devised property for a purpose "hostile to the Christian religion," the Court rejected the will challenge but did characterize the United States as a "Christian country." Similarly, in two slave trade cases, the Court characterized the United States as one of the "Christian nations" of the world: The Antelope (1825); The Kate (1864). Confronted with the question of the scope of American consulate jurisdiction, the Court in a few cases resolved the issue by distinguishing between the "Christian countries" and non-Christian countries of the world: In re Ross (1891); Dainese v. Hale (1875). Similarly, the Court repeatedly legitimated broad Congressional control over the property rights of Indian tribes, noting that Congress would be constrained by "such considerations of justice as would control a Christian people in their treatment of an ignorant and dependent race": Beecher v. Wetherby (1877). In the late nineteenth century, the Court decided a number of cases adverse to the interests of the Mormon religion, relying on the fact that certain Mormon practices such as polygamy were contrary to the "spirit of Christianity" and to the "laws of all civilized and Christian countries." See, for example, The Late Corporation of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints v. United States (1890); Davis v. Beason (1890).

The Supreme Court's most forthright claim that the United States is a Christian nation, however, came in Justice David Brewer's opinion in Church of the Holy Trinity v. United States (1892). In that opinion, Brewer set forth a lengthy argument for his claim that the United States is a religious, and specifically Christian, nation in the context of analyzing the intent of Congress in enacting a particular statute. Justice Brewer quoted several colonial charters, state constitutions, and state supreme court decisions that referred to the central importance of Christian belief in the life of the American people; cited the practice of various legislative bodies of beginning their sessions with prayer; and noted the large number of churches and Christian charitable organizations that exist in every community in the country as evidence that the United States is a Christian nation. In 1905, Justice Brewer expanded on his Holy Trinity decision in a series of lectures at Haverford College entitled "The United States is a Christian Nation," which were subsequently published as a book by the same title. Justice Brewer's contemporaries made similar observations about the American polity. For example, British observer Lord Bryce commented in his 1888 two-volume study of the United States, The American Commonwealth, that "Christianity is in fact understood to be, though not the legally established religion, yet the national religion."

During the nineteenth century, a few state supreme courts also asserted that Christianity was part of the common law of the United States. The Pennsylvania Supreme Court, for example, claimed that "Christianity . . . is, and always has been, a part of the common law of Pennsylvania": Updegraph v. Commonwealth (1824). The Ohio Supreme Court disagreed: The assertion that "'Christianity is a part of the common law of this country,' lying behind and above its constitutions . . . can hardly be serious The only foundation . . . for the proposition, that Christianity is part of the law of this country is the fact that it is a Christian country, and that its constitutions and laws are made by a Christian people": Board of Education of Cincinnati v. Minor (1872).

During the twentieth century, the Supreme Court stopped characterizing the United States as a Christian nation. In United States v. Macintosh (1931), the Court rejected an application for citizenship on the grounds that the applicant, claiming religious objections, had refused to pledge his unconditional support for this nation's future war efforts. Justice George Sutherland, writing for a narrow majority, noted that "[w]e are a Christian people . . . acknowledging with reverence the duty of obedience to the will of God," and that obedience to the nation's military endeavors was "not inconsistent with the will of God." The Macintosh decision was the last time that the Supreme Court expressly characterized the United States as a Christian nation, although in 1952, in Zorach v. Clauson, Justice William Douglas did write for the Court that "[w]e are a religious people whose institutions presuppose a Supreme Being."

Even after the Supreme Court stopped referring the United States as a Christian nation, some state court judges continued to do so. The Mississippi Supreme Court announced in 1950 that "[o]ur great country is denominated a Christian nation": Paramount-Richards Theatres v. City of Hattiesburg (1950). The Oklahoma Supreme Court claimed in 1959: “[I]t is well settled and understood that ours is a Christian Nation, holding the Almighty God in dutiful reverence”: Oklahoma v. Williamson (1959). In 1998, Alabama state judge Roy Moore defended the display of the Ten Commandments in his courtroom on the grounds that the U.S. Supreme Court in Holy Trinity had recognized that “the United States is a Christian Nation”: In re State of Alabama ex rel. James v. ACLU of Alabama (1998).

But in recent years, some Supreme Court justices and lower federal court judges have attempted to distance the courts from its “Christian nation” heritage. In Lynch v. Donnelly (1984), for example, Justice William Brennan criticized the Court’s decision upholding a governmental display of a creche as “a long step backwards to the days when Justice Brewer could arrogantly declare for the Court that ‘this is a Christian nation.’” Similarly, writing for the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit, Judge Avern Cohn noted in 2000: “We have come a long way from when it was acceptable that . . . a member of Congress could introduce a bill [in 1880] saying, ‘Whereas, The people of the United States are a Christian people, and firmly believe in God, the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth; and in Jesus Christ His only Son, our Lord . . .’, . . . or that the Supreme Court of Oklahoma could say: ‘it is well settled and understood that ours is a Christian Nation, holding the Almighty God in dutiful reverence’”: American Civil Liberties Union v. Capital Square Review and Advisory Board (2000).

DAVISON M. DOUGLAS

References and Further Reading

- Brewer, David. The United States a Christian Nation. Philadelphia: J.C. Winston Co., 1905.
 Bryce, James Bryce. The American Commonwealth. 3 volumes. New York: Macmillan & Co., 1888.
 Green, Steven K., Justice David Josiah Brewer and the ‘Christian Nation’ Maxim, Albany Law Review 63 (1999): 427–476.
 Hylton, J. Gordon, David Josiah Brewer and the Christian Constitution, Marquette Law Review 81 (1998): 417–425.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- American Civil Liberties Union v. Capital Square Review and Advisory Board*, 210 F.3d 703 (6th Cir. 2000)
The Antelope, 23 U.S. 66 (1825)
Beecher v. Wetherby, 95 U.S. 517 (1877)
Board of Education of Cincinnati v. Minor, 23 Ohio St. 211 (1872)
Church of the Holy Trinity v. United States, 143 U.S. 457 (1892)
Dainese v. Hale, 91 U.S. 13 (1875)
Davis v. Beason, 133 U.S. 333 (1890)
In re Ross, 140 U.S. 453 (1891)
In re State of Alabama ex rel. James v. ACLU of Alabama, 711 So.2d 952 (Ala. 1998)

- The Kate*, 69 U.S. 350 (1864)
Late Corporation of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints v. United States, 136 U.S. 1 (1890)
Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668 (1984)
Oklahoma v. Williamson, 1959 Ok 207 (1959)
Paramount-Richards Theatres v. City of Hattiesburg, 210 Miss. 271 (1950)
United States v. Macintosh, 283 U.S. 605 (1931)
Updegraph v. Commonwealth, 11 Serg. & Rawle 394 (Pa. 1824)
Vidal v. Girard’s Executors, 43 U.S. 127 (1844)
Zorach v. Clauson, 343 U.S. 306 (1952)

See also Douglas, William Orville

CONFRONTATION AND COMPULSORY PROCESS

Constitutional Bases

Adopted in 1791, the Sixth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution guarantees the defendant in a criminal trial the right “to be confronted with the witnesses against him,” and “to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor.”

The confrontation clause is designed to ensure the truthfulness of witness testimony against a defendant in a criminal trial. It accomplishes this by forcing the prosecution’s witnesses to testify in front of the party on trial and by allowing the defendant’s counsel to challenge the credibility and reliability of the witness’s testimony through cross-examination.

Also, rules of evidence such as Rule 801—the Hearsay Rule—of the Federal Rules of Evidence, stems from the Sixth Amendment right to confrontation and precludes the prosecution in a criminal trial from using as evidence statements made by witnesses not actually present at trial. The U.S. Supreme Court has carved out a number of exceptions to this rule, including instances where the prosecution is able to show a good-faith, but unsuccessful, effort in getting a witness to testify. For exceptions, see Federal Rules of Evidence 801(d)(E) through 804.

The compulsory process clause provides a defendant the court’s subpoena power to compel witnesses to testify. To exercise this right, a defendant must demonstrate that the witness’s testimony would be relevant, suitable, and favorable to him or her.

The confrontation and compulsory process clauses have grown in scope through a number of key U.S. Supreme Court cases.

Confrontation Clause

In drafting the Sixth Amendment, the Framers intended to incorporate the common law right to confrontation to prevent in the United States the type of abuses suffered by the likes of Sir Walter Raleigh in his trial in England. See, United States v. Inadi, 475 U.S. 387, 411 (1986). When John Adams was a defense attorney in a criminal case he said— “[e]xaminations of witnesses upon Interrogatories, are only by the Civil Law. Interrogatories are unknown at common Law, and Englishmen and common Lawyers have an aversion to them if not an Abhorrence of them”: 2 Legal Papers of John Adams 207 (Wroth and Zobel eds., 1965).

The U.S. Supreme Court has found violations of the Confrontation Clause when the prosecution introduced at trial statements from accomplices and witness that were not subject to cross-examination. See, Lilly v. Virginia, 527 U.S. 116 (1999) (custodial confession of accomplice); Idaho v. Wright, 497 U.S. 805 (1990) (statements by victim to doctor made with participation of police investigating defendant); Lee v. Illinois, 476 U.S. 530 (1986) (accomplice’s custodial confession); Berger v. California, 393 U.S. 314 (1969) (per curiam) (testimony from preliminary hearing); Brookhart v. Janis, 384 U.S. 1 (1966) (confession of accomplice taken during interrogation); and Pointer v. Texas, 380 U.S. 400 (1965) (testimony at preliminary hearing).

In the well-known case of Bruton v. United States, 391 U.S. 123 (1968), the Court held that in a joint trial the Confrontation Clause prohibits the admission of the codefendant who does not testify when the confession also incriminates the defendant. See also Roberts v. Russell, 392 U.S. 293 (1968) (per curiam); Cruz v. New York, 481 U.S. 186 (1987); and, Gray v. Maryland, 523 U.S. 185 (1998). But, the Court has also allowed the use of prior testimony from a witness against the accused because the witness was subject to cross-examination during the prior testimony. See Ohio v. Roberts, 448 U.S. 56 (1980), one of the most significant cases in confrontation jurisprudence. And, in Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987), the Court allowed co-conspirator’s statement to another co-conspirator); United States v. Inadi, 475 U.S. 387 (1986) (same); Dutton v. Evans, 400 U.S. 74 (1970) (same).

In the recent confrontation landmark case of Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004), the Court reaffirmed a principle in one of its line of cases that the Sixth Amendment right to confrontation precludes the admission of “testimonial” hearsay unless the witness is unavailable and there was a prior opportunity for full cross-examination. This controversial decision has been viewed as a double-edged sword by commentators. See Crawford v. Washington: A Critique. Miguel A. Mendez; Stanford Law Review, Vol. 57, 2004.

Compulsory Process

In Washington v. Texas (388 U.S. 14 (1967)), the Court found that through the Fourteenth Amendment, the Sixth Amendment compulsory process clause extends to criminal trials in state courts. It further held that principals, accomplices, and accessories to a crime might be introduced as witnesses for co-defendants to the same crime(s). In Washington the Court stated of this concept:

The right to offer the testimony of witnesses, and to compel their attendance, if necessary, is in plain terms the right to present a defense, the right to present the defendant’s version of the facts as well as the prosecution’s to the jury so it may decide where the truth lies. Just as an accused has the right to confront the prosecution’s witnesses for the purpose of challenging their testimony, he has the right to present his own witnesses to establish a defense. This right is a fundamental element of due process of law

Washington at 19-23. This right is not absolute. The compulsory process right is not absolute, and a court may refuse to allow a defense witness to testify where defense counsel did not identify the desired witness to gain a tactical advantage. See Taylor v. Illinois, 484 U.S. 400 (1988). See also United States v. Wallace, 32 F.3d 921 (5th Cir. 1994).

The compulsory process clause has also been the subject of debate in two notorious cases involving the U.S. President—Clinton v. Jones, 520 U.S. 681 (1997) and United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683 (1974).

EZEKIEL E. CORTEZ

References and Further Reading

- Amar, Akhil Reed. The Constitution and Criminal Procedure. 129–131 & n.194, 1997.
- Berger, Margaret A., The Deconstitutionalization of the Confrontation Clause: A Proposal for a Prosecutorial Restraint Model, Minn. L. Rev. 76 (1992): 559.
- Dickinson, Joshua C., The Confrontation Clause and the Hearsay Rule: The Current State of a Failed Marriage in Need of a Quick Divorce, Creighton L. Rev. 33 (2000): 763.
- Friedman, Richard D., Confrontation: The Search for Basic Principles, Geo. L. Rev. 86 (1998): 1011.
- “The Voice Of Adjudication”: The Sixth Amendment Right To Compulsory Process Fifty Years After United States

Ex Rel. Touhy v. Ragen, Milton Hirsh, Florida State University Law Review Vol. 30:81.

See also Confrontation Clause; Defense, Right to Present

CONFRONTATION CLAUSE

The Confrontation Clause of the Sixth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution declares, "In all criminal proceedings, the defendant shall enjoy the right . . . to be confronted with the witnesses against him." The Clause protects a criminal defendant's presumptive guarantee of an opportunity for effective face-to-face cross-examination of his accusers. The Clause is thus implicated in a child abuse case in which the child testifies in a separate room visible to the defendant only by closed circuit television or in admitting the child's hearsay statements even when he or she has never testified under oath.

The Clause cannot be understood in isolation but rather must be seen as complementing other Sixth Amendment rights, such as those to a public trial by jury with the effective assistance of counsel. Together, these rights make "crucial workings of the government visible and keep . . . the overwhelming prosecutorial powers of the government in check." Public cross-examination in a public trial helps to ensure that any effort by the prosecution to shape tainted evidence in secret or by improper methods faces public scrutiny.

The confrontation concept has ancient roots, particularly in English trials challenging civil-law-like trials by affidavit. During the American Revolutionary period, the right became associated with the struggle to enhance citizen power against the state, and its absence from the original, unamended constitution was one of the reasons cited by Anti-Federalists for their opposition to ratification of that document. Many historians thus see the direct purpose of the Clause as restraining government power.

The U.S. Supreme Court has apparently come to agree. Recently it replaced the Ohio v. Roberts test for admitting hearsay, which required proof of reliability by means of "particularized guarantees of trustworthiness" or a showing that a hearsay exception was "firmly rooted" in American history. This nearly toothless test was overruled in Crawford v. United States, which held that "testimonial" hearsay statements may not be used at trial unless the declarant is then unavailable and the accused had a prior opportunity for cross-examining the witness. The Court was vague about its definition of "testimonial," but it clearly requires government involvement in creating evidence or the witness's expectation of such involvement. Although commentators generally agree that the Crawford test will do a better job than Roberts in restraining the state and is more consistent with the Clause's history, some authors worry that Crawford will make it harder for the criminal justice system to protect vulnerable populations. In particular, in child abuse, elder abuse, and battered women cases, victims are often afraid, and unwilling to testify. Other commentators worry instead that Crawford does not go far enough, the opportunity for "effective" cross-examination being meaningless unless supplemented by broad defense rights to pretrial discovery so that defense counsel has the informational tools with which to wage war with Leviathan.

ANDREW E. TASLITZ

References and Further Reading

- Amar, Akhil Reed. The Constitution and Criminal Procedure. 125–131 1997.
- Berger, Margaret, The Deconstitutionalization of the Confrontation Clause: A Proposal for a Prosecutorial Restraint Model, Minn. L. Rev. 76 (1992): 557.
- Douglass, John G., Beyond Admissibility: Real Confrontation, Virtual Cross-Examination, and the Right to Confront Hearsay, Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 67 (1999): 191.
- Mosteller, Robert M., Crawford v. Washington: Encouraging and Ensuring the Confrontation of Witnesses, Richmond L. Rev. 39 (2005): 511.
- Raeder, Myrna, Domestic Violence, Child Abuse, and Trustworthiness Exceptions After Crawford, Crim. J. 20 (2005): 24.
- Symposium Issue, Crawford and Hearsay: One Year Later, Crim. J. 20 (2005): 1–80.
- Taslitz, Andrew E., What Remains of Reliability and Free-standing Due Process After Crawford v. Washington, Crim. J. 20 (2005): 39.

See also Confrontation and Compulsory Process; Defense, Right to Present

CONGRESSIONAL PROTECTION OF PRIVACY

Congress has often lagged behind other institutions in the protection of individual privacy. State laws often provide greater privacy protections than their federal counterparts, and courts and legal commentators have often presaged Congressional action. Despite its general laggardness, however, Congress' forays into privacy law are numerous and varied. When Congress does act, it often seems torn between competing values: individual freedom vs. national security, or individual privacy vs. free-market principles. As a result, Congressional protection of privacy often falls far short of what privacy advocates would urge and, in most cases, below that of even state legislative efforts.

The earliest federal efforts to protect privacy centered on the Census of the Population and the Census of Manufactures. The nineteenth and early twentieth centuries saw various Congressional attempts to assure citizens that any information gathered under the Censuses would be held in strictest confidence. Congress passed laws criminalizing the disclosure of any nonstatistical data gathered by the Censuses.

Other than the Census, however, Congress was slow to act to protect information privacy concerns. While state courts and legislators were busy developing various legal remedies to protect individual privacy, Congress was silent. It was not until various high-profile controversies, including Watergate and revelations of FBI profiling of civil rights activists, that Congress began to act. A number of important privacy-related hearings were held by Congress in the 1960s and, as a result, a consensus began to emerge that some federal laws were required to protect individual privacy and curb government excesses.

Although most privacy advocates urged Congress to pass a comprehensive privacy law, governing all data collection, compilation, and dissemination practice in the public and private sectors, Congress chose to pass narrower laws that generally left the free-market unregulated. The Privacy Act (1974) did apply to all information held by the federal government and included a number of important rights for citizens such as the right to be notified of information uses, the right to access government files, and the power to have errors corrected. Despite the Privacy Act's broad protections, it did not apply to the private sector.

Private sector regulation was limited to specific areas where the data in question were believed to be highly sensitive. As a result, Congress in the 1970s did pass a number of laws to protect credit information, Fair Credit Reporting Act (1970), financial privacy, Right to Financial Privacy Act (1978), and education records: Family Education Rights and Privacy Act (1974). A number of laws were also passed to limit the federal government's power to engage in surveillance of citizens, Wiretap Statute (1968, 1970), Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (1978), and to, later, to protect electronic and digital communications and information: Electronic Communications Privacy Act (1986), Computer Fraud and Abuse Act (1984). These acts, amended from time to time, reveal Congress' general intent to leave the private sector generally free from privacy regulation while protecting those areas deemed most dangerous and sensitive.

This piecemeal approach continued throughout the 1980s and to the present. Over the last few decades, Congress has passed laws to protect video rental information, Video Privacy Protection Act (1998); drivers' license information, Drivers Privacy Protection Act (1996); data related to television and telephone habits, Cable Privacy Protection Act (1984), Telephone Consumer Protection Act (1991), strengthened financial privacy, Gramm-Leach-Bliley (1999); and passed strong medical data privacy legislation, HIPAA (1996).

The last decade has witnessed strong pressure on Congress to pass new laws protecting online privacy and, in the aftermath of 9/11, to pass laws that balance privacy and security interests. Passage of the USA PATRIOT Act (2001) reworked many prior privacy rules and granted the federal government increased antiterrorism powers to investigate and use data previously held confidential under various laws and regulations. As technologies and new national security threats emerge, Congress will be asked to review its current approaches. Numerous privacy advocates continue to call for more comprehensive privacy legislation that would regulate all private and public sector data collection. Although Congress has seldom been visionary in its privacy laws, there is no doubt that this is an issue that will increasingly form part of its agenda.

DOUGLAS J. SYLVESTER

References and Further Reading

- Burnham, David A. The Rise of the Computer State. New York: Random House, 1983.
- Cate, Fred H., et al., Financial Privacy, Consumer Prosperity, and the Public Good. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution Press, 2003.
- Hisson, Richard T. Privacy in a Public Society: Human Rights in Conflict. New York: Oxford University Press, 1987.
- Packard, Vance O. The Naked Society. New York: Pocket Books, 1964.
- Sylvester, Douglas J., and Sharon M. Lohr, The Security of Our Secrets: A History Of Privacy And Confidentiality In Law And Statistical Practice, Denver University Law Review, vol. 83, no. 1 (2005).
- Warren, Stephen A., and Louis Brandeis, The Right to Privacy, Harvard Law Review, vol. 4, no. 1 (1890): 193-220.
- Westin, Alan F. Privacy and Freedom. New York: Atheneum, 1967.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Cable Privacy Protection Act of Oct. 30, 1984, 98 Stat. 2794
- Computer Fraud and Abuse Act of Oct. 12, 1984, Pub.L. 98-473, 98 Stat. 2190
- Fair and Accurate Credit Transaction Act of Dec. 4, 2003, 111 Stat. 1952
- Fair Credit Reporting Act of Oct. 26, 1970, c. 41, 84 Stat. 1127
- Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978, Pub. L. No. 95-511, 92 Stat. 1783
- Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act of Aug. 21, 1996 ("HIPAA"), 110 Stat. 2023

CONGRESSIONAL PROTECTION OF PRIVACY

Right to Financial Privacy Act of Nov. 10, 1978, P.L. No. 95-630, 92 Stat. 3697
Telephone Consumer Protection Act of 1991, 105 Stat. 2394
The Driver's Privacy Protection Act of Sept. 13, 1994, 108 Stat. 2099
The Electronic Communications Privacy Act of 1986 ("ECPA"), 100 Stat. 1848
The Family Educational Rights and Privacy Act, Pub. L. No. 93-380, 88 Stat. 571
The Financial Modernization Act of Nov. 12, 1999 ("Gramm-Leach-Bliley Act"), 113 Stat. 1445
The Privacy Act of 1974, Pub. L. No. 93-579, 88 Stat. 1896
Title III of the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968 ("Wiretap Statute"), 82 Stat. 211
Uniting and Strengthening America by Providing Appropriate Tools Required to Intercept and Obstruct Terrorism ("USA PATRIOT Act"), Act of Oct. 26, 2001, PL 107-56, 115 Stat. 272
Video Privacy Protection Act, Act of Oct. 21, 1998, P.L. No. 100-618, 102 Stat. 3195

See also Anonymity in Online Communications; Cable Television Regulation; Electronic Surveillance, Technological Monitoring, and Dog Sniffs; Fair Credit Reporting Act, 84 Stat. 1127 (1970); Freedom of Information Act (1966); National Security; 9/11 and the War on Terrorism; Nixon, Richard Milhous; Omnibus Crime Control and the Safe Streets Act of 1968 (92 Stat. 3795); Privacy; Privacy, Theories of; State Constitution, Privacy Provisions; Terrorism and Civil Liberties; Video Privacy Protection Act (1980); Wiretapping Laws

CONNALLY v. GEORGIA, 429 U.S. 245 (1977)

After a search of John Connally's house, marijuana was seized based on a search warrant issued by a local justice of the peace. Connally was then indicted, tried, and convicted in the Superior Court of Georgia in Walker County for possession of marijuana in violation of the Georgia Controlled Substances Act.

Connally appealed his conviction to the Supreme Court of Georgia, and later to the U.S. Supreme Court, on the basis that the justice of the peace who issued the warrant was not a neutral party because he had an interest in issuing the warrant. Georgia Code allowed a justice of the peace to charge $5 for issuing a warrant. If no warrant was issued, they could receive no fee. The fee was given to the county, which then paid the fee to the issuing justice.

The Supreme Court held that the Georgia statute was not valid because of its linkage of receiving compensation for warrants granted. The decision relied on the precedent set in Tumey v. Ohio, which held that an officer of the court could not issue a warrant when he or she had direct gain in the manner. The justice of the peace stood to benefit financially by issuing a warrant, which, therefore, might cloud his judgment when deciding whether to issue or deny the warrant. The issuance of this search warrant was found to be in violation of the protections provided by the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments of the U.S. Constitution.

CAROL WALKER

References and Further Reading

LaFave, Wayne R. Search and Seizure: A Treatise on the Fourth Amendment, 4th ed. St. Paul, Minn.: West, 2004.
Maltz, Earl. The Fourteenth Amendment and the Law of the Constitution. Durham, NC: Carolina Academic Press, 2003.
Wilson, Bradford P. Enforcing the Fourth Amendment: A Jurisprudential History. New York: Garland Press, 1986.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Tumey v. Ohio, 273 U.S. 510 (1927)

See also Due Process; Impartial Decisionmaker

CONNOR, EUGENE "BULL" (1897–1973)

Eugene "Bull" Connor, born in Selma, Alabama, in 1897 was commissioner of public safety in Birmingham during civil rights crusades of the 1950s and 1960s. His confrontation with Martin Luther King, Jr., in 1963 brought him notoriety as the ugly face of southern racism.

In his six terms as chief law officer in Birmingham between 1937 and 1953 and 1957 and 1963, Connor's reputation and political support thrived on his staunch enforcement of racial segregation. His leadership of the public safety department was based on racism and cronyism. After a sexual scandal forced him out of office in 1953, he fought his way back to power four years later with appeals to white fears of racial integration. His strong support of segregation, however, set him on a collision course with the increasingly assertive civil rights movement.

The nation had its first glimpse of Bull Connor's tactics in the spring of 1961, when Freedom Riders set off on an interstate bus journey through the South to publicize the persistence of segregated bus terminals. After violent collisions with whites in Rock Hill, South Carolina, and Anniston, Alabama, riders were greeted at the Birmingham bus station by Ku Klux Klan thugs who beat the protesters as they exited from the bus. The absence of any police protection for the riders occurred as a result of an arrangement between Connor and the Klan to allow Klansmen fifteen minutes to work on the passengers.

Two years later, in May 1963, Connor's reputation as an ugly, stubborn racist was reinforced when the commissioner was confronted by Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr.'s civil rights crusade. Birmingham, which King had characterized as the most segregated city in the South, was riven by racial tensions. White businessmen had been economically damaged by months of black boycotts of the segregated downtown stores that had only white restrooms. Connor's vigorous enforcement of the city's segregation ordinances had eventually driven many of Birmingham's business leaders to introduce a city government reform plan that would eliminate Connor's office. Meanwhile, for months King and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference had been staging demonstrations against the city's segregated facilities. The civil rights marches, however, by May, had been attracting diminishing participation, even after King himself went to jail for defying an injunction not to march. King decided to boost the flagging support for his crusade by sending hundreds of children out into the streets day after day. After mass arrests had filled city jails, Connor ordered the use of high-pressure fire hoses and police dogs to turn back the demonstrators. The televised brutal confrontation between defenseless black children, snarling dogs, and apparently heartless police brought the obscenity of southern racism directly into the living rooms of Northern whites. King's strategy did, in fact, energize Northern liberals, as well as the Kennedy administration, leading to the passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 that would finally outlaw segregation in public facilities. In Birmingham, the resulting economic consequences of racial disorder propelled white business owners in the city to more actively negotiate with civil rights leaders over accommodating black demands. Connor, himself, was forced out of office finally at the end of the May 1963 as the result of the structural reform of Birmingham's city government. He ended his public career, safely shelved by the white business community, as president of the Alabama Public Services Commission until his retirement in 1972.

Bull Connor became the symbol of the intransigent Southern racism of the civil rights era. Ironically, however, it was Connor's obstinate defense of segregation in Birmingham that ultimately was the catalyst for its demise. Speaking about his effect on the administration's civil rights bill of 1963, President John F. Kennedy observed that Connor had done as much for civil rights as had Abraham Lincoln.

KAREN BRUNER

References and Further Reading

Branch, Taylor. Parting of the Waters: American in the King Years: 1954-1963. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1988.
Nunnally, William A. Bull Connor. Tuscaloosa, AL: University of Alabama Press, 1991.

CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTION, THE FREE EXERCISE CLAUSE

The first amendment to the U.S. Constitution provides "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the government for a redress of grievances." The restraint on prohibitions of the free exercise of religion has significant implications for conscientious objectors to government regulation including military conscription.

Conscientious objectors are those who are unable to comply with a regulation because of a sincerely held conviction. The objector may seek to be exempt from an affirmative regulation requiring behavior, such as a military draft, or a prohibitory regulation preventing certain behavior such as the wearing of religious garb.

The free exercise clause protects some religiously motivated objections, although other law may accommodate additional types of objections. In military conscription cases, for example, current law recognizes objections based on religious belief, as well as on dictates of conscience equivalent to a sincerely held religious belief. Although a statute regulates the exemption of conscientious objectors from military conscription, the free exercise clause apparently motivated the legislature to enact the series of statutes, and it continues to guide the Court in its interpretation of the statute. The statute, 50 USC 456(j), states that "Nothing contained in this title shall be construed to require any person to be subject to combatant training and service in the armed forces of the United States who, by reason of religious training and belief, is conscientiously opposed to war in any form." It continues to distinguish "religious training and belief" from a "merely personal moral code." This statute expanded earlier exemption statutes that required membership in religious institutions. The current statute allows those unaffiliated with a religious institution to claim conscientious objector status. It recognizes objection to all wars but not to specific wars. This provision of the statute has been upheld but not extended by the U.S. Supreme Court. See Gillette v United States, 401 U.S. 437, 1971.

Conscientious objector cases often turn on an objection to regulations supporting war, but they may also be about the right to an exemption from regulation to permit an exercise of religion such as the wearing of religious clothing, the ritual use of regulated drugs, marriage practices such as polygamy, or the taking of oaths. The clause also has implications for a wide range of military-related issues from forced conscription to mandatory participation in other programs such as high school ROTC programs and even unemployment law.

Early cases involving the free exercise clause distinguished between belief and conduct, so that while belief was unfettered, conduct could be regulated. See Reynolds v. U.S., 98 U.S. 145 (1879). A long line of Mormon and Seventh Day Adventist cases expanded and contracted the scope of the protection before Sherbert v. Verner 374 US 398 (1963) adopted the requirement of a “compelling state interest” to justify burdening the free exercise of religion. Gillette (401 U.S. 437) used this compelling interest test to deny CO status to a draft registrant who objected to the Vietnam War but not to wars of national defense. Justice Douglas dissented that “conscience and belief were the main ingredients of First Amendment rights of free speech and religion” and “that the statute as written was constitutionally infirm under the First Amendment.” Douglas’s view that “if exemption was afforded to persons holding religious or conscientious scruples against all wars, so must it be afforded to those with religious or conscientious objection to participation in particular wars.” The majority rejected this argument, deciding that the government interest in a fair exemption system outweighed the right of conscience.

Conscientious objection cases require statutory construction of 50 USC 456 to measure it against Constitutional requirements of the establishment, free exercise, and even due process clauses. Exemptions for conscientious objectors have been used since early colonial days. In U.S. v. Macintosh, 283 U.S. 605, 633 (1931), Chief Justice Hughes noted that such exemptions are “indicative of the actual operation of the principles of the Constitution.” Modern cases extended the religious belief requirement to beliefs that fill the same function as religious beliefs, although the Justices often split on the rationale for such an exemption. In United States v. Seeger, 380 U.S. 163 (1965), the Court extended the statutory exemption to a nontheist whose conscience did not permit participation in war but who did not identify his belief as religious in nature (the 1948 statute, Provision 6(j) of the Universal Military Training and Service Act of 1948, required that the objection be based on a belief in a Supreme Being). The Court held that a belief occupying the place of religion would suffice. The Seeger analysis centered on the Establishment Clause’s prohibition on establishing a particular religion, but Justice Douglas noted in a concurrence that the free exercise and equal protection clauses prohibit preferring one religion over another.

Welsh v. United States, 398 U.S. 333 (1970), followed Seeger, and the plurality opinion revealed the complexity of the Court’s analysis of exemption cases. Welsh reversed the conviction of Elliott Welsh II who had a deeply held conviction to war as unethical and immoral, although he did not identify this as religious nor profess belief in a Supreme Being. The majority evaluated the intensity and sincerity of the belief. Justice Harlan’s concurrence rejected the majority’s reliance on intensity as a valid test of compliance with the statute. He noted that the statute violated the establishment clause and that the language of the statute “cannot be construed . . . to exempt from military service all individuals who in good faith oppose all war . . .” (See Welsh at 348–354). Rather, the exemption should be reconciled with the establishment clause by specifically including “those like the petitioner who have been unconstitutionally excluded from its coverage” (Welsh at 367).

The Welsh dissent, however, noted the close relationship of the establishment and free exercise clauses. While Congress intended to exclude purely moral objections, “Congress may have granted the exemption because otherwise religious objectors would be forced into conduct that their religions forbid and because in the view of Congress to deny the exemption would violate the free exercise clause or at least raise grave problems in this respect” (Welsh at 369).

The free exercise clause has been applied to conscientious objection to a spectrum of military involvement. From cases requiring saluting the flag, the training to or bearing of arms, taking of an oath to bear arms, or a range of other activities linked to military service and goals, government regulations have been challenged by those who argue that their religious beliefs require accommodation. These cases evidence the same shift as in free exercise cases generally from the Reynolds standard to the Sherbert “compelling interest” test. See, for example, Gillette v. U.S., 401 US 437 (1971), upholding the “substantial” government interest in conscription over the individual’s free exercise of religion; and Spence v. Bailey, 465 F.2d 797 (6th cir. 1972), stating that religious objections to mandatory participation in a high school ROTC program would not unduly burden officials. In cases involving military regulation of noncivilians, review has generally been more deferential than for regulation of civilians. See, for example, Goldman v. Weinberger, 475 US 503 (1986) allowing the military to prohibit wearing of a yarmulke, although Congress later legislated to allow religious apparel while in uniform (Pub. L. 100-180, Sec 508(a)(2), 101 Stat. 1086 (1987); 10 USC Sec 774.

Modern cases involving religious objection to military conscription continue to follow the requirements summarized in Clay v. United States, 403 U.S. 698, 705(1971) for the implementation of the Military Selective Service Act Section 6(j): that the objection be to war in any form, that the objection be based on religious training or belief or the equivalent, and that the belief be sincere. Clay involved Cassius Clay, aka Muhammed Ali, who objected to war not declared by Allah. Because the Justice Department did not clearly state which of the three tests formed the basis for its decision, the Supreme Court reversed the conviction without reaching the selective opposition to war issue.

JEAN BINKOVITZ

CONSPIRACY

The common law definition of conspiracy is an agreement between two or more individuals to commit an unlawful act, such as murder, or to commit a lawful act by unlawful means, such as artificially increasing the price of goods through collusion. In jurisdictions that follow the common-law definition, the term “unlawful” includes, but is not limited to, acts and means that are criminal; acts and means that are “prejudicial to the public, oppressive of individuals, or done for a malicious purpose” also suffice. Some jurisdictions, however, statutorily limit conspiracy to agreements to commit a criminal offense.

Conspiracy has been a crime since the reign of Edward I in the late thirteenth century. The early common law defined conspiracy narrowly; the crime encompassed only conspiracies to obstruct justice, normally through false accusation of criminal conduct, and required the wrongly accused individual be indicted and then acquitted of the crime. The first major expansion of conspiracy came in the 1611 decision Poulterer’s Case, where the Court of Star Chamber held that a conspiracy was punishable even if it was unsuccessful. Not surprisingly, the decision led to a dramatic increase in conspiracy prosecutions, and by the end of the seventeenth century conspiring to commit any criminal offense was punishable. Finally, by the mid-nineteenth century, conspiracy had adopted its current common-law form, punishing conspiracies to commit lawful acts by legal means, as well as conspiracies to commit unlawful acts.

As with all crimes, conspiracy is defined by the combination of a certain act and a certain mental state. The act requirement of conspiracy is unique, in that the requirement is satisfied by the defendant’s decision to enter into the conspiracy. The testimony of one of the conspirators is the ideal method for proving the agreement but is not required given the secretive nature of conspiracies. Indeed, the prosecution does not have to show that the conspirators actually exchanged words explicitly communicating agreement. A “tacit understanding” is sufficient, and that understanding can be inferred circumstantially from the coordinated actions of the conspirators themselves.

The mental requirement is more complex, because the crime of conspiracy actually requires two mental states: an intent to enter into the conspiratorial agreement and an intent to commit the unlawful act that is the object of the agreement. The intent to enter into the agreement is rarely contested, because the prosecution will not charge a defendant with conspiracy without evidence of the agreement. Whether the defendant intended to commit the unlawful act is thus the critical issue in most conspiracy prosecutions.

At common law, a conspiracy was punishable even if the conspirators had done nothing in furtherance of the conspiracy beyond the agreement itself. In the absence of a statute providing otherwise, this is still the rule. The federal conspiracy statute and many state conspiracy statutes, however, require proof that one of the conspirators committed an “overt act” in furtherance of the conspiracy. The purpose of the overt-act requirement is to ensure that the conspiracy was underway, not “a project still resting solely in the minds of the conspirators.” Virtually any act will satisfy the overt-act requirement, legal as well as illegal.

A conspiracy and its unlawful object, where criminal, are separate and distinct offenses. As a result, a defendant can be convicted of both conspiracy and the underlying crime and can be convicted of conspiracy even when the underlying crime is not prosecuted or results in an acquittal. When convicted of both, the sentences can be added on to each other, and there is no requirement that the sentence for the conspiracy be shorter than the sentence for the underlying crime.

There are two basic rationales for the crime of conspiracy. First, by criminalizing the conspiratorial agreement itself, conspiracy permits law enforcement to authorities to intervene against criminally minded individuals before they carry out the more harmful underlying crime. Second, conspiracy as a freestanding crime protects the public from the heightened dangers of concerted criminal activity. A criminal plan carried out by a group is far more likely to succeed than one carried out by an individual and is capable of causing far greater harm. Moreover, the existence of a conspiratorial group always has the potential to branch out into new and different kinds of crimes.

The crime of conspiracy has always been controversial. To begin with, the crime gives the prosecution substantive and procedural advantages unparalleled elsewhere in the criminal law—advantages that led Judge Learned Hand to famously describe conspiracy as “the darling of the modern prosecutor’s nursery.” One such advantage is simply the crime’s inherent vagueness, both in terms of its applicability to non-criminal objectives and its definition of the required mental state. Such vagueness makes a conspiracy charge particularly difficult to defend.

A critical procedural advantage for the prosecution is what’s known as the “co-conspirator hearsay exception,” which permits any incriminating statement made by a conspirator during and in furtherance of the conspiracy to be used against all of his co-conspirators. In fact, a conspirator’s incriminating statement can even be used against a co-conspirator who joined the conspiracy after the statement was made.

The most problematic advantage, however, is the prosecution’s ability to try all of the members of a conspiracy jointly. Such joint trials dramatically increase the possibility of guilt by association, where an innocent defendant is convicted either because jurors are unable to keep the evidence against the different defendants separate or simply because they assume that if one defendant is guilty, all of them must be.

These advantages help explain why prosecutors have often misused the crime of conspiracy for political purposes. Efforts to organize labor unions were consistently prosecuted as criminal conspiracies in the nineteenth century. And conspiracy prosecutions were effective tools for silencing the protected speech of peace and anti-war activists during World War I and of communists and alleged communists during the McCarthy Era.

KEVIN JON HELLER

References and Further Reading

LaFave, Wayne R. Substantive Criminal Law 2. Ch. 12. St. Paul: West Publishing, 1986.
Sayre, Francis B., Criminal Conspiracy, Harvard Law Review 35 (1922): 2:393–427.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Harrison v. United States, 7 F.2d 259 (2d Cir. 1925)
Poulterer’s Case, 77 Eng. Rep. 813 (1611)

See also Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494 (1951);
Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919)

CONSTITUTION OF 1787

The U.S. Constitution of 1787 did not contain a bill of rights, because the overwhelming majority of the delegates did not believe that one was necessary. They were creating a government of limited powers and did not think that these powers included the right to generally regulate civil liberties. Thus, the Framers did not include any general protections for freedom of religion, speech, the press, or assembly, because they quite frankly did not believe Congress could ever legislate on such matters. They did anticipate a federal criminal law, but not one at the convention believed it was necessary to guard against warrantless searches or prosecution without grand jury indictments because the Framers simply could not imagine that any representative government could act in such a manner. In opposing the addition of a bill of rights, Roger Sherman of Connecticut explained that the national legislature could “be safely trusted” to protect liberty. [2 Farrand 588–589] Similarly, he argued that no special protection freedom of the press was necessary because “the power of Congress does not extend to the Press.” [2 Farrand 617–618] A majority of the convention agreed with Sherman both times. Sherman may have been wrong about this, but it’s position was not taken out of hostility to civil liberties. The Framers were naïve in this regard, but not tyrannical.

While generally not protecting civil liberties, the Constitution contains a number of clauses that are protective of civil liberties. There are also provisions that could threaten civil liberties, especially in the absence of a bill of rights.

Protections of Civil Liberties in the Constitution

While not generally protecting freedom of speech, the “Speech and Debate Clause” of Article I, Sec. 6, Par. 1, does protect the freedom of members of the House and Senate to speak freely and openly when debating issues in Congress. This was a critical provision in the development of open government and representative government. At the same time, however, this clause has allowed demagogues, like Senator Joseph McCarthy, to destroy the reputations of innocent Americans without fear or interference from the courts.

Article I, Sec. 8 provided for the granting of copyrights to authors. This is generally seen as an important stimulus for the growth of literature and publishing in America. The protection of copyright is seen as essential to a free press to the extent that authors and publishers need economic and legal protection for their work.

Article I, Sec. 9, Par. 2 allows for the suspension of habeas corpus only under very limited circumstances: when there has been an invasion or rebellion and the public safety requires it. This clause prevents arbitrary suspensions. Indeed, the only sustained suspension took place during and after the Civil War, when there were true rebellions in the nation. During World War II habeas was suspended in Hawaii, which was a war zone. The Japanese Internment was technically not a suspension of habeas, although it unfortunately had a similar affect for Japanese Americans. The strict requirement for habeas suspension contrasts with the easier methods by act of Parliament in Britain.

Tied to the habeas clause is the prohibition on ex post facto laws and bills of attainder. These clauses were important additions to the Constitution that limited the ability of the government to punish people for their political acts and viewpoints. Article I, Sec. 10, Par. 1 also prohibited the state from passing such laws. The Constitution did not, however, prohibit the states from suspending habeas corpus in situations other than rebellion or invasion. This meant that if martial law had to be declared in the event of a natural or man-made disaster, it would be done at the local or state level.

Two clauses dealing with religion are perhaps the most important protections for civil liberties in the original Constitution. Article II, Sec. 1, Par. 7 and Art. VI, Sec. 1, Par. 3 both provide that in taking the oath of office state and federal officials “shall be bound by Oath or Affirmation” to support the Constitution. By adding the term “or Affirmation,” the framers opened office holding to Quakers and members of other pietistic faiths who refused to take “oaths.” In addition, by not including an oath to “God” or an oath on a Bible, the Framers placed no religious impediments to officeholders such as existed in England, where members of Parliament had to swear an oath on the Protestant, King James Bible. More importantly, the same clause of Art. VI also declared that “no religious Test shall ever be required as Qualification to any Office or public Trust under the United States.” At the time eleven of the thirteen states had some form of religious test for office holding, as did every nation in Europe. The United States thus became the first nation in the world to allow people of any religion, or no religion at all, to hold office. Significantly, Jews had already held some offices in the new nation, including one who was an officer on George Washington’s personal staff during the Revolution. The Constitution reaffirmed that in this nation anyone, of any religion, could hold office.

The other major protections for civil liberties were in Article III of the Constitution. Section 2, Par. 2 of that Article provided that all prosecutions under federal law would be by jury, and the trials would have to take place in the state where the alleged crime was committed. This would prevent the government from moving defendants far from their homes and witnesses, as England had done before the Revolution. Section 3, Paragraph 1 of this Article set out a high standard for treason: that it could consist only of “levying War” against the United States or “adhering to their enemies, giving them Aid and Comfort,” and that no conviction could take place without two witnesses to the same “overt act” or a confession in “open court.” England allowed prosecutions for constructive treason—that is for statements, or even cartoons or drawings—that could be construed as treasonous. No overt act was necessary for the crime, and two witnesses to the same act were not necessary for conviction. Paragraph three of this section of the Constitution also prohibited the government from punishing the descendants or heirs of those convicted of treason, which had been done in England.

Threats to Civil Liberties

Although creating a government with limited powers, the Constitution was open-ended on many issues. Article I, Sec. 8 allowed Congress to regulate interstate trade. Even if Congress could not abridge freedom of the press, it might prevent political literature from being sent across state lines if the content was deemed unacceptable to a political majority. This would also be accomplished by denying the use of the mail to certain categories of publications. Starting the 1870s with the Comstock Act, Congress prohibited “obscene materials” from the mail. For more than fifty years this included any material that women could have used to learn about birth control. Authorities prosecuted and jailed the founder of family planning in America, Margaret Sanger, under this statute. During World War I, the post office prohibited papers critical of war policies from being circulated through the mail. In the 1960s, the Congress tried to use the commerce clause to prevent antiwar activists from crossing state lines, although this law, known as the H. Rap Brown law (after a black activist), was struck down as violating the First Amendment.

The power to regulate naturalization (Art. I, Sec. 8, Part. 4) has also been used to threaten civil liberties. Aliens have been deported, or threatened with deportation, for exercising free speech rights. Also, immigration laws, which are tied to naturalization, have been used to discriminate against people on the basis of political ideology and ethnicity. Sometimes this has been used to protect the nation from those who might harm the country (fascists, communists, terrorists), but it has also been used merely to weed those with unpopular ideas, such as pacifists or advocates of polygamy, that did not pose any security threat to the nation.

The fugitive slave clause (Art. IV, Sec. 2, Par. 3) provided that runaway slaves would be “delivered up” on the claim of the owner, without any due process requirements. This would lead to kidnappings and the removal of people who had claims to freedom. At the time this clause was barely debated, but it had great potential, which was played out in the first six decades of the nineteenth century to deny fundamental rights to African Americans.

Provisions That Both Protect and Threaten Civil Liberties

A number of provisions can both threaten or protect civil liberties, depending how they are implemented. For example Article I, Sec. 8, Par. 15 allows for the use of the militia to suppress insurrections, whereas Article IV, Sec. 4 allows the use of the army to protect the states from rebellions and insurrections. These clauses have been used to suppress those who would violate the civil liberties of others—such as the use of the army to suppress the Ku Klux Klan after the Civil War or the use of the Army and the state national guards (the militia) to help integrate public schools and state universities in the South in the 1950s and 1960s. But, this clause was also used to suppress labor strikes, where workers were seeking high wages or better working conditions, but not threatening violence.

Article I, Sec. 9 prevented Congress from ending the African slave trade for twenty years. On the other hand, when the twenty years were up, Congress was able to end the trade. To the extent that enslavement is the most outrageous denial of civil liberty, this clause can be seen as cutting in both directions on civil liberties.

The most significant clauses that could have threatened, or protected, civil liberties were tied to those places—such as the territories and the national capital—where Congress had the exclusive right to legislate. The Framers argued that a Bill of Rights was unnecessary for the Constitution because the states, not Congress, would pass most general laws. The regulation of the press, for example, would be left to state law under the constitution. However, in the territories and the planned federal district—what became Washington, D.C.—the Congress would function as a state legislature. Thus, without a bill of rights the Congress would be able to deny or protect fundamental liberties without any constitutional guidance or limitation.

Conclusion

In the end, the Constitution did not greatly threaten civil liberties, because it created a government of limited powers. However, the potential for great harm to fundamental liberties could be found throughout the Constitution. With no bill of rights the Congress might find it necessary to suppress free speech or freedom of the press in times of war. The government might find it “necessary and proper” to favor one faith or one general religious ideology to accomplish some policy goal. The government might decide that a treaty required the suppression of some liberty at home to achieve a foreign policy goal. The Framers did not see these potential dangers—or did not believe them realistic, and thus did not think the Constitution needed a bill of rights. The First Congress, using the power to amend the Constitution, would remedy the lack of a bill of rights.

PAUL FINKELMAN

References and Further Reading

- Borden, Morton. Jews, Turks, and Infidels. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1984.
- Farrand, Max, ed. The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787. 4 vols. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1966.
- Finkelman, Paul, James Madison and the Bill of Rights: A Reluctant Paternity, Supreme Court Review 1990 (1991): 301–347.
- Levy, Leonard W. Origins of the Bill of Rights. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1999.
- Urofsky, Melvin I., and Paul Finkelman. A March of Liberty: A Constitutional History of the United States. 2 vols. New York: Oxford University Press, 2002.

CONSTITUTION OVERSEAS

The Constitution for the United States contains four provisions that can provide some basis for extending the jurisdiction of the Constitution beyond territorial borders:

1. The power of Congress to declare war and issue letters of marque and reprisal.
2. The power of Congress to punish as crimes 'piracy and felonies on the high seas' and "offenses against the laws of nations.'
3. The power of Congress to fund and regulate military forces everywhere.
4. The commander-in-chief power of the President to command those forces.

With those exceptions, the jurisdiction of the Constitution and statutes and official acts under its authority were originally considered limited to the territory of the nation. This included the territory of states, nonstate territories, and was extended, by the law of nations, to coastal waters, naval vessels flying the U.S. flag, and the grounds of U.S. diplomatic facilities abroad.

By international status of forces agreements, such jurisdiction has been partially extended to the grounds of U.S. military bases abroad. It has long been accepted that U.S. law governs U.S. military personnel anywhere they operate, and by extension, certain civilian contractors under the terms of their contracts.

Although it has been generally accepted that U.S. officials have no authority to officially act on foreign citizens on the territories of their own nations, there has been a movement, beginning in the twentieth century, to extend extraterritorial jurisdiction to civilian U.S. citizens abroad, to foreign nationals charged with "crimes against humanity," and to "enemy combatants" against U.S. forces of any nationality.

The first criminal prosecutions for "crimes against humanity" were in the Nuremberg Trials of German nationals after World War II. The alleged authority for such criminal prosecutions was the unconditional surrender of Germany, which was deemed to have conferred plenary power to the victorious Allies to exercise sovereignty over German territory and its citizens. However, the U.S. Constitution delegates no such power to its officials in such circumstances, even if the surrender could be considered some kind of "treaty," which it was not, since it was not presented to the Senate for ratification as a treaty. The President as commander-in-chief has authority to command U.S. military forces but no power to command civilians of foreign nations no longer in a state of war against us.

In Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1 (1957) the U.S. Supreme Court reversed a conviction of a civilian resident on a U.S. military abroad and issued a clear statement of its findings:

1. When the United States acts against its citizens abroad, it can do so only in accordance with all the limitations imposed by the Constitution, including Art. III, 2, and the Fifth and Sixth Amendments

2. Insofar as Art. 2 (11) of the Uniform Code of Military Justice provides for the military trial of civilian dependents accompanying the armed forces in foreign countries, it cannot be sustained as legislation which is 'necessary and proper' to carry out obligations of the United States under international agreements made with those countries; since no agreement with a foreign nation can confer on Congress or any other branch of the Government power which is free from the restraints of the Constitution
3. The power of Congress under Art. I, 8, cl. 14, of the Constitution, "To make Rules for the Government and Regulation of the land and naval Forces," taken in conjunction with the Necessary and Proper Clause, does not extend to civilians—even though they may be dependents living with servicemen on a military base
4. Under our Constitution, courts of law alone are given power to try civilians for their offenses against the United States

On the other hand, in United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 494 U.S. 259 (1990), the U.S. Supreme court sustained a conviction of a foreign national convicted on the basis of evidence obtained in Mexico without a search warrant, finding that:

The Fourth Amendment does not apply to the search and seizure by United States agents of property owned by a nonresident alien and located in a foreign country.

Extension of criminal jurisdiction to civilian contractors associated with the Department of Defense was legislated in the 2000 Military Extraterritorial Jurisdiction Act. Congress knew that it is nearly impossible to charge civilians under the Uniform Code of Military Justice, even if they work alongside active-duty service members. However, since the Constitution only extends to military personnel, this raises a question of whether the contracts of such civilians make them members of the armed forces subject to the jurisdiction of either U.S. military or civil courts. If not, the only authority would seem to be to prosecute them as "pirates" for warlike acts committed without state authority.

U.S. courts have also thus far sustained assertions of authority to tax U.S. citizens on their earnings from sources not only within U.S. territory, but from foreign sources, and not only while residing on U.S. territory, but while domiciled abroad. Since the U.S. Constitution delegates coercive authority only over "persons" and not "citizens," this would constitute either the extension of U.S. legal jurisdiction to personal jurisdiction over U.S. citizens everywhere, even if they are not contractually part of U.S. military forces, or a conflict with equal protection, which requires equal treatment of persons, not just citizens. U.S. statute does extend voting rights to expatriates in congressional and presidential elections (although the U.S. Constitution delegates power to Congress only to regulate congressional elections), which would avoid violating the principle of “no taxation without representation” but presents an issue of “jurisdiction creep” that has not been adequately tested.

The military actions in Afghanistan and Iraq, and detentions of persons suspected of “terrorism,” has raised several constitutional issues. Many of them center around the availability of due process protection for prisoners held at the Guantanamo Bay base on the island of Cuba. This base is held by the United States under the terms of a simple lease that does not contain a cession of legal jurisdiction over the land leased to the United States. However, such jurisdiction is also not exercised by Cuba. This has created a kind of legal “no-man’s-land,” where U.S. officials have sought to hold detainees as a way to avoid the supervision of any but military tribunals.

On Nov. 8, 2004, Federal District Judge James Robertson ruled that the Bush administration had not followed a lawful procedure in declaring Salim Ahmed Hamdan, held at Guantanamo, an “enemy combatant” who was not entitled to protections and privileges under the Geneva Convention. The “combatant status review tribunals”—used by the Pentagon to decide whether to hold detainees—are not a “competent” court to make such a determination, Robertson said. And the military commission process, which prosecutes detainees using secret evidence and unnamed witnesses, “could not be countenanced in any American court,” the judge ruled.

The U.S. Supreme Court held in Rasul v. Bush, 542 U.S. 466 (2004), that non-U.S. citizen prisoners at Guantanamo may file habeas corpus petitions challenging their imprisonment, as well as claims under federal law concerning the conditions of their confinement. Legislation was introduced in Congress to remove such jurisdiction from the federal courts, but the constitutionality of such legislation is itself in doubt.

JON ROLAND

References and Further Reading

- de Vattel, Emmerich. The Law of Nations. (1758) Joseph Chitty, ed. Philadelphia: Johnson, 1883. <http://www.constitution.org/vattel/vattel.htm>.
 Du Ponceau, Peter Stephen. A Dissertation on the Nature and Extent of the Jurisdiction of the Courts of the United - States*. Philadelphia: Small, 1824. <http://www.constitution.org/cmt/psdp/juris.htm>.

 Grotius, Hugo. The Law of War and Peace. (1625). <http://www.constitution.org/gro/djbp.htm>.
 Stimson, Edward S. Conflict of Criminal Laws. Chicago: Foundation Press, 1936. http://www.constitution.org/cmt/stimson/con_crim.htm.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT PERMITTING SCHOOL PRAYER

The appropriate role of religion in public schooling has long been controversial. At the time of the nation’s founding, few people believed that education could be divorced from religion; religious instruction was viewed as being indispensable for the inculcation of virtue and morality in children. The founders of the nineteenth century common school movement believed, however, that important religious values could be isolated from specific dogmas and tenets that separated denominations and could be taught in a manner acceptable to children of all faiths. The leaders of the common schools—Horace Mann being the most notable figure—were all Protestants, so the “nonsectarian” instruction—teacher-led prayer and readings from the King James version of the Bible—had a distinctly Protestant tone. Early opposition to school prayer and Bible reading came from Catholics, Jews, and a handful of freethinkers, but their attacks on the religious exercises led only to intransigence among education leaders and occasional violence between Protestant nativists and Catholic immigrants. Over time, particularly in cities with large immigrant populations, public schools began to moderate or even dispense with organized religious exercises.

The first attempt to preserve the practices of prayer and Bible reading through a constitutional amendment occurred in the ill-fated Blaine Amendment of 1876. Although the primary focus of the Blaine Amendment was to prevent the payment of public funds to parochial schools, the proposal also contained a provision authorizing school boards to retain school prayer and Bible readings. That latter provision was included in reaction to an 1872 decision by the Ohio Supreme Court affirming the Cincinnati school board’s ban on school prayer and Bible reading (Minor v. Board of Education). In 1888, again in response to concerns of Protestant leaders that public schools were dispensing with the religious exercises, Congress held hearings on a constitutional amendment proposed by Senator Henry W. Blair that would have prohibited the removal of prayer and Bible reading. The proposal died in committee.

During the late-nineteenth and early-twentieth centuries, a handful of state courts struck down devotional school prayer and Bible reading as violative of state constitutional provisions (Wisconsin 1890, Nebraska 1903, Illinois 1910); however, the majority of challenges to such practices failed, with state courts finding the practices constitutional.

The late-nineteenth and early-twentieth century challenges to prayer and Bible reading were based on state constitutional provisions, coming before the incorporation of the First Amendment's Establishment Clause in 1947. In 1948, the U.S. Supreme Court struck down a practice of allowing school children to be released from class for religious instruction by non-school personnel (McCollum v. Board of Education). Four years later, however, the high court stepped back from its controversial decision and upheld "release time" for religious instruction, provided it occurred off school premises (Zorach v. Clauson).

Based on the long-standing practice of religious exercises in public schools, therefore, the Supreme Court's 1962 and 1963 decisions holding prayer and Bible reading to be a violation of the Establishment Clause were extremely controversial. Several members of Congress, led by Representative Frank Becker (R-NY), proposed constitutional amendments to preserve school prayer and Bible reading. Congress held hearings on the "Becker Amendment" in 1964, and initially the measure seemed destined for passage. Only a highly organized effort by mainstream Protestant and Jewish groups, led by the National Council of Churches, defeated the proposed amendment in committee. Subsequent proposed amendments by Senator Everett Dirksen (R-IL) in 1966 and Representative Chambers Wylie (R-OH) in 1970 also died in committee.

Time failed to moderate opposition to the Court's school prayer decisions among religious conservatives. During the late 1970s, a resurgent Religious Right, led by evangelicals Jerry Falwell of the Moral Majority and Pat Robertson of the Christian Broadcasting Network, put a school prayer amendment at the top of their agenda along with an amendment to reverse the Court's 1973 abortion decision (Roe v. Wade). Candidate Ronald Reagan expressed sympathy with a prayer amendment and, after his election as President, Reagan issued a call in 1982 for an amendment: "Nothing in this Constitution shall be construed to prohibit individual or group prayer in public schools or other public institutions. No person shall be required by the United States or any State to participate in prayer." Initially, passage of the "Reagan Amendment" seemed assured. However, moderate Republican Senator Mark Hatfield (R-OR), supported by mainstream religious groups such as the Baptist Joint Committee on Public Affairs, proposed a compromise statute, the Equal Access Act, which authorized student religious club meetings in public secondary schools. After moderate evangelical groups including the Christian Legal Society and the National Association of Evangelicals signaled their support, Congress enacted the Equal Access Act instead of the Reagan Amendment.

Despite the resolution of the Equal Access Act, agitation for a constitutional amendment to protect prayer and Bible reading has resurfaced occasionally, particularly after controversial court decisions. In 1992 and 2000, the Supreme Court struck down prayers at public school graduation ceremonies and athletic events, respectively (Lee v. Weisman; Santa Fe Independent School District v. Doe). Those holdings, and similar holdings by lower courts, elicited proposed constitutional amendments in Congress by Representatives Henry Hyde (R-IL) and Ernest Istook (R-OK), including one to strip the federal courts of jurisdiction to hear school prayer controversies. To date all such proposals have failed.

STEVEN K. GREEN

References and Further Reading

- Alley, Robert S. Without a Prayer: Religious Expression in Public Schools. Amherst, NY: Prometheus Books, 1996.
- DeFattore, Joan. The Fourth R: Conflicts Over Religion in America's Public Schools. New Haven: Yale University Press, 2004.
- Green, Steven K. "Evangelicals and the Becker Amendment: A Lesson in Church-State Moderation." Journal of Church and State 33 (1991): 541-567.
- Ravitch, Frank S. School Prayer and Discrimination. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1999.
- Stokes, Anson Phelps, and Leo Pfeffer. Church and State in the United States. New York: Harper and Row, Pub., 1964.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Engel v. Vitale*, 370 U.S. 421 (1962)
- Lee v. Weisman*, 505 U.S. 577 (1992)
- McCollum v. Board of Education*, 333 U.S. 203 (1948)
- Minor v. Board of Education*, 23 Ohio St. 211 (1872)
- Santa Fe Independent School District v. Doe*, 530 U.S. 290 (2000)
- School District of Abington Township*, 374 U.S. 203 (1963)
- Zorach v. Clauson*, 343 U.S. 306 (1952)

CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF 1787

The delegates to the Constitutional Convention of 1787 (known as the Framers) were initially concerned with creating a stronger, centralized government that would allow for regulation of trade and commerce, provide for a stronger national defense, and reduce tensions and jealousies between the states. The Framers were also concerned about a fair allocation of power in national Congress and the necessity of having a government that could collect taxes and function. The leading Framers decried what they called the “imbecility” of the government under the Articles of Confederation, which was unable to accomplish very much. The Framers believed they were creating a government of relatively limited power, which could only legislate in those areas that were enumerated through specific grants of power to Congress.

Given their vision of a limited government, the Framers were relatively unconcerned about “civil liberties” under the new regime. They believed that the regulation of most behavior would be at the state level, and thus they did not see civil liberties as a particularly important concern for the national government. Most of the Framers did not believe that Congress had the power to regulate freedom of the press or create a state religion, and, therefore, they saw no reason to discuss such powers in the Convention or provide for their protection in the Constitution. Furthermore, most of the Framers could not conceive of a representative government trampling on the fundamental liberties of the people. In their view, kings, princes, and dictators threatened the liberties of the people; legislatures chosen by the people could not do so.

There was, of course, an internal logic to this argument. In England the people had forced the king to grant them rights. King John I signed the Magna Carta at sword point, surrounded by knights and other great men of the realm who demanded he guarantee them certain rights. Over the next four centuries all Englishmen came to believe that they were entitled to some of these rights. In the seventeenth century Englishmen demanded more rights and wrested them from the King in the Civil War, the Glorious Revolution, and through acts of Parliament. The English Bill of Rights was a statute passed by Parliament as part of the Revolution. This history led some Framers to believe that the United States did not need a “bill of rights,” because there was no monarch from which to wrest these rights. On the contrary, they argued that a bill of rights was unnecessary in a government of limited powers in which the people would be sovereign. In a debating congressional power over the army and the militias, James Madison asserted the widely held belief that “the greatest danger to liberty is from large standing armies, it is best to prevent them by an effectual provision for a good Militia.” [2 Farrand 338] This argument led to a number of provisions that kept the military under strict civilian control. It would eventually lead to the Second Amendment, guaranteeing that Congress lacked the power to abolish the state militias (“A well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State . . .”), but did have the power to regulate them and set rules for government them.

These many understandings about the origin of liberties and the threats to them led the Framers to ignore civil liberties issues until the very end of the Convention. The delegates debated the nature of government from the end of May until the end of July without discussing issues that are today considered fundamental aspects of civil liberties. Some protections of civil liberties were taken for granted. In an early debate, for example, James Madison cited “the diversity of religious Sects” to support the idea of checks and balances [1 Farrand 108]. Madison assumed these sects would have the liberty to practice their faiths as they wished. There was no sense in this, or any other debate, that the constitution had to protect religious freedom. Madison and others assumed that Congress would have no power to regulate religious practice and that the states would have to allow religious liberty because of the growing diversity of the nation. In the early debates in the Convention, Madison noted that “religion itself may become a motive to persecution & oppression,” but he argued that large electoral districts, not a bill of rights, would protect against this [1 Farrand 135].

When the draft constitution was first presented, in early August, it contained a few provisions that protected civil liberties. It guaranteed the right to trial by jury for federal criminal offense and guaranteed that the trial would take place in the state where the alleged crime was committed. This would emerge in the final Constitution in Article III, Sec. 2, par. 3. The draft Constitution also defined treason as only “levying war against the United States,” thus eliminating constructive treason or other definitions of treason based on speech or belief.

On August 18, both Madison and Charles Pinckney proposed adding what became the copyright clause of Article I, Sec. 8 of the Constitution. This clause would serve authors and publishers and was key to the development of a free press, although it was seen at the time as more of a protection of economic interests than of civil liberties.

On August 20, almost three months after the beginning of the Convention, a delegate made the first proposals for specific protections of civil liberties. Charles Pinckney of South Carolina proposed a series of additions to the draft constitution. Some of these eventually became part of the original constitution, including the clause limiting the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus, the prohibition of religious tests for office holding, and the prohibition on simultaneous multiple office holding. The first two would be keys to protecting civil liberties in the new nation. The third helped prevent the concentration of power in the hands of a few officials. Pinckney also proposed an explicit clause declaring that “the military shall always be subordinate to the Civil power.” The final Constitution would not have such specific provision, but the spirit of this proposal is clearly evident in the clauses that give Congress authority to make all rules for the military and to appropriate money for the military, while making the president, a civilian, the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy. Finally, Pinckney proposed a clause that would later be incorporated into the Bill of Rights. One was a statement that “The Liberty of the Press shall be inviolably preserved.” The second would form the first clause of what became the Third Amendment: “No soldier shall be quartered in any House in time of peace without the consent of the owner.” Indeed, while the order would be changed slightly, these eighteen words would form the first eighteen words of what became the Third Amendment [2 Farrand 341-42].

In retrospect, it seems astounding that no one at the Convention suggested any of these provisions during the first three months of debate. The best explanation for this is that no one thought such protections of liberty were necessary until after the Constitution took shape, and the framers understood the extent of power the new national government would have. It may seem ironic to modern Americans that the first person to make these proposals was Pinckney, who is most remembered as the most articulate and vociferous defender of slavery and the African slave trade at the convention and the man who, along with Pierce Butler, proposed the fugitive slave clause. However, this connection between civil liberties and slavery should be not seen as ironic. Masters of slaves, like Pinckney, were fully aware of their own civil liberties, and the need to preserve them, even as they denied more fundamental liberties to their slaves.

On the same day Pinckney proposed these additions, George Mason offered a clause that was distinctly hostile to civil liberties. Mason proposed that Congress have the power “to enact sumptuary laws.” Such clause would have allowed Congress to regulate how people dressed, limiting certain kinds of clothing to people certain social classes. Governor Morris, one of the richest men at the Convention and one of the largest landholders in the nation, argued that such laws “tended to create a landed Nobility.” Indeed, such a provision would have given Congress the power to establish social classes and regulate personal expression. Mason argued that such laws were necessary to make sure all citizens maintained “manners.” The Convention wisely voted this proposal down [2 Farrand 344]. Mason would later be remembered for his strident demands for a bill of rights and his refusal to sign the Constitution, because it lacked one. Yet, here he wanted to create a class-based society that would have denied to some people the fundamental right to choose how to dress themselves. Later that day Mason also opposed only allowing the United States to punish treason, arguing that the national government would have only a “qualified sovereignty” [2 Farrand 347]. Such an analysis had strong implications for civil liberties, because it would allow the state to define treason more broadly than merely “making war” on the nation. This would allow the states to use treason to suppress nonviolent opposition to state policies and, as such, suppress civil liberties.

On August 22, the Convention accepted a proposal by Elbridge Gerry and James McHenry to prohibit ex post facto laws and bills of attainder. No one at the Convention opposed a prohibition on bills of attainder that should be banned, but the ex post facto provisions roused the ire of a number of attorneys in the Convention, including Oliver Ellsworth and James Wilson, both of whom would serve on the Supreme Court. They argued that a ban on ex post facto laws was unnecessary, because, as Ellsworth put it, everyone knew that such laws “were void of themselves.” Wilson argued that such a clause would insult the Convention by leading people to believe that the delegates were “ignorant of the first principles of legislation.” In response to these arguments, Daniel Carroll of Maryland pointed out that the states has passed and enforced ex post facto laws, despite the universal belief they were unconstitutional. Wilson jumped on this argument to make a point held by many at the Convention—that a bill of rights or any constitutional provision on civil liberties was useless, because such constitutional prohibitions were unenforceable. Wilson noted that a number of states had passed ex post facto laws despite state constitutional prohibitions. Hugh Williamson agreed with Wilson, noting that in his home state of North Carolina the legislature had ignored the state constitution and passed such laws. Nevertheless, he believed a constitutional prohibition had much value “because the Judge can take hold of it.” In other words, Williamson argued that judicial review would allow courts to strike down laws that violated the Constitution. After a bit more debate, the Convention adopted the provision banning ex post facto laws, just as it had banned bills of attainder [2 Farrand 375-76].

In the weeks that followed, the Convention finished debating and refining the articles dealing with the legislative, executive, and judicial branches. These debates and votes considered various clauses touching on civil liberties, such as jury trials for accused criminals and the civilian control of the military. The Convention also adopted the slave trade provision of Article I, Sec. 9, which allowed the African slave trade to remain open until at least 1808. This was not a civil liberties issue per se, but it clearly affected the civil liberties of approximately 100,000 Africans who were imported into the country, mostly between 1800 and 1808. The Convention also adopted the Fugitive Slave Clause or Article IV, Sec. 2, Par. 3. No one at the Convention articulated any fear that this clause would jeopardize civil liberties, either of blacks or their white allies. From the 1830s to the Civil War, the implementation of this clause would deprive numerous people—free blacks, fugitive slaves, and white abolitionists—of their civil liberties. But this potential problem was not obvious to anyone at the Convention.

On August 30, with the heated debate over the African slave trade behind them, the Convention returned to finalizing the document. The delegates agreed, without debate, to add the words “or affirmation” to the clause on the presidential oath and later did the same for all other required oaths. This allowed Quakers and others who were opposed to taking oaths, to hold office under the new Constitution. This can be seen as the first constitutionally sanctioned accommodation to religion under the Constitution. Charles Pinckney once again proposed that there be no religious tests for office holding. Roger Sherman thought this was unnecessary because “the prevailing liberality” was “a sufficient security ag[ain]st such tests” [2 Farrand 468]. The Convention wisely rejected Sherman’s protest and unanimously accepted Pinckney’s proposal. The Convention then spent nearly two weeks revising the rest of the Constitution and debating the powers of the president and how it would be both elected and removed from office. The delegates were worried about presidential power and the tyranny of the executive. The debates obviously had implications for civil liberties, which could easily be destroyed by a president turned dictator. But there was not explicit discussion of civil liberties. On September 10, the Convention turned the draft Constitution over to a Committee of Style, which came back on the 12th with what was more or less the final version of the Constitution.

At this point, after almost three and half months of debate, a few delegates suddenly noticed that the Constitution did not have a bill of rights. Hugh Williamson noted that the Constitution did not have a provision to protect the right of a jury trial in civil cases. Nathaniel Gorham asserted that it “was not possible to discriminate equity cases from those in which juries are proper” and thus “this issue should be left to the legislature.” Elbridge Gerry, who a week later would refuse to sign the Constitution, argued that juries were necessary “to guard ag[ain]st corrupt judges” [2 Farrand 587]. George Mason, who would also refuse to sign the Constitution, said that a statement of the general principle of having juries, where appropriate, could resolve this issue.

But, the lack of a protection of civil juries was not the real problem. Mason asserted, for the first time in the Convention, that “He wished the plan had been prefaced with a Bill of Rights, & would second a Motion if made for the purpose—It would give great quiet to the people; and with the aid of the State declarations, a bill might be prepared in a few hours.” Elbridge Gerry, then proposed a bill of rights. Roger Sherman of Connecticut replied that the state bills of rights were not repealed by the Constitution and would be sufficient to protect the liberties of the people. He also argued that the national legislature “may be safely trusted” to protect liberty. Mason answered that the laws of the United States would be “paramount to the State Bills of Rights,” implying that liberties protected by states could be trumped by federal law or even by the federal courts. The state delegations then voted unanimously to reject the call for the addition of a Bill of Rights. Mason and Gerry doubtless supported the measure in their delegations, but no delegation supported them [2 Farrand 588-89].

The next day (September 13) Mason once again asked for a clause allowing Congress to pass sumptuary laws. The convention agreed to send this to a committee, but it never emerged from the committee. On the 14th the disgruntled Mason tried to remove the ban on “ex post facto” laws, arguing that the phrase was unclear. The Convention voted this down. The Convention then rejected a motion to add a clause “that the liberty of the Press should be inviolably observed.” Roger Sherman argued it was unnecessary because “the power of Congress does not extend to the Press.” Four states, Massachusetts, Maryland, Virginia, and South Carolina, supported this provision, but the rest did not [2 Farrand 617-18].

This was the last debate over a bill of rights. The next day George Mason announced he would not sign the Constitution. His speech, which was later published, was a wholesale denunciation of the Constitution and reflected his deep dissatisfaction with a stronger national government. He began the speech with a statement about the lack of a bill of rights:

There is no Declaration of Rights, and the laws of the general government being paramount to the laws and constitution of the several States, the Declaration of Rights in the separate States are no security. Nor are the people secured even in the enjoyment of the benefit of the common law (which stands here upon no other foundation than its having been adopted by the respective acts forming the constitutions of the several States).

However, nowhere else in the speech did he complain about the lack of protection for civil liberties. He complained about the continuation of the African Slave Trade, which would lower the value his own state's excess slaves, but he also complained that the regulation of trade in general would hurt the South. While not focusing on any specific civil liberties that were not protected, Mason did, however, attack the Constitution for prohibiting ex post facto laws, which most civil libertarians consider one of the great protections of liberty in the Constitution.

Mason's last speech, as well as the brief debate in September over a protection of a free press, helps explain why the Framers did not include a bill of rights in the Constitution. Most of the delegates agreed with Roger Sherman that a bill of rights was unnecessary, because they believed that Congress lacked the power to regulate religion or the press or any other fundamental liberties. Mason, who is often credited with pushing for the Bill of Rights after the Constitution was ratified, seems to have raised the issue mostly to express his general displeasure over the Constitution. It is extremely doubtful that Mason or Gerry would have signed the document, even if "the plan had been prefaced with a Bill of Rights," as he "wished." The fact that he waited until the last week of the Convention to raise this issue suggests that the Bill of Rights and civil liberties in general was not a high priority for him. Pinckney, who happily signed the Constitution, thought that the Framers should explicitly protect the "liberty of the Press," and four delegations agreed with him. However, the rest of the Convention did not, accepting Sherman's position that it was unnecessary. The majority of the Framers also must have understood that if they protected the press, they would have to protect every other civil liberty. Otherwise opponents of the Constitution would accuse them of planning to subvert all other liberties. Thus, the Framers rejected the demand for a bill of rights as unnecessary. The lack of a bill of rights would become an issue in the debate over ratification, but probably they Framers were wiser for refusing to be trapped into a debate of that issue at the Convention.

PAUL FINKELMAN

References and Further Reading

Farrand, Max, ed. The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787. 4 vols. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1966.

Finkelman, Paul, James Madison and the Bill of Rights: A Reluctant Paternity, Supreme Court Review 1990 (1991): 301–347.

Levy, Leonard W. Origins of the Bill of Rights. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1999.

Urofsky, Melvin I., and Paul Finkelman. A March of Liberty: A Constitutional History of the United States. 2 vols. New York: Oxford University Press, 2002.

CONTENT-BASED REGULATION OF SPEECH

One of the most important principles of First Amendment jurisprudence states that the government may not regulate speech solely on the basis of its content. Public debate would be distorted, and individual autonomy impaired, if the government were allowed to pick and choose certain ideas, viewpoints, or types of information to suppress. A law is content based if it limits or restricts speech that concerns an entire topic ("subject matter discrimination") or that expresses a particular stance or ideology ("viewpoint discrimination"). The Supreme Court generally invalidates content-based speech regulations unless the government can meet an exacting standard of justification known as "strict scrutiny" analysis.

The content distinction is a relatively recent development in First Amendment law. The Court first established its importance in Police Department of Chicago v. Mosely (1972). In that case, postal worker Earl Mosely challenged a Chicago ordinance that prohibited all picketing outside schools except for "peaceful picketing of any school involved in a labor dispute." Mosely had for several months picketed a high school that he believed engaged in racial discrimination. The Court struck down the ordinance because it applied selectively, depending on what message picketers carried on their signs. Writing for the Court, Justice Marshall explained that "above all else, the First Amendment means that government has no power to restrict expression because of its message, its ideas, its subject matter, or its viewpoint."

Pursuant to strict scrutiny analysis, content regulations of speech are unconstitutional unless they are (1) justified by a compelling state interest; and (2) narrowly drawn to achieve that interest with the minimum abridgement of free expression. The compelling-interest prong of the test ensures that speech cannot be restricted just because the majority finds it offensive. For example, in Texas v. Johnson (1989), the Court invalidated the conviction of a protestor who burned an American flag at the Republican National Convention. Although Texas claimed that its flag desecration statute served to prevent breaches of the peace and encourage respect for the flag, the Court found these arguments unconvincing. Rather, the Court concluded that the statute's real purpose was to eliminate political protests considered by many to be insulting and unpatriotic. In his opinion for the Court, Justice Brennan noted that "the bedrock principle underlying the First Amendment . . . is that the Government may not prohibit the expression of an idea simply because society finds the idea itself offensive or disagreeable."

Even where a compelling justification exists, a content-based speech regulation will not meet the requirements of strict scrutiny if it is overbroad and limits too much speech. In Simon & Schuster v. Members of the New York State Crime Victims Board (1991), the Supreme Court unanimously declared New York's "Son of Sam Law" unconstitutional as penalizing expression based on its content. The law provided that all profits made by criminals who wrote about their illegal activities were to be redistributed to crime victims, whereas criminals who wrote about other topics could keep their earnings. Although the Court agreed that the state had a compelling interest in preventing criminals from capitalizing on their crimes, it held that the New York statute was not sufficiently narrow in scope. Had the law been in effect at the time, the Court noted that it would have placed a financial disincentive on valuable works of literature by authors such as Malcolm X, Thoreau, Martin Luther King, Jr., and even Saint Augustine.

Although the Court generally treats content discrimination with disfavor, the justices do not always agree about what constitutes content-based regulation. In Hill v. Colorado (2000), for instance, six of the nine justices upheld a Colorado statute that made it a crime to approach within eight feet of another person outside a medical facility without consent "for the purpose of passing a leaflet or handbill to, displaying a sign to, or engaging in oral protest, education, or counseling with such other person." The majority concluded that the statute was neither content nor viewpoint based because it applied equally to "all 'protest,' to all 'counseling,' and to all demonstrators whether or not the demonstration concerns abortion, and whether they oppose or support the woman who has made the abortion decision." Content-neutral speech restrictions are subject to a less-demanding level of judicial scrutiny; therefore, the Court was able to uphold the statute as a valid time, place, and manner regulation. Dissenting, Justice Scalia argued that the abortion clinic no-approach buffer zone was "obviously and undeniably content-based" because its intent and practical effect was to limit the speech of abortion opponents.

One of the paradoxes in First Amendment jurisprudence is that despite both the obvious importance of the content distinction and the Court's absolutist-sounding rhetoric in cases such as Mosely, the Constitution does not always prohibit content-based regulations of speech. The Court has identified certain categories of expression that are unprotected (such as libel, obscenity, or fighting words) or entitled only to limited protection (such as commercial speech) under the First Amendment. These speech categories, which undeniably are defined by their content, are exceptions to the rule that all content-based regulations are presumptively unconstitutional. Rather, in these areas, the Court has determined that a compelling interest already exists for treating the entire category of speech as outside the boundaries of First Amendment protection.

Yet even within these unprotected categories of speech, the government does not have free rein to regulate expression based on content. In R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul, the Court overturned a city ordinance that prohibited hate speech based on race, color, religion, or gender, but not political affiliation or sexual orientation. In his opinion for the Court, Justice Scalia explained that although the state could outlaw all fighting words, the city's partial ban impermissibly discriminated within that speech category on the basis of content. The government may not make content distinctions even within these lower classes of speech solely because of official disapproval of the ideas expressed. "Thus," Justice Scalia wrote, "the government may proscribe libel; but it may not make the further content discrimination of proscribing only libel critical of the government."

NICOLE B. CÁSAZ

References and Further Reading

- Chemerinsky, Erwin, Content Neutrality as a Central Problem of Freedom of Expression: Problems in the Supreme Court's Application, S. Cal. L. Rev. 74 (2000): 49–64.
 Farber, Daniel A. The First Amendment, 2nd ed. New York: Foundation Press, 2003.
 Redish, Martin H., The Content Distinction in First Amendment Analysis, Stan. L. Rev. 34 (1981): 1131–51.
 Stone, Geoffrey R., Content Regulation and the First Amendment, Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 25 (1983): 189–252.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Hill v. Colorado*, 530 U.S. 703 (2000)
Police Department of Chicago v. Mosely, 408 U.S. 92 (1972)
R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul, 505 U.S. 377 (1992)

Simon & Schuster v. New York State Crime Victims Board, 502 U.S. 105 (1991)
Texas v. Johnson, 491 U.S. 397 (1989)

See also Anti-Abortion Protest and Freedom of Speech; Categorical Approach to Free Speech; Content-Neutral Regulation of Speech; Flag Burning; Time, Place & Manner Rule; Viewpoint Discrimination in Free Speech Cases

CONTENT-NEUTRAL REGULATION OF SPEECH

While phrased in absolute terms, the free speech clause has been interpreted to require a greater level of justification for government regulation of the content of speech and a lesser degree of justification for speech regulations that apply without regard to the content of speech. When governments impose the latter form of speech regulations, they are called content-neutral regulations of speech. The essential distinction between content-based regulation of speech and content-neutral speech regulations is that the former regulates on the basis of what is said, whereas the latter regulates on the basis of either how, when, or where the speech is uttered, or is only an incidental restriction on speech that has as its purpose the regulation of some conduct that is not related to speech. Some facially content-neutral laws are treated as content based if their application hinges on what the speaker says (for example, a law against disturbing the peace is treated as content based when it is applied because of what the speaker says). Some content-based laws are treated as content neutral if their purpose is to address the “secondary effects” of that speech, effects that are not produced by what is said but are merely adventitious by-products of the regulated speech. Content-neutral regulations of speech can be subdivided into three main types: restrictions on the time, place, or manner of speech; restrictions on conduct that have only an incidental and unintended effect on expression that is part of the regulated conduct; and restrictions intended to control the “secondary effects” of regulated speech.

Time, Place, or Manner Regulations

In general, governments may regulate the time, place, or manner of speech, so long as the restrictions on speech “are justified without reference to the content of the regulated speech, . . . are narrowly tailored to serve a significant governmental interest, and . . . leave open ample alternative channels for communication of the information” Clark v. Community for Creative Non-Violence, 468 U.S. 288, 293 (1984). This rule was articulated as early in 1949, in Kovacs v. Cooper, 336 U.S. 77 (1949), in which the Supreme Court upheld a ban on “loud and raucous” sound trucks. In Ward v. Rock Against Racism, 491 U.S. 781 (1989), the Court clarified its requirement that content-neutral time, place, or manner regulations be “narrowly tailored to serve a significant governmental interest” by noting that such regulations “need not be the least restrictive or least intrusive means of doing so So long as the means chosen are not substantially broader than necessary to achieve the government’s interest, [a] regulation will not be invalid simply because a court concludes that the government’s interest could be adequately served by some less-speech-restrictive alternative.” In recent years the Supreme Court has stressed the importance of leaving open “ample alternative channels of communication.” In Ladue v. Gilleo, 512 U.S. 43 (1994), for example, the Court struck down a municipal ordinance banning almost all signs displayed on or in residences. The majority noted that the city had “almost completely foreclosed a venerable means of communication that is both unique and important” and opined that the danger posed to free speech by bans of an entire medium of communication is that “such measures can suppress too much speech.”

The line between content-based and content-neutral regulations was blurred in Hill v. Colorado, 530 U.S. 703 (2000), in which the Court upheld a ban on approaching a person in close proximity to a medical facility to “engage in oral protest, education, or counseling” without the other person’s consent. The majority thought the ban was content neutral because it applied to any such speech, not just abortion protests. The dissenters claimed that the ban was content based because it was triggered by what the speaker says.

Regulations of Symbolic Conduct or Symbolic Speech

Government regulation of conduct does not generally implicate the free speech guarantee, but because some conduct does communicate ideas, the Supreme Court has crafted a test to determine when it is permissible for governments to regulate conduct when such regulation also restricts the symbolic speech imbedded in the regulated conduct. In United States v. O’Brien, 391 U.S. 367 (1968), the Supreme Court upheld a ban on the knowing destruction or mutilation of a military draft registration certificate, as applied to David O'Brien, who publicly burned his draft card as part of a demonstration against the Vietnam War. The Court assumed that O'Brien's action was sufficiently communicative to invoke the free speech clause but concluded that the government's ban on destruction or mutilation of a draft card was valid because it was "within the constitutional power of the Government" (considered apart from the free speech issue); furthered "an important or substantial governmental interest" (facilitating the military draft); the governmental interest was "unrelated to the suppression of free expression;" and the "incidental restriction on [free speech was] no greater than is essential to the furtherance of [the governmental] interest." Although O'Brien created the test for symbolic speech or conduct, the case was much criticized as an erroneous application of the principle, especially because there was evidence in the legislative record that the statute was enacted to punish this particularly inflammatory mode of protesting the Vietnam War.

The heightened level of scrutiny demanded by O'Brien only applies when the regulation impinges on "conduct with a significant expressive element" or "where a statute based on a nonexpressive activity has the inevitable effect of singling those out engaged in expressive activity" Arcara v. Cloud Books, 478 U.S. 697 (1986). In general, conduct "possesses sufficient communicative elements to bring the First Amendment into play" when the actor intends "to convey a particularized message" and there is a great likelihood "that the message would be understood by those who viewed it" Texas v. Johnson, 491 U.S. 397 (1989).

A series of flag-burning and flag desecration cases have cemented the principle that, under the O'Brien test, the government's asserted interest must not only be real but unrelated to the suppression of ideas. In Spence v. Washington, 418 U.S. 405 (1974), and in Smith v. Goguen, 415 U.S. 566 (1974), the Court found that the government's interest in promoting respect for the American flag was related to the suppression of ideas. In Spence the Court overturned a conviction for taping a peace sign to a flag, and in Smith the Court struck down a conviction for sewing a flag to the seat of one's pants. This came to a head in Texas v. Johnson, in which the Court overturned Johnson's conviction for "desecration of a venerated object," conduct that consisted of burning the American flag. A year later, in United States v. Eichman, 496 U.S. 310 (1990), the Supreme Court also voided the federal Flag Protection Act of 1989. Because the flag is an unalloyed symbol of the nation, its use—whether it ranges from display to destruction—inevitably involves communication of some idea, be it respect or contempt for America. Thus, the Court saw the governmental interest in proscribing destruction of the flag to be inherently related to the suppression of the idea of contempt for America and the flag for which it stands. Of course, the principle applies more broadly than just to flag burning. In Schacht v. United States, 398 U.S. 58 (1970), the Supreme Court invalidated the application of a federal law forbidding the wearing of an American military uniform without authorization to an actor performing in a dramatic protest of the Vietnam War, because another federal law permitted the wearing of American military uniforms in theatrical productions so long as "the portrayal does not tend to discredit" the military. The interplay of the two statutes provided proof that the government's interest in limiting the wearing of military uniforms in dramas was related to the suppression of ideas.

The flag-burning cases produced calls for a constitutional amendment to permit punishment of flag burners. Although some of those proposals have received the requisite majority in the House of Representatives, none have been approved by the Senate.

While many of the cases dealing with symbolic speech have involved the politically charged issue of flag desecration, the most recent applications have involved more prosaic and salacious matters. In each of Barnes v. Glen Theatre, Inc., 501 U.S. 560 (1991) and City of Erie v. Pap's A.M., 529 U.S. 277 (2000), the Supreme Court upheld state laws banning public nudity, as applied to nude dancing. The Court conceded that there was some protected expression in nude dancing but thought that the government's interest in prohibiting such conduct was sufficiently unrelated to the suppression of the erotic ideas inherent in nude dancing to warrant application of the O'Brien test. Moreover, because the ordinance at issue in Erie permitted dancers to perform wearing only "pasties" and G-strings, the inhibition on the expressive element of the dancers' performance was as minimal as the required garments.

The Secondary Effects Doctrine

The third type of content-neutral regulations are those that address the so-called secondary effects doctrine. The essence of this doctrine is that content-based regulations of speech that are intended to regulate conduct that is closely associated with the regulated speech but that is not produced by the content of the speech are treated as if they are content neutral, and thus valid if they are narrowly tailored to serve a significant government interest and leave open ample alternative channels of communication. This is, of course, a legal fiction, but one that the Supreme Court has created to deal almost exclusively with the collateral effects of pornographic, but not obscene, speech. In Young v. American Mini Theatres, 427 U.S. 50 (1976), the Court upheld a Detroit zoning law that required purveyors of pornographic materials to disperse throughout the city. The purpose of the law was to ameliorate the problems of public drunkenness, drug dealing, theft, and other criminal behavior that is closely associated spatially with concentrations of smut houses, but which is not produced by the consumption of smut. The plurality opinion in Young made much of the fact that pornographic expression is of lesser value than other speech. This doctrine was extended in Renton v. Playtime Theatres, Inc., 475 U.S. 41 (1986), in which the Court upheld a municipal zoning ordinance that required movie theaters exhibiting pornographic films to locate in a limited portion of the community. The doctrine was extended even further in City of Erie v. Pap's A.M., in which the Court applied the secondary effects doctrine to conclude that Erie's substantial governmental interest in prohibiting nude dancing was to alleviate the secondary effects of such tawdry expression and that this interest was unrelated to the suppression of ideas.

Not every effect of regulated speech is a secondary effect. When the behavior that the government seeks to control by regulating speech is the natural, foreseeable reaction of listeners' reaction to the speech, such effects are not treated as secondary effects. The District of Columbia enacted a law barring the display within 500 feet of an embassy any sign that might bring the foreign government into "public odium [or] disrepute." D. C. defended the law as intended to address the secondary effects of demonstrations against foreign governments: an increased risk of public disorder and crime. The Supreme Court rejected that argument in Boos v. Barry, 485 U.S. 312 (1988): "Listeners' reactions to speech are [not] 'secondary effects.'" Because the law focused "on the direct impact of speech on its audience," the law was regarded as content based and thus subject to the strict scrutiny test in free speech cases.

Content-neutral regulations are subject to a lesser degree of scrutiny than content-based regulations, because there seems to be less danger that the government is attempting to skew the nature of public discourse. Moreover, content-neutral regulations are far more likely to have some plausible noncensorial reason for their enactment. But because content-neutral regulations have the potential to foreclose all speech, or all of a given type of speech, by drawing the scope of the regulation broadly the Supreme Court has insisted on the intermediate level of scrutiny embodied by the combination of the time, place, or manner and the O'Brien tests.

CALVIN MASSEY

References and Further Reading

- Kagan, Elena, Private Speech, Public Purpose: The Role of Governmental Motive in First Amendment Doctrine, U. Chi. L. Rev. 415 (1996): 63:446-463.
 Stone, Geoffrey, Content-Neutral Restrictions, U. Chi. L. Rev. 54 (1987): 46.
 ———, Content Regulation and the First Amendment, William & Mary L. Rev. 189, (1983): 25:207-217.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Arcara v. Cloud Books*, 478 U.S. 697 (1986)
Barnes v. Glen Theatre, Inc., 501 U.S. 560 (1991)
Boos v. Barry, 485 U.S. 312 (1988)
City of Erie v. Pap's A.M., 529 U.S. 277 (2000)
Clark v. Community for Creative Non-Violence, 468 U.S. 288, 293 (1984)
Hill v. Colorado, 530 U.S. 703 (2000)
Kovacs v. Cooper, 336 U.S. 77 (1949)
Ladue v. Gilleo, 512 U.S. 43 (1994)
Renton v. Playtime Theatres, Inc., 475 U.S. 41 (1986)
Schacht v. United States, 398 U.S. 58 (1970)
Smith v. Goguen, 415 U.S. 566 (1974)
Spence v. Washington, 418 U.S. 405 (1974)
Texas v. Johnson, 491 U.S. 397 (1989)
United States v. Eichman, 496 U.S. 310 (1990)
United States v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367 (1968)
Ward v. Rock Against Racism, 491 U.S. 781 (1989)
Young v. American Mini Theatres, 427 U.S. 50 (1976)

See also Abortion Protest Cases; Anti-Abortion Protest and Freedom of Speech, City of Erie v. Pap's A.M., 529 U.S. 277 (2000); Content-Based Regulation of Speech, Draft Card Burning; Flag Burning; Freedom of Speech and Press: Nineteenth Century; Freedom of Speech: Modern Period (1917–Present); Intermediate Scrutiny Test in Free Speech Cases; O'Brien Content-Neutral Free Speech Test; O'Brien Formula; Renton v. Playtime Theatres, Inc., 475 U.S. 41 (1986); Secondary Effects Doctrine; Speech versus Conduct Distinction; Symbolic Speech; Theories of Free Speech Protection; Two-Tiered Theory of Free Speech; United States v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367 (1968); Young v. American Mini Theaters, Inc., 427 U.S. 50 (1976)

COOLIDGE v. NEW HAMPSHIRE, 403 U.S. 443 (1971)

In Coolidge v. New Hampshire, the Supreme Court addressed the question of which state officials may validly issue search warrants.

In 1964, a fourteen-year-old girl was murdered in Manchester, New Hampshire. A subsequent investigation led the police to suspect Edward H. Coolidge, Jr., of the crime. The police presented their evidence to the State Attorney General who supervised the investigation and who would later serve as chief prosecutor at Coolidge's trial. Acting in his capacity as a justice of the peace under New Hampshire law, the Attorney General issued a search warrant for Coolidge's car. The police impounded the car, vacuumed its carpet, and discovered evidence linking Coolidge to the murder. State courts rejected Coolidge's claim that the search violated the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments.

In an opinion written by Justice Potter Stewart, the Supreme Court held that the Constitution prohibits the issuance of a warrant except where probable cause has been found by a "neutral and detached magistrate" who independently assessed the evidence collected by the police. In Coolidge, the chief investigator/prosecutor in this case was not sufficiently "neutral and detached." Only a plurality of the Court, however, found that the search did not fall under any of the exceptions to the warrant requirement and that the evidence against Coolidge should have been suppressed.

Coolidge affirms the principle that the Fourth Amendment serves as a check on the power of police to search and seize property without a prior, independent assessment by a neutral state official.

LARRY CUNNINGHAM

References and Further Reading

LaFave, Wayne R. "The 'Neutral and Detached Magistrate' Requirement." Sec. 4.2 of Search and Seizure: A Treatise on the Fourth Amendment. Vol. 2. 4th ed. St. Paul: Thomson/West, 2004.

